IN DETROIT we found Canadian-American relations a trifle strained. There are about five hundred Canadians in Detroit yearning to get back but can't because they're having trouble proving to the Canadian migration authorities that they're in Canada. In Windsor there is a considerable number of Americans who to get back but can't because the evidence that they belong south of the border. It's all due to the new migration laws and the general suspicion that everybody everywhere is a desirable alien. An agent from the Justice Department was explaining to us. He'd been pretty well over ground and calls it a standoff. The stranded Canadians on our side remained here and we let Canada have the Americans grounded on her side. He said, you could call it even. It's not as simple as that. In Canada seeking to return from tourists are residents of the United States born in Europe, had never bothered to become naturalized. And, of course, that's true of residents of Canada stranded in Detroit. Some of them came from countries that Mr. Willkie has abolished. In any case, Mr. Willkie wouldn't let them in. And to make all the worse for them, Washington and Ottawa have taken the matter turning it over to special committees. This, the stranded ones are convinced, means that they won't get home in years.

BUT WHAT a swell excuse. . . .

Vol. 106, No. 7. Entered as second-class matter at Post Office, Springfield, Ohio, U. S. A., under Act of March 3, 1879, and at Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, Springfield, Ohio. Publishers of Women's Home Companion, The American Magazine, Collier's. Copyright, 1940, The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, in the United States, Canada and Great Britain. Executive and Editorial Offices: 250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.; 6 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London. Published weekly at Springfield, Ohio, U. S. A. Joseph P. Knapp, Chairman of the Board; Thomas H. Beck, President; Albert E. Winger, Executive Vice President and Treasurer; Gertrude B. Lane, Vice President; John S. Brehm, Vice President; William P. Larkin, Vice President; J. A. Welch, Vice President; Denis O'Sullivan, Secretary. Manuscripts or art submitted to Collier's, The National Weekly, should be accompanied by addressed envelopes and sufficient postage for their return. The Publisher assumes no responsibility for return of unsolicited manuscripts or art. Price, 5 cents a copy in the United States, $2.00 a year, $3.50 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, Argentina, Balearic Islands, Bolivia, Brazil, Canary Islands, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Labrador, Mexico, Newfoundland, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Puerto Rico, Uruguay and Venezuela. Price in Canada, 7 cents a copy and Colonies. Foreign subscriptions including postage by mail or express money order: two years, $5.00; three years, $7.00. Foreign subscriptions including postage by mail or express money order: two years, $5.50; three years, $7.50. Remit by postal or express money order in United States funds to The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, Springfield, Ohio. To avoid mistakes in delivery, subscribers should notify us of address five weeks in advance. Give both old and new addresses.

HOW WOULD YOU VOTE ON THIS QUESTION?

WHICH ARE WORSE—BLOW-OUTS OR SKIDS?

Thousands say "I'M MORE SCARED OF SKIDS"

No matter how you vote, remember this: Goodrich Silvertowns are built to give the quickest non-skid stops you've ever had.

Others report "I THINK BLOW-OUTS ARE WORSE"

Whether you agree or not, don't forget that Goodrich Silvertowns give you maximum protection against high-speed blow-outs.

All agree
"BOTH ARE DANGEROUS"

So why not get the Goodrich Silvertown—with its tread that's a "life-saver" on wet, slippery roads... and a special, internal ply construction that's a "life-saver" against high-speed blow-outs.

WHY ARGUE? Silvertowns protect you against BOTH

Do you agree with those who say skids are worse? Or could you yourself say "blow-outs"? There's room for plenty of argument, of course. But when you look at the accident reports ONE FACT STANDS OUT—BOTH ARE DANGEROUS.

Avoid "Half-Way" Protection

Maybe you've never realized it but you can now get a tire that gives you maximum protection against BOTH skids and blow-outs—and it's the new Goodrich Safety Silvertown. On the outside, the Life-Saver Tread has a regular "windshield-wiper" action on wet roads... an endless procession of spiral bars that sweep the water right and left and force it out through the deep drainage grooves. This rapid-fire wiping action leaves a track so dry you can actually light a match on it... so dry, too, that you get the quickest non-skid stops you've ever had.

Not only that, the famous Golden Ply construction of Silvertowns is noted for maximum resistance to high-speed blow-outs. The specially-treated plies that Goodrich now builds into all Silvertowns resist internal blowout-causing heat—give you greater safety every day you drive. No wonder these plies are described as "Life-Saver" plies.

After you hear the BANG of a blow-out or feel a skid starting it's too late to change your tire protection. For safety's sake get your Silvertowns today. If it will be easier to make your own terms than to pay cash, take advantage of the liberal Budget Plan available at Goodrich Silvertown Stores and many Goodrich Dealers.

the new Goodrich SAFETY Silvertown

DON'T MISS JIMMIE LYNCH'S DEATH DODGERS AT THE GOODRICH ARENA... N. Y. WORLD'S FAIR

OL' JUDGE ROBBINS

IN RECENT LABORATORY "SMOKING BOWL" TESTS, PRINCE ALBERT BURNED

86 DEGREES COOLER

THAN THE AVERAGE OF THE 30 OTHER OF THE LARGEST-SELLING BRANDS TESTED—COOLEST OF ALL!

Copyright, 1940. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, Winston-Salem, North Carolina

STEP UP SUMMER FUN WITH COOLER-BURNING SMOKES!

OVER-HOT SMOKES FLATTEN TASTE, DESTROY DELICATE MILDNESS. I BOOST SMOKING PLEASURE AND COMFORT WITH COOLER-BURNING PRINCE ALBERT

PIPES PUFF SMOOTHER WITH P.A.—ALL THE GOODNESS OF RIPE, FULLY AGED TOBACCO COMES THROUGH WITHOUT HARSHNESS

MORE JOY FOR 'MAKIN'S' FANS, TOO, THE P.A. WAY. THE CRIMP CUT LAYS RIGHT, ROLLS UP FAST, NEAT—STAYS LIT, TOO

50 pipefuls of fragrant tobacco in every handy tin of Prince Albert

PRINCE ALBERT
CRIMP CUT LONG BURNING PIPE AND CIGARETTE TOBACCO

PRINCE ALBERT

THE NATIONAL JOY SMOKE

KEEP UP WITH THE WORLD

By Freling Foster

Botanists are now producing a wide variety of new plants through the use of a drug called colchicine. Either soaking the seeds in a solution or painting the buds with a salve makes flowers, trees, fruits and vegetables not only take on new shapes and colors, but also grow to double their normal size.

Few Americans have ever played, or even watched, a game of real or court tennis, forerunner of lawn tennis, because it is almost exclusively a millionaire's pastime. There are only ten courts in the United States—on large estates and in select clubs—and they cost between $80,000 and $150,000 apiece.

During the life of the Third Republic of France from February, 1871, to June, 1940, the country changed its cabinet 106 times, or on an average of once about every eight months.

In accordance with the Anglo-Portuguese treaties of 1914 and 1916, no wine produced in the British Empire can be labeled and sold as port.

After a steel mill is through with the palm oil and bran which it uses in the manufacture of tin plate, they are mixed and sold as a fattening food for livestock.—By F. D. McHugh, New York, New York.

Probably the only private "time capsule" is a $75,000 pyramid in Monte Ne, Arkansas, erected by William Hope Harvey between 1932, when he was defeated as the presidential candidate on the Liberty party ticket, and his death in 1936. Its vault contains copies of his books on how to cure the ills of the world, preserved for more intelligent generations than his own, which failed to appreciate him.

In Dutch Guiana, the bush Negroes, who do not wear such fancy attire as trousers and dresses, are obliged by law to rent these clothes in a store on the edge of a town before entering it for a day's visit.—By Lois Catuna, Northport, Long Island.

Many persons, who have been commanded while under labor to perform a certain act on a definite date, have executed their order punctually on the day, even a whole year later.

An analysis of the testimony of 20,000 persons who were asked to describe the physical characteristics of the man they saw committing a crime revealed that, on the average, overestimated the height by inches, the age by eight years, gave the wrong hair color in 83 percent of the cases.

Certain plants have grown twice their normal size after their seeds were subjected to such vibrations, or inaudible sound waves, for only three minutes.—Julian R. Frederick, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

The only element that has not changed in color by corrosion alone is phosphorus, which changes from white to black under the pressure of seven tons to the square inch.—By Nanette R. Washington, D. C.

During the great fire of 1902, the play given nightly on Liberty Island at the New York World was about 12,000 separate pyrotechnic units costing approximately $100,000. Some of which were set off, some of which were not. Although the fire lasted only fifteen minutes, forty experts work all day long on the 200 pieces of floating equipment.

The Tremont House, which opened in Boston in 1829, was the first American hotel to rent a tire room to one guest. Up to that time, it was the custom to rent three or four persons, usually strangers to one another, to occupy a single room and sleep on one large bed.

Five dollars will be paid for each unusual fact accepted for the Contributions must be accompanied by factory proof. Address: Keep U. World, Collier's, 250 Park Avenue City. This column is copyrighted by The National Weekly. None of the material reproduced without express permission of the publisher.

It wasn't all
HUSTLE
 AND BUSTLE
in the early
Oil Days...

Here's tranquility in the midst of excitement—a peaceful scene in the sixties at the old Indian Rock Oil Company along historic Oil Creek. Note costumes, postures, gadgets—including trout rods, creel and bird-cages. And don't miss the barefoot boy in the foreground. Seething excitement was usual on the Miller Farm where this peaceful picture was made. Wells on this farm became spectacular producers of Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil—the same top-quality crude which today makes your Pennsylvania Motor Oils. These oils steadily have been the favored motor oils since the first motor car was built.

Big boom and bang man of the early oil days. Owen Roberts of the old torpedo firm W. B. Roberts & Son, Bradford, Pennsylvania, had a lot to do with perfecting the process of "shooting" a well to make oil flow more freely. Roberts' torpedoes played a big role in Pennsylvania oil producing technique. Always the quality leader of the oil industry, Pennsylvania also produced most methods of recovery and refining in use today.

Tinker is an oil man's middle name. Our picture shows Clyde Warner tinkering with a drilling rig about to be set up in Venango County, Pennsylvania. This rig will reach down into the oil sands where Nature's choicest crude (Pennsylvania, of course) is stored, and bring to the surface crude oil to make more Pennsylvania Motor Oils to lubricate the cars, the trucks, the planes, the ships, on which the whole world moves.

Under temperatures controlled to hundredths of a degree, this laboratory worker at State College, Pennsylvania, tests the viscosity, or body, of a Pennsylvania Motor Oil to be sure no adulteration has occurred. Stop-clocks register its rate of flow. High viscosity (ability to flow in cold weather, and to hold body in terrific heat) is one of the superiorities which makes Pennsylvania the favored motor oils wherever motor cars are used.

Our grocer doesn't mock turtle soup the real thing. He calls it "mock" to distinguish it from genuine. You can be pretty sure that your dealer will sell you real Pennsylvania as such—not by name "mock" name has "paraffin-base" "western oil" or "Pennsylvania-type." Oils made from 100% Pure Pennsylvania Crude are the only real Pennsylvania Motor Oils.

Imitation is flattery, and all that, but remember, the imitation only looks real. To be a genuine Pennsylvania Motor Oil, an oil must be made entirely from Pennsylvania Grade Crude—and every oil entitled to bear our emblem is guaranteed to be genuine. Look for our emblem when you buy your motor oil. It is your mark of protection.

PENNSYLVANIA GRADE CRUDE OIL ASSOCIATION OIL CITY, PENNSYLVANIA

Copyright 1940, Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil Association

The area at right, touching four states, is the only district in the world producing Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil, which is known to be the best raw material in the entire world for making motor oil.

This advertisement is published in the interests of producers, refiners, wholesalers, retailers, exporters and users of 100% Pure Pennsylvania Motor Oils protected by our emblem. Watch for new announcements in this series.

Below is the official emblem of the Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil Association. It is registered in the U.S. Patent Office and protected under federal copyright laws. This emblem is not the mark of a brand. It is a guarantee to you that a motor oil is made entirely from Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil and that the oil is up to this association's rigid standard in every respect.

BETTER OILS from the GROUND UP!

THE AMAZING NEW 1941

PHILCO

PHOTO-ELECTRIC RADIO-PHONOGRAPH

Plays any Record on a BEAM OF LIGHT!No Needles to change!*Records last 10 times longer!*New Purity of Tone!CLEARER HIGH NOTES
DEEPER LOW NOTES

Philco for 1941 presents the first basic improvement in record reproduction since the invention of the phonograph. Music on a beam of light! Instead of a hard crystal and rigid steel needle that create work and wear, the amazing Philco Photo-Electric Radio-Phonograph reproduces any record on a beam of light, reflected from a tiny mirror to a Photo-Electric Cell. It's a history-making invention that brings you thrilling new benefits never before enjoyed in a radio-phonograph. ONLY PHILCO HAS IT!

No needles to change! The Philco Photo-Electric Reproducer is extremely light and floats gently in the record grooves. In normal use, its rounded jewel lasts from 8 to 10 years! Records last 10 times longer! The new Philco Photo-Electric principle eliminates wear because it eliminates work. There's no grinding or gouging of record grooves. You can play and enjoy your most valuable records as much as 700 times without fear of wear!

Glorious new purity of tone! You hear all the beauty of your records; rich, deep "lows" without sacrifice of clear, brilliant "highs." Surface and needle noise no longer mar purity of tone.

TILT-FRONT. Only Philco brings you this brand-new convenience! No lid; no need to remove ornaments to reach the phonograph. No dark, unhandy compartments. You simply tilt forward the grille which automatically brings out the record turntable, in full view and easy to use.

MAKE YOUR OWN RECORDS. The Philco Home Recording Unit is optional equipment at reasonable extra cost. Large microphone with acoustic chamber insures life-like recordings. Free from record scratch.

PHILCO 609P. This Philco Photo-Electric Radio-Phonograph combines the exquisite beauty of a lovely Period cabinet of authentic Hepburn design with the thrill of Philco's new and spectacular 1941 invention. It brings you new and vital benefits no other radio-phonograph can offer. Music on a beam of light. New Tilt-Front cabinet. Automatic Record Changer for 12 records. New phonograph circuit, specially designed for finest tone. Yours for only $15 down.

PHILCO 608P. Philco's new, history-making achievements are yours at a popular price in this amazing 9-tube Philco Photo-Electric Radio-Phonograph. Plays any record on a beam of light. Tilt-Front cabinet with no lid, no dark, awkward compartments. Automatic Record Changer for 12 records. American and Foreign radio reception with new Overseas Wave-Band. Handsome cabinet of costly, hand-rubbed mahogany woods. A sensational value and yours for only $12.95 down.

255T. The finest table model radio money can buy in tone, performance and beauty. Powerful 9-tube circuit gives amazing sensitivity and selectivity. Lovely walnut cabinet. Only $5.95 down.

See and hear the new
PHILCO RADIOS and RADIO-PHONOGRAPHS

FROM $9.95 TO $395

now on display at your nearest Philco dealer...

PHILCO for 1941 offers you the greatest values in its 11 years of leadership! Consoles, table models, compacts, portables, auto radios... a wide variety of styles for every taste and purse.

EVERY 1941 PHILCO IS BUILT TO RECEIVE TELEVISION SOUND
AND FREQUENCY MODULATION... THE WIRELESS WAY!

221C. Brings you Philco's latest features at a record low price. American and Foreign reception; new kind of Overseas Wave-Band. Smart walnut cabinet. Just plug in and play. Only $2.35 down.

The Big Dough-Re-Mi

By Henry Anton Steig

ILLUSTRATED BY ROBERT O. REID

Birth pangs of a big-time swing band. You'll be hearing them on the coast-to-coast hookups, now that the crisis is all over

"EE, Honey, it brings me down to have to take you into this," Frank Leedy said with a sad look around the dingy, third-rate hotel room as he found a path from the door through the pile of luggage. He was tall and skinny, with curly blond hair, prominent ears and a wide mouth.

"Oh, cheer up, Pops," May said. "We're back in New York, ain't we? Just think of it—no more night clubs in day coaches, no more canceled spots, no more worrying about what happened to the advance money. And, compared to the dives we've been stopping at, this is a palace."

She was a dark-eyed bundle of slight curves, half the size of her husband. The careless way in which she flung a large bag onto the bed suggested gay, endless energy.

"Yeah, everything's sharp, Honey. All we have to do is get the gang a nice, steady job." Frank shook his head ruefully. "What we did to the poor cats on the ride!"

"Well, at least we brought them home," May said on one of her quick trips between the valise and the dresser. "Only trouble is, the public ain't hep to our brand of jive, yet. But we'll put them hep. They'll dig our stuff after a while."

They had been married three months before and for a honeymoon had gone with their band on a playing tour, with expectations of a long, steady booking. But their big-talking agent's promises had fizzled out to two a week and then, finding themselves with eighteen blank days ahead before the next certain pay check, and with just enough for fare home, they'd played it safe and abandoned the tour.

May kicked the empty valise under the bed, went to the washstand in the corner and, as she sloshed water over her face, began to sing one of their own songs: "I'm blue but happy, blue but happy, happy cos I'm used to bein' blue. Sad but I like it, sad but I like it—like it cos there's nothin' else to do. So send me down, blues, send me down, blues . . ."

Frank never ceased marveling at the size of the voice that came out of her. Having heard that voice, one could no longer be much impressed with the fact that she also played the piano like a man. As only few men could. But it counted a lot in the band.

Five years ago it had been only a quartet, with Frank on the tenor sax and clarinet which he'd played professionally, by necessity, ever since he'd got his first long trousers; Vido Maresca, the tough, chunky Latin, on guitar; Tubby Phil Adams drumming, and May at the keyboard. Then the others had joined, one by one, until there were ten. All ace swingmen who hadn't been sure what they were after until they had found Frank and May. After that they had something to hold on to and stay with. May's voice inspired them and Frank's ideas as a leader were so right for the men who understood them that it was a joy and a privilege to help carry them out.

"It's been a long time," Frank said softly when May had stopped singing.

The boys subtly called everybody's attention to her. Then she looked up from the keyboard toward the people at the tables and began, simply, to wail it out, easily filling the place with her big contralto

"Doesn't seem long to me. You have to be patient, that's all. Goodman didn't get there overnight. And meantime, we're having ourselves fun, just making music."

"Yeah, we've still got the band." Frank chuckled self-solacingly.

There was always that, May thankfully reflected, to keep her moody, temperamental spouse happy at heart. He had his band. It had taken five years of the most painstaking kind of work to make it what it was, but it had been a work of love. If only Frank didn't suffer so when the slightest thing went wrong with the music! But there was nothing she could do about that.

Having completed freshening herself, she noticed that Frank had just been sitting on the bed, watching her with that appreciative smile of his which still embarrassed her because it was so openly worshipful.

"Well! How about getting unpacked? This is going to be our home for a while, you know."

Frank got up and kissed her and obediently began making order among his effects. "Tomorrow," he said with a sigh, "we start selling it again."

A MONTH later they were still trying to sell it. The big square room in the Musical Arts Building had become as much a home as the hotel room. In it they spent their days, rehearsing, playing for booker after booker, in the other their nights, talking and planning late before they went to sleep. An occasional engagement at a party or a club dance barely paid for the thirty-cent lunches, sixty-cent suppers and the rent for both rooms.

"Too hot—too wild—not refined," ran the comments.

They were very tired of it the afternoon Morton Fess came to hear them. He was a short, cadaverous, cigar-eating, small-time agent, panting for prestige and the big money.

"No showmanship," he said after the boys had played their hearts out for him. His positive, all-knowing manner had immediately irritated Frank.

"What do you want us to do, jump around and do a snake dance—or wear funny hats?"

"You got to sell your stuff more."

"It's solid music. We always counted on it selling itself."

"Well, now, take your drummer, frinstance," Fess said slowly, with the air of one handing out invaluable advice. "Not enough traps. It don't make an impression. It looks empty."

"Does it sound empty?" May demanded. She and the boys were having difficulty controlling themselves. This guy was the worst yet.

"No—I wouldn't say that." Fess gave May an oily, paternal smile. A dame at the piano was one of the things about the band that didn't seem right to him. The way she glared back at him, however, led him to decide he'd better not mention it. "But there's certain effects people like. Chimes, frinstance, and temple blocks—you know, some novelty."

Frank looked at Tubby behind the drums and saw the wave of pink start at his tight collar line and spread rapidly up around his moon face. Tubby often got choked up that way. Frank always had to talk for him.

"Well, look, Mr. Fess. There's certain suitcase men, like Adams, here, 'frinstance,' who would give up altogether before they even made a pass at a temple block."

"Clippy-cluppy, clippy-cluppy," Vido the guitarist, broke in, making an ironically fierce grimace. "Say! Whoda think this is, Rodney Montfort's stooges?"

"Temple blocks, for Pete's sake—a chimes!" muttered Windy Warrick, the big, apeline trombonist, holding tight to his instrument, afraid he might be tempted to use it as a club.

Rodney Montfort's band was nationally famous but Fess sensed that the disparagement of the big name came not from envy but from a special kind of militant earnestness. He was not equipped to understand it. He was puzzled by the boys' music and by the attitude. He couldn't tell them a thing. Obviously they had no respect for his opinions. Antagonized, he would not admit that he had been impressed. He smiled and shook his head pityingly and at that May lost her temper.

"You heard what we've got. Take or leave it!"

The agent left without another word. Steve, the trumpet player, who looked like a men's clothing ad, made a disrespectful noise on his horn for a send-off. Vido began mumbling:

"That tin-eared heel! I'd like to—He shaped his fingers into hooks and waved them in the air.

Only the big, stout Alec Potter, easy going and slow except when he was handling one of his reed instruments had remained calm through the weeks of discouragement. He pulled Vido down into his chair, handed him his guitar, picked up his alto sax and began playing. Vido's muttering tapered off as he joined in, and one by one the others went to work until the whole band was playing again. What a sweet bunch Frank thought for the thousandth time. Smiling at May, he, too, picked up his horn.

Fess indignantly thumped the elevator bell and asked himself who the hell those boys thought they were, anyway, when he noticed two men come down the corridor and stop at the door of the room, behind him, that he had just left. One he recognized as Emil Wetterau, president of National Music Incorporated, and the other, younger man, as Arthur Pickett, junior executive.

"Listen to that, Emil," Pickett said. "Wonder who they are. Listen—they're marvelous."

IN HIS curiosity, Fess had leaned toward them. Wetterau suddenly turned and gave him a look of regal displeasure. Fess was glad the elevator door opened just then and he hurried into the car. He had heard enough. Any band that could stop the representatives of National Music in their tracks like that must certainly be worth getting hold of.

Back in the corridor Emil Wetterau impatiently took Pickett's arm. "That's what you would no doubt call a killer-diller aggregation, and you ought to know by now that they make me sick. Swing is on the way out, anyhow. Come along, Arthur, we've got an important hearing to attend." Pickett had to hurry along. . . .

Fess and the corpulent Mr. Freeman stood arguing amid chunks of plaster and pieces of scrap lumber in what used to be a quick-order lunchroom and was soon to be The Inner Door—Freeman's seventh or eighth night-club venture. Several men were at work decorating it.

"Don't proposition me with green music, Fess. I'm investing thousands in this establishment and I've got to protect it."

"But every band was green once, wasn't it? Leedy and the club start at scratch and get built up together. His

(Continued on page 24)

"You have to be patient, that's all," May said. "Goodman didn't get there overnight. Meantime, we're having ourselves fun"

It's men going off to fight machines. There's nothing sporting about it. They haven't got a chance

The Man Who Wanted War

By Martin Knapp

ILLUSTRATED BY ELMORE BROWN

He watched the young men going off to fight machines. It gave him another slant on war

HERE was a crowd around the club bar, and everyone was talking, and the radio was blaring out war news, some men were looking over the shoulder of a man who had a newspaper in black headlines three inches high. They stared at the black letters, the man's eyes were shocked and apprehensive—all but those of Freddy Winsted, who held the paper; his face was up like a lamp, and he looked happy for the first time in years.

You couldn't help but notice it. And, really, you didn't notice Freddy Winsted. He was always around, but you didn't see him. Or, if you did, it was just as a reddish blur which was his face with its two empty blue eyes that always looked puzzled, and which now he was shining so that they transformed his face into the semblance of the face it used to be. It stood out, even in the crowd of men. And, though he was some way off, I could hear his voice, above the noise, saying, "Damn' swine!" over and over; and, "No fourteen points now to get 'em off the hook! Ought to be wiped off the earth! Damn' fat swine!" He went on and on. It might just as well have been 1914.

Freddy Winsted was a freshman in 1914. A big, good-looking boy. Of course, he was a natural for Harvard; a Winsted, 3d or 4th or 5th, and everything a Winsted should have been, crew captain, one of the top clubs, and a good deal of sense of what was done, and what wasn't. He felt he had a tradition to maintain, and he took it pretty seriously. He was popular, and one of the important men in his class. He just assumed that everything would be handed to him on a platter, and it was.

And he certainly was good-looking. I remember what Louisa said once on the beach at Nantucket. His being so brown made his hair fairer, a bright amber color, and the muscles rippled across his brown back. Somehow, he did suggest a Norse god—huge, and fair, and bright-colored. Looking at him in that thoughtfully detached way her eyes had, she said, "He is beautiful. The most beautiful thing I've ever seen." There was something defiant in the way she said it. I'm sure she married Freddy because he was so darn' beautiful.

BUT, of course, the war helped too. When he came back with a wound stripe on one arm, and just a little pale, he looked every inch a hero. But he still had his boy's laughing face, and everywhere he went people turned, instinctively, and smiled. You could see it had been a perfectly swell war. He'd got in just at the end, been billeted with the British, seen some action, and a good deal of officers' mess. It was Kipling and all that. It went to his head rather. And, to make everything complete, he got a splinter of shell, and was invalided back to London.

It wasn't serious, except that it made him a hero. But he might have got over that, if the war hadn't ended then. He felt very bad about that, and very bad about leaving England. Except that he talked a good deal more than they do, he was more British than the British when he landed at Hoboken. He never could understand all the gloom about the war. Apparently, he never saw the dead men in the mud. It had been simply a swell show.

Life was just a glorious adventure. You can't exactly blame him. There'd been a mean conspiracy to dump everything into his lap without the slightest trouble. Even Louisa sort of came along with all the rest, though that conveys exactly the wrong impression of Louisa if it suggests a docile female. For, of course, Louisa was mercury, and small and dark, and utterly bewitching, with quick movements, and a mind that darted about incessantly. And yet she married Freddy, and it was not surprising that she did, for, after all, he was young Lochinvar. What I mean is, that he just had everything, and it looked like a most brilliant match, and the picture papers were full of beautiful young officers grouped around Freddy and Louisa, who looked too beautiful to be real. Their pedigrees were printed with pictures of most of their living relatives, all bank presidents and bishops.

Louisa was just twenty when she married Freddy about 1919. And she got the famous Winsted silver, had two perfectly adorable little girls, and, later, Frederick Winsted 4th, or 5th, or 6th. They were the best-looking children I have ever seen, and Freddy talked about them as though they were a completely new species. Only they didn't act like that. When he tried to put them into the same mold from which he had been poured, they simply would not jell. That was just one of the things that began to baffle him.

UP THROUGH the nineteen-twenties he grew steadily more and more baffled. There were so many things he couldn't understand. He just couldn't understand why he couldn't be a president, or a vice-president like his father, and his grandfather. It wasn't because he didn't try. He tried brokerage, and banking, and promoting a moving-picture company; he had a go at aviation, and some new kind of magazine, and several other things. Of course, he had to be something big, important. It looked so easy. And it wasn't.

I began to notice that Louisa was growing more and more defiant when she talked about him. "He's kind and generous," she said. "He'd do anything for his friends. He's a dear. Really, he is. He doesn't drink, or do any of those things. He hasn't any vices, really. I wish he had. It isn't that. It's just his

(Continued on page 37)

"I had great ambitions. Repertory. Then I went on a world tour—Shakespeare"

The Patriotic Murders

By Agatha Christie

ILLUSTRATED BY MARIO COOPER

The Story Thus Far:

HENRY MORLEY, a London dentist, lives with his spinster sister, Georgina. He has a partner, one Reilly; a secretary, Gladys Nevill (who is in love with a youth, Frank Carter, of whom he does not approve); and an office boy, Alfred.

Hercule Poirot, the noted Belgian detective, keeps a dental appointment with Morley. He leaves; and a short time later, his friend, Inspector Japp of Scotland Yard, informs him by phone that the dentist has shot himself.

Racing to Morley's office, Poirot examines the body, asks some questions. After which, he convinces Japp that Morley may have been murdered. And they start an investigation. . . . Gladys Nevill tells them a curious story. She had received a telegram (on the day of Morley's death) informing her that her aunt—in the country—had suffered a stroke. She had rushed to her aunt, and found her in perfect health! . . .

Among the dentist's patients, shortly before his death, were Alistair Blunt, head of a great banking firm; Miss Sainsbury Seale; and a wealthy Greek named Amberiotis. Among his partner's patients were Colonel Abercrombie, a retired army officer; and Howard Raikes, a young American. Alfred, the office boy, testifies that Raikes had reached the office—and suddenly disappeared. Had he left the office, or—? Japp and Poirot decide to investigate.

Another possible suspect is Frank Carter, who had called at Morley's office and, informed that Miss Nevill was not in, had apparently gone away. Had he hidden himself and killed Morley? The two detectives wonder. . . . Interrogated, Reilly has little of importance to offer. Nor has Alistair Blunt—or his niece, Jane Olivera, who appears to be interested in the case.

The two men pay a call on Miss Sainsbury Seale. The lady seems flustered by the appearance of two "police officers." In flutelike tones, she answers their questions. Meanwhile, Poirot has been developing a theory. He puts a few queries to Miss Seale concerning her conversation with the dentist. Then, leaning forward, he says quietly:

"He didn't happen to mention a patient by the name of Amberiotis?"

III

NO, NO," Miss Sainsbury Seale said. "He really said nothing—except, I mean, the things that dentists have to say."

Through Poirot's mind there ran quickly: "Rinse. Open a little wider, please. Now close gently."

Japp had proceeded to his next step. It would possibly be necessary for Miss Sainsbury Seale to give evidence at the inquest.

After a first scream of dismay, Miss Sainsbury Seale seemed to take kindly to the idea. A tentative inquiry from Japp produced Miss Sainsbury Seale's whole life history.

She had, it seemed, come from India to England six months ago. She had lived in various hotels and boarding-houses and had finally come to the Glengowrie Court which she liked very much because of its homey atmosphere; in India she had lived mostly in Calcutta where she had done Mission work and had also taught elocution.

"Pure, well-enunciated English—most important, Chief Inspector. You see," Miss Sainsbury Seale simpered and bridled, "as a girl I was on the stage. Oh! only in small parts, you know. The provinces! But I had great ambitions. Repertory. Then I went on a world tour—Shakespeare, Bernard Shaw." She sighed. "The trouble with us poor women is heart—at the mercy of our hearts. A rash, impulsive marriage. Alas! we parted almost immediately. I—I had been sadly deceived. I resumed my maiden name. A friend kindly provided me with a little capital and I started my elocution school. I helped to found a very good amateur dramatic society. I must show you some of our notices."

Chief Inspector Japp knew the dangers of that! He escaped, Miss Sainsbury Seale's last words being: "—and if, by any chance, my name should be in the papers—as a witness at the inquest, I mean—you will be sure that it is spelt right. Mabelle Sainsbury Seale—Mabelle spelt M-A-B-E-L-L-E, and Seale S-E-A-L-E. And of course, if they did care to mention that I appeared in As You Like It at the Oxford Repertory Theater—"

"Of course, of course." Chief Inspector Japp fairly fled.

IN THE taxi he sighed.

"If it's ever necessary, we ought to be able to check up on her all right," he observed, "unless it was all lies—but that I don't believe!"

Poirot shook his head.

"Liars," he said, "are neither so circumstantial nor so inconsequential."

Ten minutes later they paid off the taxi and entered the Savoy.

Japp asked for Mr. Amberiotis.

The clerk looked at them rather oddly. He said:

"Mr. Amberiotis? I'm sorry, sir, I'm afraid you can't see him."

"Oh, yes, I can, my lad," Japp said grimly. He drew the other a little aside and showed him his credentials.

"You don't understand, sir, I'm sure.

Mr. Amberiotis died half an hour ago.

To Hercule Poirot it was as though a door had gently but firmly shut.

Twenty-four hours later Japp roused Poirot up. His tone was bitter.

"Washout! The whole thing!"

"What do you mean, my friend?"

"Morley committed suicide all right. We've got the motive."

"What was it?"

"I've just had the doctor's report on Amberiotis' death. I won't give you official jargon but in plain English he died as the result of an overdose of adrenalin and procaine. It acted on his heart, I understand, and he collapsed. When the wretched devil said he was feeling bad yesterday afternoon, he was just speaking the truth. Well, there you are! Adrenalin and procaine is stuff dentists inject into your gum as a local anesthetic. Morley made an error, injected an overdose, and then Mr. Amberiotis left he realized what he had done, couldn't face the music and shot himself."

"With a pistol he was not known to possess?" queried Poirot.

"He may have possessed it all the same. Relations don't know everything. You'd be surprised sometimes, things they don't know!"

"That is true, yes."

"Well, there you are. It's a perfectly logical explanation of the whole thing."

"You know, my friend, it does not quite satisfy me. It is true that patients have been known to react unfavorably."

(Continued on page 32)

More than Base Hits

By Robert A. "Red" Rolfe

The Yanks have their fifth columnists, too. They're the sharp-eyed sign swipers who engineer the cute inside stuff that means dozens of extra games at the end of a season

FOR four hectic years we Yankees have won the American League pennant and the world's championship. For four years we have hit doubles, triples, homers. For four years we've had superlative pitching.

Maybe we won't win the pennant this year. Maybe we did get off on the wrong foot and waited until midseason to get back into step. The fact remains those four straight wins broke a record. We did put on the pressure this season to jump from the cellar division well up toward the roof.

How did we do all this? Was it better hitting and pitching? What more does a team need to excel?

Well, my story is that not hitting, not pitching, not even the defensive play of our infield nor the strong arms of our outfielders could account for the definite edge we have had over our opponents. Our pennants were won by subtle, inside baseball.

That's my thesis. And now it's up to me to prove it. Let's go . . .

First, let's charge up two or three victories a year to the Frankie-and-Johnny play. How many times have you seen Johnny Murphy (Grandma, the Fireman) come striding in from the bull pen in the last innings, ready to rescue our game from the villainous Indians or Red Sox or Tigers? Two men are on bases—here's a real game to illustrate what I mean:

It's Hadley versus Harder, in Cleveland, June, 1939, ninth inning, the score 3 to 2 in our favor. Jeff Heath is on second, Bruce Campbell on first and dangerous Ken Keltner at bat. And no one out. Then Johnny takes the mound. For

(Continued on page 40)

Double plays mean smart fielding. Here Yankee Third Baseman Red Rolfe comes in fast for a grass-cutter and, without straightening, whips the ball over to second for the first put-out

The Tune I Know

By Donald Hough

ILLUSTRATED BY EARL OLIVER HURST

It's a wise cowboy who knows when to saddle and ride, and Hade Crosby's friend was a wise cowboy

HALLELUJAH, I am broke again. Hallelujah, the way that old tune goes, I am broke again. One thing about it, though, I have got my bedroll with me. And some groceries in her. And I have got a saddle and a braided rawhide rope, and I am open for a job.

(Oh, yes, if somebody will beg me to take a job, I will take her, all right!)

I am walking along the road, keeping time by whistling through my teeth that tune I know. Hallelujah. . . But it is not so bad this time, because I have got my bedroll (with groceries) and a fine saddle. The only way I can get to the Circle C dude ranch is by walking along the road, and I am doing her. I have heard there is a job for a good hand at the Circle C, so I have left my outfit in town, I have not got a horse, and I am on my way to tie down that job if I can.

The only trouble is, it is a job wrangling dudes. Suppose I get this job, and suppose this fall I would go on up to Montana for the roundup season, and I would meet my old friend Hade Crosby, and Hade would say, "Steve, where'd you summer?" and what would I say? I would have to say, "Hade, it hurts me to say it, but I summered down in the Circle C country wrangling dudes."

Hade would choke.

But I need the job, I sure do need her, and if I get her, boy, I won't be broke no more. So I am going over in my mind what I am going to say to the head wrangler up at the Circle C. His name is Kinkaid. I have never saw him in my life; Ed Jones, he runs the Teton Bar back in town, told me about the job. I have only been down here three days, when I come from Utah, where I had a job taking some horses up to a place in the Wasatch Mountains. Mormons, they have got down there. They can make water run uphill in their irrigation ditches, damned if they can't.

I will tell Kinkaid where I worked, and if he wants to see me ride, I will do her for him. Or rope, or anything. I suppose I'll have to get me a fancy vest, the way the dudes like them, and a hand-tooled belt with studs in it and a silk handkerchief and a hatband with metal disks. I mean, if I get the job. Maybe a red silk shirt. Boy.

It is hot and I sit down to take a rest beside the road. The Teton peaks stand up there high in front of me, and on a bench along the foot of them in the woods there is where the Circle C is at. So I rest a while and keep on going (high-heeled boots was never made for walking, boy) and late in the afternoon I turn off of the road and go up a worse road and climb the bench and I come to a long clearing, a natural park, and there she sits. They have got a big log building, one story high and with a porch, and a lot of dude cabins on both sides where the dudes sleep.

I do not feel like walking right up to her, so I circle around toward where I can see the corrals and barns. I am walking along a fence, when suddenly I catch sight of something. I don't know what it is, a wrangler or a dude, and I don't know whether it comes from a circus or from a side show, but it sure would make a nice Christmas present. He is the fanciest thing I have ever saw. He is coming toward me, so I lean against the fence and wait. He touches his horse and rides over, a nice, easy lope. One thing, he sits nice in the saddle.

He comes up. "Hello," he says.

"Hello," I say.

Then he says something I cannot repeat it here, but it is something he says he will be. He jumped off his horse on the other side of the fence and he is sticking his hand through the fence, and I am taking his hand, and we are standing there calling each other the worst names we can think of.

"What in the name of hell are you doing here?" Hade says.

"I got lost, off of the road," I tell Hade.

Hade rubs his chin. He says, "Steve, this is the first time I have ever known you to lose your bearings like this."

"I was walking along whistling a tune," I tell Hade. "You know how it is, you are whistling and thinking, and pretty soon you are lost." I look at Hade's clothes. "Hade," I say, "I can't help but see you have got a job."

HADE takes a deep breath and leans harder on the fence. "Steve," he says, "it is entirely temporary. It is on account of some hard luck up in Montana this spring, four kings against a small straight flush, and I needed a job and I had to take her. It is grub." He looks at me. He says, "It is better grub than you would believe. By the way," he says, "this outfit needs a good man to wrangle dudes. Somebody with his own saddle. Maybe you would happen to know of somebody."

"I wouldn't know of anybody around here," I tell Hade. "I just come in from Utah three days ago, Hade, and put my saddle and bedroll in the shed back of the hardware store where I and you slept once when we was broke."

"You have got your saddle with you?" Hade says.

"I was thinking of trying for a job at the Lazy K," I tell him.

Hade says, "Steve, you are lost anyway, you might as well stay here and take this job. It would help me out, Steve; and another thing, it would be like old times, I and you working together again."

"Hade," I tell Hade, "you have got a way of putting things where it is mighty hard for a fellow to say no."

So I get through the fence and Hade leads his horse and we walk into the lodge, and I am telling Hade where I have been since we saw each other last, and we come to the office of the place and Hade takes me in and introduces me to Kinkaid.

Kinkaid says, "Oh, yes, I been expecting you. Ed Jones called up and said he was sending you up here to try for the job."

I do not take the trouble to look at Hade. I just stand there.

Hade says, "Mr. Kinkaid, Steve here is one of the best top hands in the business. Outside of being one of the smoothest liars in the West, there is nothing against him, and I and Steve sure work together fine."

I am hired.

THEY have got a dude here by the name of Miss Manners. A dude is no bargain, take them as they come, but this dude Miss Manners is about the best you can expect. To start with, which is not unusual about dude girls, she is so pretty it just makes a fellow wonder if she's real.

She is here with her mother, and along with them is a young fellow who is going to marry Miss Manners and his name is James Darrow.

But anyway, this Miss Manners you would think she was born here in the West, and that's a fact. She can ride as good as anybody, and she rides Western; she sits down in the saddle and takes it. She looks like she has worn her Western clothes, denim pants and all, since she was a little kid.

Anyway, it would be harder to find two people more different than her and Darrow, no matter where you would want to look. Maybe in the East they were the same, but they sure are different here. This fellow, I don't like to say it, but I give you my word I have never saw anything so comical in my life when it comes to getting or sitting on a horse or trying to ride. He hates horses, he looks at one like he has got a pain in his stomach, and you don't have to believe it, but one day he puts his wrong foot in the stirrup when he is mounting, and he swings into the saddle and there he is, backwards. He just sits there backwards and looks down at the horse's tail and wonders what the hell.

But the thing is, he is really the nicest fellow you would want to meet. He can tell the funniest stories you ever heard, and he knows he is terrible around a horse, and when it is time for him to fall off he laughs as hard as the horse does. I mean as the rest of us. You can't help but like him, he is that kind of fellow.

Miss Manners wants to ride all the time. The other dudes go for a ride every afternoon, but they take a mighty tame kind of ride, going along in single file, and this is too slow for Miss Manners. Mr. Kinkaid will not let Miss Manners ride alone, so he tells Hade to go along with her and Darrow, or when Darrow can't make it, then go with Miss Manners alone.

I do not like this so very much.

Perhaps you do not know my old friend Hade, but that fellow Hade is about the finest set-up fellow you have ever saw in your life, and while Hade could not be called strictly handsome from a movie point of view, he has got something about him that when the ladies take one look at him if Hade is not careful he is practically a married man. With all these dude-wrangler clothes on, it is worse than ever along these lines.

Hade tells me that Miss Manners does not want to keep pace with the only speed Mr. Darrow can ride at, which is a slow walk, but she wants to dash around like she is on the trail of some train robbers or something, and Darrow can come along the best he can, in the distance. She rides beside of Hade. Every time Darrow falls off, Hade says, him and Miss Manners have a quarrel. Most of the time lately Darrow does not go at all.

When Hade is explaining something to Miss Manners, does not look at what I explaining. She looks at

One night in the bunkhouse I and Hade are alone and we get to talking.

"Hade," I say, "this Miss Manners, she sure does like to ride."

"Yeah," Hade says. He is cleaning his boots.

"This Darrow," I tell him, "is sure one fine fellow."

"Sure seems like it," Hade says. He puts down his boot. He says, "They ought to make a mighty nice couple, take it when they are married. I think Darrow is one of the leading ones back in the East, and this Miss Manners, when I am riding with her and I get a good look at her, it seems to me, Steve, like it is this Hedy Lamarr, this movie actress, out there in the sagebrush riding along beside of me."

Hade does not say no more.

"You better be careful, Hade," I tell him.

He looks at me. "Forget that part of it," he says.

I DO not exactly forget it. I am watching Hade and Miss Manners, and I do not like it the way she is looking at my friend Hade. I will try to explain this. For one thing, we let the dudes practice throwing a rope. Miss Manners makes Hade show her. She makes him take hold of her hands and move them. By this time Miss Manners could throw a rope when she is sound asleep, but she is always wanting to practice, anyway.

When Hade is explaining something to Miss Manners, she does not look at what he is explaining. She looks at him.

Darrow is not riding any more. He has gave up. Every day Hade and Miss Manners are riding, and when they are not riding, Miss Manners is going along where Hade is going, around the ranch, and she is hanging onto his arm and looking at him.

One thing I have got to say, they do look mighty nice riding around together. Miss Manners has got a big man's hat, and she is wearing boots with three colors of leather in the tops, and take Hade with his dude-wrangler outfit, the two of them together make a regular picture, they sure do.

One night Hade is sitting on the edge of his bunk reading a magazine. I notice he is not turning the pages, he is just sitting there looking at it. No, he is not even looking at it. He is looking right past it, at the floor. He sees me watching him, and he begins to read.

All right Hade.

Who is going to blame Hade? When he mentions this movie actress Hedy Lamarr in regards to Miss Manners, he is right, he is telling the truth. In the face of Miss Manners being so beautiful, and especially the way she looks at Hade, Hade so far has kept his head and done his best.

But Hade is not keeping his head no longer. It is all over with Hade.

He is sitting there looking past his magazine, he is looking at the floor, and he is in love with Miss Manners.

The next night in the middle of the night somebody is shaking me, and I wake up. "What is it, Hade?" I ask him.

Hade says, very quiet, "Goodby, Steve."

I am shaking my head, trying to get wide awake. I do not know what this is about.

"Steve," Hade says, "I have got my bedroll and saddle on the last bunk, there, and you put them away and take good care of them and I'll write you

(Continued on page 48)

How to Build Airpower

By W. B. Courtney

Mr. Courtney saw, at first-hand, how Germany built her airpower. How it was done, and what any nation hoping to match it will have to do, is discussed here

A FRIEND of mine who is employed by a firm that builds airplanes went into his bank to deposit a pay check.

The teller read the company's name printed on the check. He said. "Well, you fellows in the aviation business are pretty lucky, I guess. You're in the big money now!"

My young friend, because of lifelong enthusiasm for aviation and belief in its eventual greatness, works for a lesser salary than his talents and qualities would now fetch in many other fields. His company has hundreds of thousands of dollars sunk in plant, acreage, materials and equipment and has never earned a dividend.

Forget my friend and his company, however. Just think about what that bank teller said. Plenty of air and military experts will tell you it's the American version of a state of mind that has brought disaster upon the European democracies. It is widely held and it is a cynical mixture. The minute you work for a "war" industry you are a profiteer; and the moment we turn attention to problems of preparedness our smug belief in our own unsurpassed competence, ingenuity, skill and industrial genius finds assurance that everything is already fixed. We complacently take the resolution for the accomplishment; the thought for the deed. The President said we must gear up our industry to a capacity of 50,000 planes a year. Henry Ford said he can build 1,000 planes a day. Hurrah, we knew the old American git-up-and-git was still there!

We have read about and seen pictures of horror abroad. We even had an hour of panic, after President Roosevelt's "timetable of invasion," in which he intimated that enemy air armadas could base on Greenland—although Pan American Airways dropped the notion of laying down an emergency stop there for its transatlantic service when Colonel Lindbergh, after personal study and survey for several weeks, found no practicability for even lone passenger ships in its ugly rock- and ice-bound harbors.

But fright quickly passed. Famous names and mouthy phrases lulled us back to false security. A thousand planes a day, a double-size Navy. It is only natural for uncritical and but partially informed, or partisanly misinformed, laymen to read magic in great men. "Henry Ford" is a byword. A Washington taxi driver told me: "Boy, it's a good thing Henry Ford took hold of this here plane mess. Now we got nothin' to worry about!"

Aviation leaders, air corps and military officers think you still have a lot to worry about. They wish you would take time out right now for a rational look at the airpower situation here and overseas.

Meanwhile, the current wisecrack in an Air Corps long starved is "Swell, let Henry Ford build a thousand planes a day—for one day. Then we'll have an Air Corps!"

When a flying officer talks like that he is not guilty of defeatism. He is bitterly striving to make you view the situation with realism rather than "with alarm." He knows that you can't get an air force merely by appropriating money. You've got to have a policy, and someone in centralized authority to say go ahead and build.

Furthermore, the air officer wants you to consider Henry Ford's sincere and patriotic offer in light of other factors. Ford did not say he could build one thousand planes a day right away. The most optimistic professional guess is that it would be a year and a half before he could gear up to that rate. Remember, Henry Ford was building automobiles for many, many years before he reached a production rate of 1,000 cars a day. Moreover, by 1,000 planes a day Ford does not mean 1,000 complete flyable planes. He means what aviators call "the shell." That is, fuselage and wings—a covered framework, nothing more.

A Problem of Co-ordination

Each of Ford's 1,000 planes a day would still need landing gear, controls, instruments, engines, propellers. Someone—perhaps Ford himself—would have to build 1,000 motors a day. Someone also a thousand pairs of tires, someone else a thousand radios, a thousand turn-and-bank indicators, a thousand gas tanks and compasses, a thousand each of a dozen other gadgets. Such production facility and capacity are not even remotely within sight or grasp. A nation should have to produce the pilot to fly these ships. The ideal, demonstrated in Europe, is to have at least three for each ship. British experience has been that two active days a week is the absolute human limit of each ship's endurance, but squadrons must keep for seven days of 24 hours each in blitzkrieg's in swing.

Finally, Henry Ford meant that he would build 1,000 shells of only one type of airplane a day: pursuits. Air power is made up of many types of ships. Pursuits comprise only about 22 per cent of a combat air force. And some pursuits require two motors each: a means doubles on many instruments and other fixings. Some bombers take engines apiece: with a consequent multiplying of accessories.

Assuming that such mass production would make each completely equipped and flyable pursuit cost half what it now costs, the toll for a 1,000-plane building program would be $18,350,000 a year—for pursuits alone—about one quarter of a whole air force.

In midsummer, the aviation in-

DMITRI KESSEL

Propellers for American planes on the assembly line at the Hamilton Standard Propeller Co., Hartford, Conn. Bulk of plane manufacturing in United States is on West Coast

FAIRCHILD

American airplane factory (the Bendix plant at Bendix, N. J.) is a compact unit that could easily be organized by enemy bombing

Upper right, German workmen installing propellers on a Junkers engine. German fighting planes are stripped to bare essentials

The United States was actually building within its present floor space about 100 military airplanes a month. Of course, an extremely small percentage of the planes for England.
As for motors, the picture is only slightly encouraging. Of all types and sizes of aircraft engines, from little 40-horsepower put-puts to the huge horsepower experimental mammoth, the United States produces no more than 1,500 a month.
This is about step for step with plane manufacturing when you consider that the Germans and commercial air planes are twin- or multiple-engined.
"Fighting" motors nowadays must all be 1,000 horsepower or greater. Two build virtually all such motors;
Pratt & Whitney with great plant expansion already under way in England or by France and Britain they can produce between them 2,000 a month another year, if then. A third war-motor, the Allison, owned by General Motors, which has been "in the game" for more than five years, has not reached a production of 25 a month.

The Bright Side

There is the credit side:
Our planes and motors, beyond any question, are still best in all phases of production.
Our pilots are best, and the Air Corps training program, in scope and influence, plus the Civil Aeronautics Administration plan, is a guarantee our air-force will not only continue to receive the best instruction and more experience, but we shall be far ahead of all possible combinations of enemies in active reserve "flyer strength" long before they can possibly catch up in "plane strength."
Our aviation industrial executive-in youth, fitness, eagerness and experience, is not surpassed elsewhere.
Our abundance of material and resources.
Our bombing accuracy. This is due to training and partly to superior bomb sights.
American and other foreign expert observers agree that so far as they can tell the German air force has made two mistakes in its fighting. First, it has not used bombs of heavy enough weight in raids on surface naval units.
Second, its high-altitude bombing (as differentiated from the much publicized dive bombing) has been ragged. The first is inexplicable. The second may be due to hasty, incomplete practice or to inferior bomb sights, although this is difficult to assume of German military technicians who have been so careful and precise in all other particulars.

This is as good a time as any to explore the notion that the United States possesses a "secret" bomb sight.

A bomb sight is a mechanical gadget, usually set in a gyroscopic mounting, that enables you when you aim at a target from the air to calculate swiftly factors of drift, altitude, forward speed of plane, interlayer wind velocity and numerous other considerations that take you three years to figure out with a pencil and paper. Bomb sights are built on known mathematical principles. They are not "invented" or "discovered"; they are devised. Superiority in bomb sights is merely the old story of the better mousetrap; of refinements in application and shrewdness in use.
One of our bomb sights has long been considered "best." With it our Air Corps has made truly astonishing records, on bombing ranges. But intense, arduous practice also played a part in these records set by picked crews of at least ten years' experience.

The United States is the birthplace of powered flight by man, and home of the most stirring pioneering air flights.
It is difficult for our lay citizens, therefore, to understand why this leader of world aviation hasn't got the world's greatest air corps.

France, after the first Great War,
(Continued on page 54)

Pratt & Whitney motors ready for shipment from the Hartford plant. Two such plants make nearly all our large motors

EUROPEAN

© BRITISH COMBINE

DMITRI KESSEL

SHE was good but she wasn't as good as Rafael. Rafael was young, he was serious about his work, and he never smiled. Rafael and Margarita: the tango. Rafael Allones of Caibarien, son of a sponge fisherman, and Marge Petersen of Brooklyn, dancing under the stars at the Blue Pavilion.

This was the encore. When it ended, applause rose in a geyser of sound, fell reluctantly on all parts of the pavilion in scattered, persistent handclaps; died grudgingly.

Bleeker relaxed. "Yes, sir," he said, nodding his head approvingly, "Max sure made a success of this place. Here it is, stuck down on the beach, miles from nowhere, and people come from all over. Palm Beach. Miami. All over."

"Max is okay," Kernehan said.

Bleeker took a drink, cleared his throat. "What about the girl? Is it bad?"

A hand fell on Kernehan's shoulder. "I thought I recognized you," Max Wagner said; and to Bleeker, "Hello, Sheriff."

"For old times' sake," Kernehan said, "I'll let you buy me a drink, Max. Sit down."

"Even when he comes south he carries a chisel. Hey, Mario; set 'em up here." Max Wagner hunched forward on his elbows, his chubby, middle-aged face good-humored with raillery, his rich brown eyes twinkling. "You must see the wife, Kerny. Aggie'll be glad to see you."

"How is Marge Petersen?" Kernehan said.

Max Wagner looked first at Bleeker and saw in the sheriff's eyes an uneasy, liquid stirring. In Kernehan's face he saw nothing. Kernehan was gazing across the wide reaches of the pavilion.

Max Wagner said, "I had a hunch you didn't come out here for the entertainment."

Kernehan leaned his head to one side, glanced sidewise at Wagner and shrugged.

Max Wagner thrust his stocky body up out of the chair. He strode away with his fingers curled in his palms, leaving a stir of troubled anger where he had sat.

Kernehan said, "Excuse me, Sheriff," and followed Wagner into the bar.

"Go 'way. You give me bad dreams," Max Wagner said.

Kernehan followed him into the office, where Agnes Wagner and two men, clerks, sat behind desks, busy with accounts.

"You're looking well, Aggie," Kernehan said.

"Well, I'd rather be fat than in the Follies. What's eating Max? What's eating you, Max?"

Max Wagner wheeled and came up under Kernehan's chin with his blunt index finger cocked. "Looka here, Kerny," he said, biting into his words with hard, small teeth. "You're not in your own back yard down here. You might be hell on wheels on Broadway but down here your badge is just something you carry around in your pocket for sentimental reasons. You leave the girl alone."

"Max, control yourself, Popsy," Agnes said.

"Control myself! I see him and I'm upset. He gives me stomach trouble!" Max banged out another door.

Kernehan said, "Where's he going now?"

"The games are that way," Agnes Wagner said. She looked gravely at Kernehan. "We're doing awfully well here, Kerny. We'll be out of the red in two or three years. You wouldn't chuck a wrench in things, would you? I don't hold the New York raid against you. It was your job and you did it."

Kernehan nodded, his smile meager. "Seen Eddie Moran around, Aggie?"

Her eyes snapped. "No, damn it! No! What's the matter with you? Can't you let her alone? Do you have to use that cheap authority of yours to hound her wherever she goes? Get out! Get out of this office! This is not a public room. It's private. Get out!"

Kernehan gave her plump shoulder a pat, said, "That's all right, Aggie; there's nothing to worry about."

RAFAEL knocked, then entered Margaret Petersen's dressing room, nodded to her where she lay resting on a settee, and went to lean by the window.

"You do not feel well tonight, señorita?"

"I'm just resting."

"While we were dancing, you were distracted. I refer to that."

"I'm tired, that's all. I'm tired. Go away, Rafael. Go away, will you?"

Rafael sat down, crossed his arms, and stared morosely at the floor. "You saw someone," he said reflectively. "You are troubled."

She wished he would go away and knew he wouldn't. He was so young, barely twenty, yet he had all the gravity and dignity of a matured man. His ambition was tremendous. She knew when her dancing displeased him.

She had been a better dancer, really, when the team was Moran and Petersen. Being in love with Eddie Moran, she had danced lovingly with him, and that meant all the difference in the world. That was why, she knew, she was not a good dancer. Love has nothing to do with dancing. She hated dancing because once it had been part of her love, both inextricably linked; and now there was only the dancing.

Her lip curled. "Wasn't the applause big enough?"

Hurt, he stood up. He dropped his eyes. "Yes, you are ill tonight. Si, si, you are ill. I should not have disturbed you." He glided to the door, opened it.

"Rafael, I'm sorry. I'm a heel, Rafael." Her voice broke and she put her hand to her throat, as if to control it. "I'm just a dumb, ungrateful Swede; that's what I am."

He left the door open and crossed to where she sat. Bending over, he took hold of her hand, stroked the back of it affectionately. "You close your eyes, you rest, you feel better, señorita. We dance again in half an hour. I will call you. Sleep. Try very hard to sleep."

She felt ashamed and hid her face against his shoulder and held grimly to his hand. "You're a grand kid, Rafael!"

"Real Spanish, too?" Eddie Moran said.

Rafael straightened, wheeled toward the doorway.

"I've heard about you," Moran said. "Rafael and Margarita. Nice going. Shall I come back later, Countess?"

Rafael said soberly, "I do not like your talk."

"Who cares?"

"Go away, Rafael, please," Margaret Petersen said.

Rafael went out, his sandals slapping the floor angrily.

"I had a hunch," Margaret Petersen said, her eyes fixed blankly on Moran's face, "that there'd be trouble tonight. I wonder why the doorman let you in."

"I came in the back way, Countess. Swell kitchen. You look wonderful, kid."

He sat down beside her and put his arm around her. She stood up, drawn in, her hands clenched. He tossed his hat aside and lay back on the settee. His lips boxed his strong white teeth in a handsome, brazen grin. His light blue eyes were hilarious. He possessed the cold virility of a diamond.

Unrelenting, white-faced, she stared down at him. "What do you want?" she said.

"Relax, relax. What am I, a plague?"

A Girl Must Be Sure

By Frederick Nebel

ILLUSTRATED BY HARRY L. TIMMINS

The story of a cop who got his man—and, incidentally, got a girl, too

"That's not the word I was thinking of, but it will do. What do you want?"

"A penthouse on Park Avenue. Lunch at the Colony and a big greeting at Morrocco. A note in Lucius Beebe's column. A million bucks."

"A dope."

"I can lay my hands on a hundred grand right now, Countess. What do you get here—ten bucks a night?"

"And meals."

"Marvelous!" He bounced nimbly to his feet and applauded.

Her legs, her whole body, felt dead. The corners of her mouth were miserable.

"How about running up to Palm Beach after your show, Margie? Did you know I own a piece of a dog track? There was a time when I thought dogs were something you danced with. Did you ever see a million bucks, Margie?"

"No. And you never will. Beat it. Every time I think of how I loved a rat, I go cold all over. I get pins and needles. I'm not your kind. I never was, and that was why loving you hurt so much. You're cheap, mister. With a million bucks, you'd still be cheap. Beat it."

"SOME going, baby." His smile was twisted, not nice to look at. "It's good I can take it."

"You can't take anything. Try taking Kernehan sometime—"

A white look struck down across his face and he gripped her arm. "Listen," he muttered, "have you seen Kernehan?"

"Take your hand off."

"Don't give me that, sister. That's what I'm here for. Kernehan. I got a tip he was south. I want to know. I—"

The door banged open and Max Wagner said, "I thought I told you a week ago to stay the hell away from this place. What do I have to do, throw you out on your kisser?"

"All right, all right; keep your hair on. What is this, a branch of the Union League Club?"

Max Wagner took a fistful of Moran's tie and shirt. "Kernehan's out watching the dancing, my friend. I don't want anything to happen here."

Moran was not listening to him. Moran was looking at Margaret Petersen with his blue-white eyes. "Why didn't you tell me he was out there?" His voice shook.

"I thought maybe if he got you my trouble would be over. I'm sick. I'm all in. He turns up in Chicago. He turns up in Detroit. He turns up in St.

"Relax, relax," he said.
 "What am I, a plague?"
 "That's not the word I was thinking of, but it will do," she told him

Louis. Everywhere. Everywhere I go he turns up. I can't stand it!" She covered her face with her hands.

Moran's face, now a sweaty gray, looked completely out of shape. "Why, you dirty little—"

"Out," Max Wagner said, swinging him through the doorway. "Left. The back way." He kicked the door shut and looked hopelessly at Margaret Petersen. "You're all worn out, kid. Look. Stay out at the beach house with Aggie. Get some sun. Listen, I gave Kerny a piece of my mind—"

She sat down, shook her head. "It's not Kerny's fault. Not really, I guess, Max. I gave him a rotten deal." She lay back on the settee.

Max Wagner left the room on his toes. He closed the door without making a sound. When he reached the office he said, "Where's Kernehan?"

"Trying chuck-a-luck," Agnes said. "Max, what's the matter?"

"Moran." His hand was already on the door leading to the gaming rooms.

"Max," Agnes said, half rising.

"I chased him. Only I want to make sure Kernehan won't take it into his head to stroll in the moonlight."

Kernehan was watching the big wheel spin on the wall. He was clanking silver dollars in his hand.

"Well, well," Max Wagner said, all good cheer, the beaming host. "Happy to see you winning, Kerny."

"You're like a hen on a hot griddle, Max. Don't you ever sit still?"

"Boy, I'd like to! Just once!"

"No time like the present." Kernehan turned away from the table. "Find us a cozy nook, Max. A nice crowd you draw here. Nice people."

"Never a squawk."

THEY reached a quiet alcove and sat down on an upholstered bench.

Kernehan said, "I'm glad to see you got over the hives."

"You know me: I blow up easy. Besides, that was a bean ball you handed me—popping that one about Marge. How about a drink?"

"I've had enough. How is she, Max?"

"Marge?" Kernehan's eyes drowsed on space. He nodded, absent-mindedly clanking the silver dollars in his palm.

"Her nerves are shot." Max Wagner raised his hands, wiggled his fingers.

"Kerny—don't get me started, will you?"

"You know what happened, don't you?"

"I don't know anything. All I know is about a guy named Kernehan hounding
 (Continued on page 46)

NO!

NO!

No!

No! No!

NO!

No Mothers Wanted

By Frank Condon

VERY few persons are aware of his changed business habits, but the fact is Mr. Zanuck is now working nights. I mean Mr. D. Zanuck of 20th Century-Fox, the motion-picture head man. He once worked daytimes, like anybody, and played polo Sunday afternoons, but now he works nights at the large, white studio and he doesn't play polo any more or any games, as he has little heart for sports. And he looks drawn and resentful.

The reason he changed habits quite suddenly is a simple one. . . . Just recently, Miss Shirley Temple was paid off, let go and dismissed from service and, as they say in the lingo of the business, she checked off the lot. She is now going to school. . . . Her last check from the studio was for $300,000, which will keep her in slates and sponges until further notice.

Her departure left the studio without any baby or child actress. It created an infantile void, with no little childish feet pattering down the runways, and almost in one grand and concerted gesture the mothers moved in, the mothers with adorable and gifted children of tender age and children neither gifted nor adorable, but only a trifle damp about the nose. They came from all over the land, near by and afar, each mother leading a small youngling by the hand. Each child was the new Shirley Temple and each mother stood ready to sign a contract on the spot and take a small down payment from the studio cashier.

Mr. Zanuck's gate is closed to dogs and mothers bringing children. Shirley Temple's successor has been chosen, so keep the children home

On the day the news was published that Shirley was leaving the studio, the first mothers appeared, and their numbers have increased steadily until now they darken the horizon, they surround the studio, they saunter up and down roads, alleys and by-passes and they are slowly driving the studio cops off the beam of sanity. . . . Cops hardest hit are those sturdy lads in the little glass booths in reception rooms, who cannot escape, shoot or do anything.

They Won't Accept Jane

That is why Mr. Zanuck has abandoned his daylight working hours and one of the larger banks has offered to lend him its armored truck if the situation becomes worse. Doting mammas and curly-haired darlings have deserted their customary haunts and now, if the Central Casting Bureau happens to get a call for a baby actor, it rushes a car up to the Fox Studios and snags a passing mother and child off the picket line.

What the eager parents refuse to believe is that they are wasting their time hanging about the studio gates, trying to break through, because the studio already has selected its successor to Shirley Temple. Her name is Jane Withers. She works on the lot, has been there for six years and has made twenty-three pictures and is fourteen years old, but just the same Jane is the successor to Shirley and the Fox people are not fooling around with strange babies. The onrushing mothers decline to accept Jane Withers. They claim she is too old to be an infant prodigy, whereupon they resume their desperate efforts and the studio adds another cop.

All the young candidates for the Temple job and check apparently can do four things. They can smile nicely, shake their curls, dance and sing in a childish treble. That is why studio cops are gradually going daffy, especially those cops in the glass booths who pass to the legitimate public officers are not permitted to leave booths, as they must be there doors open, so they must stand dimpled darlings sneak into the tion rooms and display their with or without music.

They come in behind fat r dance, jig, sing and shake their the glowering cop on duty, this can hire them, but he cannot. can do is sit there and sweat. these youthful ones are accom by their proud mothers, who e offspring on to renewed jiggling

It Isn't Funny Any More

The young prodigies even bring a band, composed of children on homemade jew's-harps, zitherleles, guitars, piccolos, flutes, whistles, barrel staves and cymbals. There is usually some trouble to them out. I spoke to one of the officers and he said: "It used to be a little funny at first, but not any more."

When Mr. Zanuck traveled from New York to Los Angeles he thought he heard a phonograph the plane. He did not. It was a child with bright yellow curls, to him in the aisle, with her mother doubt peeking anxiously from the room. The child was silent in Nashville.

(Continued on page 44)

The studios don't need a successor to Shirley Temple, a fact difficult to impress on hordes of fond mammas

NO!

No!

NO!

NO!

NO!

No!

M

Parting Shot

By Frederick Skerry

ILLUSTRATED BY HARRY MORSE MEYERS

A SHORT SHORT STORY
COMPLETE ON THIS PAGE

WELL back from a window but with a wide angle of vision, Jean Mathieu sat in his bedroom over a tobacco shop, his gaze slanted upon the inn doorway at the opposite corner where square joined highroad. He was living one of his bad times when even going below to the shop was too much for him, but now unwonted excitement made him less sensible of his weakness. Most of the past night he had sat there watching half an army rushing through the village; ambulances with wounded; tanks and guns and trucks roaring past; and finally, the infantry plodding wearied still in a sort of order. Long before, on the first news of the army's falling back, the ten score villagers had hurriedly evacuated their homes. He had watched their going sadly. Again! When he thought...

The village was as a place dead. A few stragglers, an occasional fleeting car full of officers only accentuated the emptiness. He had been forgotten—though, he thought, somebody may have looked into the shop and, seeing no sign of him, concluded he had been taken by others. He was not cast down by the oversight. His neighbors, with their families and themselves to think about, could scarcely be expected to remember him—only one of the old familiar army of displaced. Not a family in the village but one or more vacant places to stir his memory. He was taking a longer time to die, that was all. Only half a day, white before his time, dragging helplessly to his end. . . . What matter? But even had they thought of him he could not have gone with them. He had reserved seat for a show that he knew well from his experience as an actor in an earlier one. Besides, he had a special reason for remaining. He was the only man left in the village. For Monsieur Hohe had stayed by his inn. Once in a while he stood in his doorway and watched a long column pass. Hohe—a mystery these three years, since that day he appeared, a stranger, to take over the inn from old Labarre. Perhaps the strangeness of seeing a man so young content with keeping an inn—Hohe was no more than in his early thirties—was noticeable because they had become accustomed to an old innkeeper. Somehow, it seemed a business for an older man than for one young and active. But that was Hohe's affair. Still, a man appears out of nowhere and takes his place in a small village. . . . Well, people wonder, which is natural.

But Monsieur Hohe offered little information. Oh, to be sure, vague references—travels—voyages—shadowy family affairs—which told nothing. He was as secretive as one freshly released from prison. It was all very puzzling, this reticence of his, in a community where garrulity was as much a part of life as breathing.

Most puzzling was his seeming indifference to the activities of the old enemy; countries gobbled up with appetite insatiable and in overweening confidence. With everybody speaking his mind about these things, Hohe went about his work saying nothing but with a patient look on his face, as if he were forced to listen to children's prattle.

THEN that evening after Denmark had been quietly appropriated: "Well, of course," Giraud said, like an oracle, over the babble in the bar, "Denmark is one thing, but we are another. We are ready for them."

And hadn't he, Jean Mathieu, said to Hohe, "And what do you think, Monsieur Hohe?" Flatly, like that.

Then Hohe, busily wiping the zinc of the bar, shrugged his rather stooped shoulders without looking up. "It is good to be ready," he said. Which was ambiguous, to say the least.

And when they left the inn were any of them concerned about Monsieur Hohe? Not one. They listened abstractedly to his doubts of Hohe, blind to the mysteriousness of the man. "And what," Giraud said, "would a spy be doing in a small, unimportant village?"

What indeed? What use to argue with them? The village was small, to be sure. But unimportant—that was something else. Wasn't it on a main highroad to the frontier? And wasn't the road a direct one to a place that was important, a confluence of roads that led to towns and cities and military posts? And didn't they know that these subjugations of peoples had been made easy by the treachery of foreigners within their borders?

But he, himself, was far from satisfied with Monsieur Hohe. Hohe! How many times had he repeated the name to himself? Hohe—Hohe . . . Hohe—nohe . . . Hohe—nzollern. . . . Maybe it was his imagination. And yet . . . yet . . .

Without losing sight of the inn door Mathieu saw a company or two, in loose formation, come running into the square, deploying to take posts in houses. A rear guard. . . . His shop door crashed . . . feet stumbled on the stairs. . . . He looked around for an instant as his bedroom door flew open, and a soldier staggered in. Scarcely more than a boy, he thought, as his gaze returned to the inn doorway. Just such a boy as he had been. From the corner of one eye he saw the boy swaying on his feet—heard the gasped, "Pardon, Monsieur!"

He kept his gaze on the inn. "You are wounded?" he said over his shoulder.

"Yes, Monsieur—somewhere inside." "Ah! Well, my son, take it easy. A wounded man is privileged. . . ."

The sharp racket of motorcycles grew louder. A burst of shots echoed through the square as a troop of machines appeared. Three of the leaders tumbled off and sprawled in the road, their machines wobbling crazily, then tipping on their sides and skidding in half circles to a stop. More machines appeared, and from behind them came the roar of heavy trucks.

A fierce bitterness filled him. Wincing with the effort, he picked up the rifle behind him

Mathieu turned his head quickly as the boy behind him sank heavily to the floor, his rifle and its strap bumping and clattering.

Soldiers from trucks began to rush houses from which shots were coming. They would find them empty; the rear guard would be scurrying from the back gardens to the fields. Scattered shots—a burst or two from automatic rifles—and the throbbing of engines had the air to itself.

AN OFFICER climbed down from a truck, newly arrived. Mathieu straightened in his chair as the innkeeper came out and stood stiffly before his door—not the rather stoop-shouldered Hohe now, but straight, like a soldier, his arm outstretched obliquely in that hated salute. Hah! Monsieur Hohe! The man who had lived as one of them! Mathieu's curiosity was satisfied—shockingly, for all his doubts of Hohe. A fierce bitterness filled him.

Wincing with the effort, he picked up the rifle behind him—tried the bolt. When he rested the muzzle on the window sill and took sight the innkeeper was handing a long, folded paper to the officer. Gently, Mathieu squeezed the trigger—and Monsieur Hohe pitched forward, his second salute half finished. "Perfect!" sighed Mathieu. "But too late—much too late!"

With the rifle in his hands, he twisted about to look at the motionless figure on the floor. If he put the gun back they would blame the boy for the shot. But the boy would not have sighted on Hohe; he would have aimed at a man in uniform. Heavy feet pounded the stairs. And Jean Mathieu sat waiting—the rifle across his knees.

If your doctor finds your blood pressure up he is going to ask a great many questions concerning the way you live

Essential hypertension needn't interfere with your normal routine—you'll probably keep right on working and playing

You'll probably be told that there isn't any real reason for not continuing to enjoy life—in a quiet sort of way

Staying on good terms with the little woman is one way to help keep your blood pressure within reasonable bounds

Don't Worry About It

By Hannah Lees

ILLUSTRATED BY GEORGE DE ZAYAS

High blood pressure is nothing to get steamed up about—in fact that's just what you shouldn't do. Relax and let research delve into its causes, which still remain somewhat mysterious

THERE is a certain room in a certain hospital in Boston where a group of earnest students has been gathering weekly the last couple of years to go to school. There are lectures and exercises and recitations. There are examinations—stiff examinations, too. But the only requirement for the entrance into this class is high blood pressure. It's remarkable how quickly these earnest, mostly middle-aged students progress.

The lectures, you see, are on high blood pressure and the psychic origin of many of its symptoms. The exercises, which the students practice at home as well as in class, are relaxing exercises. The recitations are by the senior members of the class to show the junior members how much it is possible to improve. And when examination time comes . . . well, some of the students simply feel a great deal better, but in two thirds of those who attended the class more than three times, the blood pressure had actually fallen remarkably. This is quite possibly the only blood-pressure class in existence but it is typical of the way this common ailment—very common, one out of every four people over fifty has it, which means at least your mother- or your father-in-law—is being treated by enlightened doctors today. The modern idea seems to be that whatever the physiological cause, which we'll get around to in a minute, the most usual aggravating factor, once you have the ailment, is worry, and the logical way to treat it, therefore, is to teach you not to worry. So if you go to a good, forward-looking doctor today, complaining of headaches, dizzy spells, nosebleeds and what not, and he discovers that what you have is essential hypertension (recognize your old friend under that title?) the chances are before you're through you'll wonder if you haven't dropped accidentally into the office of a psychiatrist.

"Hm," he may say casually as he unwinds that gray cloth from around your arm, "blood pressure's up a little." He'll probably look in your eyes then with a little black instrument called an ophthalmoscope and, in case he goes mysterious, I'll tell you that that's because the back of your eyes is conveniently enough the one place a doctor can actually see your smaller arteries in action. He can actually see whether they're diseased or just acting up. Then he'll probably send you to his laboratory for a number of kidney and other tests. And, "Hm," he may say again, if all the tests prove negative, "wouldn't hurt you to lose a little weight, we'll have to see to that, but organically you're sound as a nut. Just that little increase in blood pressure—no cause for it."

He may tell you to lay off meat and salt and tobacco and liquor, and perhaps stop working for a while, and give up your golf. But before long he'll know all about just how seriously you take things and what things you take too seriously, whether your wife loves you and vice versa, and whether you've been stewing for some time over that raise the boss hasn't given you. Then he'll probably tell you to go back to your office and your golf and your before-dinner cocktail and enjoy life in a quiet way, losing weight if you have to lose it, because that's important for general health as well as for high blood pressure, and though you pay him regular visits after that he may very possibly not be too much concerned with your blood pressure.

The idea, you see, is that many people with high blood pressure are ill because they feel—witness the fact that a man with a slightly high blood pressure can feel sicker than a man with very high blood pressure—and if you can manage to give them a tranquil life and make them lead a tranquil life without symptoms, if not their high blood pressure will vanish.

Of course this form of treatment is an admission of defeat. If doctors knew a better remedy for high blood pressure, like pernicious anemia or insulin for diabetes, they wouldn't waste their time over anything as mental suggestion. The point is that it works in most cases.

The immediate cause of high blood pressure in many cases, however, is a nervous condition, a spasmodic stiffening of the walls of the smaller arteries, all the thousands and thousands of little arteries that carry the blood from the larger arteries to the infinitesimal capillaries in the remotest parts of your body. It isn't that the heart beats faster or harder, or that there is too much blood running through the side of you. Doctors thought this, and that was often why they bled the patient. Logical, too—high blood pressure, let the blood and relieve the pressure, just as you air out of a tire, only it didn't bring relief because that wasn't the trouble.

It's Just a Matter of Degree

The extra pressure, they've found, comes from too much blood, but from too little room for it to flow around in, as if fluid were being forced through a soft rubber hose and you had clamped something hard around the hose, shutting it off, just keeping it from expanding. Now this doesn't mean, as you might think, that high blood pressure and hardening of the arteries are the same thing, or that a narrowing of the arteries is necessarily the cause of high blood pressure. As a matter of fact it is in other ways around in some cases. After a while the arteries and arterioles have been having spasms long enough and often enough to stay contracted all the time and become thickened and hard.

Of course high blood pressure is just a matter of degree and extent. Nobody's blood pressure is constant for many minutes at a time. It has been lying down, it rises when we stand up, it rises still more when we stand up. It rises when we eat our dinner and then drops when we drop off to sleep. And as for the various expressions, such as "Go away, I can't raise my blood pressure," and "Break a leg," and "Break a sweat," and "Break a cold," and almost clichés, and sound clichés at the heart of any even moderately intense emotion, they give the blood pressure a slight kick in passing, but they don't cause definite temporary increases.

Just what makes normal blood pressure so easily to inner and outer behavior is something doctors have had quite a time to figure out. A change in the rate of your heart has something to do with it, but more important still is the sympathetic nervous system, which controls most of the involuntary muscles of the body that go right on working whether you are asleep or not—from those in your stomach to those in your arteries. So if you're (Continued on

Occupation: Widow

By William C. White

ILLUSTRATED BY GEORGE HOWE

Story Thus Far:

PAUL LESSER and Rolf Blaerchen, owners of a Berlin night club, employ a singer, Carl Dirling, and a comedian, Karl Dietrich. Lesser marries Carola, and a short time later is killed in a mysterious automobile "accident." Suspecting that Blaerchen, a Nazi, has been somehow involved in her husband's murder, Carola leaves Berlin; and Dietrich, guilty of having fun at the Nazis, is sent to a concentration camp. Three years pass. Dietrich, released from the camp, returns to Berlin, where he joins a group of anti-Nazi conspirators—Hans Ranke, Hans Klauss, Schebeler and others. His bitterest enemy is Rolf Blaerchen, who has become a power in the Foreign Office. His dearest friend is Carola, who, hoping to learn the truth concerning her husband's death, comes back to the German capital and becomes a Foreign Office spy—reporting to Blaerchen.

Nothing Blaerchen (who makes incessant advances to her) and shocked by his ruthlessness, Carola finally tells him bluntly that she will work for him no longer. After which, she begins rehearsing a singing role that Franz Wagner, owner of "Sans Souci," a well-known night spot, gives her.

But Blaerchen keeps a sharp eye on her; and presently he guesses the truth: Karl Dietrich whom Wagner has employed as a messenger (general factotum) and Paul Lesser's widow are in love. Infuriated, he forces Carola to accompany him to his home, where—after ordering her to drop Dietrich—he tells her that he loves her.

Carola listens patiently. Then, when he begins to make violent advances, she says: "Is that why you killed Paul?" The question comes as a terrific shock to the Nazi. And, watching her face intently, Carola feels sure that he is guilty of her husband's murder.

A few hours later, Carola learns that Dietrich has been arrested. She implores Blaerchen to have him released. Then comes a surprise: Blaerchen says that he will release Dietrich if she will accept an invitation from Herr Praut, an important Nazi official. Carola agrees.

Dietrich, freed, meets Carola and they discuss the situation. They wonder if they can escape Germany, escape from Blaerchen. "If," Carola says, "we can get out, no matter how dangerous, I'll go anywhere with you, Karl!"

VII

KARL called Klauss from an outside telephone. A half-hour later they met near the Kaiser Wilhelm Museum.

"We can go in and keep warm," Klauss said pleasantly. "If we should happen to be discussing the exhibits, who will know?" He smiled. "Tell me about your arrest."

"Later," Karl said hurriedly, as they entered the museum. "First, is there any way that people can get out of this country?"

"You and Fräulein Dirling?"

Karl nodded.

"There is one way," Klauss said slowly, "by fishing boat out of Stettin." For the first time in a long while Karl smiled. "I was sure you would know of that." But he saw no answering smile on Klauss' face. "Is it very dangerous?"

"I know of five men who tried it last month."

"And?"

"Two got through!"

With his face expressionless, Karl considered that. That was an escape that was as dangerous as the trap.

"I wish I could be more encouraging," Klauss said.

"What can we do?" Karl's deep voice cracked. "Blaerchen insists that as the price for her freedom and mine she show herself at Herr Praut."

"Praut?" Klauss was interested at once. "Why should Blaerchen do anything for him?"

"I don't know," Karl said.

They sat on a bench in one of the exhibit halls. Except for a guard the place was empty. "If we did know, we could understand Blaerchen better." He seemed eager to help. "Tell me all you have heard about Blaerchen."

Karl thought for a moment, then recalled what Mainescu had said about Blaerchen's enemies, what Maria had said about his habits, what Froscetti had said, and the gossip that Schebeler had reported, about Praut's promotion and about the fight. "That sums it up," he said.

KLAUSS nodded and they moved to a group of statuary. They stood near it, as if examining it. "Since Blaerchen has been interested in Carola he wouldn't be handing her over to Praut without expecting something in return."

"Possibly. What could he expect?"

"Revenge, of course, but I think that's a luxury that Blaerchen could not afford unless there was a profit in it." Klauss smiled ever so slightly. "The most obvious thing is money." When Karl objected, Klauss continued: "Why not? After all, Blaerchen is only following a notable and exemplary precedent. Certainly." Klauss lowered his voice. "I think Blaerchen is avaricious enough to do anything for money. Particularly now, when he did not get a promotion! He must be bitter about that!"

"Possibly," Karl agreed. "I'm afraid that doesn't help us. Carola insists that she keep that engagement with Praut."

"She may not have to," Klauss said paternally, as they moved to another group of statuary. "There might be some way to use money to trap the impregnable Herr Blaerchen so that you and Carola need not fear him any more."

Karl shook his head. "I have no experience setting traps for villains."

Klauss smiled. "After fifteen years in the theater? I thought that that was the essence of the drama, from Hamlet to the Three Penny Opera." Then he was suddenly serious. "Dangerous as it might be, I would have you do anything rather than attempt the journey across the Baltic."

For a half-hour after they had left the museum Karl walked the street, not sure where to go or what to do. Blaerchen might very well be baited into some trap by money, but on this cold February morning Karl could think of no trap. Then he remembered that he was more than two hours late for work. He could make some excuse to Wagner.

But he did not expect to find Wagner carrying on like a madman. "Come here, come here—where have you been?" Wagner roared.

It seemed like an exaggerated reaction to two hours' lateness.

"I'm sorry I'm late—!"

"Late? I don't care when you come in. But Carola!"

"What's the matter?" Karl's voice was taut.

"She called me and said she'd changed her mind. She isn't going to open." He stared at Karl and saw something in his face. "Come in!" He led Karl into the office and slammed the door. "Carola ought to be more thoughtful. I have a bad heart. To call up and say in cold

(Continued on page 50)

"You're beautiful!" Karl exclaimed. He kissed her. "You look as if time had stood still!"

The Big Dough-Re-Mi

Continued from page 10

bunch is phenomenal, I tell you." The agent paused impressively. "And you can get 'em cheap. You can get 'em for what the singer alone is worth."

"A singer too, heh?" Freem said casually.

"Blues," said Fess passionately. "And you couldn't find another pair of pipes like hers even on Broadway. Her husband directs, they use a lot of their own tunes you couldn't hear anywhere else, and altogether it's a very original set-up. You know, the intimate tone—like it's a privilege to hear 'em. Just right for a club. It'll go big, Mr. Freem. It'll pack 'em in."

Eventually they got around to price. "Fourteen hundred," Fess said. "After all, there's ten of 'em, and you know a leader always gets at least as much as the rest of the band put together."

"Seven," Freem countered promptly. "After all, I had bands workin' for me before." His final word was, "Nine hundred—if I like 'em."

"If this isn't a dopey racket!" May said. "We insult him, we practically throw him out, and two days later he comes back with a job for us."

Fess had just left the rehearsal hall with Freem. Freem had liked it. Frank was expected at the agent's office that afternoon to sign up.

"I don't like the idea of working for that guy but we're in no position to be choosy," he said.

"Good thing we don't have to see much of him," said May. "That snaky grin of his is a killer."

"All he has to do is hand it over Saddy nights, reg'lar," said Steve, the trumpeter.

FRANK wanted May to come along to the agent's office but she begged off. "It's your band, Frank. Besides, I'm afraid I might louse up the deal. He might look at me, that way he's got, and I might make a crack that'd keep us rehearsing for another couple of months. Just read it slow, Pops, in blues time."

Frank read the contract slowly but that made the terms seem no less brutal: exclusive management of the band for a year, fat percentages of any outside engagements Fess might get for them, six hundred and fifty dollars a week—when they worked.

"I'll think it over, Mr. Fess."

"No time for that. Freem has six other bands he can put in there and he wants your yes or no today. He opens in a few nights, you know."

Frank thought of the boys. They'd had only meager pickings the last few months and some of them had families dependent upon them. He told Fess he'd make a phone call and then give his decision.

"Six-fifty; tie-up for a year; no play no pay," he summed it up for May over the telephone.

"I guess it's only a rumor that a leader is supposed to get half," May said. "You can't give the boys less than sixty, and then there's music to buy and . . . that vulture! Well—the boys must eat, though. But insist on half pay for no play, at least."

Fess howled when Frank told him about the guarantee he wanted, so Frank started to leave. Fess saw he meant it and called him back. Three hundred a week, if engagements ran out—for no more than two weeks—was the best he would offer. Frank found haggling very distasteful. He signed. . . .

Pickett leaned over Wetterau's desk, coaxing, persuading: "But Emil, it's five years now that you've been saying swing is on the way out. The fact that you don't like it hot, personally, is losing us business. Look at Goodman, the Dorseys . . ."

"Look at Montfort, Kemp, Lombardo, Fields, Heidt, Reisman, Kyser, Noble, Nelson, Hallett, Clinton," Wetterau rattled off.

"I know, Emil. But this band of Leedy's is exceptional in its class, and if we don't grab them somebody else will. I found out they're in a cheap spot and if we hurry maybe we can still get them."

Wetterau at last yielded. "All right, get 'em. But strictly hot bands are too unpredictable for me. Wow or flop, Arthur, Leedy'll be your own private headache."

THE Inner Door Club was more than half filled and that was good going for a new place with an unknown band, only ten days after opening night. They were playing a lively stomp tune when Pickett sat down at a table near the platform. He listened with pleasure and excitement. He had made no mistake.

Frank stood with his tenor sax in front

Then the boys abandoned the score and, with Frank showing the way on his clarinet, jammed two choruses. It was collective improvisation by ten artists, smooth and inspired, with a minimum of exhibitionism. It was music.

May's voice had come as a complete surprise to Pickett, and with the effect of what had followed—one of Steve's trumpet passages kept ringing in his head—it took a little while for him to recall just why he was there. He sent a note by waiter and shortly Frank and May came curiously to his table.

"Won't you sit down?" he said, after introductions had been made.

"Thanks."

"To come right to the point: National wants you under their banner."

May and Frank exchanged glances of unhappy surprise.

"Gee, Mr. Pickett, we'd like it, but . . ."

"Add three men to make it a full band, then a tour for a break-in, and then a big spot in town. Say fifteen hundred to start. Later, well, anything may happen. With radio and recording and theater appearances—" Pickett smiled promisingly.

"Say! Who's drivin' this thing, you or me?"

JAY IRVING

of the band, sending them from one brilliant chorus into another. One realized that the boys were working hard but having a good time at it and that made watching them enjoyable. There was no clowning, no straining for effect. The show was all in the music itself.

The half-hour session ended with Blue But Happy Blues. There were a few instrumental solos before May sang. She didn't grapple with a microphone. ("Take that thing away. I don't need it and it only makes me nervous," she'd said the first night they'd been there.) There was only a sudden hush as the boys turned their heads toward her, ready to follow the accompanying figure she set for them on the piano before she began singing, and that subtly called everybody's attention to her. She looked up from the keyboard toward the people at the tables and began, simply, to wail it out, easily filling the place with her big contralto:

*"I'm blue but happy, blue but happy,
happy cos I'm used to bein' blue;
Sad but I like it, sad but I like it, like it cos there's nothin' else to do.*

So send me down, blues, send me down, blues, send me just as deep as you please. . . ."

Frank groaned. "We're trying to tell you we're here through an office—tied up for a year."

"Oh—too bad!" Pickett's face fell. But then he took heart again; he just had to have this band. "But maybe we can buy your contract. I'd help you up to a thousand dollars, which you could pay back out of future earnings. But you'd have to handle it yourself. Chances are your agent would want a million if he knew we were interested."

"Gee, thanks, Mr. Pickett. We'll try," Frank said.

A FULL band, darling!" May whispered as they walked slowly back to the platform.

"Five brass, four reeds and the rhythm we've got—what we could say with that!" Frank mumbled, dazed.

"But we're 'way ahead of ourselves," May said soberly, thinking of Fess.

Frank was flabbergasted when Fess asked five thousand dollars for the contract. "That's what it's worth to me," the agent said coolly. "Specially if National Music or somebody like that is after you."

Shrewd rat, Frank thought as he left the office, and they were bound hopelessly to him for a year. But now that that was settled he couldn't brood much over it. The band was working where it could be heard to advantage and he craved recognition more than money. He would go on with the band, developing new ideas, further exploring their potentialities. That was what he lived for.

Pickett said he was sorry, but a year wasn't forever and after that, maybe

When Frank told May about it she thought: "Five years fighting for a break and when it's handed to us, only get our hands slapped for reaching for it. Another whole year!" But Frank she said, "Well, the boys are happy, making a name—and who wants to go back on the road, anyway? No, me, thanks. I just had some."

So they returned to making music and lost themselves in it.

AT THE end of the month Fess paid two hundred dollars more per week out of Freem who, in his caution, which he now regretted, had insisted on a month-to-month arrangement. He had to pay because the band was almost filling the club, nightly, now, and it was worth it to him. Fess said nothing about the increase to Frank. As for Freem, he had assumed that the band was getting its share, or something near it, and, besides, proprietors did not by custom poke into what went on between agent and the help. But because of the night contact between Freem and the band would have been strange if it had not eventually come out that they were being treated shabbily.

One evening between dances May was filling in at the piano, humming while Frank, at her side, dreamed the melody on his sax and Steve leaned on the side of the piano, listening. May slipped up onto the bandstand and sat down near them, looking smug around at the well-filled tables.

"This is the stuff they love," he whispered to May. "Makes them feel they're at a sort of private party."

"Things look pretty good, don't they, Mr. Freem?" May said.

"Yeah, pretty good, but it ain't a gravy. Not that I'm complaining. Oh, don't forget the band alone costs me eleven hundred a week."

Quickly May found a cadence for her improvisation. Her abrupt stop and Steve's low whistle made Frank look up from his horn.

"Eleven hundred—and we're getting only six and a half!" May said.

"The cheap low-down!" Frank muttered unhappily.

Freem smiled crookedly and shook his head. "I guessed he was looking out for himself—but that's around forty per cent he's cuttin' you! Well, too bad I can't interfere." He shrugged his shoulders, got up and left.

"What a fancy rookin' Fess is giving us!" Steve observed. Then he went into the band room to tell the boys about it.

"We've got to do something, Pops," May said grimly. "We've got to get clear of that vulture."

"Now, now, Honey—don't make yourself sick over it," Frank begged. "It's tough, all right, but we can't help it. . . . Gee, don't look at me like that—as if I was something that belonged in a cage."

"It isn't fair to the boys, Frank."

"But what can we do, kid, what can we do?" Avoiding her eyes, Frank picked up a copy of a weekly musical publication, which he had bought before coming to work but had not yet had time to study.

"Whee—look at this!" He thrust the

"Here's the way to feel refreshed"

Coca-Cola has the charm of purity. It is prepared with the finished art that comes from a lifetime of practice. Its delicious taste never loses the freshness of appeal that first delighted you...always bringing you a cool, clean sense of complete refreshment. Thirst asks nothing more.

© 1940, THE COCA-COLA COMPANY

Take hold of an ice-cold bottle of Coca-Cola and you have the whole answer to thirst in the palm of your hand. Lift it to your lips and drink. You'll find out at once what the pause that refreshes with ice-cold Coca-Cola can really mean...to you. Try it.

"HEY, TONY, THE CAR RUNS LIKE A DREAM!"

A SERVICE MAN REVEALS WHY MANY CARS LACK PEP...

"SHE POKES ALONG LIKE AN OLD COW," I told the service man. "No pep, always the last car to get away at every traffic light! It's certainly not any fun driving a car in that condition."

"THERE'S THE TROUBLE, LADY," he said, holding up a spark plug. "See? Electrode's gone. That's why the engine misses and has no power. I recommend a set of new Auto-Lite Spark Plugs."

PLENTY OF PICKUP AND POWER NOW! What a difference those Auto-Lite Spark Plugs made in the way my car runs! That service man did me a real favor when he recommended Auto-Lites.

Secret of surging power for lazy, spark-weary motors found in amazing mystery spark

MOTORISTS everywhere are amazed when they replace old, power-wasting spark plugs with sensational new Auto-Lites. Sluggish, pepleless cars suddenly gain flashing pickup and power, and deliver more miles per gallon.

The reason? This new kind of spark plug fires with less electrical effort — produces an amazing Mystery Spark that transforms gasoline into smooth, lively POWER.

To harness this strange Mystery Spark, Auto-Lite engineers produced a new Konium electrode, designed on a new principle of gap geometry, they developed a new and exclusive "Ziramic" insulator.

No other new spark plug ever attracted so many users in so short a time. See the difference a set of new Auto-Lite Spark Plugs may make in your car's performance. Have them installed today. Look for the Auto-Lite sign. There is one near you.

THE ELECTRIC AUTO-LITE COMPANY
TOLEDO, OHIO • Merchondising Division • SARNIA, ONTARIO

NEWEST ACHIEVEMENT OF AUTO-LITE ENGINEERS
Out of 28 years' experience in automotive electrical engineering comes this new spark plug, as the final link in the ignition system.

Ignition Engineered
by Ignition Engineers

Change to AUTO-LITE SPARK PLUGS

agine at May, pointing out the lun called the Jam Shelf:
"Jew on Night Club Row and the st word in hot music"—May read—Frank and May Leedy and their riffing out a unique and very per-kind of jive. This gang is a most elme addition to the select group ayg uncompromised swing—and we mean noise. It took them a long getting set, as it always does with kind of offering, but we hope that they're in a decent spot they'll easily win the recognition they deere followed a listing of the band's nnel, explaining what each of the did to make the music sound so whole column, Frank. Boy that's "May said in a distant-sounding pays for everything. Wait'll the see it—it'll cheer them up after our news we just got." Frank took magazine and hurried into the band ny remained behind at the piano, ter mind was not on the music. This Frank's softness about money mat-had really tried her patience.

le next night was Saturday night here was an even bigger than usual theater crowd at the Inner Door ching in their seats while the band through one of its out-of-the-sessions. Suddenly, in the middle fast tune, the piano went a bit off beat, making the whole rhythm secwaver.

Frank quickly swung around, facing band with his sax, and blasted the back into time.

ER the initial shock, he fronted gain, climbing into the nervous, elling voice of the upper register of ax and carried the band with him for er full chorus. To that lead the could play only their best. But as as Frank relaxed, in the very next Tubby scrambled a drum inter-Vido's pick seemed to get tangled ing the whanging strings, and right that Windy muffed a riff and Steve to pieces with him. Frantically k looked to the two reed men to him pull the band out, and Alec—the infallible—went bad, actually aked on his alto.

ank hung up his horn and retreated the anteroom to hide. He hadn't ed himself to say a word, afraid he t scream; he hadn't trusted himto look at the customers. Puffing usly at a cigarette, he turned his inward upon himself. He was a of a crank to blow up like that. The were only human; every band had ff-night now and then.

But later it got worse. It didn't seem possible but it got much worse. Around two in the morning. Frank could no longer contain himself and called the band backstage.

"If a guy hits a clinker once, well—so he hit a clinker. But for the whole outfit to go lousy!"

May chewed her lip. None of the boys could look Frank in the eye.

"Me," Tubby said. "I got a bum wrist." He rubbed his wrist. "I don't know how, but I must've strained it—a tendon or something—and it hurts terrible."

Frank turned in disgust to Windy.
"And why should you stink all of a sudden?"

"Dunno, Frank—I'm doin' my best," Windy rumbled.

"How about you, Alec?"

"My reed went back on me," Alec said weakly.

Frank flared up:

"Now none of that off-time jive! All the fussing you do with reeds . . . !" Frank turned finally to May. "You got a bum fin too?"

"Maybe we're getting stale—or something," May lamely replied.

FREEM bellowed into the phone: "I tell you, Fess, the customers are laughing—the wrong way. If you don't believe it come down and hear it yourself. Three nights in a row! And I'm giving notice starting tonight. They'll have to get good again, fast, if you expect me to keep 'em. Don't forget that satisfactory-performance clause."

"Just give me a little time," Frank told Fess. "A gang like mine just has to straighten out. They're too good not to."

The agent was baffled and exasperated. "Well, the way Freem feels about it, you got only a coupla days. And you can't blame him."

That night after work Frank said to May, "Maybe I better give up. Maybe I just better walk out."

"Now, when we really need you most?" May said.

"If I only knew why—why!" Frank looked at her queerly. "Think they're hitting the jug too hard? Naw—it couldn't be that. I could tell in a minute. Maybe—maybe it's because they know we're getting such a raw deal from Fess."

"Well, it might be that. You can't expect them to be gay about it," May said slowly. It wrung her insides to look at him. He was pale and a bleak, hopeless expression had come into his eyes.

"But they're such fine musicians," Frank said. "We've been rooked before and they never took it like this.
Gee!—I never would've thought they

How's your "Pep Appeal"?

—by Dorne

Opera Director: A tenor you are—maybe. But a toreador—pfui! Where is the "oomph," the pep appeal?

Carmen: Did somebody mention PEP? I've just discovered it, too! Isn't it the most delicious cereal you ever tasted? And, besides, it's extra rich in two of the most important vitamins. Come on, toreador, let's have a snack.

Carmen: You know, we have to get all our vitamins for pep. And this perfectly grand cereal called KELLOGG'S PEP is extra rich in the two that are most lacking in every-day diets—vitamins B<sub>1</sub> and D.

Toreador: Whoa, there! You can save the details. PEP tastes like a million dollars.

Toreador: Ah, Carmen! Now that I've discovered vitamins and KELLOGG'S PEP, just watch me become the greatest bull-fighter that ever trod the boards.

Carmen: Take your time, toreador. It doesn't all happen at once!

Vitamins for pep! Kellogg's Pep for vitamins!

Pep contains per serving: 4/5 to 1/5 the minimum daily need of vitamin B<sub>1</sub>, according to age; 1/2 the daily need of vitamin D. For sources of other vitamins, see the Pep package.

MADE BY KELLOGG'S IN BATTLE CREEK

COPYRIGHT, 1940, BY KELLOGG COMPANY

"That's for people who miss the train"

REANER KELLER

"How a kind word ruin my beezness"

1. Everyone takes the siesta in the heat of the day, except I, poor Juan. While all are asleep, the shops are closed. Except my shop, where I sell pottery to the American tourists for ten times what it costs in America.

Copyright, 1940, General Foods Corp.

2. An American senorita comes one afternoon to buy the pottery. "How is it that you do not take the siesta?" she asked, speaking that strange language which I have heard called Highschool Spanish. "Ah, senorita," I sighed, "I cannot sleep!"

3. "It is the coffee!" I explained. "I love the coffee. I cannot resist it. But when I drink it with the lunch, then all afternoon I am wide awake!" She nodded. "It is good business to be open when other shops are closed!"

4. "I would give all the beezness for a good siesta!" I cried. "Then you should drink Sanka Coffee," she said. "It's 97% caffeine-free, and can't keep you awake!" "It is an American trick!" I scoffed. "How can it be good coffee?"

5. "It's wonderfull! A blend of finest Central and South American coffees!" she replied. "And the Council on Foods of the American Medical Association says: 'Sanka Coffee is free from caffeine effect, and can be used when other coffee has been forbidden!'"

6. So in gratitude I charge her only five times what the pottery is worth. Later, I try Sanka Coffee. Delicious. And I sleep each day during the afternoon. My pottery beezness, he is ruin but ah, amigo... how I enjoy the siesta!

SANKA COFFEE

REAL COFFEE—97% CAFFEIN-FREE

Makes delicious iced coffee

Use Sanka Coffee when you make iced coffee this summer. It's delightfully cooling and refreshing...and it lets you sleep!

could sound so bad even if they tried."

"Whatever it is, Pops, you've got to hold on—you've just got to," May said.

The band was thrown out of the club at the end of the week.

Frank got the wishful notion that being fired would bring the boys around and he clung to it desperately. "One more chance," he begged Fess. "I swear they'll be good."

"What else can I do?" Fess said bitterly. "It'll cost me three hundred bucks if I don't get you something before another week goes."

A few days later he had the proprietor of a suburban dance hall at the rehearsal room to hear Leedy's band.

It stank.

"Sorry," the man said, and went away.

Having almost swallowed the chewed stump of his cigar, Fess also left.

The boys squirmed in their seats, saying nothing. Frank stared at them, distraught, then slowly down at the clarinet he still held in his hands, and, with sudden, insane rage, flung it up against the wall. It made a queer clattering sound, with tinkles, as broken keys spattered on the floor.

Then came another strange sound, out of Steve.

"P-p-pa-hah!" He exploded into laughter. With that to send them, the other boys let go, too. They roared, they stamped their feet, they pounded each other on the back. Only May didn't laugh. She jumped up from the piano, faced Frank worriedly and put her hands on his arms.

"It was all my fault, Pops—I talked them into it. But we had to do it, don't you see? Fess—I think maybe we're rid of him!"

"Huh?" Frank looked stupidly at her and around at the boys. "Oh—I get it. A special extra-funny rib on me, one that it took five years to build up. Guess I ought to laugh, too." He gave a short, tragic laugh. "Five years—for this. Here it is—the clincher." He took out of his pocket a copy of the musical magazine, dropped it on the piano, yanked himself free of May and fled. She dashed after him but when she reached the hallway he was out of sight.

SHE turned slowly back to the boys. They weren't laughing any more. Steve showed her the "Jam Shelf" column:

"Seems we were a little hasty with our congratulations in the last issue. Frank Leedy's phenomenal jammers have suddenly gone bad, but terrible, overnight. As we went to press the news came that they were bounced out of the Inner Door, and we hate to have to say they earned it. Though it seems unaccountable, such things have happened before."

May didn't wait to hear any more, but got her hat and rushed out into a taxicab.

On the way a series of frightful possibilities whirled through her mind. Maybe Frank wouldn't be at home when she got there.

Maybe...

The cab, caught in the late-afternoon traffic crush, inched painfully down Seventh Avenue. In an agony of impatience she jumped out, tossed the hackman a coin and ran the rest of the way to the hotel.

"Frankie, darling!" she cried from the doorway, and stopped short, bent over a valise on the bed. She near him.

"I'm so terribly sorry, Frank! I most gave it away, more than once. It was too late..."

"Let me alone."

"You have to listen. Pickett on it too and..."

"I don't want to hear about..."

"But it was the only way, Frank! I was so sure it would work."

Stubbornly, but very slowly, she continued packing.

She had stopped talking. He glanced at her. She was sitting on the telephone, legs crossed, hands on her hips, watching him grimace. He wished she would say something, but left himself nothing to say.

HE COULDN'T stall any longer. Slowly he closed the valise and fastened it with the straps. He got his hat, picked up the valise and started for the door. "Well, s'long, May. I didn't stir, didn't make a sound, would have had to go if not for the den jangle of the telephone. I grabbed it. He dropped his valise in fascination watched her face. He tenseness, heard her gleeful giggle.

"Wow! Now please tell it to me!" She went over to him, took his ear, led him to the phone and him down into the chair.

"Fess just left me," Pickett said. "Thought maybe I didn't know you supposed to be washed up and that could still get a price for the coffee. A bargain at two grand, he called. Laughed him down to five hundred to give him something for it. Smashed your wife. Right now it looks like a twenty-six-week tour. Easy hope spots. Drop in tomorrow and we'll about it."

"Gee, Mr. Pickett—I don't know what to say," Frank stammered. "Thanks—and we'll give you the best we've got."

He put down the telephone and turned in his seat to stare surlily at the window.

"It's swell, May, and all that mumbled grumpily, "but it was mean not to put me wise. If you knew what I went through! It was slow death by torture."

She grasped him by the hair, and turned his face up.

"You know you wouldn't have done for it. Admit it!" She shook him. "Admit it!"

"Owoo—all right, Honey, all right. But let go." He looked sheepish at her. "Yeah—I guess it was the way, kid."

He grinned.

"I'd've packed you and the baby the first night if I'd been hep. I'd to admit it."

She laughed and kissed him.

"Think of it, Pops—back on the again!" May began singing, making up as she went along, dancing before him. "New faces—new places—always on the go—truckin' on down old jive trail!"

Telegraph Poles

CROCKETT JOHN

DIRTY PLUGS

'Lay Down on the Job!'

SPARK PLUGS

For More Than 31 Years

THE QUALITY SPARK PLUG

Buick, Cadillac, Chevrolet, LaSalle, Nash, Oldsmobile, and Pontiac motor cars; Chevrolet, Diamond-T, Federal, GMC, and International Trucks; Allis-Chalmers, J. I. Case, Cletrac and International Harvester Tractors . . . these are some of the well-known cars, trucks, and tractors which use AC Quality Spark Plugs. Trust your spark plug requirements to the same brand of spark plugs which the leading, big-volume manufacturers select.

Get a Set—and Get the difference

AC SPARK PLUG DIVISION • General Motors Corporation
FLINT, MICHIGAN

Clean Plugs put SNAP and PEP into your car's performance

More than 70,000 Registered AC Spark Plug Cleaning Stations stand ready to clean and regap your plugs. Get this service every 4,000 miles—and drive a better performing, faster starting, gas-economizing car.

Here's the CURE for Spark Plug Troubles

	Have Plugs CLEANED by the AC METHOD
	Cleaning Includes REGAPPING to the Engineers' Standards
	The Cost is only 5c EACH the biggest nickel's worth you ever got

SPARK PLUGS NEED CLEANING, TOO

Replace worn plugs with new AC's for best engine performance

A MILLION — of Chrysler

238,857 MILES

238,857 MILES

The test cars of a famous rubber company reveal amazing superiorities of Chrysler cars!

IMAGINE driving your car 20 hours every day . . . piling up 1,000 miles a day at almost "wide-open" speeds . . . and doing it every day for years!

That's exactly what a prominent tire and rubber company has been doing with its Chrysler test cars since 1934.

Driving in two shifts daily, these cars have piled up a yearly average mileage of more than the distance from the earth to the moon . . . with a meticulous record kept of every detail of performance . . . every penny of cost. Probably no individual motorist in the world has so complete a record of cars performing in such strenuous service!

Look at the records and marvel! Not only at the amazing performance and economy of these Chryslers, but at the steady betterment of these figures! Note the astonishing increase in gasoline and oil mileage . . . and then reflect that each Chrysler has been bigger and more powerful than the one which preceded it. See how average speeds have increased and every cost lowered!

A MILLION MILES OF OPERATING RESULTS

GASOLINE				OIL
1934	Average	per	gallon	15.2	miles	1934	Average per gallon 620 miles
1935	"	"	"	15.7	miles	1935	" " " 700 miles
1936	"	"	"	16.2	miles	1936	" " " 1,016 miles
1938	"	"	"	16.3	miles	1938	" " " 1,262 miles
1939	"	"	"	16.7	miles	1939	" " " 1,652 miles
SPEED				REPAIRS
1934	Average	per	hour	43.2	miles	1934	Average Cost 66/100 cents per mile
1935	"	"	"	48.4	miles	1935	" " " 51/100 cents per mile
1936	"	"	"	51.3	miles	1936	" " " 33/100 cents per mile
1938	"	"	"	51.5	miles	1938	" " " 29/100 cents per mile
1939	"	"	"	52.3	miles	1939	" " " 27/100 cents per mile

Claims are easy to make, but facts speak with the greatest authority of all. Whatever motor car you own or plan to buy, these facts and figures suggest the satisfaction you, too, can expect from a Chrysler!

Be Modern — BUY

MILES OF PROOF

Stamina and Economy!

Averaging more miles than the distance to the moon for 5 successive years!

The Chrysler test cars of a famous rubber company travel 1,000 miles each working day. Two shifts . . . 20 hours a day . . . every day of the year except Sundays and holidays . . . imagine driving a car like that! Approximately ten times around the world each year . . . the distance from the earth to the moon! Where else could you find proof of stamina that even compares with this one? You've heard it said . . . "You get the good things first from Chrysler!" Here is the amazing proof of just how much these good things can mean to you as a motorist!

YEARLY RECORDS

Miles run		Time in service
1934 CHRYSLER . . . .	256,787	(14 MO.) JULY 1934 . . .	SEPTEMBER 1935
1935 CHRYSLER . . . .	242,782	(12 MO.) AUGUST 1935 . . .	AUGUST 1936
1936 CHRYSLER . . . .	212,331	(12 MO.) AUGUST 1936 . . .	AUGUST 1937
1938 CHRYSLER . . . .	225,310	(11 MO.) SEPTEMBER 1937 . .	AUGUST 1938
1939 CHRYSLER . . . .	273,098	(12 MO.) NOVEMBER 1938 .	NOVEMBER 1939
TOTAL . . . .		1,210,308 miles

★A 1940 Chrysler Royal went into service January 16, 1940. Figures are now being established which will give an accurate, long-haul comparison with its predecessors. All facts quoted here are taken from records supplied to Chrysler by this well-known tire manufacturer. The figures are available for examination in Chrysler's files.

- ★ Averaging 20 hours a day!
- ★ 1000 miles each working day!
- ★ At terrific speeds!

CHRYSLER !

238,857 MILES

238,857 MILES

The Patriotic Murders

Continued from page 12

to these local anesthetics. Adrenalin idiosyncrasy is well known. In combination with procaine, toxic effects have followed quite small doses. But the doctor or dentist who employed the drug does not usually carry his concern as far as killing himself!"

"Yes, but you're talking of cases where the employment of the anesthetic was normal. In that case no particular blame attaches to the surgeon concerned. It is the idiosyncrasy of the patient that has caused death. But in this case it's pretty clear that there was a definite overdose. They haven't got the exact amount yet—these quantitative analyses seem to take a month of Sundays—but it was definitely more than the normal dose. That means that Morley must have made a mistake."

"Even then," said Poirot, "it was a mistake. It would not be a criminal matter."

"No, but it wouldn't do him any good in his profession. In fact, it would pretty well ruin him. Nobody's going to go to a dentist who's likely to shoot lethal doses of poison into you because he happens to be absent-minded."

"It was a curious thing to do, I admit."

"These things happen—they happen to doctors—they happen to chemists. . . . Careful and reliable for years, and then—one moment's inattention—and the mischief's done and the poor devils are in for it. Morley was a sensitive man. In the case of a doctor, there's usually a chemist or a dispenser to share the blame—or to shoulder it alone. In this case Morley was solely responsible."

POIROT demurred.

"Would he not have left some message behind him? Saying what he had done? And that he could not face the consequences? Something of that kind? Just a word for his sister?"

"No, as I see it, he suddenly realized what had happened and just lost his nerve and took the quickest way out."

"I know you, old boy. Once you've got your teeth into a case of murder, you like it to be a case of murder! I admit I'm responsible for setting you on the track this time. Well, I made a mistake. I admit it freely."

"I still think, you know, that there might be another explanation."

"Plenty of other explanations, I dare say. I've thought of them—but they're all too fantastic. Let's say that Amberiotis shot Morley, went home, was filled with remorse and committed suicide, using some stuff he'd pinched from Morley's surgery. If you think that's likely, I think it's damned unlikely. We've got a record of Amberiotis at the Yard, and as a matter of fact he's been under observation here. He started as a little hotelkeeper in Greece, then he mixed himself up in politics. He's done espionage work in Germany and in France—and made very pretty little sums of money. It's just possible he was up to something of that kind now—but we haven't got anything on him so far. He wasn't getting rich quick enough that way, and he's believed to have done a spot or two of blackmail. Not a nice man, our Mr. Amberiotis."

"He was out in India last year and is believed to have bled one of the native princes rather freely. The difficult thing has been ever to prove anything against him. Slippery as an eel! He might have been blackmailing Morley over something or other. Morley, having a golden opportunity, plugs an overdose of adrenalin and procaine into him, hoping that the verdict will be an unfortunate accident—adrenalin idiosyncrasy—something of that sort. Then, after the man's gone away Morley gets a fit of remorse and does himself in."

"That's possible, of course, but I can't somehow see Morley as a deliberate murderer. No, I'm pretty sure it was what I first said—a genuine mistake, made on a morning when he was overworked. We'll have to leave it at that, Poirot."

"I see," said Poirot, with a sigh. "I see . . ."

Japp said kindly, "I know what you feel, old boy. But you can't have a nice juicy murder every time! So long. All I can say by way of apology is the old phrase: 'Sorry you have been troubled!'"

He hung up.

HERCULE POIROT sat at his handsome modern desk. He liked modern furniture. Its squareness and solidity were more agreeable to him than the soft contours of antique models.

In front of him was a square sheet of paper with neat headings and com-

"John, what else should I have put in besides the rum?"

CHARLES PEARSON

ments. Against some of them were query marks.

First came:

Amberiotis. Espionage. In England for that purpose?

A German agent?

Was in India last year. During period of riots and unrest. Could be a Communist agent. Russia?

There was a space, and then the next heading:

Frank Carter? Morley thought him unsatisfactory. Was discharged from his employment recently. Why?

After that came a name with merely a question mark:

Howard Raikes?

Next came this sentence: "But that's absurd!"

Hercule Poirot's head was poised interrogatively. Outside the window a bird was carrying a twig to build its nest. Hercule Poirot looked rather like a bird as he sat there with his egg-shaped head cocked on one side.

He made another entry a little farther down.

Mr. Barnes?

He paused and then wrote:

Morley's office? Mark on carpet. Possibilities.

He considered that last entry for some time.

Then he got up, called for his hat and stick and went out.

Three quarters of an hour later Hercule Poirot came out of the underground station at Ealing Broadway and five minutes after that he had reached his destination—No. 88, Castlegardens Road.

It was a small, semidetached house, and the neatness of the front garden drew an admiring nod from Hercule Poirot.

"Admirably symmetrical," he murmured to himself.

Mr. Barnes was at home and Poirot was shown into a small, precise dining room and here presently Mr. Barnes came to him.

Mr. Barnes was a small man with twinkling eyes and a nearly bald head. He peeped over the top of his glasses at his visitor while in his left hand he twirled the card that Poirot had given the maid.

He said in a small, prim, almost falsetto voice: "Well, well, M. Poirot? I am honored, I am sure."

"You must excuse my calling upon know more than I do," said Hercule Poirot.

"Don't know anything at all," said the other, "just put two and two together."

"One of those two being?"

"Amberiotis," said Mr. Barnes promptly. "You forget I sat opposite to him in the waiting room for a minute or two. He didn't know me. Always an insignificant chap. Not a thing sometimes. But I knew he was right—and I could guess what he was up to over here."

"Which was?"

MR. BARNES twinkled more than ever. "There's a war on!"

"Spying, you mean?"

"Possibly—but not necessarily. It needn't be so crude as that. In any case Amberiotis wouldn't do his 'spying' if you call it, himself. He might be a clearing station—receive information and pass it on in due course. But a wider field than that. An enemy is often a very decent fellow—a patriot. But there are others. There's a kind of international culture. It's immaterial to him who his employers are. He is all that concerns him. It's his job to be where there's any dirty work. Wartime is a grand opportunity for him. It's a time when the most stable sound of concerns may be undermined."

Poirot said, "I comprehend you."

"I thought you would. For some time now there have been forces at work to undermine the solidity of our British democratic constitution long before the war. But they haven't had much luck. To upset England really upset it—you've got to play with its finance. And you can't play with its finance when you've got Alistair Blunt at the helm."

Mr. Barnes paused and then went on: "Blunt is the kind of man who in private life would always pay his bills and live within his income—whether he got two pence a year or several millions makes no difference. He is that type of fellow. And he just simply thinks there's no reason why a country shouldn't do the same! No costly experiments. No frenzied expenditure. No possible Utopias. That's why he paused—that's why certain people made up their minds that Blunt was a good idea."

"Ah," said Poirot.

Mr. Barnes nodded.

"Yes," he said. "I know what you're talking about. Quite nice people, of 'em. Long-haired, earnest-eyed, full of ideals of a better world. Or not so nice, rather nasty in fact. A few little rats with beards and foreign accents. And another lot again of the Big Bully type. But they all got the same idea: Blunt Must Go!"

He tilted his chair gently back and forward again.

"They're out after Blunt all right. That I know. And it's my opinion yesterday morning they nearly got him. I may be wrong—but it's been tried before. The method, I mean."

He paused and then quietly, circumspectly, he mentioned three names: an unusually able Chancellor of the Exchequer, a progressive and farsighted manufacturer, and a hopeful young politician who had captured the public fancy. The first had died on the operating table, the second had succumbed to an obscure disease which had been recognized too late, the third had run down by a car and killed.

"It's very easy," said Mr. Barnes. "The anesthetist muffed the giving you in this informal manner," said Poirot punctiliously.

"Much the best way," said Mr. Barnes. "And the time is admirable, too. A quarter to seven—very sound time at this period of the year for catching anyone at home." He waved his hand. "Sit down, M. Poirot. I've no doubt we've got a good deal to talk about. 58, Queen Charlotte Street, I suppose?"

POIROT said, "You suppose rightly—but why should you suppose anything of the kind?"

"My dear sir," said Mr. Barnes, "I've been retired from the Home Office for some time now—but I've not gone quite rusty yet. If there's any hush-hush business, it's far better not to use the police. Draws attention to it all!"

"I will ask yet another question. Why should you suppose this is a hush-hush business?" Poirot asked.

"Isn't it?" asked the other. "Well, if it isn't, in my opinion it ought to be." He leaned forward and tapped with his pince-nez on the arm of the chair. "In Secret Service work it's never the little fry you want—it's the big bugs at the top—but to get them you've got to be careful not to alarm the little fry."

"It seems to me, Mr. Barnes, that you

BACK FROM HAVANA

OWL: Paul, you look great! You must have had a fine vacation in Havana.
DERRINGER: Sure did! If all the team feels like I do, we ought to win the pennant again.

OWL: Everybody in baseball knows you enjoy good cigars, Paul. Did you try any of those Havana cigars in Cuba?
DERRINGER: You bet—smoked 'em all the time!

OWL: Then you can speak with authority. Try this new White Owl and tell me if it has the real Havana flavor.

PAUL DERRINGER finds real Havana flavor in NEW WHITE OWL

DERRINGER (after several puffs): Say, this is great! It's milder than an all-Havana Cuban cigar. But it's the real Havana taste, all right!

PAUL DERRINGER, star pitcher of the National League, looked in fine condition when we interviewed him shortly after the 1940 season got under way. He had recently returned from a vacation in Havana and seemed all set to break his last year's record of pitching 25 winning games.

Paul had sampled many kinds of Havana cigars in Cuba, and we asked his opinion of the new Blended-with-Havana White Owl. He gave it a thorough test ... said there was no doubt about its authentic Havana flavor.

You'll enjoy its rich, mellow Havana taste, too. And the fact that you now can get this preferred cigar taste in a good 5¢ cigar accounts for the amazing popularity of the new White Owl. Are you missing out on this cigar "find" of the year?

NOW BLENDED WITH HAVANA!

Try a

NEW WHITE OWL

—Today

5¢

New White Owls are made in America—see how at New York World's Fair, 1940

Copyright, 1940, by General Cigar Co., Inc.

You can change these Blades WITH MITTENS ON

1. THERE IS NO FUMBLING with wrappings on the Schick blade . . . no unscrewing or reassembling razor. These are nuisances of the past for more than 5,000,000 men who have switched to the Schick Injector Razor—whose blades come sealed in a bath of oil in a patented metal Injector cartridge—which changes blades automatically as shown below.

2. A PULL AND A PUSH, and into the razor head goes a keen-edged, double-thick Schick blade. All ready for a quick, safe shave—thanks to the perfected solid guide bar which stretches the skin taut and sets up every whisker for a really clean job.

3. OFFERING YOU the most modern improvements in safety razor design in more than 35 years, the Schick Injector Razor might cost a lot more. Yet, in the pigskin-grain "Popularity" Kit, it comes to you—complete with 20-year guarantee—for only $1! Try it!

Schick Injector Razor

MAGAZINE REPEATING RAZOR CO.
Bridgeport, Connecticut
Niagara Falls, Ont., Canada

the anesthetic—well, that does happen. In the second case the symptoms were puzzling. The doctor was just a well-meaning g.p., couldn't be expected to recognize them. In the third case, anxious mother was driving car in a hurry to get to her sick child. Sob stuff—the jury acquitted her of blame!"

He paused.

"All quite natural. And soon forgotten. But I'll just tell you where those three people are now. The anesthetist is set up on his own with a first-class research laboratory—no expense spared. That g.p. has retired from practice. He's got a yacht, and a nice little place on the Broads. The mother is giving all her children a first-class education."

He nodded his head slowly.

"In every profession and walk of life there is someone who is vulnerable to temptation. The trouble in our case was that Morley wasn't!"

"You think it was like that?" said Hercule Poirot.

"I do. Morley wouldn't do the job. He knew too much, though, so they had to put him out."

"They?" asked Poirot.

"When I say they—I mean the organization that's behind all this. Only one person actually did the job, of course."

"Which person?"

"Well, I could make a guess," said Mr. Barnes, "but it's only a guess and I might be wrong."

Poirot said quietly, "Reilly?"

"Of course! He's the obvious person. I think that probably they never asked Morley to do the job himself. What he was to do was to turn Blunt over to his partner at the last minute. Sudden illness, something of that sort. Reilly would have done the actual business—and there would have been another regrettable accident—death of a famous banker—unhappy young dentist in court in such a state of dither and misery that he would have been let down lightly. He'd have given up dentistry afterward—and settled down somewhere on a nice income of several thousands a year."

MR. BARNES looked across at Poirot. "Don't think I'm romancing," he said. "These things happen."

"Yes, yes, I know they happen."

Mr. Barnes went on: "I read a lot of these spy yarns. Fantastic, some of them. But curiously enough they're not any more fantastic than the real thing."

Poirot said, "In your theory, where does Amberiotis come in?"

"I'm not quite sure. I think he was meant to take the rap. He's played a double game more than once and I dare say he was framed. That's only an idea, mind."

Hercule Poirot said quietly:

"Granting that your ideas are correct—what will happen next?"

Mr. Barnes rubbed his nose.

"They'll try to get him again," he said. "Oh, yes. They'll have another try. Blunt has got people looking after him, I dare say. They'll have to be extra careful. It won't be a man hiding in a bush with a pistol. Nothing so crude as that. You tell 'em to look out for the respectable people—the relations, the old servants, the chemist's assistant who makes up a medicine, the wine merchant who sells him his port. Getting Alistair Blunt out of the way is worth a great deal, and it's wonderful what people will do for—say, a nice little income of four thousand a year!"

Poirot was silent a moment, then he said: "I have had Reilly in mind from the first."

"I.R.A.?"

"Not that so much but there was a mark, you see, on the carpet, as though the body had been dragged along it. But if Morley was shot by a patient he would be shot in the surgery and there would be no need to move the body. That is why, from the first, I suspected that he had been shot, not in the surgery, but in his office—next door. That would mean that it was not a patient who shot him, but some member of his own household."

"Neat," said Mr. Barnes appreciatively.

Hercule Poirot got up and held out a hand.

"Thank you," he said. "You have helped me a great deal."

ON HIS way home, Poirot called in at the Glengowrie Court Hotel.

As a result of that visit he rang up Japp very early the following morning.

"Bon jour, mon ami. The inquest is today, is it not?"

"It is. Are you going to attend?"

"I do not think so."

"It won't really be worth your while, I expect."

"Are you calling Miss Sainsbury Seale as a witness?"

"The lovely Mabelle—why can't she just spell it plain Mabel. These women get my goat! No, I'm not calling her. There's no need."

"You have heard nothing from her?"

Hercule Poirot said:

"I wondered, that was all. Perhaps it may interest you to learn that Miss Sainsbury Seale walked out of the Glengowrie Court Hotel just before dinner the night before last—and did not come back."

"What? She's run away?"

"That is a possible explanation."

"But why should she? She's quite all right, you know. Perfectly genuine and aboveboard. I cabled to Calcutta about her—that was before I knew the reason for Amberiotis' death, otherwise I shouldn't have bothered—and I got the reply last night. Everything okay. She's been known there for years, and her whole account of herself is true—except that she's slurred over her marriage a bit. Married a Hindu student and then found he'd got a few attachments already. So she resumed her maiden name and took to good works."

"She's hand and glove with the missionaries—teaches elocution, and helps in amateur dramatic shows. In fact, what I call a terrible woman—but definitely above suspicion of being mixed up in a murder. And now you say she's walked out on us! I can't understand it." He paused a minute and then went on doubtfully: "Perhaps she just got fed up with that hotel? I could have easily."

"Her luggage is still there. She took nothing with her."

Japp swore.

"When did she go?"

"About a quarter to seven."

"What about the hotel people?"

"They're very upset. Manager looked quite distraught."

"Why didn't they report to the police?"

"Because, mon cher, supposing a lady does happen to stay out at night (however unlikely it may seem from her appearance) she will be justifiably annoyed by finding on her return that the police have been called. Mrs. Harrison, the manageress in question, called up various hospitals in case there had been an accident in the block. She was considering notifying the police when I called. My appearance seemed to her like an answer to prayer. I charged myself with everything, and explained that I would enlist the help of a very discreet police officer."

"The discreet police officer being yours truly, I suppose?"

"You suppose rightly."

"All right. I'll meet you at the Glengowrie Court Hotel after the inquest."

JAPP grumbled as they were waiting for the manageress.

"What does the woman want to appear for?"

"It is curious, you admit?"

They had no time for more.

Mrs. Harrison, proprietor of the Glengowrie Court, was with them.

Mrs. Harrison was voluble and almost tearful. She was so worried about Miss Sainsbury Seale. What could have happened to her? Rapidly she went over every possibility of disaster.

She paused at last for breath, murmuring:

"Such a nice type of woman—and seemed so happy and comfortable here."

She took them, at Japp's request, to the chaste bedroom occupied by the missing lady. Everything was neat and orderly. Clothes hung in the wardrobe; nightclothes were folded ready on the bed, in a corner were Miss Sainsbury Seale's two modest suitcases. A row of shoes stood under the dressing table: some serviceable Oxfords, two pairs rather meretricious glacé fancy shoes with court heels and ornamented bows of leather, some plain black evening shoes, practically new, and a pair of moccasins. Poirot noted that the evening shoes were a size smaller than the day ones—a fact that might be put down to corns or to vanity. He wondered whether Miss Sainsbury Seale had found time to sew the second buckle on her shoe before she went out. He hoped so. Slovenliness in dress always annoyed him.

Japp was busy looking through some letters in a drawer of the dressing table. Hercule Poirot gingerly pulled open the drawer of the chest of drawers. It was full of underclothing. He shut it again modestly, murmuring that Miss Sainsbury Seale seemed to believe in wearing wool next the skin, and opened another drawer which contained stockings.

"Got anything, Poirot?" Japp asked.

Poirot said sadly, as he dangled a pair: "Ten inch, cheap shiny silk, probably 2/11."

Japp said, "You're not valuing probate, old boy. Two letters here from India, one or two receipts from charitable organizations, no bills. Most estimable character, our Miss Sainsbury Seale."

"But very little taste in dress," said Poirot sadly.

"Probably thought dress worldly. Japp was noting down an address from an old letter dated two months back."

"These people may know something about her," he said. "Address up Hamstead way. Sound as though they were fairly intimate."

There was nothing more to be gleaned.

● Actual color photograph—Dewey Hufines chants "Sold American!"—and Luckies get another pile of ripe, golden leaf!

Luckies' finer tobaccos mean less nicotine

Authoritative tests reveal that Luckies' finer tobaccos contain less nicotine than any other leading brand!

Here's the natural result of buying finer, selected cigarette tobacco for Lucky Strike. The average nicotine content of Luckies, for over two years, has been 12% less than the average of the four other leading brands★—less than any one of them.

This fact is proven by authoritative tests which have been confirmed from time to time by independent laboratories.

You see, each year we exhaustively analyze tobaccos before purchase. Thus our buyers can select the leaf that is ripe and mellow, yet mild and low in nicotine content—then buy it up.

The result—a cigarette of finer tobaccos—mild and mellow, with a naturally lower nicotine content.

Have you tried a Lucky lately?

Copyright 1940, The American Tobacco Company

★ NICOTINE CONTENT OF LEADING BRANDS

From January 1938 through March 1940, Lucky Strike has had an average nicotine content of 2.02 parts per hundred—averaging 9.82% less nicotine content than Brand A; 21.09% less than Brand B; 15.48% less than Brand C; 3.81% less than Brand D.

With men who know tobacco best—it's LUCKIES 2 TO 1

Here's America's own Ale—Here's a flavor found in no
other brew

When you meet Ballantine's Ale for the first time, its greater life may come as a surprise. Ale is not ordinarily so live and sparkling a drink. The secret is in the brewing . . . Ballantine's was created especially to please the American taste.

A true ale, Ballantine's is brewed with ale yeasts to the very highest of brewing standards as set up by Peter Ballantine himself a century ago . . . Purity, Body and FLAVOR—with the emphasis on FLAVOR.

Treat yourself to a glass today—learn why millions get more enjoyment from Ballantine's Ale than from any other brew. Now on sale from coast to coast . . . in bottles and cans.

Copr., 1940, P. Ballantine & Sons, Newark, N.J.

BALLANTINE'S
America's Largest Selling
ALE

at the Glengowrie Court Hotel except the negative fact that Miss Sainsbury Seale had not seemed excited or worried in any way when she went out, and it would appear that she had definitely intended to return since on passing her friend Mrs. Bolitho in the hall, she had called out:

"After dinner I will show you that pattern for a Balacava helmet I was telling you about."

Moreover, it was the custom at the Glengowrie Court to give notice in the dining room if you intended to be out for a meal. Miss Sainsbury Seale had not done so. Therefore, it seemed clear that she had intended returning for dinner which was served from seven-thirty to eight-thirty.

BUT she had not returned. She had walked out into the Cromwell Road and disappeared.

Japp and Poirot called at the address in West Hampstead which had headed the letter found.

It was a pleasant house and the Adamses were pleasant people with a large family. They had lived in India for many years and spoke warmly of Miss Sainsbury Seale. But they could not help.

They had not seen her lately, not for a month, not in fact, since they came back from their Easter holidays. She had been staying then at a hotel near Russell Square. Mrs. Adams gave Poirot the address of it and also the address of some other Anglo-Indian friends of Miss Sainsbury Seale's who lived in Streatham.

But the two men drew a blank in both places. Miss Sainsbury Seale had stayed at the hotel in question, but they remembered very little about her and nothing that could be of any help. She was a nice, quiet lady and had lived abroad. The people in Streatham were no help either. They had not seen Miss Sainsbury Seale since February.

There remained the possibility of an accident, but that possibility was dispelled too. No hospital had admitted any casualty answering to the description given.

Miss Sainsbury Seale had disappeared into space.

On the following morning, Poirot went to the Holborn Palace Hotel and asked for Mr. Howard Raikes.

By this time it would hardly have surprised him to hear that Mr. Howard Raikes, too, had stepped out one evening and had never returned.

Mr. Howard Raikes, however, was still at the Holborn Palace and was said to be breakfasting.

THE apparition of Hercule Poirot at the breakfast table seemed to give Mr. Raikes doubtful pleasure.

Though not looking so murderous as in Poirot's disordered recollection of him, his scowl was still formidable—he stared at his uninvited guest and said ungraciously:

"What the hell?"

"You permit?"

Hercule Poirot drew a chair from another table.

Mr. Raikes said:

"Don't mind me! Sit down and make yourself at home!"

Poirot smilingly availed himself of the permission.

Mr. Raikes said ungraciously:

"Well, what do you want?"

"Do you remember me at all, Mr. Raikes?"

"Never set eyes on you in my life."

"There you are wrong. You sat in the same room with me for at least five minutes not more than three days ago."

"I can't remember everyone I meet at some party or other."

"It was not a party," said Poirot. "It was a dentist's waiting room."

Some swift emotion flashed into the young man's eyes and died again at once. His manner changed. It was no longer impatient and casual. It became suddenly wary. He looked across at Poirot and said:

"Well?"

Poirot studied him carefully before replying. He felt, quite positively, that this was indeed a dangerous young man. A lean, hungry face, an aggressive, the eyes of a fanatic. It was a face, though, that women might find attractive. He was untidily, even shabbily dressed, and he ate with a carelessness that was, so the man watching him thought, significant.

Poirot summed him up to himself:

"It is a wolf with ideas . . ."

Raikes said harshly:

"What the hell do you mean—come here like this?"

"My visit is disagreeable to you?"

"I don't even know who you are."

"I apologize."

Dexterously Poirot whipped out his card case. He extracted a card and passed it across the table.

Again that emotion that he could not quite define showed upon Mr. Raikes' lean face. It was not fear—it was more aggressive than fear. After it, unquestionably, came anger.

He tossed the card back.

"So that's who you are, is it? I've heard of you."

"Most people have," said Hercule Poirot modestly.

"You're a private dick, aren't you? The expensive kind. The kind people hire when money is no object—when it's worth paying anything in order to see their miserable skins!"

"If you do not drink your coffee," said Hercule Poirot, "it will get cold."

HE SPOKE kindly and with authority. Raikes stared at him.

"Say, just what kind of an insect are you?"

"The coffee in this country is very bad anyway—" said Poirot.

"I'll say it is," agreed Mr. Raikes with fervor.

"But if you allow it to get cold it is practically undrinkable."

The young man leaned forward.

"What are you getting at? What's the big idea in coming round here?"

Poirot shrugged his shoulders.

"I wanted to—see you."

"Oh, yes?" said Mr. Raikes skeptically.

His eyes narrowed.

"If it's money you're after, you've come to the wrong man! The people I'm in with can't afford to buy what they want. Better go back to the man who pays you your salary."

Poirot said, sighing:

"Nobody has paid me anything yet."

"You're telling me," said Mr. Raikes.

"It is the truth," said Hercule Poirot.

"I am wasting a good deal of valuable time for no recompense whatsoever. Simply, shall we say, to assuage your curiosity."

"And I suppose," said Mr. Raikes, "you were just assuaging your curiosity at that darned dentist's the other day."

Poirot shook his head. He said:

"You seem to overlook the most ordinary reason for being in a dentist's waiting room—which is that one is waiting to have one's teeth attended to."

"So that's what you were doing?" Mr. Raikes' tone expressed contempt and disbelief. "Waiting to have your teeth seen to?"

"Certainly."

"You'll excuse me if I say I don't believe it."

"May I ask then, Mr. Raikes, what you were doing there?"

(To be continued next week)

The Man Who Wanted War

Continued from page 11

ers. If he'd just stop trying to be fther, and his grandfather, and his grandfather." And then she burst ars, which was most unlike Lou-If he'd just grow up," she said.
t care if he doesn't set the world
If he'd only stop being a stuffed and grow up. A man can't be just ful, and not grow up."

On the big crash came in twenty-e hoped that might jolt them to-
But it didn't. Freddy neither to smash, nor took to drink, nor tted suicide, nor did any of the which were done then. He just realize anything had happened.
st got more and more confused,
lked more and more about Har-and about the late World War, everyone else was talking about g wealth, and priming pumps, and e and what in hell they were going if they lost their jobs. Freddy's died of rage, and Freddy began nt to leeward.

Finally, he drifted back, to Hoboto the time when life was rosy. If ed once about the "British Expe-ary Force," I heard it fifty times.
ght that not only Louisa would nd, but that we all should. Even ildren began to clash with him, ey were growing up, and he was When Louisa finally left him, she wreck, and Freddy looked like a who had been knocked off the deck, comes up dazed.

THAT was why I used to sit, and en to reunions, and the Yale game n 1917, and what damn' fools the ans were ever to have gone into am at all. It got to be pretty ter-I don't know how long I could endured it, if a crop of new wars t come.

pote of the awfulness, they were a nd to Freddy Winsted. It was no hard to find someone to talk to.
ught on every front, right in the big window of the club. It became a f staff headquarters. He became different and younger man with er shoulders, and some of the folds from his stomach. He became one best club warriors ever known.
it wasn't until that day I saw him bar holding the newspaper, with black headlines saying England
t war, that his eyes really began to
From then on he became an e, a seer.

I didn't see him for a week, I guess.
What with the Athenia's being sunk and all, I was feeling pretty low. I suppose I wanted someone to talk to. "Well, it's come," I said to him.

"Bound to! Bound to!" he told me, cheerfully. "You can drive the British only just so far. Great people. They'll get this mess cleaned up now. Ought to have been done before. I've seen it coming. Don't see why anyone's surprised. We've got to clean these damn' Nazis off the earth. Ought to have been done before. We'll do it now." He rubbed his hands together.

"We?" I said. "What do you mean, we?"

"We got to stand behind the English.
Blood brothers, sort of. Only sporting thing to do. Can't let 'em down. Can't let other chaps fight your battles. We helped 'em out in 'seventeen. We'll help 'em out again. I'm rarin' to go."

I looked at him. He was a big man, and pretty fat, with soft skin underneath his eyes. "I guess you'll have to wait a while, Freddy," I said, "before you go. We aren't going to get into it just yet. At least I hope not. We haven't forgotten 1914 yet."

He looked at me, and laughed. I'd not heard him laugh for years. It sounded like an echo of his boyish laughter.

"You got another think coming," he said. "We'll get in all right. Sooner than you think. But I can't wait for that. I'm going to join up now." He laughed again, and rubbed his hands.

"Join up what?" I said.

"The British army."

"Are you serious?" I said.

"Serious! Serious! I'm sailing Thursday. The Lancastria. Got my passport, and everything."

There were a lot of things I could have said. Perhaps I should have said them.
Perhaps it would have been better if I had. But he looked so happy I couldn't say them then. I sat and looked at him, and then I saw he had something on his mind. He began fiddling with his hands, and he got very red, and coughed two or three times. He stuttered and stumbled over what he said. I thought he'd never get it out. He said, "Ah—oh—I say.
Would you—would you mind just mentioning this to—ah—Louisa?"

I said, of course, I'd be delighted to tell Louisa, and I was sure she would be pleased.

He beamed at that, but I saw he

You may worry about the plumbing

but here is one worry you can avoid

With proper care you might have avoided the worry of that leaky pipe. That's true about chassis lubrication too.

A haphazard job with ordinary grease means early repair bills.
That's why it is important to remember one word: "MARFAK," which means our 40-point Chassis Lubrication Service. We are trained in a special Texaco lubrication school. We work from a special Texaco "Lubrication Guide," so we don't miss a point on your car. We use Marfak lubricants.

They last twice as long as ordinary grease.

Look for the bright red sign,
"Let us Marfak your car," at Texaco and other good dealers' stations and leave your chassis lubrication worries with an expert.

TEXACO DEALERS INVITE YOU TO tune in the TEXACO STAR THEATRE - Starring Kenny Baker and Frances Langford - Every Wednesday Night - Columbia Network -
9:00 E.D.T., 8:00 E.S.T., 8:00 C.D.T.,
7:00 C.S.T., 6:00 M.S.T., 5:00 P.S.T.

TEXACO'S
40-POINT
CHASSIS
LUBRICATION
SERVICE

AT ALL TEXACO AND OTHER GOOD DEALERS

Copyright 1940, The Texas Company

"I have to get to town before the bank closes."

PAUL MC CARTHY

But to tell the truth, a few think this genuinely AROMATIC pipe mixture is terrible!

The story is in a pipeful.

Bond Street has that swell aroma, flavor and bite-free coolness of custom blends costing plenty. Contains rare aromatic tobacco never before used in a popular price mixture. Your pipe's welcome anywhere... even women approve.

So new, so different you may not like it. But, if you do, you're set for life. So—get down 15¢ for a tin of Bond Street today... and find out!

Today—try a tin of

BOND STREET
Pipe Tobacco

A Product of PHILIP MORRIS

hadn't finished. He began floundering again. I thought he never would get at it. "You might," he said. "You might—" "Might what?" I said. "Go ahead!" "Oh," he mumbled. "I just thought. Perhaps—maybe—you'd suggest—you might just suggest sort of—that she might hold off on this divorce business. Just for a while, you know. Just till—"

And, suddenly, I saw what he was driving at. Why he wanted to go to war. If he could only come back a hero, as he had before. He was crazy about her still.

If he could only do something big, heroic, he might get her back.

"Okay, Freddy," I said. "I understand. I'm sure I can get her to wait till you come back."

He wrung my hand so hard it made my eyes smart. . . .

Everyone clubbed together to give him a swell time before he went away. The sporting side of the thing appealed to everyone. Men gathered around, and thumped him on the back, and looked at him a bit enviously. The years sloughed off, and he was right back in college, and I've never seen a man more happy.

We gave him a big dinner the night before he sailed, and everybody got stewed, and said a lot of things that weren't meant. And yet there was a good deal of affection in it all. There was something kind, and simple, and naïve about him. A lot of men surprised me when we went down to the pier to see him off. There was a big crowd, really. And his children were there looking at him with surprise, but proudly.

He stood up very straight, and laughed, and said goodby to everyone. And, all the while, I could see him looking anxiously beyond the crowd, hoping Louisa would be there.

He kept waving as the tugs grunted and nosed the ship out into the stream. He stood beside the rail and waved, as the band of dirty water widened. Watching him gave you a queer feeling that he was fading back into his past to join his youth.

I MUST confess, I forgot about him, after that. There'd been no news of any shake-up in the English army after he landed, and no one had heard a word from him. When the neutrality law was changed there was some talk about what he'd do, but he'd gone clean out of my mind until, one day in December, Louisa called me up. She sounded anxious.

"Freddy's back," she said. "He's in the hospital. Dr. Briggs just called me up. He says Freddy told him not to, but he thinks I ought to know. I can't get it straight. Briggs says it's not really serious. Some sort of infection. He wouldn't tell me much. There's something about it that sounds queer. I think I ought to go and see him."

She wanted me to go with her, so I went. We found him quite alone, propped up in bed, in a small room full of antiseptic smells. Running around his head, and down over one eye, a bandage looked absurdly like a turban knocked askew. As a heavy man always does in bed, he looked deflated. The effect was not heroic. On the bed before him were stacks of papers, blue and green and yellow, which looked like official blanks of some sort. He kept picking at them, as we talked.

None of us knew what to say. Louisa murmured something about his head but he only seemed embarrassed.

"Well, well, Freddy," I said. "Glad to see you back."

"Yes," he said. "I'm back."

"Well, well, that's fine," I told him. "How are things on the other side? What's the matter with your head?"

He stared at us in silence.

"How's the war going?" I asked.

"I never should have gone," he muttered. "I didn't understand."

I had no idea what he meant. "Well, it's good to see you again," I repeated. "Sorry you got hurt. Anyway, you tried to help."

He gave one of the bitterest laughs I ever heard. "Yes," he said. "I told them we were right behind them. I told them how I'd been with them before and been wounded. I said I didn't expect one of the crack regiments. That I'd come over to fight right in the trenches. They were very polite, of course. The English always have good manners."

"What do you mean?" I said. "I don't understand."

"Neither did I," he answered. "I just didn't understand at all." He was staring out of the window at the rain. "It's these damn' machines," he muttered. "They kept asking me what I knew about airplane engines, and American mass-production methods, and about assembling tractors. They made me pretty sore, at first. I told them I wasn't out for any soft berth in a factory."

"What did they say to that?" I asked him.

He tried to laugh again. "It wasn't what they said. They were very nice about it. They told me it was very sporting of me to come over. It wasn't what they said. It was just the way they looked. They had the darnedest way of looking at you. As though you were something prehistoric." He lay fingering the papers.

"It's a cockeyed war," he burst out. "I didn't understand. It's all machines, and charts, and graphs. Before, you had the bagpipes, and the bands, and Tipperary, and all the flags waving. But, now, it's just the clank, clank, clank of the machines." He put his hand up to his head.

"What happened to your head?" I asked. "How did you get hurt?"

"London's like the catacombs," he muttered. "It's not the same place it was in 'eighteen. You've no idea how dark it is. I ran into an electric sign that wasn't lit. Go ahead, laugh!" he muttered. "I don't blame you."

We just stood there, and I didn't feel like laughing. I felt that he had banged into a lot more than an electric sign.

"It's fierce seeing the young men going off," he said, at last. "Going off to fight machines. There's nothing sporting about that. They haven't got a chance. This war's like that. I can't understand. It's not against the men. It's men against machines."

His voice slid off. It didn't sound like Freddy Winsted's voice. It had something in it that made you catch your breath—something strained and new. It was the voice of a man who had seen things you hadn't seen, and knew things you didn't know.

"I don't want to talk," he said. "It isn't time for talk. The war won't wait. All the glorious spirit in the world won't stop them. They come clanging on." His face twisted up. "We've got to stop them. Don't you understand? Can't you see over here be made to understand sort of war this is? They say the gas that makes men helpless and tent. Do you want to know what it's the babel of stupid men, and sure groups, and politicians! That makes nations impotent! It's deadly than the deadliest gas! We can stop it, and go to work sweat, and do without, we're doing. Not just England! We ourselves world!"

HIS voice made you forget that Freddy Winsted. This was a grown man we didn't know. Louisa looking at him as I had never seen her look at him before. There was a detached about her eyes. They were wide and wet and shining.

He was fumbling with the papers separately. "I've got a job," he said. "I've got to help. I've got to do something. I can't ever sit around again. It's fierce being laid up like this. I've got to get going. It's not much of a job. Just getting things shipped quick. All these things." He waved toward the green and yellow lists.

One slid off the bed and, Louisa picked it up and put it down before him. Her eyes never left his face. "I'd like to help," she said. "I think I can."

Slowly, he looked at her and put his hand to his head. "I ran into a sign," he said. "Why don't you laugh? I was a big fat joke. You see, I thought, perhaps—if I could only do something big—"

"You have," she said, softly. Then, being Louisa, she did it quickly which made the room no longer for me.

"Could I have one, please, lady?"

LAURENCE REYNOLDS

Aren't you glad
I remembered about
"33 to 1"?

BLENDED 33 TIMES TO MAKE ONE GREAT BEER!

It's the Happy Blending of 33 Separate Brews—for the One Flavor that has won America, Coast to Coast!

● Pabst Blue Ribbon is served in more homes —at more parties, picnics and other social occasions—than any other beer.

And the reason? It takes not one, not five, or twelve...but 33 separate brews from 33 separate kettles, to make a single glass of BLUE RIBBON!

Each brew is as fine as choicest ingredients and Pabst's 96 years of experience can make it.
Then all 33 brews are brought together in perfect balance.

An expensive way to brew? Of course! It's like blending champagne, coffee or tobacco to produce the finest. And that's what makes it America's Premium Beer, with a smoothness that is unique . . . and a goodness that never varies. Sometime today, meet Blue Ribbon.

It's the BLEND that Better's the Beer

Try Pabst Blue Ribbon and Prove it

Copyright 1940, Pabst Brewing Company, Milwaukee

... WITH A
BLUE RIBBON ON IT

... First in the Homes of America—and the Largest Selling American Beer in the Rest of the World!

The Golden Grain of KANSAS

The Liquid Gold of PENNSYLVANIA

Copyright 1940 by Tide Water Associated Oil Company

Nature gave them both that EXTRA SOMETHING

BOTH the grain that grows in Kansas and the oil that flows in Pennsylvania have won worldwide fame for distinctive quality . . . But in Pennsylvania, one crude oil commands a top market price because of its inherent lubricating richness. It is the Bradford-Pennsylvania crude . . . and from this famous crude Veedol Motor Oil is refined exclusively. Veedol brings to your motor a natural oiliness that provides a constant, dependable "Film of Protection" . . . a natural resistance that fights off heat, friction, sludge and carbon . . . These inherent Veedol qualities naturally mean much in carefree performance for your modern motor and in worthwhile economy for your pocketbook.

Ask for VEEDOL Safety-check Lubrication

A PRODUCT OF TIDE WATER ASSOCIATED OIL COMPANY . . . MAKERS OF "FLYING A" GASOLINES

More Than Base Hits

Continued from page 13

a second, he looks over his right shoulder, toward Heath on second base. Then he faces the plate. He gets the sign from Dickey. He seems to be winding up. Suddenly he turns and fires the ball into the wide-open space at second. Is the man mad? But no—wait—like a bullet Frankie Crosetti streaks toward second, back of the astonished Heath, nabs the ball and puts it on one more Indian who bites the dust.

The Frankie-and-Johnny play is not Yankee magic. No—inside baseball. Here, in detail, is how it works:

After getting the signal from Dickey, Murphy took his customary pitching position with arms resting against his chest. He then glanced over his right shoulder at Crosetti and Heath. Instantly Frankie flashed him the pick-off sign. Murphy then faced Dickey and in this new position began a silent count. "One, two . . ."—Frankie began to glide to his left—"three . . ." and Johnny whirled and fired the ball into space as Frankie hurtled into an exact spot at the right of second base. The Yanks win another, for we then walked Keltner intentionally, an infield out advanced the runners and young Schilling struck out.

Here's another late-inning game saver, a typical Joe McCarthy brain teaser: It's the eighth inning and we're leading 4-3. Buddy Rosar, a slow runner, is on third, with fleet George Selkirk on first. No one is out. And here's Joe Gordon up. A possible additional run looms large at this late moment. Joe works the count to three and two.

Stop here and let's pretend you're down on the bench with Joe DiMaggio and Charlie Keller and Lefty Gomez and the boys. Ask yourself this question: "Should I start Selkirk running on the next pitch or make him play close to the bag to await developments?" Doesn't sound like a very important decision, does it? Well, I have seen many managers start the runner—and few get away with it. Not Joe McCarthy.

Common-Sense Baseball

If you analyze the possibilities, you will see that Joe's decision to hold the swift Selkirk on first is not a fool play, but the surest possible method of adding that one run needed to rivet down ■ victory. Suppose Selkirk runs on the pitch. If Gordon misses for a strike-out, George will probably be doubled at second, out stealing. Then only a base hit can score Rosar, for he is not fast enough to score on the front end of a double steal. Suppose Gordon lines to an infielder. Selkirk would again be doubled, and again only a base hit would score Buddy. If Gordon pops up, once again the possibility of ■ double play arises, with Rosar again marooned on third.

Now let's look at the other side of the picture, with Selkirk still holding the bag. If Gordon strikes out, lines or pops out, Selkirk is saved, only one is out, and we can still score Rosar without the aid of a hard-to-get base hit—by means of a long fly, bunt or ground ball hit in such a manner that ■ double play is impossible. Clearly the percentage is all in McCarthy's favor, and this is the sort of thing that adds up to ten or twelve games a season.

Speaking of long hitting, and the Yanks have never been bashful in that respect, it wins a great many games. But did you ever ask yourself how we manage to pile up miraculous records against pitchers who stand at the head of their profession?

Take Tommy Bridges—cool, cagey Tommy. Tommy won 150 games and lost 102 since he began pitching in the majors. His record against us until this season is nine won, twenty-three lost.

But it isn't black magic. It's the result of a genuinely deep study of hitting styles by the Yanks as a team, by our coaches, Art Fletcher and F. Combs. Lazzeri tipped us off on I. Back in '35, Mickey Cochrane's team were champions and Tommy was game winner. But we beat Tommy often that Black Mike stopped pitching him against us.

In those days Mervyn Shea, a pitcher on the White Sox, was a close friend of Lazzeri's. One day Shea told Tommy Bridges had two distinct styles of pitching with men on bases. Art League rules require a pitcher to keep his motion after the preliminary step and before making the throw. Shea discovered that Bridges sometimes kept his arms high over his head, sometimes only partly. He noticed when Tommy made the full stretch he threw a ball when he made the half stretch, a false

A Cinch for Tony

Tony passed the information on to me. All that remained was for Bridges to face us with men on bases. One day in Detroit, Lazzeri came to bat with Bridges on third and Dickey on first. As Tony took his half stretch, a whisper went for a strike; Tony didn't go. Again the stretch of arms, this time the full length—and again the voices of the Yanks: "It's a curve!" We edged forward, for Lazzeri, a fine curve-ball pitcher, was getting the pitch he wanted. Tony banged a triple against the left field scoreboard. Out of the Tiger cage came Mickey Cochrane to send Tony to the showers. Bridges dejectedly bowed his head as he quit the mound, as he said to himself: "That was the best I ever threw and it wound up a tie in the scoreboard!"

Tommy had his revenge. Last season Merv Shea was signed by the Tigers as a coach. His first official act was to rectify Tommy's motion. The next time we faced the Tigers, Tommy pitched. We watched in vain for the tell-tale of the half stretch. Detroit won, and Bridges has been tough for us ever since.

Our chief sign sleuth is Earl C. Down in Florida this spring, we met the Giants in an exhibition at their Vero Beach camp. Earl coached at first, and in the early innings of that game, twenty feet away a rookie Giant named Roy Joiner was warming up. Roy is a lefty with a collection of screwballs and a nippy curve.

Earl performed a nearly incredible feat when he hustled over to our dugout in the fourth inning and said: "Tommy, him! When Joiner gets in there, keep your eyes open! And he proceeds to tell us how to detect every difference of ball Joiner throws. Earl had his right, for we got seven hits and scored in one and one third innings—gives you an idea how inside stuff works off at bat.

Another bit of Yankee trickery adds units to the won column in league standings is that famous bunt of Babe Dahlgren's, which was good for at least two games in '39. It called the ninth inning of a game in Cleveland. We were one run behind the time. Selkirk, speedy on the bases, was on first when the Babe, who is an adept bunter, purposely faked a missed bunt on the first strike or smash a double past Ken Keltner, Indian's third-sacker, on the next

McCarthy allows us full latitude in of this sort. Our private name for "reversing the bunt" and it's good at extra game or two each season. I speaking of drives past the third man, they're right in my territory. part of the Yankee scheme of doing things right in order to win a lot games, I learned first how to defend at the so-called "hot corner." In seven seasons, I have studied opposing batters not only on the field but on the record book.

My job is mainly to stop balls hit in the area between the foul line at right and Frankie Crosetti's overlying shortstop area. Against all but most powerful drives our defense could be ironclad. Infielders are guided by the batter's left- or right-handedness on at the plate. But my chief concern is always where a batter usually stands and how he runs. Earl Averill and Al Gehringer of Detroit, Hal Gray of the Indians and Ted Williams of the Red Sox are all lefties who pull hits into right field, sluggers who try for a long drive or drill liners between second and first. To stop them, entire infield moves to the left, narrowing the space between second and the third baseman plays at least ten to twenty feet toward short and ten to fifteen feet back of the bag, in case these big boys pole an out-bitch into left field.

What Third Basemen Think About

It's dangerous as these home-runners may be, speedy left-hand hitters or worse. They can spray the ball all over the lot. They can drive, bunt, top, and a ball or scout a grass-cutter anywhere within fair territory. Stars at this time of play are Roy Weatherly of Cleveland, Buddy Lewis of Washington, Mickey Vernon of the Tigers, Finney and Earl of the Red Sox.

For our pitcher has two strikes on triple-threat batters, I must stand to the grass so that I can come in ready for a bunt, yet far enough back to handle a hard drive. After the second out, the tension eases, for they can't hit but such late-swinging, fast lefties as McCoskey, Finney and Cramer are the toughest problems I face, for they may or may not drive to left field. All are crack bunters.

When the big, powerful right-handers like Hank Greenberg, Rudy York, Ray Fox or Harland Clift are up, there is no place for anyone with slow feet. I move fifteen feet back of the plate for Hank, Rudy or Jimmy. Clift is a special study all by himself. He hits distance and also bunts. Even more dangerous is the fastest man in baseball, George Washington Case of the Yankees. I can't waste a second fielding a Case bunt. When he gets on, he's always ready to steal. If he reaches second, it's a critical moment, especially if versatile Buddy Lewis is at bat. Lewis bunts too, and I must be prepared to handle the ball on the grass, as well as to cover every inch from the base line to the foul line, not to mention stopping a hard drive into the outfield. On the other hand, if I move too far in, Case will certainly steal third. What should I do?

If you analyze this situation carefully you'll advise me to defy Case and his speed. If Lewis bunts, he must place the ball so neatly that I can't handle it. Odds are against such a hit. If he bunts poorly he's out. He may hit a foul. He may pop up. I still am in a good position to stop a drive. And I am ready to tag Case out if he steals.

Perhaps the most complex play—and the one that requires accurate handling—is the cutoff, when runners are scurrying around the bases and the outfielder has retrieved the ball and is hurling it in the general direction of a base. On cutoff plays, with a man on first and a hit steaming off an opponent's bat, Crosetti lines up with the ball and third, taking a position about twenty feet in front of me. He never cuts off the throw from Charlie Keller unless it is impossible to get the runner approaching third. Hits into left with a man on second bring me into line with the plate.

Remember Babe Dahlgren's double in the opening game of last fall's series with the Reds? In the fifth inning Cincinnati was leading 1-0. Babe hit to left with Joe Gordon on first. Joe sprinted all the way home when Berger threw from left field to second instead of to third. It took the combination of Gordon's speed and Fletcher's cunning to tie the score and make a goat out of Berger. Art, coaching at third, turned a normal throw-in (which should have been a cutoff) into a horrible error, for Gordon beat the relay to the plate when Fletcher daringly waved him home. One more Yankee win, on a little detail.

Well, as I said before, that's my story. It's the little things that count. But I'm afraid not all of the Yanks agree with me. Remember that third game of the last world series, out in Crosley Field, in Cincinnati? We scored five runs, four on homers—two by Keller, one by DiMaggio, one by Dickey. The fifth run was scored by Professor Rolfe. I singled, the fifth hit of the game by the Yankees. Keller's homer drove me in.

When I reported to the clubhouse after the game, some wag, probably Lefty Gomez, had posted a notice:

"Attention Red Rolfe: Singles forbidden on this club. Report for batting practice, 10 A.M. tomorrow."

But it was not signed by Joe McCarthy.

"We're taking her back for the thousand-mile checkup!"

A. ROSS

WHY, HAL! YOU'RE SO HOT AND EXCITED, YOU'RE PERSPIRING MORE THAN THE PLAYERS!

THAT NIGHT

I DON'T CARE IF I AM UNREASONABLE! I'M GOING HOME WITH THE SMITHS!

BUT, SALLY—WHAT ARE WE QUARRELING ABOUT?

POOR HAL! ATTRACTIVE AT A DISTANCE, BUT A WASHOUT AT A DANCE

I FEEL SORRY FOR HIM, TOO. BUT 'B.O.' IS INEXCUSABLE

HAL ASKS HIS BEST FRIEND

BUT NED, I BATHE FREQUENTLY

I KNOW, HAL—BUT YOU SHOULD USE THE RIGHT SOAP—ONE WITH A SPECIAL DEODORIZING INGREDIENT—I MEAN LIFEBOUY

LIFEBOUY IN MY MORNING BATH SURE STOPS 'B.O.' AND WHAT SWELL, CREAMY LATHER. I'VE NEVER FELT SO CLEAN AND REFRESHED!

LIFEBOUY IS ESPECIALLY "B.O." MADE TO PREVENT

EVERY TIME you perspire from heat or exercise, you risk "B.O." Perspiration from nervousness, emotions, or excitement leads to "nervous B.O." too. Be safe! Use Lifebuoy Health Soap in your daily bath. Lifebuoy is the only popular soap especially made to prevent "B.O." It contains an exclusive deodorizing ingredient.

Lifebuoy gives quantities of refreshing, purifying lather... so zippy, you enjoy a new glow after your bath. Get Lifebuoy today. More people use it for their bath than any other soap

SALLY, I'M A NEW MAN NOW THAT WE'RE TOGETHER AGAIN

SALLY THINKS

HE IS A NEW MAN. BET HE'S USING MY SOAP NOW—LIFEBOUY

LIFEBOUY HEALTH SOAP

Its crisp odor goes in a Jiffy — Its Protection lasts and lasts

Don't Worry About It

Continued from page 22

See Your FAIRBANKS- MORSE Dealer!

FOR THIS NEW STOKER WITH STOK-O-LITE

● See this stoker and you will know why people are buying it at a rate which is increasing faster than almost all other stokers. The Fairbanks-Morse Automatic Coal Burner gives clean, steady, healthful, and economical heat from ceiling to floor. It gives it to you with such dependability you almost forget there is such a thing as a heating problem.

And now another new, big feature—STOK-O-LITE! If for any reason an overload condition occurs, and the stoker is prevented from giving you heat, the little red glow-lamp on the thermostat warns you instantly, before the house gets cold. STOK-O-LITE is the biggest feature of the year in stokers. Only Fairbanks-Morse has it.

NO DOWN PAYMENT

As long as 36 months to pay

Guardian of Your Purse, Health, and Comfort

Because Fairbanks-Morse makes quality stokers in quantity you can own one for a surprisingly low price. Get the facts! Use coupon for name of nearest dealer and informative booklet "Live in Comfort."

Fairbanks, Morse & Co.
Stoker Division, Dept. 48
600 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Please send, without obligation on my part,
FREE booklet on automatic coal burner heat
for my home.

Name .....

Address .....

City .....

State .....

In Canada, address The Canadian Fairbanks-Morse Company, Ltd., Montreal.

FAIRBANKS MORSE
Automatic Coal Burners

going upstairs in the dark and hear an unexpected sound on the landing above, unless you're a man of iron your heart will begin to beat faster, which increases the pressure slightly, and then your sympathetic nervous system will send out impulses that will make the muscles of your arterioles contract, and your blood pressure will go whooping up, only to come right down again when you find it was only the cat. Some scientists think this stimulation of the sympathetic nervous system is largely the result of adrenalin released when your body is under tension. Others think it occurs chiefly in the brain. Take your choice.

When a person has what is known as high blood pressure, however, it means that his arterioles are contracting more than they should for longer than they should, or else when they shouldn't be contracting at all. The only trouble is nobody has been able to find out what makes them contract in that unreasonable fashion. Up to about twenty-five years ago scientists thought the kidneys had a good deal to do with it. They didn't know then about essential hypertension. They just knew that people with most types of kidney disease had high blood pressure as well. And that seemed almost enough of a discovery then. After all, they had only been able to read blood pressures at all since the nineties. It looked like a simple case of cause and effect.

By Trial and Error

But as more and more work was done and more and more elaborate apparatus invented and more and more exact tests devised, they discovered it wasn't so simple after all. People with kidney disease had high blood pressure all right, but so did people with various endocrine disturbances and no kidney disease, and then there were lots and lots of people whose blood pressure was way up in the air and you couldn't find a thing wrong with their kidneys nor with their thyroids or adrenals or pituitary glands. So they finally called this kind of blood pressure essential hypertension, essential in this case meaning of unknown cause, and began looking for other causes.

Some doctors decided that essential hypertension was due to a focus of infection somewhere; in the teeth or tonsils or sinuses or in almost any part of the body, and began yanking things out at a great rate. Others thought maybe it was a result of the wrong kind of food. That was where the no-meat, no-salt, no-alcohol idea came in, but diet didn't seem to make much difference unless the patient happened to need reducing and it could incidentally accomplish that. Others thought that since adrenalin, which is produced by the adrenal glands, was known to raise blood pressure, and since high blood pressure was a symptom of certain glandular diseases, maybe all hypertension was glandular in origin, maybe essential hypertension too, only they couldn't seem to hitch the two up together very well. Still others, and this seemed the most logical conclusion until just recently, decided the whole trouble was with the sympathetic nervous system.

So then the surgeons stepped in. If the medical men can't fix this, they said, rubbing their hands, just watch us. After a good deal of animal experimentation, they began cutting the nerves that controlled certain beds of arteries on the theory that if the smaller arteries didn't get the nerve impulses they wouldn't contract. Several different procedures of this sort grew up, all pretty radical, and all of them, as one doctor remarked, only successful at the hands of the man who evolved that particular method.

So there the matter stood and still stands as far as treatment is concerned, with doctors not knowing what to believe theoretically and going ahead and treating their patients practically with a certain amount of diet, a certain amount of medicine, occasional surgery and a great deal of what the medical world calls suggestion. Meanwhile, an experimental pathologist in Cleveland by the name of Harry Goldblatt, who probably doesn't give a tinker's dam whether people get dizzy spells and headaches or not, has been very busy for the past ten years on what may turn out to be high-blood-pressure history. It seems, thinking of one thing and another, he began wondering if maybe after all the kidneys didn't have something to do with these mysterious rises in blood pressure that had nothing to do with the kidneys.

He took some dogs and monkeys, and made some little silver clamps, and began clamping the arteries that led to the kidneys, just to see. He clamped some only a little, some a lot, some entirely, and he probably felt a trifle smug when he saw where all those clampings were leading to. He certainly should have, because it turned out that if you constricted the arteries leading to a dog's or monkey's kidneys, why, almost right away the animal's blood pressure went up and stayed up until you took the clamps off again. If you constricted those arteries just a little the blood pressure only went up a little. If you constricted them a lot the blood pressure went sky-high. Yet constricting the arteries leading to other organs in the body didn't do a thing, so it wasn't just a mechanical reaction. And you could denervate the kidney (that means cut all the nerves leading to it) before you clamped the artery and the blood pressure still went up. So it couldn't be a reflex nervous reaction either. It certainly looked as if, in spite of all those scientific opinions, the kidney did after all have something to do with this unreasonable contracting of arterioles all over the body, but what?

Goldblatt tried constricting the artery leading to the kidney, waiting till the blood pressure went up and then removing the kidney. The blood pressure went right down. That was funny too. He tried constricting the artery leading to the kidney and then clamping the vein that leads away from it. The blood pressure didn't go up. Funnier still. He did both those stunts again and again and the thing happened. It looked as if the thing was formed in the is (ischemic means to an organ anemic means to a person) which, when it got out into the made the smaller arteries contra

A Medical Mystery

This is sort of like a Western now, continued in our next and because that's as far as they Goldblatt thinks, and many doctors are beginning to agree with that when people get essential tension it is because there is a substance formed in their kidneys—for reason nobody knows yet, but connected with the kidney blood—an undesirable substance that into the blood and contracts the of the arterioles. They don't know what this substance is yet or what acts on the sympathetic nervous or the adrenals or directly on the riolar muscles or how.

In lots of ways it doesn't even make sense so far. Doctors, for instance, that essential hypertension is almost entirely a disease of civilization. It is not only very common among the natives of the tropics but even uncommon among white men in the Orient and the tropics. They know there isn't a blood pressure among the natives but it is commoner and serious among American Negroes among American whites. What about our particular civilization makes that strange substance form in the kidneys, if that strange substance is the whole answer? Nobody knows but they will. Watch for the next installment, probably in about five years. Watch the work of one Goldblatt.

Meanwhile, if you have high pressure, take your doctor's advice. Let Dr. Goldblatt and the rest of the experimental workers do the work. Just go along to the office and the course and the movies. Drink your evening cocktail and play your bridge. Don't work too hard or with your wife, but aside from there's nothing to keep you from living life as much as ever, for years and years.

"I just played a little composition of my own"

MICHAEL

Gordon's has the Advantage of Liqueur Quality & High Proof, 94.4

Select the gin that is recognized for certain definite advantages. For all gins are not alike. In Gordon's you have the advantage of Liqueur Quality and High Proof, 94.4. This means richer flavor, velvety smoothness, drinks that never taste thin... good reasons for requesting Gordon's when buying gin.

100% NEUTRAL SPIRITS DISTILLED FROM GRAIN • COPYRIGHT 1939, GORDON'S DRY GIN COMPANY, LTD., LINDEN, NEW JERSEY

DRINKS NEVER TASTE THIN WITH

Gordon's Gin

No Mothers Wanted

Continued from page 20

Goldilocks SAID:
"all porridge is bad for bears"

Goldilocks was brightening up her smile with delicious Dentyne the day she found the home of the three bears. Of course she tried their chairs, their beds and their porridge—and you've never seen three madder bears.

But Goldilocks flashed her lovely smile and said "Anyway, porridge won't make your teeth shine."

"But it's nice porridge," wailed the big bear.

"And not chewy enough," said Goldilocks. "Now Dentyne has an extra firmness that helps polish teeth and makes them gleam. It strengthens jaw muscles—firms up your gums. Here try some."

"M-M-M," said the little bear. "It's delicious. That nice cinnamon taste is different—and extra good."

"Right-O," laughed Goldilocks, "and note the flat handy package. It slips neatly into purse or pocket. More smiles to you and brighter ones—with Dentyne."

Moral: Help your teeth stay lovely and sparkling by chewing Dentyne often. Get a package today.

HELPS KEEP TEETH BRIGHT. MOUTH HEALTHY

Jane Withers is now approaching fifteen and has been with the studio since she arrived in Hollywood, making the momentous leap from childhood without losing her value to the films. Not all do. She is the only child marvel the studio possesses, though they no longer regard her as a child and quit taking pictures of her and her three thousand dolls over two years ago. Scenario writers at work on a Jane Withers story are now permitted to hint gently at Romance, and as a young lady she will have the benefit of a far larger story field. All the old photographs have been removed from the files and the idea now is to have her grow up rapidly and quit sliding down stair rails.

The embattled mothers have all this information and know that Shirley has not been replaced, so they continue to strive. Boy, how they strive! They send their children to the same school attended by the Zanuck children, figuring on some sort of accidental contact. When the Zanuck little ones return home to Father Z. after a hard day in school, they often bring him photographs and notes, handed them in the schoolroom by little comrades who desire nothing in the world except Shirley's old job at any reasonable salary.

It Might Even be Shirley

It used to be in the studio that the stars received the fan mail. Tyrone Power and Alice Faye were champions and their mail was huge, but now Mr. Zanuck is the star and receives more mail than his actors—all mother mail from Hollywood and California and America and foreign countries where the mail is still moving. The telegraph company wore out so many messenger boys, some of them elderly, that they finally installed a teletype in Zanuck's office and now his secretary can sit there and watch the pleas for attention as they roll in.

Shirley leaves the studio with one more picture to come, called Young People, arranged for release this month. Her last two were The Bluebird and The Little Princess, and these were the pictures that seemed to indicate an episode had come to the end of its run. They were coldly received, particularly The Bluebird, and over on Wilshire Boulevard the manager surveyed his empty house and closed up before ten o'clock.

Even if she goes to school a long time and adjoins motion pictures and studios, Miss Temple has done pretty nicely by herself and her parents, having at the age of eleven earned some three million dollars.

The Jane Withers picture just finished is The Belle of Avenue A, a drama made from The Brat, and this is her twenty-third for the same management. That makes her a veteran troupier, but even so, the film people are not looking for child marvels and hence the lively chill directed toward those mothers. As Mrs. Temple says, Shirley will now attend school regularly like any little girl and grow up to gentle maidenhood amid scholastic surroundings—unless some magnificent offer comes along, a circumstance that might occur any moment.

If that happens, Shirley will resign from school and return to the sound stage and the hairdresser. It is barely possible that some bright genius of the films may stumble upon a certain type of story and who is there to say that Miss Temple is a permanent schoolgirl? Once upon a time she rang the bell with things like Little Miss Marker and Stand Up and Cheer and the bell is still there. Given the combination of a brand-new story by somebody like Damon Runyon, with Joe Pasternak to make the picture or D. O. Selznick and Shirley on the job, it would be a little like betting against Bimelech at a mile.

Little Miss Marker, it might be noted, was the original Shirley Temple success of any magnitude and first appeared in Collier's as a short story by the redoubtable Runyon. Then came the picture, and when it opened in New York the little Temple girl was so utterly unknown that they refused to hang out her name in lights on the marquee in front of the theater. . . . Instead, they gave the big play to Damon Runyon, author, and often he would walk past the theater and stare up at his name in astonishment.

Then Shirley began to click with the movie fans. . . . The theater promoted her to lights in small letters and slightly reduced Mr. Runyon. As she gathered

WEST POINT MEN

- are brave and cultured young gentlemen.
- always tell the truth.
- dance excellently.
- are expert in breaking up an enemy's hollow-square formations.
- and have been left far behind by modern, mechanized war.

WHAT GOOD IS WEST POINT?

An article by Henry F. Pringle

IN NEXT WEEK'S COLLIER'S

momentum, her lights enlarged until they spread clear across the canopy and Mr. Runyon dwindled down teenie-weenie and finally there was no Runyon at all—just Shirley. And so the film business stumbled upon another baby gold mine. It proves once more that curly-haired little girls are far more important than top-notch authors.

To hurry back to the blazing mammas and their bright-eyed brats, it is observed in Hollywood that none of the established agents will handle children, have really taken a dislike to children and will not even talk to movie mothers or look at them or let them in. It used to be that gifted children were welcomed, but that condition has changed.

A recent case demonstrates the financial foolishness of steering children into the films and hoping for great rewards. One small and gifted moppet was run through the preparatory mill just lately and was taught everything from toe-dancing to imitating birds. Her fond and funded parents spent five thousand dollars having their baby readied for good jobs in the movies, and in the end her film career consisted of two assignments before cameras. For one of these, she was paid $25 and for the other $15, and it looks as if her career is over.

Mr. Zanuck's only real retreat these post-Temple days is his swimming pool, which is surrounded by a wall festooned with zebra trophies of the African chase, and in its cool depths he expects a moment to loom up any time between one hartebeestes and the dik-diks holding her child aloft.

The studio forces have received definite instructions to be cold to mothers and that is why Mrs. Zanuck could not get in, the other afternoon at dusk. She had just come from a shopping trip, with little Darylin, age nine, and little Susan Marie, age seven, and was her casual desire and intention to call on her husband and perhaps take him along home in the car. The warden, a new man on the gate and all home was that the studio had recently formed a strong dislike for mothers bringing children and trying to crash in at Mr. Zanuck. And do you think Mrs. Z any good to say she was late to a gateman wise in the wiles and cunning schemes of mothers accompanying children?

Mrs. Zanuck finally took her child and went along home without further comment and the gateman wasn't reprimanded.

The only child actor now employed at the studio is Johnny Russell, who frequently labored in pictures with Withers and Shirley Temple. Overeager mothers picketing the gate, they have to smuggle Johnny in, lest he be mobbed. If he can get in, the mothers argue

Meet the Winner

In the movie career of the real star, Jane Withers, now in her third picture, there seems to be a lack of poetic justice or delayed reward. Withers family came from Atlanta eight years ago, first Mrs. Ruth Withers and Jane, and later on, Father Withers. They resided in a small two-room apartment on Orange Drive, where Jane Withers did the cooking, and then waited for the lightning to strike.

In time luck came along and Jane Withers was overjoyed, for in her early days, she, too, longed to go to the stage. Circumstances and stern parents prevented this and so one day Jane Withers grew serious and asked her father to marry her and she agreed, with one condition.

"If we ever have a little girl," she said, "she must have a chance to go to the stage or in the movies, so what do you say about that?"

Like almost any young man who has done, Walter promised it would be all right with him, so they were married and had a little girl and here she is at fourteen, almost an old-time film star and the Withers live in a house in a rich neighborhood, with servants everywhere. Jane has nine cats, two deer, a parrot, three turkeys, ten pheasants, three squirrels, a hundred chickens, two lovebirds, a donkey, two goats and a Chinese pig.

She is now as tall and heavy as Alice Faye and is therefore no Shirley Temple, as the mothers would gladly point out to Zanuck if he would only let her inside the gate. Mrs. Withers is paid a salary for helping Jane do her job properly and Walter Withers runs a wholesale rug business and religiously stays away from the studio. In six years he has visited it three times, his only being to let Mrs. Withers manage the star who is going to be Shirley's successor.

Preparedness that started 20 years ago

DURING the first six months of 1940, the volume of freight for export handled through Atlantic and Gulf ports of the United States reached a level unequalled since the war years of 1917-18.

And yet this volume was handled so smoothly by the American railroads that no comment about it appeared in the news.

Why?

Because preparedness, with the railroads, is not a newly discovered need. It is something the railroads have studied and worked for ever since the end of the first World War.

And the plain fact is — in speed and operating efficiency the American railroads today are at the highest peak in their history.

Freight train speed averages 62% higher than in 1920.

That's because heavier rails have been laid — sidetrack mileage has been increased — terminal facilities have been enlarged — terminal operations have been speeded up — arrangements for having cars on hand wherever and whenever they are needed have been vastly improved. During the first six months of 1940 the railroads placed in service more new freight cars than in any like period in the last 10 years.

Today freight trains actually perform more than twice as much transportation service per hour as trains did 20 years ago.

An indication of the ability of the railroads of the United States to take care of any traffic that may develop is shown by the fact that between August and October, 1939, they handled without car shortage or delay the largest increase in business ever recorded in so short a time.

The big fact is — in capacity and in operating skill and methods — the railroads are ready to do their share in speeding national defense — and a mighty big share it is bound to be.

And that's why we say — give the railroads an equal chance to keep themselves fit to do the job that they alone can do.

"See America" FOR $90

Start from your home town now on a Grand Circle Tour of the United States — east coast, west coast, border to border — go by one route, return by another — liberal stopovers — for $90 railroad fare in coaches — $135 in Pullmans (plus $45 for one or two passengers in a lower berth).

NOW — TRAVEL ON CREDIT

See your local ticket agent

ASSOCIATION OF

AMERICAN RAILROADS

WASHINGTON, D. C.

NOW YOU CAN PUT WINGS ON YOUR ENGINE, TOO!

Just follow the lead of United Mainliners—Sound your "Z" for this oil... and Zoom!

Auto Mechanic

How do you air line fellows protect your engines from high-speed varnish and sludge?

Boy, that's easy! We use regular PennZoil. It helped us lengthen engine life from 4000 to 6000 hours. And it's the real PennZoil your customers can buy anywhere!

United Air Lines
Mechanic

LET UNITED'S AWARD-WINNING SHOPS BE YOUR ENGINE LABORATORY

September will mark the 20th anniversary of the establishment of the Main Line airway by the U. S. Post Office Department. United has flown this route since 1927.

Member I. A. Grade Crude Oil Assn. Permit No. 2

United's maintenance shops in Cheyenne hold Aviation's award for efficiency. Using PennZoil, United has lengthened both the time between overhauls and the life of its engines.

Look at the chart below. It tells why your car needs sludge-resisting PennZoil... why you should sound your "Z" every time you ask for oil!

Be oil-wise specify PennZoil

EXTRA CLEAN! PennZoil's 3 extra refining steps take out impurities that clog your motor, slow it down and waste gas and oil.

At today's price, PennZoil is a whale of a buy, so sound your "Z" soon!

Refining of plain oils ends here.

These 3 extra steps make PennZoil.

Others stop here.

GIVES YOUR MOTOR AN EXTRA MARGIN OF SAFETY

A Girl Must Be Sure

Continued from page 19

one of the finest girls anyone ever saw."

Kernehan was daydreaming. "Almost three years to the day. They were dancing at a Broadway place called the Tiger Inn. We were keeping a tail on George Karidian. You know George—we sent him up a year ago. The policy game. He took a shine to her one night and then practically lived at the Tiger Inn. After the show, you'd see her and Moran at Karidian's table. Finally they weren't dancing at all, but you'd see them around town, all the hot spots—the three of them. There were parties at Karidian's penthouse. Well, we picked up enough on Karidian to make a pinch worth while. So I went up to the penthouse one afternoon to get him, and she was there too.

"Whatever I walked in on—well, she was sore at him for something. I said, 'All right, George, we want to see you downtown.' He said, 'For what?' And I said, 'Offhand, I'd say for keeps. Anyhow, five or ten years, I hope.' Well, he went off his nut. You know me, Max; I'm a pretty patient guy. Hell, I wasn't even thinking about my gun. I didn't think George would be fool enough to go after his. But he did and I went after him. Then Moran busted in. I got George's gun away from him, turned on Moran—I didn't know what to expect by that time—and then Marge let go with her foot and kicked the gun right out of my hand. Moran hit me with a bronze book end.

"When I came to, she was the only one there—trying to stop the blood. She was still trying to stop it when the doctor came in. She'd phoned him. George and Moran had breezed." After a moment he added: "I didn't file any charges against her."

"And you've hounded her ever since, hoping to find Moran."

Kernehan sighed. "Something like that. I first caught up with her in Chicago. I took her to dinner. I danced with her in Detroit. One night in St. Louis we drove through Forest Park. We drank good beer in Cincinnati. When I got back east, I went over to Brooklyn and told her folks she was doing well. They're fine people."

"I'll bet there's one thing you don't know."

"There's a lot I don't know."

"Aggie told me this. She told Aggie." They leaned with their heads close together. "Moran was crazy to open a swell café in the East Fifties, for the carriage trade, but he needed the backing and that's what he was hanging around Karidian for. Well, you know how George was nuts about Margie. Well, Moran wanted sure enough to open that café. Well, he wanted Margie to be nice to Karidian. What I mean, nice. You catch?"

"You're practically subtle, Max. Do you think she still loves him?"

"How do I know? How do I know about women?"

"Seen Eddie Moran around, Max?"

Max Wagner stood up. "You better go easy, Kerny. He's toughened up in three years. He's in the dough, which means he's got some tough friends."

He drummed off on his short legs, his coattail flapping.

RAFAEL walked with her across the Blue Pavilion's parking space, their shadows thrown far out, elongated, by the floodlight.

"Hello," Kernehan said. His face beneath the brim of his hat was in deep shadow.

"Hello," she said flatly.

Rafael took hold of her arm. "It is late. I will take you home direct. You are fatigued. It is necessary that you sleep. Tomorrow is Saturday night."

"You're Rafael?" Kernehan said.

"Rafael Allones."

"I'll take her home, Mr. Allones. Direct."

She said, "Go ahead, Rafael."

Without another word Rafael squinted into his midjet car and drove off.

"I rented one," Kernehan said, and led her to a black coupé.

Saying nothing, she got in.

"I waited," Kernehan said, "till you were finished here tonight."

"Considerate of you."

He drove out beneath the white sky archway, saying, "You'll have to tell me. I'm a stranger here."

"Go out the boulevard to the left and turn right."

He drove on in silence, turned right at the canal and kept going into the outskirts of the small coastal city.

"The next street light," she said.

He pulled into the curb and stopped in front of a small, two-storied hotel. One light glowed in the lobby. There were green boxed shrubs out front.

"Nice," he said.

"It's clean."

HE LEANED his elbows on the wall and stared ahead through the window shield.

He said, "Well..." and was lost.

"Well, what? Get it over with. I can stand it. Then let me alone—tomorrow and tomorrow and forever!"

He drummed on the wheel. "I'm balled up. I come down here pretending I'm looking for Eddie Moran. I'm kidding myself. I came down here, in fact, and this is clean goods, kid—I came down here to see you."

"Don't try to kid me, Kernehan. Why don't you ask me where Eddie Moran is? Go ahead, ask me—ask me!" Her voice cracked.

He said, "Funny; I'm not even thinking about Moran." He shrugged. "I know he's around here somewhere. Fact is, I'm off duty. Vacation. Hell, I'm not even armed." He got out of the car, walked around it and pulled open the door on the other side. "Go to bed."

She stepped out and walked swiftly into the lobby. He was getting bored into the car when she came out again.

"Are you on the level about not being armed?" she said.

"Yes."

"Well, look out. Eddie is."

She went into the hotel.

Kernehan liked the little clapboard shack on the beach. He had rented through a real-estate agent, for two weeks. The sheriff, putting in a word, had got him a low rate. It was far from the beach, by itself, and he could swim or surf fishing to his heart's content. It was a good place to sit around and think. The big thing in his thoughts had been Moran; to get Moran until somewhere along the way Margaret Petersen became the big thing.

He wondered why he never heard Moran come up through the sand. He guessed it was because his ears were full of thoughts.

"Good afternoon, mastermind."

Kernehan looked up from a pipe he was reaming. Moran was outlined the doorway against the late-afternoon sea. He carried a rifle. The sea was dull blue, tumbling and noisy.

"Hello," said Kernehan, and went on reaming his pipe.

"I've just seen Margie," Moran said. His voice was quiet but Moran was calm. There was great repression roast and his words were blurred a saw her a couple of nights ago," than said. He looked at the rifle.

 hunting?"
 you call yourself game, yes."
 nehan sighed and tossed his pipe
 the sofa. "I'd almost forgotten you, Moran. I've been thinking pleasant things."
 understand double talk, so don't
 t. You don't get out of this, pal.
 more than two years you've made e hell. It's got to end. I'm in the now and I'm not going to have opper bust up my parade."
 you're in the dough, why don't you gunman?"
 s better this way. Because nos going to know."
 nehan said, "I'd sure like to know you found this place."
 u weren't at the hotels, so I phoned real-estate agents. A dope would of that. There's no use trying to e the subject. What kind of a mer are you?"
 ly fair."
 e how good you are. I've watched lace for two days. This time, late oon, the beach is always empty.
 mpty now. All right, mastermind, swimming. Out. Straight out.
 e watching you with the rifle, so try to come back in. Out. Way
 If you're washed up somewhere, ll be no marks on your body.
 ng. Get going."
 nehan drummed on his knees.
 swell idea," he said, "but it won't If you're going to do it, you're to do it right here."
 vy feet were pounding in the brush ck of the shack. Terrified, Moran's eaped to one side. Kernehan was m savagely in that instant. No simply the unleashed weight of dy and the fierce momentum of his error. It was a collision, head on, th went down. Kernehan wrenched le away so hard that it flew out of and while he was tumbling over n's twisting body. Moran bleated.
 rambled to his feet and ran head-down to the water; and as he ran off his coat, then his shirt.

sheriff yelled, "Hey, you!" and
 d over his head.
 nehan was sitting up. He looked
 . There was a long red mark on his head where he had struck it against ott of the rifle.
 ran was in the water, swimming.
 cked his trousers off.
 ey! Hey!" the sheriff bawled.
 ello," said Kernehan.
 m! Look at him!" the sheriff
 l. "He don't know how rough it is ere! He'll drown!"
 ow'd you happen along?" Kerneasked.

"That girl. The dancer. She phoned Max Wagner. Asked where you were.
 Max didn't know. He phoned me. He told me to run out quick. I don't know —something the girl told him. . . . Hey!"
 he shouted to Moran. "Hey, you dope, you! Come back here! Look at the dope.
 Look at him! Hey! Hey! Hey! . . ."

Kernehan climbed the hotel stairway, found her door and knocked. He waited.
 After a minute he listened. He was sure he had heard some movement beyond the door. Besides, the hotel clerk had said she was in. He knocked again, a little louder this time, and stared down at the doorknob. Presently he saw the knob move. The slowness with which it moved fascinated him. Then the door opened quickly, quietly, creating a small breeze.

SHE stood rigid, her lips drawn against her teeth, her eyes round and glassy.
 When she saw him, all the rigidity flowed, swept, out of her body. Blood rushed into her cheeks. A great, long-held breath made a faint, whistling sound as it rushed out between her parted, trembling lips. She leaned against the wall, let her head lie well back, closed her eyes.

"Thank God!" she said. "I thought it might be Eddie."

"That's what I thought you thought."

"I knew you weren't armed. I knew that look in his eyes. I was fool enough to tell him you weren't down here after him at all. I said you didn't even have a gun. I said—it was me you were down here for. I said what you said in Baltimore that night—that you loved me. I said I loved you."

"I always miss things like that."
 "I said I was sick and tired of having Rafael superintend my hours of relaxation, my diet. His ambition floored me.
 I said. It was too big and I couldn't ever really be part of it. I said I didn't want to dance any more. I said I loved you."

"You just said that part a minute ago.
 Where did it begin?"

She rubbed her head against the wall.
 "St. Louis a little bit, I guess. Oh, Baltimore, I guess—Baltimore, really. I don't know. Somewhere along the line.
 I denied it, I guess. I was afraid. I didn't want to be hurt again."

"Me hurt you?"
 "How did I know? How did I know about anything? What does it matter?
 What are we standing here talking like this for?"

"I don't know," Kernehan said.
 "What are we waiting for? What are we waiting for?"

"I know what I'm waiting for," Kernehan said.

He took her in his arms and he did not have to reach for her lips; she reached for his. He kissed her in a long, timeless silence, putting an end to words.

"All the best steel nowadays is being used for armaments"

CHARLES PEARSON

There's a Tangy Freshness to it . . .

You're going to like this different tasting dentifrice.

It's cool, and quickly refreshing as the shock of salt-spray on your skin. It has a quickening taste and contains acid-neutralizing Squibb Milk of Magnesia in concentrated form. Your whole mouth seems to feel fresher! Squibb Dental Cream cleans as thoroughly as a dentifrice safely can.

It tastes good, feels good,
and you can be sure it's good for you, because it's a product of the House of Squibb, the name that everywhere means purity and safety. If you've never tried this effective dentifrice, get some today!
You'll be pleasantly surprised at its reasonable cost!

SQUIBB ANGLE TOOTHBRUSH (illustrated)... dentist designed, head bent at correct angle for easier brushing and gum massage.
Ask your druggist.

Contains Concentrated Squibb Milk of Magnesia

SQUIBB Dental Cream

★ Taste and feel the refreshing difference!

The Tune I Know

Continued from page 15

Minister of Character

Through a long lifetime, he has won and held the respect and friendship of men of every faith. His humanity knows no bounds of creed, and his own life has been the most inspiring sermon he ever preached.

He would see nothing inconsistent in a man's making a religion of his business... in fact, it would seem a perfectly natural thing that one should put into his daily tasks the finest that is in him. Character isn't something you can wear on Sunday and leave in a bureau drawer on Monday. You achieve character by living up to a certain set of standards so long, you couldn't go back on them anytime or anywhere. If you once start compromising, there is nothing left.

That is the basis for our own belief that any product should be made as good as possible, even though that quality might seem higher than is absolutely necessary. Especially is this true of motor oil. For the protection of a costly motor... yes, even the safety of the passengers, may depend on the ability of the oil to do the impossible in one of those sudden emergencies that afford the real measure of character. Quaker State Oil Refining Corporation, Oil City, Pennsylvania.

Trust your car to the Oil of CHARACTER!

later where I am at, so you can send them to me. And Steve," he says, "I am hoping to see you, so we can work together like we have done it before. Someplace."

"Is it on account of Miss Manners?" I ask Hade.

"Of course," he says.

"I am mighty sorry, Hade," I say. "Where are you heading?"

"I have always wanted to see Nevada," he says.

So we shake hands and Hade goes out to see Nevada.

In the morning he is back.

DARROW comes in about noon and sits down beside of me on my bunk, where I am going over my rope, softening it up. He says, "Steve, I have made up my mind to try to learn to ride."

I am feeling sick.

He says, "Will you take me out this afternoon, alone, and give me some lessons?"

I tell him, "Mr. Darrow, we will go and I will do my best."

So we take a couple good horses out to a little park in the woods back of the ranch. He tries it, but he is as stiff as a clothespin, and rides like one, when he is on the horse. Which is not all the time.

"I give up," he says finally. His lip is trembling.

He sits there slumped over in his saddle. I have got an idea. I say, "All right, it is hopeless, no use trying any more," and I hit his horse a smart cut on the flank and away we go, and Darrow is suddenly riding like a top hand. He is relaxed, he has gave up, and now he is riding.

"Do you think," he says, "I can do it like that this afternoon?"

"I think you can do her," I tell him, "if you'll let every muscle good and loose. Just give up, pretend you can't do her, and say to hell with it, and I think you can do her."

So he goes and tells Miss Manners he is going to ride with her and Hade that afternoon.

So Hade saddles up for Miss Manners, and I saddle up for Darrow. He says he wants me to come along. So I saddle up for myself. When it is time to start, I am afraid. Darrow has got that old look in his eyes, like he is going to do her or die trying, and that is no good.

"Listen," I tell him, "walk up to that horse like the horse was just a corral fence, and you are going to hop up and sit there and smoke yourself a cigarette. Let yourself completely loose."

Well, Miss Manners and Hade are mounted, and standing there watching, and it is time for Darrow to get up. I give him the nod and wink, and he winks back and swings up on his horse like a cowhand.

And what does he do?

He swings too far, and misses the off stirrup with his foot and keeps right on going, over the saddle, and he is flat on his face on the ground on the other side of the horse.

Miss Manners has got her hands over her eyes, she is laughing, and Darrow is sitting there on the ground with a surprised expression. I tell him to try it again.

So he tries her again and it is perfect. We start off, and we have not gone far when we come to an open flat, and Miss Manners yells, "Let's go!" and she is off, and we are off too, all of us going at a gallop.

I am watching Darrow.

"Take it easy!" I yell at him.

No use. He is holding on, he has a stirrup, and he looks at me and to say something but he can't talk.

I drop back of him, just to be the left, and we swing with her, at the end of Darrow. Off he goes.

He hits the ground and he comes over, and I am with him, I go down the dust, hitting on my left shoulder taking her on the roll. I end up beside of Darrow, and our horses are going on. Hade sees what has happened, and he stops Miss Manners give him the sign we are not to let them go after our horses.

"Are you all right?" I ask Darrow.

He is sitting there laughing at the ing of his legs. He is laughing at Hade watches Hade and Miss Manners chasing the horses, and he says, "I think this is funny. He says, 'Yes, Steve, I am all right.' Hade says, 'I am in good enough shape, says, 'to start walking.'"

And he starts back toward the horses, limping a little.

I call after him, but he does not answer. He keeps on walking.

Hade and Miss Manners bring the horses.

Miss Manners looks at Darrow and he is walking back toward the horses. She does not go after him.

WELL, here it is payday, and I am sitting on a bench beside of the house cleaning my saddle, and Hade comes along and sits down.

He says, "Steve, I'm going home tomorrow." He has had a couple of drinks.

"All of you going?" I ask.

"Just me," he says.

I keep on cleaning my saddle. V. all I can say is, "I tell him, I'm mighty sorry."

He says, "Well, it's one of those things." He looks very sad. He says, "If only we wouldn't of come out here. It was a mistake. I'm not saying anything to anybody, Steve. I'm just going out, without saying anything. You would keep it dark." He says, "I have known Miss Manners since we were kids. He does not go on."

I am feeling sick. "Is it about you are leaving?" I ask him.

He nods. He says, "I know Hade about Hade. He didn't mean to go against him. I have not got a chance against him. And nothing against him. It is one of those things about the country and surroundings run with you. All I hope is that she get her head back in time. I am saying on behalf of them both. Especially Lucille fits in here fine at present the summer will end sometime, and will not fit in here and Hade would fit in anyplace else. It would be a tragedy, Steve. For Lucille especially for Hade."

Darrow is right. I am sorry for Darrow has put in words what I have in my head, and what I think Hade got in his head, too.

"I wish I could think of something," I tell Darrow.

"I wish I could think of something," he says, and walks away. I am cleaning my saddle.

After while I can see Hade and Miss Manners coming in from their horses. They are not talking and laughing always. Hade is looking at his ears, just sitting there in the saddle going into the bunkhouse and take the boots and start cleaning them. Hade comes in.

He sits down beside of me. "Hade," I say, "how was the ride?" "All right," he says. "I am cleaning a boot. 'It's a good thing,' I tell Hade, 'Miss Manners has never seen what this place is like in the winter.'"

"Yes," Hade says. He lays back on the bunk. He is looking at the roof. "I can't help it," he says. "I fell in love with her."

"You better fall out," I tell him, "before you get hurt." "I have tried," he says, "but it doesn't do good."

He lies down on the bunk, face down, head on his arms.

Yellow comes in and says the ghost is looking down at Kinkaid's office. Hade goes up and goes on down, but I keep on cleaning my boots. I am trying to think, which is always a very hard thing for me but especially now. When I have my boots cleaned I put them on and go out for a little walk. I walk over to the corral, and sit on the fence. A fellow can do most of his thinking sitting on a fence looking at the horses. I am sitting there watching a couple of poor coyote baits that are on pension at the ranch.

GET off the fence after while and go down to get my pay. Kinkaid is in his office, and before he gives me my money I sit down and talk to him a while. We have quite a long conversation, and when we are through I go on back to the kitchen.

Hade is laying on his bunk.

Hade," I tell him, "Kinkaid wants I you to take a couple horses over to the Triangle T tonight, and bring a couple back tomorrow."

"All right," Hade says. He gets up. "When we leave now?"

"Right now," I tell him. "Bring along your blankets out of your bedroll; we got to stay there all night."

We take our blankets and saddles out of the corral and put them on the fence. I go in and walk up to the two old coyote baits and lead them back. Hade is not paying no attention, and he throws his saddle on one of the horses. Then he stands back and looks at it.

"Where did this coyote bait come from?" he says.

"We're taking them over there," I tell him.

"We'll never get them there," Hade says. He saddles up and I saddle up and we mount and ride away from the ranch. We take the trail that goes south out of the ranch, down along the mountains, toward where the Triangle T is at.

"I never been over to this Triangle T," Hade says. "How far is it?"

"It is quite a ways," I tell Hade.

We ride along, and it is mighty pretty this time of day, the sun low the way it is. "This time of day, the sun like this, she sure is pretty out," I mention to Hade.

"She sure is," he says. "Let's stop a minute." He draws up and I draw up and we turn our horses and sit there and look back. We can't see the ranch now, it is behind a rise, but I can see Hade looking for it. He is looking and looking.

"Can't see her from here," he says.

"No," I say.

So we go on, and we go into some woods and stay there a while, on the trail, and when we come out we are in a high saddle in the hills. You can see a long ways, straight ahead. It is a long valley ahead of us, and the bottom is all sagebrush flats.

The trail turns here, curves around toward the Triangle T. We sit there a few minutes to rest the coyote bait; we have been climbing, and we start up again, and Hade follows the trail where it swings around.

"No, Hade," I tell him, "we do not follow the trail no more. We go straight down onto those flats."

Hade looks at me. I pull up beside of Hade, and I look at Hade. "Winters in this country," I tell him, "are not the same as summer."

"No," he says.

"She was beautiful, Hade," I tell him. "Just like this Hedy Lamarr. Her and Darrow, that have known each other since they were kids, will get along wonderful in the East. Better than I or you."

Hade is not saying nothing. He is looking at me.

"Hade," I tell him, "you said the other day you had never saw Nevada."

Hade is sitting up very straight in his saddle. He is not looking at me, now; he is looking back, trying to see back to where the ranch is at, and Miss Manners.

Then he looks at me again, and he says, "No, Steve, I have never saw Nevada in my life. This will be the first time."

He gives his horse a dig in the ribs, and we move off of the trail and start down toward the long valley that is ahead of us.

We ride along.

After while Hade straightens up, and throws one leg over the pommel of his saddle and looks over at me and kind of grins.

"It's all right, Steve," he says.

Well, I'm sitting there whistling through my teeth.

A tune I know.

Golly, but this smoke is torrid!
Gotta fan my fevered forehead!

Now I'm giving Kools a test:
Right away
I feel refreshed!

SWITCH FROM "HOTS" TO KOOLS

Prove it to yourself! See how much more fun smoking becomes! The mild menthol in KOOLS tastes so cool and refreshing, it's a pick-up for any smoke-dry throat!

TUNE IN — Paul Sullivan
Reviews the News — CBS
Every night but Sat. & Sun.

VALUABLE COUPON ON EACH PACK... FOUR EXTRA IN CARTONS

Good in the United States for dozens of luxury premiums like these Therm-a-Jug. Handy gallon size. Insulated liner is unbreakable. . . . 200 coupons.

FREE. Write for illustrated new edition B & W premium booklet. No. 18. Address the Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., Box 599, Louisville, Kentucky.

Powerlite. 800-foot beam or flood light 50-hour Eveready battery. 350 coupons

B & W COUPONS ALSO PACKED IN RALEIGH & VICEROY CIGARETTES & BIG BEN SMOKING TOBACCO

"Make sure you get it all in!"

RICHARD TAYLOR

FALSE TEETH WEARERS

often worst breath offenders

Don't let Denture Breath and stains shout "False"

DENTISTS SAY • USE POLIDENT

A thin dark film collects on plates and bridges. This film soaks up odors and impurities like a sponge! It holds germs and decay bacteria . . . gets into every tiny crevice where brushing can't even reach. And it's so tough that ordinary brushing seldom removes it.

Almost always it results in "denture breath", a most offensive breath odor. You won't notice it—but others will.

Yet there's a perfect way to clean and purify false teeth without brushing, acid or danger. It is Polident, a powder that dissolves away all film, stains, tarnish and odor. Makes breath sweeter—and plates or removable bridges look better and feel better

Grateful Users Praise It

Thousands call Polident a blessing for convenience and hygiene. Long-lasting can only 30¢, any drug store. Money back if not delighted. Approved by leading dentists.

Hudson Products, Inc., 220 West 19th St., New York, N. Y.

POLIDENT

NO BRUSHING

Add Polident to 1/2 glass water. Stir. Put in plate or bridge for 10 to 15 minutes. Rinse—and it's ready to use.

ARE YOU A STRANGER-To Yourself?

DO you know what you are best fitted for? Can you interpret your moods—know the mental influences—behind your whims and fancies? Let the Rosicrucians (not a religious organization) show you how to discover yourself and master your life. Send for the free "Sealed Book" that tells how to receive these facts. Address Scribe E. G. D.

The ROSICRUCIANS
SAN JOSE (AMERICA) CALIFORNIA

Aids in the Relief of
HAY FEVER

Dr. Weaver's
Original
NASAL FILTER

Nothing else "Just as good"
COMFORTABLE — SCARCELY VISIBLE

How It Works

FILTER the AIR YOU Breathe!

More Than 30,000
in Use

Fitted by leading Physicians
Supply Houses in 600 cities.
Ask for demonstration or write
The Nasal Filter Co., Dept. C, Columbus, O.

blood—" He glowered at Karl. "Now tell me, what's going on between you and Carola?"

Karl did not answer. He was not sure he could trust Wagner.

"Come, come, I'm too old to be fooled. I can read peoples' faces," Wagner said impatiently. "It's my business, along with caring for trained dog acts, eccentric dancers, and an occasional God-sent talent, to be able to sense what's going on. You and Carola are in love."

"Yes, we are," Karl said frankly.

"Then what's the trouble?"

Karl could answer that in a word: "Blaerchen!"

Wagner sat back. "I should have guessed that. She was with him when I first met her. I know him and his kind. He is very dangerous, Karl. It's hopeless if he's in the way."

Karl agreed. "Would he do anything for money?"

Wagner laughed. "I could tell you plenty about him and all that gang. They are all alike, men in power, misusing it, turning it to their own advantage." He was silent for a moment. "The Nazis have made patriotism into Big Business, but only the important party members collect the dividends. The Ribbentrop gang and the Goering gang, and a dozen smaller gangs, all fighting for spoils!"

"Why haven't you reported what you know to the police?"

"To their police?" Wagner looked astounded. "No, thanks, I don't interfere in politics. I was tempted once. Blaerchen used a friend of mine, a young American dancer who was here for a few weeks at the Winter Garden. He even got her a diplomatic passport so that she could carry material abroad."

"What material?"

"Some sort of Foreign Office information that he was supplying to the British."

TO TEMPT Blaerchen into repeating such a thing was attractive—until Karl realized that Blaerchen would want to be sure to whom he sold such information.

Wagner was laughing. "Shocked? There have been many such instances, and not only involving Blaerchen."

"Praut?" Karl asked hopefully.

"As much as Blaerchen! Men like that would sell out Ribbentrop or Goering or even Hitler if the scheme seemed safe and there was a profit in it."

Karl was thinking fast. "There must be some scheme to get at Blaerchen." Timidly he asked, "Would you help if—?"

Wagner shook his head slowly. "Sorry, my friend, but I can't mix in politics in any way." Firmly he added, "I don't even want to know what you might plan. Any simple scheme will fail, I tell you. Blaerchen can have you arrested at once and say that he went along with you, just to trap you. You'll have to find a new plot."

"A friend of mine mentioned Hamlet," Karl said, disappointed.

"You used to know all the plots when you wrote a sketch a week at the Krokodil," Wagner said reminiscently. "Remember The Lion Tamer? The Twentieth Century Eulenspiegel?"

Karl smiled in spite of himself. They were short farces which he did over and over again. The audiences loved them and they were fun to do. Then, like a man jerked up by a rope from the flies, Karl was on his feet. "Remember The Butcher and the Policeman? I've got it!"

"I hope so." Wagner did not smile.

"But don't tell me anything about it."

Wagner had no chance to say any more. Karl was out of the office and down to the street.

He hurried along the street, recalling every detail of The Butcher and the Policeman. It was a one-act farce that had made the crowds at the Krokodil roar. Sometimes he had done it every night for a month. It was a farce acted in medieval style. In it a butcher, troubled by a nagging wife, wanted some way to quiet her. He persuaded his friend, a policeman, to arrange a secret rendezvous with her and to keep it. From that time on, the butcher had control of the situation as he went about hinting, "I know something, I know something!" The wife was unable to question him for fear that she might reveal something that he really did not know. Yet she was always afraid thereafter that he might really know something and reveal it to the town gossips.

For that plot, the first thing necessary was a "policeman," a man whom Blaerchen did not know. The second thing necessary was the money for the bait. Both these elements could be found. After those a hundred details remained unclear. The whole scheme was dangerous and it might mean concentration camp or worse. Yet an attempt would be better than waiting grimly for Blaerchen to act on jealousy and hatred and turn on Carola.

Karl hurried to Carola's house. It was her new apartment, near the Tiergarten and he was glad it was not far away. Carola opened the door, her face more than usually troubled. On the sofa sat an old woman dressed in black, her face red, her hands holding a sopping gray handkerchief.

"This is Anna, Maria's sister," Carola said. "Maria has been jailed and Anna wants me to help."

"What did she do?" The old woman began to cry again. "What did she do? Why should they arrest her? All she wanted to do was to live peacefully."

"What can I do?" Carola asked hopelessly.

Karl shook his head. This was Blaerchen again.

"Why should they arrest Maria?" the old woman continued. "She had done nothing wrong. Gott in Himmel! The police were so rough too. What came, the swine, they would give no planation. They just said, 'Come along with us' the same way you take a cow and say, 'Come along.' Can't do anything?"

"I wish I could help," Carola said.

"This is just more hardship," the woman continued. "It's been that all our lives. My sister and I were raised in an orphan asylum and sent to work when we were twelve. We had to work hard for no money on a farm in East Prussia. We've never been happy. Everything has gone wrong since we married—I saw a 'Wife Wanted' in the newspapers and I married one. We had nine children. Then they came away from me." She began to cry. "Five of my children died and now my sons are at the front and I don't know what will happen to them. Now Maria is in jail!"

Carola took money from her pocket book while Anna began to cry. Karl watched her try to comfort the woman and said nothing.

THE old woman left and for a moment while Carola said nothing. Then she said, "It's all horrible, the whole thing. Then she said, 'Is there a way to get abroad?' She waited for an answer then she was shocked to see Karl shake his head.

He kissed her, then said quietly, "There may be no need to go abroad. Gently he added: 'I've thought of something we can do.'"

Carola looked up hopefully. "Tell me!"

"In a moment." One sentence Anna had said supplied some missing details of the scheme! Quickly, "Have you von Maurer's dress?"

"It was on the note he wrote me about lives in the southeastern part of Berlin."

"That's the first thing done." Carola sounded satisfied. The next thing was to get in touch with Klauss again and ask if he might use some of the money that Schebeler had supplied. "Would you be willing to ask Frohman within the next few days to return the favor you once did him?"

"She was chosen Apple-Blossom Queen the year of the blight" questions made no sense and they asked with an air of rising excitement. "Gladly, but please explain." "I think we can put Blaerchen in a position in which he can't threaten us," said firmly. "My scheme is possible but it may be very dangerous." "Why consider danger? What else do we look forward to?" "You'll go through with your plans, Wagner, too."

PERRY BARR

"How can I?" Then she smiled. "Well, if you think it best." The answer pleased Karl. He glanced at the room and saw a pile of sheet music on the piano. He took it quickly and began to thumb through it. Carola stared at him, understanding nothing and not quite sure that he understood. Almost jubilantly he told her, "You're going to sing some songs, aren't you?" "Of course I am!" Carola sounded surprised.

"You know the song called The Lonely Widow?" Carola shook her head. She supposed that Karl was saying made sense but she was not sure.

"A boy with a secret, Karl exclaimed, "Get that song and sing it at the opening. It's about one of those who put an ad in the newspapers looking for a husband. It's very funny! Listen to the chorus:

*"Handsome widow,
Hair and eyes of brown,
Only twenty
House in town!
Seeks life's comrade,
Loyal, true.
Please send photo.
No postage due!"*

at song and sing it for Blaerchen at the opening."

and thereafter Blaerchen will not be able to use us?" That was too ridiculous! But at song can hint to him that you are something he would rather no one know."

Carola wrinkled her forehead. "Then I must go to him and tell him so?" "That would be too dangerous," Karl answered quickly. "What we want is to keep him guessing, to make him feel uncertain. If that keeps him just enough and makes him wonder what you know, if you know how many others know, then Blaerchen is going to be a very nervous gentleman."

Carola caught Karl's jubilant excitement. "But how does a song about a lonely widow—?"

Karl laughed and for a moment he mimed, "Handsome widow, hair of brown—?" Then he said, "On Sunday, as it has been for the last fifty years, the newspapers are filled with ads headed, 'Marriage Partner Wanted!'" He was gay now, a new man. "Have you read any recently?" "I haven't been interested," Carola answered.

"You've seen the sort of advertisement," he continued. "They say 'Handsome widow of forty-five with small estate, well born among the first families, wishes to meet well-situated civil servant or Kleingrundbesitzer!'" He said pleasantly. "What a dreadful thing, to describe someone with a piece of land."

"Yes, yes," Carola said impatiently, "today is Wednesday. I'll write Blaerchen a letter, unsigned, hinting that some interested party would be willing to make a financial arrangement that might interest him. If he is interested, he is to put an advertisement in the marriage column reading, 'Handsome widow, with brown hair and blue eyes—?' That will give me a box number which I can write. In the meantime I must find von Maurer. I need an honest man whom Blaerchen does not know. And I want you to see Froscetti."

"And then?"

"Then if Blaerchen answers my letter and everything works, sing that song right at Blaerchen at the Sans Souci next Thursday night!"

IF BLAERCHEN was interested in replying to Karl's letter, the answer would be in the Sunday paper.

Karl was up early Sunday morning, and hurried to Alexanderplatz. A woman selling newspapers was on the corner. She watched him curiously as he took a paper, opened it, and hunted for the marriage advertisement columns.

Here was a half page of fine print and Karl went through a hundred small advertisements. "Retired dry-goods dealer wants to marry . . ." "Brother seeks husband, from first circles, for sister, aged 37 . . ." "Beautiful cultured masseuse, 44, wishes to find . . ."

Then in the last column, near the end, he saw it: "Widow of twenty, brown hair and eyes, owner of house in Berlin, wishes to find life's companion, loyal, honest, true. Please send photograph, prepaid. Address box number 25 D."

There it was, an answer!

The newswoman smiled at him. She knew what page he had been reading. "I'm sure you'll find a handsome wife," she laughed.

"What? Oh!" Karl returned her laugh and hurried to a telephone to call Carola. She would be waiting for him to say, "I have an answer."

On Sunday afternoon Karl took the subway to the southeastern part of Berlin. He got out at the Treptow station and had to walk a half mile, passing several factories, then the parks along the river. A few couples had dared the cold afternoon for a promenade but they walked quickly. Passing them, he told himself that some day he and Carola might be able to promenade arm in arm, in park or on pavement, fearlessly and free.

Along a row of old apartments, he hunted for one number and entered a house in the middle of the block. After an hour he came out, the look of satisfaction deeper on his face. It was colder outside now but less cold than it had been in the apartment. Even the house in which a man like von Maurer lived could not get fuel.

Karl started down a side street to the subway but a crowd ahead blocked his way.

Smoke plumed out of a large factory building. A policeman was holding people back. Back of him were more policemen and police wagons were arriving every minute.

"What's on fire?" Karl asked the man nearest to him, a workman with a hard, expressionless face.

"The electrical works." The workman took a pipe from his mouth.

"The police seem worried about it."

"They ought to be." The workman spat on the pavement. "That kind of electrical works may explode." He lowered his voice. "Makes fuses for shells!"

That was a good reason for moving faster!

Karl detoured and reached the subway. He rode to the Zoo. It was pleasant to be able to look forward to being with Carola without having to worry about Blaerchen's knowing of it. He would not bother them so long as he expected her to keep that engagement with Prout.

Karl went into a cafe. Carola was not on time but there was no need to worry about her being late. She, too, had had an engagement this afternoon. When she came she was smiling and when she smiled like that her blue eyes glistened, matching the blue of her little

"No, I never waste time reading their bulletins. They're too blurry to bother with!"

BUSY PROSPECTS won't try to decipher blurry stencil copies. Tell them your story quickly, legibly on Hammermill Mimeo-Bond. This paper gives sharp, clean copies—up to 5,000 from one stencil. You can write on it with a pen; the ink won't feather. Test Hammermill Mimeo-Bond free. Send for 100-sheet packet and "Good Stencil Duplicating"—how to get better results from your equipment.

HAMMERMILL MIMEO-BOND
HAMMERMILL MIMEOGRAPH PAPER

MADE BY THE MAKERS OF HAMMERMILL BOND

What is your home like? Does it contain worth-while books that give you and your family stimulating contact with great minds, or does the sum total of your resources for reading consist of current novels or the daily newspaper—interesting today but of no value as mental stimulation or information tomorrow?

We all want our homes to be real homes, warm and hearty, where the latch string of welcome is prominently displayed, a place where our friends will want to come and return again and again. To make our homes attractive and to draw about us interesting and

THIS COUPON ENTITLES YOU TO FREE BOOKLET

P. F. Collier & Son Corporation
250 Park Avenue, New York City

I am interested in receiving by mail, free and without obligation, your valuable booklet, "Fifteen Minutes a Day" describing the famous library, Dr. Eliot's Five-Foot Shelf of Books (The Harvard Classics) and containing Dr. Eliot's own plan of constructive reading.

437 H. S.

Mr. _____
Name Mrs. _____
Miss _____
Address _____

FREE! Hammermill Paper Co., Dept. C, Erie, Pa.
100 SHEETS As operators of a model _____
Stencil Duplicator, we would like to test Hammermill Mimeo-Bond. Send 100-sheet packet and "Good Stencil Duplicating." (Students and outside U. S., 50¢)

Name _____
Position _____
(Please attach to, or write on, your company letterhead) C-8-17

YOU TOO WILL ENJOY
-15 Minutes
a Day

entertaining friends, we too, must be interesting and entertaining.

Dr. Eliot, America's greatest educator, and for forty years President of Harvard University, chose for his Harvard Classics, the texts that are the backbone of college training. Enlightenment, stimulation, a release from reality, an ability to soar to new heights of thought, explore new worlds of interest and experience new realms of enjoyment are in store for those who own

Dr. Eliot's
Five-Foot Shelf
of Books
(The Harvard Classics)

The Harvard Classics is now offered at the lowest price in its history. The cost per volume is actually 1/3 of that of the ordinary current novel.

Send for the famous book, FIFTEEN MINUTES A DAY. It is yours without obligation and without cost.

The foods I like
DON'T LIKE ME!

Most of us crave certain foods that disagree with us, if only because we eat too much of them. Then the discomfort of an upset stomach... gas pains, sour, acid indigestion and simple diarrhea.

Next time, take Pepto-Bismol, the pleasant-tasting aid in relieving common upsets due to over-indulgence, hasty eating and improperly selected food.

Pepto-Bismol soothes your upset stomach — doesn't add to the upset, as drastic, irritating physics do. Neither laxative nor antacid, it quickly helps relieve your stomach distress.

50c at your druggist's.
Or by the dose at drug store fountains.

Norwich

Makers of Unguentine*

PEPTO-BISMOL

FOR UpSET STOMACH

*REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

hat, the blue of her boyish coat. She looked like a promise of spring. The cold had pinked her cheeks. People at other tables turned as she passed.

Karl met her with eager questions: "What happened? Did you see Froschetti?"

She nodded, smiling as if a little secret amused her. "But first I saw the newspaper this morning. I couldn't believe it!" She looked at him proudly. "You were right, Karl." Then she asked, "What about von Maurer?"

"I saw him." Karl picked up a menu. "One minute. Let's order something—I'm awfully hungry." He frowned as he looked at the card. "It doesn't look very appetizing. We have our choice between sausage and fish, boiled potatoes, carrots, and cabbage."

"I'm not very hungry."

Karl called a waitress. "What do you recommend, Fräulein?"

The waitress smiled sadly. "The sausage is ersatz, imitation. The fish—"

"They haven't discovered how to make ersatz fish?"

"Nein, mein Herr, but there isn't any more fish!"

Karl shrugged his shoulders. "I think we'll both have coffee, Carola."

She agreed.

"The coffee isn't what it used to be, mein Herr," the waitress said apologetically. "It used to be ersatz made out of real malt. Now it's made out of ersatz malt!"

That sounded as bad as it would probably taste. Karl watched her leave and said slowly, "I wonder what will happen when people find out that men like Blaerchen don't have to drink imitation coffee made from the imitations of coffee imitations?"

"I'm more curious about other things," Carola smiled. "I want to know about von Maurer. Did he agree?"

Karl nodded.

"Without argument?"

"AT FIRST he felt it beneath his dignity as a good Nazi to argue with me," Karl said. "When I told him that Blaerchen was threatening you, von Maurer remembered Mainescu and became friendly. Then he wanted to help us. He is eager to help but he said, 'If Blaerchen is a scoundrel, then why not report him to his superiors?' I told him that in that case the three of us would be arrested immediately and that Blaerchen would insist that he only co-operated with us to trap us." Karl paused for a moment. "I convinced him that the important thing at the moment is to forestall Blaerchen, not punish him." Then he asked, "What about your visit to Froschetti?"

Without a word she took an envelope from her bag. "Here is five thousand marks! As soon as he looked at the German-Swedish documents, he said they were more than worth the money." As she handed him the envelope she said, a little more uncertainly, "Is every detail complete now?"

"Complete!" Karl said emphatically. "Blaerchen has answered my letter. Klauss has let us have documents to sell to Froschetti for cash. We have it. Tomorrow von Maurer will meet Blaerchen, pretend to be on the Goering side, and offer to purchase information about the activities of the Ribbentrop crowd."

"Suppose Blaerchen calls the police? He may suspect von Maurer."

"Von Maurer has a long party record. He's the type that's on the Goering side." Even more convincingly Karl added, "He won't call the police for interparty intrigue. All that Blaerchen could do would be to refuse."

For a little while Carola was silent. Then, "If he accepts von Maurer's offer, all that remains will be my song at the opening?"

"That's all!"

"And we shan't have to fear Blaerchen after that?"

"I don't think so." Karl explained eagerly, "He will feel sure that you know something about this advertisement and about his answer but he will not dare to ask you or to arrest you for fear you'll report to his Foreign Office superiors what you know."

"I hope so, but I can't believe that Blaerchen won't do something to us."

"He will be unable to do anything, my dear." Karl spoke confidently. "He will be afraid of you. Let him have some sleepless nights."

"I hope you're right." But Carola did not sound convinced.

ON THE afternoon of the opening, Wagner's office was like a railroad station on mobilization day. Last-minute telephone calls for reservations, for choice tables, visitors on a dozen different missions, kept everyone busy—everyone but Wagner. He was around smiling, unconcerned by the confusion. "Everything's done, everything's arranged," he said, paying no attention to callers or telephone calls. "It will be sensational. The number of important officials coming tonight— It will be like the Nuremberg Party Congress!"

Throughout the day, Karl watched the clock. He had two appointments in the late afternoon, one with von Maurer, another a routine meeting with Schebeler.

The day before, von Maurer had met Blaerchen for the first time and the meeting had gone as Karl had hoped. Blaerchen was suspicious at first until von Maurer showed him money and hinted at having access to much more. Today von Maurer was to have met Blaerchen at noon at a little inn outside the city. That meeting was the key to Karl's entire scheme and if Blaerchen had used it to trap von Maurer, then the scheme collapsed and with it any hope that Carola would ever be free from Blaerchen.

Karl was meeting von Maurer in a little café off Mittelstrasse. He was there on time. He looked around the room. At a rear table a man sat, his head on his folded arms, as if he were sleeping. It was von Maurer.

He was not asleep but acted like a person dazed. "I was here ahead of time," he said absently.

"Did you see him?"

Von Maurer nodded but said nothing.

"What happened?"

"Everything happened as planned."

"Then, what—"

"It made me sick. It made me horrified. He took the money and he was eager for it. He gave me an envelope."

The contents were genuine. But the money—" There was something dreadful in the man's voice. "I don't think that any Nazi official, so placed, so trusted, would be so criminal! It was like a blow to the stomach."

Von Maurer would get over the action. It was understandable. The important thing was that the trap was sprung.

"I didn't feel nervous, I wasn't frightened. I half hoped police would be here. I didn't want to think we were in a trap. The pain in his voice was not phony. He looked like a sick man. In my pocket I have the envelope he gave me. I am going to keep it," von Maurer said firmly. "I may be less of a German than you, but I am still a good German. The must not fall into the hands of an enemy of Germany." Then, as if something condensed from long thought, he said, "I think I have a duty to feel that Blaerchen should be arrested at once."

"And have the police arrest you?"

"I know that," von Maurer said. "But it troubles me. Sometimes I should take this envelope to the police!"

"Promise me one thing since I'm concerned in it," Karl asked. "Before you decide to do anything, please let me know." Then Karl left him at the table, his mouth drawn tight, his face pale, a man ready to spring at something uncertain of his footing.

KARL hurried now. He was due at Sans Souci by six and he still had to meet Schebeler. For a moment he thought of the ever-present chance of detection and arrest; it would be incredibly bitter to be arrested on this night.

Schebeler met him eagerly, glad as usual for a chance to talk to someone. "Please sit down a little while." He began to make excuses but Schebeler insisted. "First of all, I have memories of conversations with the Italians. They will interest your friends!"

"They will be obliged to you."

Schebeler slipped an envelope under the table and Karl pocketed it.

Then Schebeler leaned halfway across the café table. "I have something to tell you! Blaerchen and Praus are friends!"

That was scarcely news. Yet Karl asked eagerly, "What changed that?" "No one knows! It was very sudden. Everyone in the Ministry speaks of it."

"I wish you had more definite information," Karl said casually. Then he excused himself and hurried away.

Now, a brief meeting with Ran-

ROBERT

the envelope and then to the puci!
was not at the station and Karl wait restlessly. He hoped that of all nights nothing unexpected happen but his restlessness in-
s. He pretended to read a news-but the lines of type jiggled his eyes.

sin Karl?"
turned and saw a stranger, a man, attractive, well-dressed. He friendly but Karl could take no es.
other guessed the dilemma. "My Kuhlmann," he said. "Don't be Herr Klauss sent me. Herr could not come and Doctor has disappeared."

had to chance trusting the man.
appeared?"

r Klauss is very worried," Kuhlnodded. "You haven't seen
?"

"If Ranke had been arrested
o one who had had any contact m was safe!
re sure he has not been arrested."
an said positively. "He left his Sunday morning, to meet with riends, workmen in a factory in
w. That factory was set on fire afternoon."

was sure that that was the fire seen. "Perhaps the Gestapo them!" And Ranke, by his im-ty, now threatened all the work lauss had done. And with that, who had had any contact with an assure you that the Gestapo ot got Ranke," Kuhlmann said

"But no one knows what will in the next few days."

There was no need for Kuhlmann to more specific. If Ranke was he might be forced to confess

A man tortured with the scien-tuelty that the Nazis had de-could not be blamed for any-he said.

you have anything to send to —" Kuhlmann began.

remembered the envelope. He trust Kuhlmann. He gave the pe to him.

r Klauss will keep you ind," Kuhlmann said. "Don't be d!"

USE black-out restrictions forced early closing, the opening was set eight o'clock. Carola was in her ing room before six, wishing that ould come. The last costume fitas over, the last rehearsal finished.

Fräulein ready to dress?" the maid t yet!" Carola was watching the Karl should have been here by whole plan hung on what Karl hear from von Maurer. If any-had gone wrong, then the en-ent with Praut was unavoidable.
thought made suspense the more and she began to pace up and en she heard a knock at the door ran to it. Then she stepped back.

was Praut, resplendently puffy reign Office uniform, ridiculously ous.

ust wanted to tell you how eagerly oking forward to tonight," he said.
oked her over from head to foot.
most eager. And you?"

am I!" she said, with a sorry at-at sounding sincere. She could am the door in his face until she ung her song. "Now, if you'll ex-
me—"

came back to her dressing table
wanted to cry.

en Karl came in. Carola rushed to and clung to him, her golden hair to his cheek.

"Is everything all right?" she whispered.

"Everything, sweetheart."

Praut was forgotten! Like a little child, reassured, she said, "Then I shall dress now." As if ashamed of her worry she protested, "Let me go! You're mussing my hair! You must go, Karl.
Let a lady have her dressing room."

He stepped into the confusion in the wings. There were flowers to attend to and messages. People who had been around the Krokodil and other cabarets in the old days came backstage with best wishes. They were pleasant but not too pleasant to Karl, lest any Gestapo observer should be watching to see who was too friendly to an ex-political prisoner.

FROM time to time Karl peered out from behind the curtain into the house. The decorators had done a good job. Mirrors around the walls picked up the gold of the lights so that the room seemed burnished. People were beginning to arrive, in uniform and party dress, strangely gala for a country at war. Now and then some high official whose face Karl had seen in the newspapers entered, followed by a group of friends, like a miniature monarch with a retinue of retainers. Each group tried to outstrut the others, like self-conscious exhibits at a poultry show. They had their women with them, for the most part attractive blondes, whose Paris gowns hinted at the strange contents of diplomatic pouches from France in the days before the war.

Once Wagner joined Karl as he was looking through the curtain. "A pretty crowd, nicht wahr?"

Karl agreed.

He came closer and whispered, "I wouldn't have let most of those men wash dishes in any cabaret of mine ten years ago! They would not have left even the washrags and the soap. Ah, well!" He smiled broadly, "It's a sensational opening! Sensational!"

A master of ceremonies, Hans Ritter, a man whom Karl did not know, came into the wings, straightening his tie, brushing the lapels of his coat. Karl could feel envious. Like Ritter, he had waited like this, and a thousand times, for the first music from the orchestra.

Karl turned to the curtain again.
There was no sign of Blaerchen or Praut, but one large table in the front row was still vacant.

The first act, a pair of comedians, was almost finished when Carola's maid called him to her dressing room. Carola had not wanted him to see her in her costume until it was completely ready.
She wore it now, her golden hair combed straight, lying flat on her head like a sheet of beaten metal. She had almost no make-up on; a usual make-up would have been superfluous. She wore a plain gray dress, simply cut, exactly like the dress she used to wear at the Krokodil.

"Like it?" Her face was shining.

It was hard to stop a throbbing throat, hard not to believe that in a moment he and she would not go out on the stage, hand in hand, as they had once done.
"You're beautiful!" Karl went up to her and kissed her.

"My hair!" She laughed.

"You look as if time had stood still."

That reminded her of something not pleasant. "Is Blaerchen here?"

"I haven't seen him come in yet. Sing your song and he will be too frightened to do anything to you."

"And to you, too?"

"And to me!" The thought of other dangers, from von Maurer and from Ranke, was vivid again but he could not speak of them now.

Then a callboy entered. "Five minutes, Fräulein Dirling!"

(To be continued next week)

YOU'LL HAVE more fun IN PENNSYLVANIA

Cool breezes sweep the mountain-top playlands of Pennsylvania, urging you to come where every vacation moment is a sheer delight. There's a thrill a minute waiting for you on rolling fairways and pine-rimmed lakes. Come feast your eyes on scenic splendor you'll never forget, let Pennsylvania's time-mellowed shrines become more than names in a history book. Summer 1940 is the time to enjoy all this. So pack your bags, come along. We've put out the welcome mat and everything is set for the best vacation ever!

FREE PICTORIAL MAP AND FOLDER HOSPITALITY PASSPORT

Send for this guide to Pennsylvania, illustrated in color. Out-of-state inquirers will also receive the Hospitality Passport. Address Pennsylvania Dept. of Commerce, Div. D-22, Harrisburg.

FIRST
SEE

TO SEE AMERICA FIRST....

Pennsylvania

THE NATION'S BIRTH-STATE

ARTHUR H. JAMES, Governor

RICHARD P. BROWN, Secretary of Commerce

DON'T LET THOSE FLEAS STAY ON YOUR DOG

—any longer than it takes you to get Pulvex Flea Powder from your dealer

Among those fleas now on your dog, some may be carriers of tapeworm larva or sarcoptic mange. For fleas, warns U. S. Dept. of Agriculture Circular No. 338, can transmit tapeworms or sarcoptic mange to dogs. Consequently, never allow your dog to remain infested with fleas or lice!

If your dog is scratching, assume he has fleas. Don't take chances! Stop his torments without delay. Protect him against the possibility of getting tapeworms or sarcoptic mange from fleas. Pulvex him at once!

Pulvex Flea Powder kills every flea with incredible speed. None ever revive to reinfest. Also destroys lice, ticks, sticktites. Kills fleas, too, when put on a single spot.

As Pulvex is borated, it helps allay itching from scratching. Even more important—

YOUR DOG WILL BE ABSOLUTELY PROTECTED AGAINST FLEA INFESTATIONS if you use Pulvex by the astounding "minute-a-week" control method described in folder on can. Is your dog scratching? Then act! Get a can of Pulvex Flea Powder at once! At drug, department and pet stores, 50c.

PULVEX FLEA POWDER

PULVEX FLEA SOAP oils and grooms the coat, deodorizes, cleans and destroys the fleas, only 25c!

ASK DEALER
TO SHOW YOU
THIS FOLDER

Clear, Soothe TIRED* EYES IN SECONDS!

Only TWO DROPS of this eye specialist's formula are needed to SOOTHE and REFRESH dull, tired eyes... Its special EXCLUSIVE ingredient quickly CLEARs eyes red and inflamed *(from late hours, fatigue, driving, overindulgence, etc.).

Thousands prefer stainless, sanitary, safe EYE-GENE, because it is quickly EFFECTIVE in making EYES FEEL GOOD. WASH your eyes with EYE-GENE today. On sale at drug, department and ten-cent stores.

USE EYE-GENE

How to Build Airpower

Continued from page 17

became the world's foremost airpower; then slid from leadership to last place.

England has a rich and skilled industrial background, the resources of the earth's greatest empire, and a three-century tradition of "ruling the waves"—which meant she ruled the sea channels of international trade in war and peace. You would have expected her to attempt to transfer her rule of the waves to rule of the air—the modern ocean of commerce and combat.

Germany was poor in all things compared with these three countries—the world's two most powerful and wealthy empires, the world's most powerful and rich single nation.

Germany did not become top airpower by spending most money. We spent hundreds of millions, too; so did France and England. You can't just buy airpower. It is a state of mind and method, as well as of possession. Difference between totalitarian and democratic administration is a glib but not a whole answer.

We're Building Against Germany

The answer to German air strength is, of course, composed of many things; some tangible, many intangible. There was the addiction, for example, of her leaders to youth. Germany's solicitude for the physical welfare of her youngsters, the manner in which she trained and indoctrinated them, were familiar over the years—even lamely imitated in England. Not so familiar is this significant comparison:

The average age of the highest generals in the German air force is forty-four. In the English army, sixty. In the French, nearly seventy. British and French generals are veterans of many far-flung and old-fashioned campaigns. Germany's are veterans of only the last war and this one—plus a little experimenting in Spain.

Such contrasts and studies in detail are endless. Our immediate aim in this piece, however, is to see how Germany's airpower exceeded that of nations with greater potentialities for it—and our chances of overtaking her. If you aspire to be the greatest airpower, you must boldly say we are building against Germany. Military power and foreign policies are always built "against" someone. Our modern Navy was originally built "against" the British, as the most elementary histories tell you—if England had a small navy, we should have had a small one, also. Our Monroe Doctrine was pronounced "against" France and the Quadruple Alliance of Russia, Prussia, Austria and England.

The inclination abroad has been to blame wholly Blum's nationalization of aircraft factories for France's loss of airpower leadership. On the other hand there was not much profit in aircraft production for France's great steel industrialists. There was huge profit in the fortification of the Maginot Line, and the ammunition for its heavy guns. The "Line" was consequently oversold to the French public, who relied on it as if they were approaching 1914 rather than 1939.

I saw more than one of the prewar French plants. So did many other Americans. It was agreed they were poorly conceived, wretchedly operated. There were dirt and bad lighting, inadequate rest and toilet facilities and general slovenliness. One thing struck every foreign visitor to prewar French aircraft shops—all employees smoked at their work and in every department and corner. There was neither discipline nor interest. Factory directors complained of lack of co-operation by private French business leaders.

From an industry capable of 1,000 planes a month years ago, France was down to a production of only 20 to 40 planes a week in the summer of 1939. Some of her planes had been sent into the bloody rehearsal in Spain in 1936. Their record was so bad against the Germans and Italians, and beside the American-inspired Russian models, that they were withdrawn for further study and for redesigning.

Officers of the French aircraft carrier Bearn, which came to Canada in June to pick up cargoes of United States planes, told the American pilots who "ferried" them over the border that in April and May of this year France's aviation industry produced exactly one airplane.

In many French aircraft factories, just before the war, completed planes were covered by paper and stored away for want of motors. The motor plants were not nationalized. Their owners had a profitable export business, and they took care of that before they would supply France's own nationalized aircraft makers.

England's prewar aviation industry had better morale, organization and factory management. It was at the other extreme from nationalization. But visiting experts frequently warned that it was inefficient and costly by either German or American standards, and that it suffered from the stuffy old English sin of underestimating foreign products and exaggerating the merits of its own. Pan American's transatlantic service was delayed at least five years because the English, unable to produce a plane capable of ocean schedules, would not grant the United States necessary landing rights. Frequently, in press and interviews, English leaders belittled American planes, scoffed at the idea that England would need them.

The First Grand Strategy

Main criticism of English planes by American experts was that they were "too sturdy," had too much "British solidness"—like English boots and marmalade—and were built in the "by hand" tradition of the famous old English coachmakers instead of by up-to-date machine practices. What this boiled down to was a fear they were too expensive, complicated and necessarily too slow in manufacturing processes for an industry that might suddenly have to be geared up to wartime quantities. It was estimated that tooling under English methods cost for each type of plane ten or more times as much as in the United States—for the Wellington bomber, for example, several millions were spent in tooling up for an order of 1,000. Less than a year before the outbreak of war, four of these planes—England's best bomber—had been finished. England's finest pursuit, the Supermarine "Spitfire," had great difficulty getting into production because it is an assembly job and various parts made by subcontractors failed to fit. In the autumn of Munich only seven Spitfires had been made, of an order of 1,000.

Germany, by then, had reached a production rate of 2,000 planes a month.

Co-operation between the French and British air forces and other military leaders was bad until the fright of Munich. Then a so-called "Grand Strategy" was decided upon, with belated recognition of airpower. The Germans were to be

"WINE COOLER" IS SMART NEW SUMMER DRINK

HANDS NEVER held a prettier quencher than this tall, refreshing "cooler" made with wine. When you take your first sip...um-m! Wine coolers are doubly delightful because they're so easy to make. Mix a pitcherful next time you entertain friends in—and listen to the cheers!

OTHER "COOLER" RECIPES FREE

at the store where you buy the wines of California. California wines are grown to strict standards of quality. True to type. Well developed. Inexpensive. Wine Advisory Board, 85 Second Street, San Francisco

HAY FEVER MINIATURE RESPIRATOR

New DUPOR No. 1 keeps irritating POLLENS, and NUISANCE DUSTS out of nose. Convenient — does not interfere with eating, sleeping, smoking, talking — all you need do is breathe through nose as nature intended. Wear while sweeping, dusting, cleaning. Farmers use for grain dusts; industries use for nuisance dusts, lint, etc. Weight 1 ounce. Literature FREE. H. S. COVER Dept. C. South Bend, Ind. PIONEER RESPIRATOR DESIGNER SINCE 1894

JERIS ANTISEPTIC HAIR TONIC

Your hair needs and deserves Jeris "common-sense treatment." Use Jeris Antiseptic Hair Tonic to pep up scalp circulation, remove every trace of loose, slightly dandruff. Use Jeris, the dependable hair tonic to keep your hair always immaculately groomed.

AT DRUG STORES AND BARBER SHOPS

nd off by the Maginot Line for three years and meanwhile blockaded by the English fleet. Terrific drive was to be employed to prepare a "knockout" blow at the end of that time by air. The air sm was to be mostly a British enterprise, with whatever help France could summon by the purchase of American planes. England recognized the vulnerability of her centralized aviation facilities and training facilities, within range of German bombers. So Canada is selected to be the Empire Air Training Center.

In each of the three years 20,000 pilots and enough over to allow for casualties were to be trained until the 100,000 deemed essential for the terrible knockout were ready. Planes and engines were to be manufactured in Canada, as well. With the constant menace of German bombers near by, foreign military experts figured England would devote every factory hour at home to the manufacture of defensive pursuits, while trainers were bought in Canada's next-door neighbor, the world's potentially greatest reservoir of aviation manufacture, the United States. But England decided to kill two birds with one slug. The transports, running westward empty to get Canadian soldiers, could be loaded with English-made training planes, and a few dollars would be saved on each plane over American costs. Precious home factory space, therefore, was turned away from bombers and pursuits to little trainers.

But the Factories Lay Idle

With the rout in Flanders came a change in the "Grand Strategy." Two ships loaded with trainers were actually lited in midatlantic and ordered back to England. Now, the London authorities informed Canada, the plan was to hold Germany on the Somme-Aisne for two years, and consequently the training program must be speeded up to deliver the "knockout" then.

The London Air Ministry asked Canada to prepare to build factories—for which plans were supplied—to build Rolls-Royce aviation engines. Canada did so with enthusiasm, dispatch and efficiency; notified London it was ready for the patents so that it could tool up when these were not forthcoming, and the factories lay idle, Canadian officials repeatedly phoned London and finally got a commission there. Air Ministry people were sorry: Rolls-Royce aircraft motors were made by a private firm, and its board of directors were unwilling to lease its aircraft patents for overseas manufacture! It was June of this year—after the Battle of France had begun—before Rolls-Royce, under government compulsion, released its patents simultaneously for the United States and Canada.

The half a dozen small airplane manufacturing companies in Canada were told by the Air Ministry, before the war, they would be expected to make English planes, for which plans would be supplied. They eagerly and quickly prepared. Each was a complete plant. After a long wait, each was told it would be leased only certain parts to manufacture and these would be shipped to England for assembly. The powerful British Society of Aircraft Constructors had decided it would be unwise to let any one Canadian manufacturer have the whole plan of any English plane, for it might make use of that to go on as a competitor in world markets after the war!

Last year's appropriations for the United States covered an air corps of 5,500 planes. All have been contracted for and will be delivered within the set time limit, June 30, 1941. Although some experts believe these figures are oversanguine, it is hoped and planned by the Knudsen Board that the United States aviation industry will produce 40,000 military planes in the next two years, of which 25,000 will be for us. It is also hoped that our production thereafter will be 40,000 a year. The factory investment for such plane output, not including motors, will be at least half a billion dollars, and it will cost you between three and four billion dollars every year to maintain a production rate of 40,000 or 50,000 military airplanes.

American military observers here and abroad reached the point of hair-tearing when the $4,000,000,000 "second navy" was appropriated, in the light of Europe's war. The British navy, the world's largest, had not thwarted German operations or strategy in a single particular. The withdrawal from Dunkerque was made possible by the Royal Air Force, and a pooling of French and English fast, small naval vessels—destroyers, light cruisers, speedboats. Not a single capital ship participated. If the combined navies were not able to prevent the transportation of an initial German force of 65,000 men across the open Skaggerak to Norway, and of several German divisions down the Netherland coast to the Hague and other ports, how could a United States fleet, however large, prevent landings on the open thousands of miles of South American coasts—which is the avowed purpose of the increased navy? German staff officers told me: "Air and mechanized forces represent land power, hundreds of small, fast surface vessels of various types represent sea power in the 20th century. The 'Big Navy' is a 19th century project: but it is 'big business,' and will die hard. Dreadnoughts, or capital ships, are as extinct as dinosaurs."

Hitler's known private contempt for sea power was expressed in the French armistice terms, when he merely asked demilitarization of the French navy, indicating no plan for its use.

Lastly, if French and English experience suggests pitfalls, there are lessons in a comparison of the German and the United States aviation industries.

Just before the fall of Paris, French air officers reported that the paint was still wet on the door hinge of one of the Heinkel bombers they shot down. They said this indicated hasty, careless production; ships hurried from factory to firing line. Perhaps it did, although this solitary instance might have been a repair job. Also, every flier knows that metal paint within secluded nooks of planes—control stick root, door hinges—where the wind rush in flight does not reach—may stay wet for several days or a week. The most important point of this incident was overlooked. Yet it is the key to the whole German air policy. German officers spoke frankly of it to me in Berlin:

Stripped for Action

"Airplanes for war use cannot be judged like airplanes for commercial use. Quantity is more important than all-around quality, so long as your fire power, or armament, is equal. Warplanes are expendable just as shells, torpedoes and cannon are expendable. There must be basic quality and design to begin with. But then we strip our warplane down until there is barely enough of it to carry guns, fuel, motor and pilot—and to hell with the golf-stick compartments and steam heat and cockpit full of fine and fancy instruments that your Air Corps specifications demand from your manufacturer. We give our squadron leader's ship a pretty good set of instruments, but the rest of the planes are up there to follow him and only need a few basic instruments. The gallant lone aces of the last war have no part in this one. An air squadron is a team, exactly as a machine-gun squadron on

DANGER AHEAD

... when "oily film" clouds your windshield!

Take No Chances! Your eyes can see only as far as your windshield will let them. It's asking for trouble when "oily film" fogs the glass. To keep windshields clean and safe, use Bon Ami Cake regularly. It cleans glass quickly and easily. Leaves it polished crystal-clear and free from dangerous dust-catching film.

Bug Spots are Dangerous, too! This is the time of year squashed bugs mess up your windshield. Leave stains that are hard to get off the glass. With Bon Ami Cake, you can get rid of stubborn bug-spots in a jiffy... along with the rest of the dust and dirt. Insist on your service man using Bon Ami on your windshield.

The quick, safe cleanser for windshields

BON AMI CAKE

Keep a Cake and cloth in the pocket of your car.

EXTRA MONEY! in Spare Time!

Show largest assortment low priced Personal Christmas Cards on market. 5 series, 52 designs. Also 9 exclusive box assortments including $1 GIFT BOX 21 Artist Award Christmas Folders. Costs you 50c. Season's most sensational seller. Big selection De Luxe Personal Cards. Tell us which lines interest you. Samples on approval. Write today.

JANES ART STUDIOS, Inc.
424 Anson Place Rochester, New York

SELL
PERSONAL CHRISTMAS CARDS
LOW 50¢ for $1
100 Designs including
De Luxe Line

CALLOUSES BURNING or TENDERNESS on BOTTOM of your FEET

NEW INVENTION QUICKER RELIEF!
Away goes pain and off come those callouses, ever so quick with the New Super-Soft Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads! Soothe, cushion, protect the sensitive area. New in design, shape and texture. 630% softer than before! Patented thin Scalloped Edge, heart shape. Easily applied in an instant. Don't come off in bath or stick to stocking. Separate Medications included for quickly removing callouses. Cost but a trifle—greater value than ever. At Drug, Shoe, Dept. Stores and Toilet Goods Counters. Insist on Dr. Scholl's.

NEW Super-Soft
Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads

GET This Useful Travel Clock!

An attractive travel clock with tan ostrich-grain genuine leather slide-fastened case. 30 hour movement. Size 4 1/2" x 4" when closed. Ideal for travel, home and office use.

EARN yours by selling only two 1-year COLLIER'S subscriptions at $2.00 each to persons living outside your home. Offer good in U.S.A. only. Simply pin subscribers' names and addresses to this ad with check or money order for $4.00.

Independent Agency Division, Desk C-33
The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company
Springfield, Ohio

MASS DESTRUCTION of INSECTS

at  $\frac{1}{3}$
the Cost

OF OLD METHODS

TANGLEFOOT DIFUSOR

WORLD'S GREATEST INSECT DESTROYER—does away with all the fuss and muss of conventional methods. Entirely automatic. Made and guaranteed by world's leading manufacturer of quality insecticides.

GETS THEM ALL—DIFUSOR vapor penetrates inaccessible hideouts. Gets roaches, bedbugs, moths and other pests not controllable with ordinary methods, as well as flies, mosquitoes, ants, spiders, etc. Real mass destruction. A boon to stores, apartments, institutions, as well as homes.

SANITARY, ECONOMICAL—no escape for bugs, but entirely harmless to human or animal life. Does not taint even the most delicate foods. Much more economical... a little goes a long way.

50,000 SATISFIED USERS—including prominent hospitals, hotels, industrial plants, creameries, bakeries, as well as stores and homes use and endorse DIFUSOR.

For full information USE THE COUPON.

TANGLEFOOT WORLD'S BEST INSECTICIDES

THE TANGLEFOOT CO. • GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
Without cost or obligation, send me information regarding DIFUSOR.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____

LAW STUDY AT HOME

Win greater respect and success. Learn more, earn more. We guide you step by step—furnish all text material, including fourteen-volume Law Library. Degree of LL. B. conferred. Low cost, easy terms. Get our valuable 48-page "Law Training for Leadership" and "Evidence" books free. Send for them NOW.

LaSalle Extension University, Dept. 840-L, Chicago
A Correspondence Institution

STOP Scratching Itch Fast
-or Money Back

For quick relief from itching of eczema, pimples, athlete's foot, scales, scabies, rashes and other externally caused skin troubles, use world-famous, cooling, antiseptic, liquid D. D. D. Prescription. Greaseless, stainless. Soothes irritation and quickly stops intense itching. 35c trial bottle proves it, or money back. Ask your druggist today for D. D. D. PRESCRIPTION.

A NEW WAY TO SHAVE

Barbers find it marvelous for softening beard—for soothing skin

• If you have a tough beard or sensitive skin, try the new shaving trick used by more and more barbers in better shops! They know the way to soften beards and protect tender skin! Just apply a little Medicated Noxzema before lathering—or use Noxzema alone as a latherless shave. Notice the amazing difference. No razor pull! No smarting irritation! And how cool and comfortable your skin feels. At all Drug Stores.

NOXZEMA
BALTIMORE, MD.

By the makers of TANGLEFOOT

- Fly Paper
- Fly Ribbon
- Fly Spray
- Mosquito Repellent
- Tree Tanglefoot
- Stock Spray
- Roach Powder
- Ant Powder
- Gummed Tape

the ground is. It is mass principle on a little scale. Its value is in co-ordination as a unit. Airplanes are extensions of torpedo ranges, of machine-gun and cannon muzzles. So we build our planes adequate for the job demanded of them—to go out and kill and destroy—and nothing more. We figure on heavy expenditure of planes, and our industry is geared up with that in mind. Our war-planes are built to last five hours or five days—not five years, like yours. And if we win the war there will be no point in our enemy's saying, 'Oh, our planes are better built than yours. They last longer!'

In the United States, plane makers have complained that even after they had won competitive bids they could not get under way because the Army kept changing plans and specifications in a constant search for perfection. There seemed to be nobody in authority who would take the responsibility of freezing the design and saying "Go to it!"

In Germany, the system is as follows: Two or more private firms bid on Air Ministry specifications. A responsible officer says "this one" or "that one" is best. An order for 400 is immediately given, to be run off without change. Also, the winner is compelled to release his design on a royalty basis to his unsuccessful competitors, each of whom is given a large order. Thus, the talents, factories, workmen and production skill of all bidders is swiftly turned loose to build each winning design, while the extra money accruing to the model's originator encourages an incentive.

In peacetime there were no changes until at least 400 of each new model had been turned out. Now, in wartime, the first run-off is much larger—about 1,000 each. Then an improved design may be ordered. If the responsible officer doesn't know his job and a type proves bad in practice—he's out of luck.

In the United States, if you want to see a man about an airplane you don't know whether to go to the War Department, Navy Department, Air Corps, Commerce, Treasury, National Advisory Committee, Post Office, Interstate Commerce Commission, and now also the National Defense Council—or your congressman. You probably end by going to all. When the aviation industry leaders hastened to Washington for the emergency confab about Roosevelt's 50,000-plane demand they were shunted from one office to another—and ended by having their group picture taken.

No Place to Land

In Germany, there is no such dispersion of authority. The air force is separate and distinct, like the Army or the Navy. You go to one place on your aviation business, and one place only—the huge Reichsluftministerium on Leipziger Strasse, and you will be quickly taken to a man who knows what he is talking about, and can say yes or no at once.

In the United States we haven't a single national highway that has been designed for emergency plane use. We haven't a national policy of airport construction co-ordinated with military defense or preparedness. WPA airport-project millions have been spent without plan, and, with a few notable exceptions, frittered away on landing fields dictated by political soaping rather than defense necessities. Our largest commercial ships and "Flying Fortresses" have virtually "No Place to Land," in formation away from the established military bases, as you were told in Collier's two years ago. Less than one tenth of all our airports are suitable for military use. Because of lack of Administration control and forethought, lack of a national program, we haven't airports on which to base 50,000 airplanes—if we had 50,000 planes.

In Germany, the whole national program of airport construction and planning has been under the proper authority of the Reich Air Ministry, and proceeded hand in glove with air force buildup. There are hundreds of fields from which all types of German planes can operate. Many key fields have underground hangars and underground repair shops. We haven't an underground hangar or shop in the United States, no system of protected storage for our planes, even at those military fields within bomber range of oceans or frontiers. The great system of German national highways—Reichsautobahnen—was conceived as part of the air program. Wherever possible the roads course in the direction of the prevailing winds. They are each from 4 to 10 lanes wide, free of poles, signboards, and other obstructions, beautified only by low shrubs, and bypassing towns and cities. These great highways are laid down across the face of Germany like a handy grille: east to west, north to south. They are constantly used by the air force. Near Frankfurt I saw a pursuit squadron practicing landings and take-offs on one half of a highway, with mobile surface repair and refueling units co-operating, while the other half of the road was kept open to normal traffic. Moreover, more than two years ago Germany had perfected a catapult for launching heavy land planes. Within a distance of 300 feet, and a time of 5 seconds, bombers two thirds as big as our "Flying Fortresses" can take off on this catapult.

In the United States—as in England—all our airplane and engine factories have been grouped and built without an eye for their possible vulnerability to modern warfare. We have relied on old-fashioned and palpably outmoded factors to keep them safe—distance, land and sea defenses. The shops invariably are in one piece; under one roof. Engines in Hartford, Connecticut, and Paterson, New Jersey; sixty per cent of American planes made in the Los Angeles district. Large, easy, juicy targets, with not a single air-raid shelter in the lot, nor a thought for raid organization. One bomber, sneaking in from a ship cruising offshore, with a single load, could disrupt an entire assembly system. He would not have to "destroy" the factory.

German air-industry factories, which I have seen, were conceived, designed, and constructed against air raids. They are placed away from rivers or rail lines or other "leads" that raiders might follow. They are camouflaged by paint and other means to blend into their surroundings. The buildings are invariably one low story, set among trees, with tanks or roofs showing above the trees. Chimneys line up with tree trunks and contain smoke-dispersal gadgets. Special paint kills reflecting surfaces on windows and walls. Nothing shows open spaces. Large factories are scattered through several square miles of forest. No single building is very large and no building is closer than one of a mile to any other building. Each factory is really like a scattered collection of individual plants, or sub-factories. Air raiders without pre-information from their spies would have a most difficult time finding a German aviation factory by day, an impossible feat at night. Even knowing the general vicinity, raiders would scarcely put up an action more than a fraction of a plant because of the way the work is scattered. All German aircraft plants are in the country, away from cities, from obvious landmarks or military objectives. Average German experience has been factories in full production swing half a year or less after ground is broken.

How the Germans Do It

Finally, each aviation plant is abundantly provided with air-raid shelter of the most modern conception: a hospital, kitchen, recreation, food storage, radio and telephone communications, sanitary and gasproof facilities underground. Air-raid drills are a part of the daily routine of each shift, remind you of the fire drills we had in school kids. Complete raid damage repair facilities and materials are stockpiled in readiness. Several American airports have said the welfare facilities the best German plants, such as Heinkel at Oranienburg, compare with the best American country clubs, and represent an outlay of at least one million dollars by American standards.

Every German plant is required to maintain an apprentice school, where boys from 14 to 16 are trained in a four-year course which pays them and graduates them into full journeymanship at the plant. Middle-aged women are extensively trained, and are extensively used on specific light jobs, such as painting.

In the United States we have the best if limited, single research body in the aviation world; The National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, under a distinguished board of experts and headed by George W. Lewis. For years this invaganization was a government d, housed by indulgence. Now has been given for its expansion:

up two additional laboratories.
universities have research activistably Massachusetts Tech and ia Tech. Others, like the Uni-of Washington with its wind tuninvestigate on a smaller scale. The nt air lines conduct research of n, but the exchange of informaong all these diverse bodies has phazard.

Germany, research has been one major activities of the Air
y, which has given money, scien-d acreage to it without stint.
y has at least 7 great research each more extensive than our laboratory, each concentratursuit of only one field of study.
country all fields have been the responsibility of one group, the s in one of her research laboraat Germany developed her fa-system of dive bombing beyond g known in other countries. In e of bombing you don't need a ht. The whole plane is pointed arget, like a finger, or a pistol.

mb is released vertically, and a the same path as the flight of
e. The danger is that it might plane. If the plane pulls up at ant the bomb is released, it will but accuracy is sacrificed for

The Germans know how to stay with the bomb, by flaps and slow
The bomb, in fact, actually gets f the plane. Greater accuracy is d this way. The nearest equivahe "follow through" of your golf

United States, law until reeld profits of the aviation indus-military orders to 12 per cent
By the time the companies paying local, state, and federal ey could realize little better than cent, they contend, offering no nent to investors. On the Saturght Congress adjourned tem-y so that its Republican members go to the convention in Philaa bill limiting the profit to 8 per oss was passed—amid carnival
f old songs, rebel yells, and desk-that did not promote thought-However, it is planned in the ision measure to reconsider this once again.

Work's the "Secret Weapon"

Germany all privately owned com-engaged in building warplanes ctors are permitted a profit of 12 nt. In addition to these are the es granted for the origination of
s. Six per cent, maximum, can be o stockholders of the invested Any clear profits above six per must be invested in government
The government, by guarantee-fitably large orders, or by extenddit, virtually subsidizes essential expansions.

in the Germans first air-raided Flow and drove the British Grand Sea fleet therefrom to shelterage west coast of North Ireland, out nber range, Royal Air pursuits on the field at Kirkwall, motors pilots eager, guns ready. But angry Britishers never took off.
Flow is a naval base, under Ad-y jurisdiction. The local British official was not empowered to permission to British non-navy to take off to fight for the com-ritish cause. By the time he teled to the proper authority on the and, and red tape was cut, the ans were back in Hamburg!

s fantastic situation would be ated here, with some modifications due to bold young American impatience with red tape. Army Air Corps planes would not be permitted to search or chase enemy ships at sea, without Navy permission: or to repel attacks on, say, Charlestown Navy Yard—these being matters of department jurisdiction, over which there are great rivalry and jealousy.

Those of us who have seen the German navy, army, and air force know that whatever else he may divulge Chancellor Hitler's real "secret weapon" is teamwork; attained to a degree never before seen in military operations.

It permeates the entire organization,
from general staff to lowliest squad: it ties the fighting men to home industrial background, civilians, farmers and spies.
Military observers say the idea of "fifth column" is grossly exaggerated, and really serves as an alibi for the defeated. The truth is that espionage is on a not much larger scale than in the last war, but is superbly integrated with the whole teamwork and on a basis of split-second timing. Thus, Lieutenant Prien's submarine which slipped into Scapa Flow on signal from shore at the exact moment to pass the nets and sink the Royal Oak and damage the Repulse.

Perfect Timing Wins

The capture of Fort Eben Emael in Belgium's strongest fortified line in the first days of the war in the West is an illustration. This was one of those Maginot-type strongholds: not a head showing above ground. Yet it fell apparently without loss or struggle; immediately stories circulated of "secret weapons"—of liquid fire that ate cement and steel, of nerve gas; a dozen guesses.
This is what happened:

Spies gave the Reich air force such precise information of the layout of Fort Eben Emael that the location of the windows to the power plant was known.
A slow-flying dive bomber, flaps all the way down to brake it, swept low across the fort and explosives were tossed through the powerhouse windows. This plunged the fort into darkness underground, destroyed electrical controls and signals. Parachute troops landed the next minute, and when the dazed Belgians came tumbling up—it was right into the hands of grinning Germans.

This timing between spies on the other side of the line, and attackers, is exceeded in the technical military sense of difficulty only by the timing between German air and ground forces. Remember that one moves at speeds of 250 to 300 miles an hour and upward;
the other, when mechanized, at 40 miles per hour. Lost contact or clumsy timing would result in disastrous confusion.

In Hawaii when the air corps held maneuvers and ordered a general blackout every light in Honolulu and on Oahu Island was out—except those in the Navy Base at Pearl Harbor. The Navy wasn't playing.

All this should at least give you an idea what we are up against if we compete for first place in world airpower.
It's a job our aviation leaders say we have the resources, workmen, and brains to accomplish—just as we matched, in a past day that now seems fearfully remote, the seapower of England.

There is a last thought. Germans say that war airpower can be translated into peace airpower. Air industry that is geared up to carry troops and explosives in overwhelming numbers can bear salesmen and goods, the soldiers and ammunition of trade, as handily.

Perhaps the greatest challenge to American aviation and its potential strength is the plain sign that the military air war in Europe is going to become very soon commercial air war all over the world.

Expected guests are doubly welcome —TELEPHONE FIRST!

WHEN you're vacationing in the car, it's always a temptation to drop in and surprise old friends along the way.

But don't make it too great a surprise. Telephone ahead to let them know you're coming. Your welcome will be warmer because you're expected. You'll enjoy the visit more.

And remember, there are many other ways in which Long Distance telephone service can contribute pleasure and peace-of-mind to your vacation.

The Bell System cordially invites you to visit its exhibits at the New York World's Fair and the Golden Gate International Exposition, San Francisco.

"Our Daily Bread"

THREE men, so ran a letter sent to the New York Times, were gathered at a bar one evening. Two of them had bought drinks all around. The third insisted that it was his turn now, though none of the three wanted a third drink. Whereupon the bartender suggested: "If you really don't want the drinks, why not give them to the Red Cross?"

That gave these men an idea. The idea was that each of them, every day, would deny himself something that he really didn't need, and that would have cost a quarter, and would put that quarter aside for the Red Cross' foreign-relief work. Or if he didn't deny himself something, he'd put aside two bits anyway. Once a month the three of them would send the pot to the Red Cross.

This original "Daily Bread" club expanded to 34 members within three days—meaning that if all 34 should live up to their pledges they would send the Red Cross more than $3,000 in a year.

The reason the original three named it the "Daily Bread" club is that more and more people in Europe for a long time to come are going to be short on their daily bread. Regular, persistent help from somewhere is going to be needed if a lot of them aren't to be mowed down by hunger. The only big source of help is the United States.

We hope the movement spreads far and wide, whether based on a quarter in every club, or on a dime, or on a cent. It looks like a sound scheme for putting United States giving to war victims on the steady, day-in-day-out basis for which this ghastly emergency calls.

Soldiers of Misfortune

TWO of my ancestors were in General Washington's army. Now I come to Canada to fight for democracy, and I wind up a guy without a country, without a job and without a dime! Gosh!

Gosh, we'd say, is putting it very charitably, considering the story behind the above remark.

The remark was made recently by a man named Philip Stegerer, 26, who left the United States and joined Canada's air force last February, when British law required all foreign volunteers to take the oath of allegiance to the British crown. U. S. law, vintage of 1907, provides:

Any American citizen shall be deemed to have expatriated himself . . . when he has taken the oath of allegiance to any foreign state.

So when some old injuries pushed Stegerer out of Canada's air force with an honorable discharge and he tried to return to the United States, he was stopped by immigration officials. They told him he would have to go through the same naturalization rigmarole to recover United States citizenship as if he had been born in Russia, England or Slobodka.

This law was passed, if memory serves, as a patriotic rebuke to wealthy Americans who left the United States claiming that gentlemen couldn't live in it, and to American heiresses buying themselves husbands possessing foreign titles.

It couldn't have been intended as a slap at soldiers of fortune. If it was so intended, Congress also rebuked the memories of Lafayette, Kosciusko, DeKalb, von Steuben, and others of this gallant stripe.

In the World War, of course, thousands of American soldiers of fortune simply shifted over to our Army when we went in. There appears to be little chance of such a solution for our soldiers of fortune in this war. On their behalf, Congress ought to act, and act quickly.

Good Luck, General

WE'RE too humane to mention the names of various New Dealers who are looking a bit shopworn after seven years in the public eye.

We merely want to say that such is not the case with James A. Farley, as he leaves the Administration high command to build himself and family a nest egg as head of the New York Yanks.

Farley started his New Deal career with about every conceivable strike against him. He had a Tammany and New York Boxing Commission background. He was promptly labeled the practical politician who did the dirty work while the big boss uttered the pious sentiments. He was given the job of Postmaster General, notoriously the big patronage-dispensing job in the Cabinet. And—a totally undeserved misfortune — Mr. Farley almost never takes a good picture.

General Jim has cleared all these hurdles as he came to them.

He ran the Post Office Department well. He never tried to grab the limelight from the big boss. He would have liked to be President, but he never let that ambition deflect him from what he considers his duty. You can't help admiring him.

Defense and the WPA

PENNSYLVANIA'S opening its 164-mile "Highway of Tomorrow," from Pittsburgh to Harrisburg (or from Irwin to Pottsville, if you prefer) over an old road right of way of Commodore Vanderbilt, gives the nation cause than ever to congratulate on its magnificent highway system. Road improvement in the automobile's first 40 years has been an incredible.

We haven't finished the job, though, by a long shot. Especially we aren't out of the woods if the highway system is to be hooked to our national-defense system. It is coming to be realized that many of our paved, hard-surfaced or comfortably passable roads have many kinks in them.

These curves would seriously up a delegation of, say, ten paratrooper divisions speeding toward one of our coasts to give the would-be invader the welcome he deserved. A mechanized, or paratrooper division is a huge military unit, great numbers of weapons on wheels plus numerous conveyances for food and supplies.

How about putting as many WPAers as possible to work on the job of straightening out the crippling of those kinks?

Robert Moses, noted park commissioner and bridge and highway builder of New York City, suggests that this country needs to do some heavy imitating of the German military roads (autobahnen). Main features of these roads are long, straight curves plotted by railroad-building engineers, correct banking, no grade crossings, inlets and outlets as smooth as can be in an uncertain world. Move that the WPA get busy.

August 24, 1940

5¢ A COPY

Collier's

THE NATIONAL

What Good is West Point?

By Henry F.
Pringle

PUB LIBR
BURLINGAME
CALIF 21040X
132

TO NEW MEMBERS OF THE LITERARY GUILD

Free

..the magnificent new

historical novel of and for our generation

A 732-page masterpiece
the whole civilized world will be reading—talking about—arguing about!

Great historical novel of the hour—an irresistibly dramatic story of the war years and later—the period that treated the beginning of the world conflagration. Upton Sinclair's "World's End" is one of the most exciting novels the Guild has ever offered—a story of the life and experiences you will never forget. But it is more than that. It is a picture of our world—yesterday, today and tomorrow; a gripping record of the most critical period in the history of civilization.

It shows the rise of Mussolini, and of Hitler, and of the author. "Then I saw Munich and said to myself 'This is the end; the end of our world.' Will it be World's End by fire and sword which the prophet predicted more than twenty-five centuries ago?"

Out of this came the conception of this epochal novel.

Besides a whole gallery of unforgettable new characters of fiction, you will meet in World's End such real people as Woodrow Wilson, Clemenceau, T. E. Lawrence, William Bullitt, Anatole France, Bernard Shaw, and many others. So powerful is the story that real history here is as absorbing and dramatic as the lives of the fictional characters. Suspense and interest mount in intensity to the very last of its 732 pages. To read World's End is to see our world of today in a clearer light. Sooner or later everybody you know will be talking about this book. Here's a wonderful opportunity to get it free, together with free membership in the Literary Guild of America. Read the full details of this attractive offer below.

Why the Guild Offers You This $3.00 Book FREE

Principal reason is to encourage immediate acceptance of our offer of free membership in the Guild so that we can distribute the extraordinary book values which you get as a member. When you realize that you will have the privilege of getting many important new $2.50 to $5.00 books, fiction-non-fiction whenever you want them, for only $2.00—that you are practically joining the Guild at once.

You Save Up to 50%

Literary Guild selects each month an outstanding book from the forthcoming titles of the leading publishers. Through the publishers' edition, you can buy for from $2.50 to $5.00 what you would have bought individually at $2.50 to $5.00. Guild members pay only $2.00 for these same books, in the Guild editions. Guild books are delivered to members on approval, the same as the publishers' edition is on sale.

Magazine "Wings" Free

Old members receive free monthly Guild magazine WINGS, which contains articles on the current selection and its author, and includes a special contribution by the author. It is profusely illustrated. WINGS is also an invaluable guide to all important current reading. For each month it reviews about 30 new books, any of which may be purchased through the Guild at the established retail price.

WINGS also contains an advance description of the book to be selected the following month. If you do not want that book, merely notify the Guild not to send it when the time comes. On the other hand, if the selection sounds interesting, you may have it sent for your approval. Guild members are not required to purchase a book every month. As few as four selections within one year keeps your membership in force.

Other Advantages of Membership

Members who purchase four Guild selections within the six-month period between January and June, or July and December, are rewarded with a free Bonus Book worth $3.00 or more. Full details of this popular plan will be sent you upon enrollment, also details of the new $10,000 prize contest for Guild members. The Guild Service starts as soon as you mail the coupon. A copy of "WORLD'S END" will be sent to you immediately. Send no money—just the coupon. But you are urged to act at once—this offer will soon have to be withdrawn!

$10,000.00 CASH PRIZES FOR GUILD MEMBERS ONLY

USE YOUR FREE COPY OF "WORLD'S END" to write a slogan and win $5,000.00, $1,500.00, $1,000.00 or one of 100 $25.00 prizes. Rules are easy and simple. Entry blank and details of this contest sent you immediately upon enrollment.

JOIN NOW—CONTEST CLOSES SOON

LITERARY GUILD OF AMERICA, 9 Rockefeller Plaza, New York, N. Y.

The Crowning Achievement of
"the American ZOLA"

Upton Sinclair is one of the most influential writers in the history of American literature. He is one of the best read American authors in Europe. His previous fiction successes, among them The Jungle, Oil!, Boston, have earned for him the title of "the American Zola." World's End is conceded by critics to be the best book Sinclair has ever written.

MAIL THIS COUPON TODAY
FREE: "WORLD'S END"

Literary Guild of America, Dept. 8 C.W.
9 Rockefeller Plaza, New York, N. Y.

Please enroll me as a member of the Literary Guild and send me a free copy of "WORLD'S END." I am also to receive free each month the Guild magazine "WINGS" and all other membership privileges. It is understood that I will purchase a minimum of four selections of my choice at only $2.00 each (regardless of higher retail prices) within a year, and that I may purchase, if I wish, any other books in print at the established retail prices.

This enrollment entitles me to participate in the $10,000.00 Slogan Contest, AT NO COST TO ME.

Name .....

Address .....

City..... State.....

Occupation.....

For plan serving Canadian members, write to Literary Guild, 388 Yonge Street, Toronto, Ont.

Survival of the Fittest...

PROVED BY 2,400,000,000,000 MILES OF SERVICE

JUST thirty-two years ago this familiar diamond block tread was developed by Goodyear to provide maximum grip and traction under all road conditions. Appropriately, it was named the All-Weather tread.

Since then literally thousands of now forgotten "revolutionary tread improvements" have been tried by the public and found wanting.

Yet today—after more than three decades marked by spectacular advances in all other phases of tire design—the All-Weather tread survives basically unchanged.

With every advance in cars and roads it has proved the superiority of its non-skid protection—and steadily increased its leadership as the world's most popular tread.

This is the time-proved tread you get on the far-famed Goodyear "G-3" All-Weather — the standard first-line tire of the world by virtue of years of sales leadership.

Standout as the "G-3" is, in mileage and safety, it will give you even longer service if bought now. For it is a well-proved fact that tires broken in during fall when roads are cooler average up to 20% greater mileage.

So if you want sure safety for your Labor Day trip—if you want road-gripping traction during the slippery months ahead—if you want a big dividend in plus mileage—get "G-3" All-Weathers now while present low prices still prevail.

One look will convince you that the "G-3" All-Weather is the greatest tire value ever offered for so little money—
■ tire backed up by a twenty-four-hundred-billion-mile performance record that proves this truth: Goodyear tires are as good as you think, and cost far less than you imagine!

All-Weather—T. M. The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company

THE GREATEST NAME

IN RUBBER

GOODYEAR

'Vaseline' Hair Tonic is the official hair preparation of both World's Fair Aquacades. As a check on "Dry Scalp," it is used before every performance by the male ensemble.

Professional advice on keeping your hair GOOD-LOOKING

Read how the stars of Billy Rose's WORLD'S FAIR AQUACADES guard against
"dry scalp" and keep hair handsome.

Aquacade stars use 'Vaseline' Hair Tonic to combat dryness. Unlike ordinary hair preparations it contains no ingredients that can possibly dry the scalp. 'Vaseline' Hair Tonic not only helps protect the precious oils of the scalp, but also supplements them . . . making hair well-behaved and healthy-looking.

"I use 'Vaseline' Hair Tonic regularly to help prevent the water and sunshine from washing away and baking out the natural oils of my scalp."

Esther Williams

"Even when I'm not swimming, 'Vaseline' Hair Tonic is part of my daily routine. I've found it helps keep my scalp healthy as it keeps my hair well-groomed."

"Buster" Crabbe

"Before each performance I rub on a few drops of 'Vaseline' Hair Tonic to help protect my scalp against the ruinous effects of too much sun and water. It also keeps my hair lustrous and always easy to arrange. It's a real life-saver to me."

Charley Hahn

A few drops supplement the natural scalp oils, keep hair good-looking.

EVERY MORNING shake on a few drops when you comb your hair for that well-groomed look.

EVERY WEEK before shampooing give your scalp a generous 'Vaseline' Hair Tonic massage.

Vaseline HAIR TONIC

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

Copyright 1940, Chesebrough Mfg. Co., Corp'd.

KEEP UP WITH THE WORLD

By Freling Foster

In the ruby mines of Mogok, Burma, the native workers are obliged to wear, over their heads, a padlocked steel helmet, to prevent them from swallowing the precious gems.—By Helen Andrews, Aurora, New York.

On the Delaware River Bridge, connecting Philadelphia with Camden, motorists who do not have twenty cents to pay the toll are permitted to leave an article as security. Frequently many persons pledge and never return for such valuable property as tires, cameras, musical instruments, fraternity pins and engagement and wedding rings.—By Philip P. Moeszinger, Camden, New Jersey.

Bacteria can live in colder and hotter temperatures than any other form of life, certain species being able to survive at 459 degrees F. below zero and others at 320 degrees F. above it. Some germs have been found in a revivable condition in coal deposits about a hundred million years old.

A survey made among a large number of American psychologists showed that ninety-two per cent of them do not believe that human nature possesses any ineradicable, instinctive factor that makes international wars inevitable.

Far more persons suffer from hemeralopia, or the inability to see as well in the daylight as at night, than from nyctalopia or the inability to see after nightfall except under a strong, artificial light.—By Norris Kever, New York City.

A man may be elected President of the United States by only thirty-one per cent of the popular vote.—By Fred T. Blakemore, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

The velocity of sound is not dependent on its pitch or loudness but on the elasticity and density of its medium. This is the reason why sound waves travel at only 866 feet a second through carbonic acid gas, 1,092 feet through still air, 4,730 feet through water, 10,900 feet through pine wood and 15,700 feet through iron.

About fifty Negroes have biographies in the new edition of Who's Who in America, among them being Marian Anderson, Robeson, Bill Robinson, Ethel Waters and Richard Wright.

Two elaborate cafeterias in Los Angeles make money despite the fact that they serve their meals at cost, plus one cent for profit, social security taxes, and their patrons to pay any part of the check or dine free.—By Dick Bark River, Michigan.

A tin can, which is all steel except for its thin coating of tin, is a loss when discarded because it has yet discovered an economical method of separating these metals so they may be used again.

Cultured Japanese consider the burning of incense an important rite. They not only use it in a variety of rites and ceremonies, but also perfume almost everything, including their homes, furniture, clothing and hair. It is even employed in games whose contestants try to distinguish between the 178 different standardized odors.

The most popular word in names is "old." It is used on seven hundred brands of American whiskies.

Despite its tremendous volume and great potential power of destruction, the average flash of lightning, if it could be harnessed for commercial use, would be worth more than two cents.—Leo D. Lavanis, Los Angeles, California.

Phonograph records have been used by symphony orchestras. For example, one containing a song of a nightingale is sometimes employed in the presentation of Respighi's Pines of Rome because it is more reliable than the bird itself.

Five dollars will be paid for each interesting or unusual fact accepted for this column. Contributions must be accompanied by factory proof. Address Keep Up with the World, Collier's, 250 Park Avenue, New York City. This column is copyrighted by Collier's The National Weekly. None of the items may be reproduced without express permission of the publisher.

The WASP

Clipper

GIFTS AND PERSONAL SETS

GENUINE

POINTS

Reversible double-length propelling eraser.

...encil "in working togs."
...strong, thin leads have 39%
...er writing point than regular leads.

Wasp CRISPLINE
— for Home
... School...
Business...
Drafting...
Shorthand, 75c.

WORLD'S RECORD VALUES In School and Business Pens!

Why handicap school work, why slow up the job, with a second-rate pen—when the WASP CLIPPER with genuine 12K gold point costs no more? BUT be sure you do get WASP or very likely you won't get genuine gold. It's easy to mistake brass or gold plate for gold, easy to buy an imitation gold-pointed pen without thinking. But the reasonably priced CLIPPER points are genuine gold—rich, ageless, AND NON-CORROSIVE. Which means that they're made to give satisfactory service for a long, long time. WASP CLIPPER points are iridium-tipped and silken smooth. The fluid supply is visible. And Clippers STAY in top writing condition because they fill full and FLUSH CLEAN at ONE forceful stroke of lever or plunger. Here's writing equipment to wear with satisfaction, or give with pride—the kind that shouts quality, and whispers price! . . . WASP CLIPPER gold-pointed pens, $5, $3.95, $2.95, $1.95, $1.25—sets from $7.50 to $1.95.

NOW 144% MORE Scrip CAPACITY THAN OLD-STYLE PENS

MADE IN THE PEN CAPITAL OF AMERICA

THE WASP PEN CO. INC. • FORT MADISON • IOWA • U. S. A.

Wasp Rite-O-Way Pen Set
... Always Ready for Desk Work
... Months Without Refilling!
$1.50—stainless steel point.
$3.50—genuine gold point.

The Voice with a Smile

"We hold," says a well-known writer, "that the ladies of the American long distance telephone wire up what is probably the most efficient public service in the world. They have profound patience and a capacity for taking pains that some one once said that genius amounts to."

"We once called a fellow at a hotel in Philadelphia he had just departed on an automobile trip in a wrong direction. A few days later the long distance operator caught up with him in a little town in Missouri. He was the most surprised man in all but one of the States in the Union. The exception was New York. We were most surprised there. To this day we have no idea how the operator did it."

DAMON RUNYON
in the New York Times

BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM

The Bell System cordially invites you to visit its exhibits at the New York World's Fair and the Golden Gate International Exposition, San Francisco.

What Happened to France

By André Maurois

Famous biographer and historian, the author knew intimately men who ran things in England and France. The greatest tragedy of modern times stands out with terrible clarity in these revelations

Chamberlain with von Ribbentrop at Godesberg. "It was a strange destiny that brought this businessman, who considered contracts sacred, face to face with the chancellor of the Reich"

WHY FRANCE AND ENGLAND WERE ILL-PREPARED FOR WAR

ONE day toward the end of 1935 I had lunch in London at the home of Lady Leslie, in company with Winston Churchill, my hostess' nephew. At the meal he took me by the arm and led me into a small room. He said to me: "Now, Mr. Maurois," he said, "you must not write any more biographies. No! No!" I looked at him in some alarm. He said: "You must do now," he went on, "write one article a day; a single one and the same one every day. In these in which you will express, in all the different ways that you can think of, a single idea: The French air force, which used to be the best in the world, is slipping back to fourth or fifth place. The German air force, which used to be nonexistent, is in process of becoming the best in the world! There you are. Nothing else. And if you proclaim these truths in France, and if you force France to listen to them, you will have performed a much greater service than in describing a woman's loves or a man's ambitions."

I replied that, unfortunately, I was by no means an expert in aviation; that I had no authority to talk about it, that no one would listen to me if I did and that, despite his advice, I should continue to write novels and biographies.

"You will be wrong," he said in his vigorous and ironic voice, to which from time to time a slight difficulty in enunciation gave a pleasant and characteristic flavor. "You will be wrong. At this moment the threat embodied in the German air force is the one theme that should interest a Frenchman. For your country may die because of it. Culture and literature, Mr. Maurois, are all very well, but a culture without strength soon ceases to be a living culture."

I never wrote the articles Winston Churchill asked me to write, and today I bitterly regret it. But that conversation impressed me greatly and left me with an abiding uneasiness. On several occasions I made inquiries from qualified persons about the state of our air force. Each time the reply was either evasive or frankly pessimistic.

"If the war should break out," I was told by a colonel in charge of a bombing squadron at Lyon, "we will die bravely, my pilots and I, but that's all we can do!"

"Why?" I asked.

"Because there are too few of us and our machines are obsolete."

In 1936 the situation became even worse. Sit-down strikes in the factories, lack of energy on the part of the government, the red tape of bureaucracy and the unreasonable demands of the committees on procurement reduced French production almost to zero. During the year 1937 the number of airplanes produced each month by French factories fell to the almost unbelievable figure of thirty-eight—at a time when the monthly production in Germany was exceeding a thousand planes!

While, in France, a deplorable hostility was poisoning the relations between workmen and the leaders of industry, in Germany all the forces of the nation had been mobilized for a war of revenge which the German government had foreseen and which it wanted. Absurd stories were circulated in France about the alleged weakness of the Nazi regime. They were examples of wishful thinking. All those who knew Germany well—Sir Eric Phipps, the British ambassador, for example, and Mr. François-Poncet, the French ambassador to Berlin—had been reiterating their warnings for long years. I remember being present in 1937 during a conversation between these two men.

"Don't have any illusions about it," said François-Poncet, "Germany is strong; she knows it and she is determined to make use of her strength. Two lines of conduct, and only two, are open to France and to Great Britain: Either our two countries must renounce everything else and devote all their energies to a formidable rearmament or they must try to reach an understanding with Germany."

I asked: "But is that possible? Does Germany want an understanding?"

"Germany," François-Poncet replied in the sarcastic voice of a bitter humorist, "Germany wants nothing and wants everything . . . Germany desires to be dynamic, that is, to change . . . the men who today are her leaders love spectacular celebrations, gigantic symbols. Do you wish to win them over? Build face-to-face on opposite banks of the Rhine two colossal ladders. On one bank bring up some millions of young Germans carrying flags with the swastika, on the other some millions of young Frenchmen carrying the colors of France; have these young people climb up and down the ladders in faultless formation, while, on a float in the middle of the Rhine, the commander of the French forces faces Hitler. Then, perhaps, there will be a chance of bringing about an understanding between France and Germany, if at the same time you have become very strong. But if you carry on your relations with the Reich in terms of diplomatic quibbling and finesse, which it despises; if you continue to draft notes and make speeches instead of building airplanes and tanks, then we are headed straight for war, and for a war that we shall not win."

François-Poncet was not the only one to form an estimate of Germany's new strength. Foreign countries, comparing the Nazis' military expenditures with those of France and England, understood very well that the balance of forces in Europe was going to shift—and many of them took precautions. Mr. Laroche, who was French ambassador to Poland, often said to me that he thought it unjust to blame the Poles for having sought German favor after 1936.

"WHAT could you expect?" he said to me. "When they saw Germany was rearming and France and England were not making the slightest effort to oppose her; when they saw Hitler, in March, 1936, march his troops into the Rhineland—an action in absolute contravention of the Treaty of Locarno—without France lifting a finger to stop him; when they heard the French premier say over the radio: 'I shall not allow Strasbourg to remain within the range of German guns,' and when they saw with stupefaction that this speech was not followed by any action whatsoever, they lost all confidence in us. The leaders of Poland said to me at that time: 'If you do not prevent Germany from rearming we shall be forced to become her friends.' That's what happened. And at the very time we were losing the confidence of Poland we saw both Belgium and Yugoslavia slip away from us for the same reason."

In this lack of diplomatic preparation and in this abandonment of Europe to German hegemony the responsibility of Great Britain was at least as great as that of France. Many powerful groups were united in restraining Great Britain from adopting a courageous and foresighted foreign policy. The bankers of the City were concerned about the money they had loaned to Germany and they persisted in the naïve hope that they could do business with a country that was shouting from the rooftops its intention to be self-sufficient. A certain number of persons of importance in England, terrified by Bolshevism, believed they had found in Nazism a barrier to the revolution. At the same time the intellectual liberals were preaching peace at any price and unilateral disarmament, which was destined to be the death of liberalism. All these tendencies combined magnificently to play into the hands of Germany.

No doubt the common people in France and England were aware, more or less consciously, of our weakness, for in 1938 they were profoundly hostile to the idea of a war. It was easy to see this at the time of Munich. American public opinion, at that point, was severely critical of Chamberlain and Daladier. But the United States did not know the real situation. They had little idea of the state of mind of the citizens of Paris and London, who saw themselves without air-raid shelters, without gas masks and without anti-aircraft guns, while there circulated, thanks to the efficiency of German propaganda, terrifying rumors about two-ton bombs, the very breath of which could destroy whole sections of a city, and about poison gases that would be released above them.

Men who would have been bravery itself if they had had to fight in the front line against an enemy like the one of 1914 were terrified at the thought of a war behind the lines in which their wives and children would be the victims. And so the peace of Munich, which New York considered shameful, was received by the crowds in Paris and

London with almost unbelievable enthusiasm. This diplomatic abdication was celebrated like a victory. One member of the Paris municipal council dared propose that a street be given the name Rue de Trente Septembre in date of the capitulation.

In Paris at about that time I saw Neville Chamberlain, the principal san of the negotiations. It was a destiny that brought this mayor of Birmingham, chairman of numerous administrative councils, a business man who considered contracts face-to-face with the romantic chieftain of the Reich who was convinced had no duties except to Germany that an agreement with a foreign power had no value except in so far as it was useful to the German people.

In November, 1938, two months after his meetings with the Fuehrer, Chamberlain described to me, on a night at the Quai D'Orsay, his reception in Berchtesgaden. Hitler had said to him:

"Shall we talk alone or in front of your associates?"

"Alone," Mr. Chamberlain replied.

THEN Hitler took him—with an interpreter, Dr. Schmidt—into his bedroom. It was a small room furnished with an iron bedstead; on the wall hung a single, very fine picture, which came from a museum in Munich and had been changed from time to time. Chamberlain was stupefied by the torrent of words that constituted the German chancellor's conversation and the impossibility of getting in the slightest reply.

"When I arrived in Godesberg for my second interview," Chamberlain said, "I was received with speeches of such violence that almost immediately it was clear to me that it would be useless to continue a conversation begun in this tone."

"Every few minutes—by an obviously prearranged plan—an officer would enter and hand the Fuehrer a dispatch. 'Two more Germans killed by the Czechs,' Hitler would cry, his face distorted with rage. 'All the blood that has been spilled shall be avenged. The Czechs must be annihilated!' Seeing my fury, whether simulated or not, in the end, I said to the interpreter that it would be better to break off the interview and that I would return to my hotel. This was on the opposite bank of the Rhine I had to cross the river by boat. As I was withdrawing, Hitler, coming to express himself with the same violence, followed me out onto the terrace. There, suddenly, he stopped and the expression on his face changed with extraordinary rapidity, he looked at the river stretching away at our feet, murmured in a soft, almost imperceptible voice: 'Oh, Mr. Prime Minister, I am so sorry. I had looked forward to showing you this beautiful view. . . . But it is hidden by the mist. . . . Never before I seen a human being change so abruptly from savage anger to a poetic mood.'"

One of the officials of the office who had accompanied Mr. Chamberlain to Germany told me that the prime minister had retained a very strong impression of these interviews and that such outbursts of violence were something entirely new in his experience. That even now when anyone mentions the name of Hitler in his presence he makes a face like that of a child being forced to swallow castor oil. Mr. Chamberlain thought it his duty to preserve peace and he hoped that he had succeeded.

He was encouraged in this belief by the innumerable testimonials he received from men and women in France and England. Thousands of peasants

(Continued on page 55)

Italy's Count Ciano in Berlin on one of his visits to Hitler. French Foreign Minister Bonnet considered Count Ciano's sincerity to be "beyond question"

He struck, went to his knees, recovered instantly, and spilled the wind from his parachute

They Think of Everything

By Pat Frank

THE traveling bag," said Captain Gross, checking off the items on his list, "you should have the following: two shirts, two pair of blue socks, handkerchiefs, the striped tie, razor, toothbrush, the two suits, which I thought you have been wearing, and the traveling bag."

"I was instructed," said Wolfgang, "I have the suits for ten days so they would be a little strange. They are excellent. Made in England." Captain Gross smiled and shook his head. "That we could not afford," he explained. "But the labels, they were made in England. Now on your person I will carry your Luger, fifty rounds, three grenades. Most important of course, is the cable cutter. Everything is packed?"

"Yes, Captain." "You have the English money, and papers and credentials? You have memorized the name and address of our contact in Ipswich? You have not forgotten the compass? They have removed all weapons, so it will be important."

"I have everything, Captain." "Goodbye, and good luck. Heil Hitler," Wolfgang replied, saluting. He adjusted his leather parachute harness, picked up his shiny suitcase, walked out on the dark ground and felt his way toward the deeper shadows, in many shadows, which was the Junkers.

He took his seat in the transport, and saw that others were there before him. There were no lights, so their figures were dim and bulky and their faces unrecognizable. In a moment they were in the air. There is not much excitement, Wolfgang considered, flying in a military transport that has no windows. Someone wished he had become a pilot. The Parachute Corps was elite, also, and no doubt when it was over he would have decorations and perhaps a commission. He could see himself lined up for the Fuehrer's personal congratulations, and unconsciously his back stiffened and his shoulders went back.

WHEN they had been an hour in the air Wolfgang sensed they must be near their destination, the sparsely settled lowland between Orford Ness and the Deben River. He did not need a map. His map had been etched in his head. An officer stepped from the pilot's compartment and said: "In two minutes we begin. You will go out at intervals of one minute." This was so they would not fall bunched, Wolfgang knew. The plan did not call for assault, but for infiltration. Some might be captured. A few would get through. For each job there were at least two men. The Parachute Corps thought of everything. He saw that the suitcase handle was secure on his belt.

Wolfgang was closest to the door. The officer motioned to him. Wolfgang stepped to the opening, held to the metal grips and braced his feet as he had been taught, and shoved off hard into the night. The wind whipped his head back, and then he was falling easily, his chute opened wide over him.

Expertly he tugged at the shrouds, and swept down for an open field. He struck, went to his knees, recovered instantly, and spilled the wind from his parachute. He lay still on the ground, as he had been instructed, and disengaged the traveling bag.

This was fortunate, for from the direction of the road he heard voices. "I saw something moving in that field," a man's voice said. And then a girl said, her voice taut with fear: "So did I!"

"I'll see what it is," the man said reassuringly.

Wolfgang drew a stick grenade from his belt. He heard the whip of brush on the man's trousers, and then he saw his form, looming clean against the sky. Wolfgang flipped the pin and threw the grenade. The explosion seemed much louder than it ever had in practice. Wolfgang rose and ran toward them. The grenade had got them both, he saw at once. Wolfgang retrieved the suitcase and ran for a clump of trees. There was no sign of more life in the field, or on the road. He got busy.

He stripped off his uniform, changed to the gray flannel suit, tossed the unused grenades and the Luger into the suitcase and walked out onto the road as a Londoner who had been summering at Orford, and who now was fleeing the coast because of imminent invasion. His compass led him west, toward the coastal highway running to Ipswich. When he reached the highway he walked south, and, with dawn's first light, cars began to pass him.

Six, maybe seven miles now to Ipswich, and the suitcase dragged at his arm. The party man in Ipswich would point out the telephone lines leading to London. After these were cut he would be on his own. The idea of being his own commander fascinated him. He would capture a British armored car. He would race to the shore again, and perhaps take a battery from the rear.

He was so busy with his plans that he did not notice the barricade until it was too late to turn back, for he had been seen. A lorry blocked the road. There were soldiers around it, rifles slung over their shoulders. Three small cars, luggage strapped to their running boards, were halted in front of it.

A sergeant motioned to Wolfgang, and called, "This way, sir." Wolfgang walked over and saw, behind the lorry, a straggling line of men and women, some empty-handed, some carrying bags. "Sorry," the sergeant said, "but we're examining all coming this way. Won't take long. Step into line."

"Righto," Wolfgang said. "What's up?"

"Fritz's planes have been over the coast. May have dropped some damn 'chutists."

"Nuisance, aren't they!" Wolfgang dropped his suitcase at his feet. He could open it, casually, grab the grenades, and make a fight of it.

THEN he saw the Englishman just ahead in line had a suitcase much like his own. A typical Englishman, sallow, his chin weak and narrow. He would be polite, perhaps meek. A man in the Parachute Corps thinks swiftly.

Wolfgang shoved his own suitcase alongside the Englishman's, jostled the frail fellow, said, "Sorry, old man," and picked up the bag again. Only it was the Englishman's suitcase he now held. He didn't think the Englishman noticed.

Presently the sergeant came to the Englishman, and rifled through his credentials. Then he bent and opened the suitcase. The sergeant cursed, and the Territorials slammed their rifle muzzles into the Englishman's belly. The Englishman's eyes were wide and frightened, staring straight into his own, as they led him away. They didn't give him much of a chance to talk. They just took him into the woods and shot him. A soldier in civilian clothes is a spy.

The sergeant came back. His face was twitching.

"Ready for me now?" Wolfgang asked.

The sergeant didn't say anything. He examined Wolfgang's papers, felt his hips and under his arms, and then opened the suitcase that had been the Englishman's. Wolfgang looked down, numbly, at two shirts, a suit, handkerchiefs, socks, and on top of these a heavy, rubber-sheathed pair of shears, a Luger, and three stick grenades.

PLAID: Bronze-colored tweed jacket; gray flannel trousers; Norwegian peasant slippers; oxford shirt; wool tie and hose; khaki hat

GORSE: Blue-brown Shetland suit; striped oxford shirt; knit tie; crepe-soled Norwegian shoes; brown snapbrim hat, contrasting edge

TUX: Midnight blue dinner jacket; pleated bosom dress shirt; maroon dress tie; garnet studs; linen kerchief; patent leather pumps

COVERT: Fly front coat; blue nailhead worsted suit, red over-plaid; white shirt, button-down; red-gray tie; brown shoes; gray hat

TARTAN: Scotch plaid flannel lounging robe; blue broadcloth pajamas; hard-soled leather slippers. Socks and robe traditionally loud

TAILS: Midnight blue tail coat; tweed shirt; pearl wing collar; waistcoat; opera hat, black

Back to School

By Henry L. Jackson

PHOTOGRAPHS FOR COLLIER'S BY IFOR THOMAS

IF YOU want something easy, try convincing an admiral that the airplane is going to replace the battleship. But don't argue with an undergraduate about clothes. You can't win. He knows what he likes.

Funny thing, ■ while after he has made up his mind the rest of the nation is likely to find out about it and follow suit. Who do you think is responsible for the sudden reappearance of the tail coat on dance floors all over the country? Why do you suppose hat manufacturers let out a whoop of joy? College men decided to go in for it. As the campus went, so went the country.

An undergraduate's clothes fall into three general categories: formal, semi-formal, and week end. For campus room he likes sports jacket, flannel trousers, sturdy brogue-type shoes, extravagant socks. For the other hand, he suddenly goes formal and takes a businesslike dinner jacket is confined to smokers, stag dinners and parties. For fancy cutting, he turns up in tail coat and top hat.

You will find listed on campus things that make up his wardrobe.

There are ■ few strictly campus items that are cherished for their own sake not to reason why.

CAMPUS CONFERENCE: Reversible leather and poplin jacket with zipper. Bronze color tweed jacket. Shetland pull-over sweater, with long sleeves man's coat

the line-up.
Smith Col-throughout the now buying men's shops

CORDUROY: Finger-tip coat with leather buttons; tweed suit; checked shirt; striped tweed tie; moccasin-type shoes with tongues; cotton rainhat

RAIN: Cotton gabardine raincoat; flannel shirt; ribbon-shape bow tie; Varsity cap; blue wool hose; black and white shoes, red rubber soles

HERRINGBONE: Oxford shirt in herringbone pattern; foulard tie; jumbo size gold collar pin; elastic solid color mesh suspenders; covert slacks

TATTERSALL: Covert suit; waistcoat of tattersall flannel; white oxford shirt; knit tie; khaki hat with green band; brown calfskin "gummy" shoes

You can always tell a college man, but you can't tell him anything about clothes. He knows what he wants, and frequently he sets the pace for the rest of the country trousers short. Not because they are out of them, and not to show off. Simply to show off their blazers and checks. The leather patches on the elbows of the sports jacket, it doesn't mean anything. The boys are buying new jackets in to local stores and patches put on. They just like that way. They also like the collar-attached shirt. They like that in addition to wearing it on campus and in town they wear it with their dinner jackets. The manufacturer has copied the dinner-jacket wear and the office business. The next time you see a collar to turn up—and you will be surprised—is on pa-swing bands; a typewriter for turning in papers that prejudice profs favorably; pens, pencils, pipes, lighters, electric razors; and where the budget will stand the strain, a small refrigerator for midnight forays. If there's no special girl friend you're likely to find a personally autographed photograph of La Hedy, Ann Oomph, or some unknown streamliner gracing a picture frame. If they make the grade they'll be around the campus for at least the next four years, and they want it to feel like home.

CAMPUS SNACK: Cotton gabardine raincoat, natural color muffler; double-breasted camel's hair polo coat. Striped Shetland sports jacket, pigskin belt

The Big Mistake

By Josephine Bentham

ILLUSTRATED BY HARRY BECKHOFF

One time when an automobile accident was the most wonderful thing that could possibly have happened to a slightly wilted romance

DICK HENDRICKS sat at Ronnie Ferguson's feet on the lowest step of the Fergusons' front porch. His attitude, however, was scarcely one of courtly supplication. He was, as a matter of fact, not looking at Ronnie at all. He was looking, in deep distaste, at his own automobile.

The lines of the car at the curb, having been fashionable in 1931, contrasted rather oddly with the lines of the car in the Fergusons' driveway, a neat little '37 model that Ronnie's father had picked up for her sixteenth birthday.

"Well," Dick said gloomily, "I've got the fund up to twenty-seven dollars and sixty cents—but I don't kid myself that's going to get me anywhere!"

From Ronnie came a downward-sliding and ambiguous monosyllable indicating sympathy, encouragement and an ill-suppressed desire to change the subject.

"They prob'ly won't allow me more'n twenty or twenty-five bucks on that old heap of junk," he went on. "But when you think of all the time and money I've put into that car, they're a lot of chiselers at that. And it was a good year too. But you take a car like yours—or maybe '38 or '39—"

"Listen!" Ronnie cut in, desperately. "Do we have to talk about cars the whole doggone time?"

"Oh—" he said. "Sorry I bore you."

"You don't bore me! Only I keep getting this feeling you're sore about something."

"No." He looked at her. "That's a crazy thing to say! What did you say a crazy thing like that for?"

"I don't know. Only we just sit and argue—and I don't know what about."

"I wasn't arguing! I was just trying to tell you I couldn't get a car like yours inside of five years at this rate." He thought a second. "Why, my gosh! Ten years!"

They stared at each other and then they burst out laughing—because, of course, they would be so old in ten years it made them laugh just to think of it. At any rate, he was in a good temper again. He pulled a leaf off the honeysuckle vine and chewed it absently.

"Look," he said, "I hear it's all fixed up about that dance at the country club. The committee's going to give it on the sixteenth. Not," he added, "that it would interest you much."

Ronnie smiled in a provocative way and looked at her thumbnail.

"You'd be staying home," he went on. "Because, who'd be crazy enough to take you anyway?"

"Nobody, I guess. I could go by myself."

"Then I'll be seeing you—but I won't dance with you." He reached over to yank one of her shoe laces loose. "So don't you expect it."

"Why, no," Ronnie said. "Who am I?"

"Oh, well, I guess you're the girl friend—being as how I'm a dope. I guess I'll take you to that dance."

"Who asked you?"

"I'm asking you."

"Well, I'm saying maybe."

"You're saying what?"

"I'm saying okay."

Ronnie laughed and rolled over on the porch steps as if they were the mossy stretch of a riverbank. The sun felt good and warm on her bare legs. She wriggled her toes in her grass-stained saddle shoes and thought, suddenly, of her silver sandals. There was a tear in one toe that she would have to fix up, most likely, with radiator paint. There was less than no chance, she decided reluctantly, for a new pair in time for the sixteenth. At that very moment, in her sweater pocket, was a crumpled bit of paper—a bill from the Elite Garage, listing gasoline, oil, the straightening of a fender, and any number of washing jobs. . . .

"Hey!" Dick said. "What are you thinking about?"

"I've been thinking some more that dance," Ronnie said. "Why we go in my car, for goodness' sake!"

It took him about a second to this.

"In your car?" he said. "You mean your car?"

"Well, why not?" She went on in innocent way, pleased with the thought of pleasing him. "After all, you like it so much better than your own—and then we'd be assured of getting there—I mean we wouldn't have to get out and put on tires in your good clothes or—what?" she demanded, staring. "What?"

HE DREW a good, long breath. "So!" he said. "So that's the is! So it's got to the point ashamed to be seen in my old bus!"

"No, I'm not!" said Ronnie. "be childish."

"Well! It's a very peculiar thing old bus was okay for you to ride and go places in before you—"

"Oh!" cried Ronnie. "Oh, how Oh, I don't think I ever heard anything so plain silly in my whole life!"

He ignored this.

"However," he continued loudly, "my car isn't good enough for you, you only got to tell me, that's all! There's absolutely no need for you to go around and worrying about my car for gosh sake!"

"Yes," Ronnie said, "and maybe a person doesn't want to go to a dance he ought to come right out and say. As if an automobile had anything to do with it!"

"Well, what else were we talking about? What else were you trying to say except you didn't want to go to the dance in my car?"

"Oh, my goodness! Maybe I want to go to that dance at all! Maybe that's the way you'd make a person feel!"

With these final incoherent words jumped to her feet. And before he could think of anything further to say, he found himself alone on the Ferguson porch step. Ronnie had closed the

"Maybe I don't want to go to the dance!" she cried. And before he could think of anything to say, he found himself alone on the step.

door behind her with a small, deafening, furious bang. . . .
 "And is that any way," her father inquired mildly, "to treat a guest?"
 Ronnie stared in reproach at the gentleman in the armchair.
 "Why, Dad! You were listening! I heard what I said!"
 "Of course, Veronica. Everybody in the neighborhood must have, too."
 "Then Ferguson prodded fresh tobacco into the bowl of his old brown pipe. He turned a quizzical eye on his daughter.
 "You know," he went on, "I've been thinking about that car of yours. I don't know—we may have been a bit impulsive, Ronnie."
 "Oh, Dad. I don't think we were."
 "Well—it doesn't seem to be bringing much luck."
 "You mean Dick Hendricks," Ronnie said heatedly, "he's making himself completely absurd and ridiculous!"
 "O-o. Not more than most men in his place. You weren't any too keen about that car of his."
 "Why! It's not even a car exactly! Just a crazy old crate and he knows that makes it worse. A man feels a sensitive about his car, Ronnie—especially if it's his first car. You were bragging the male vanity, my dear, on a very tender spot."
 "But," cried Ronnie, "that definitely doesn't make sense! Because everybody knows a 1937 car is better than a 1934 car! Everybody knows it!"
 "Yes," her father agreed, smiling. "I wouldn't want to sell your car, would you?"
 Ronnie hesitated. Then she spoke in a low, ringing tones of a steel-riveted cannon:
 "I'd die before I sold that car! I'd rather see it go to the bottom of the sea, all right!" her father cut in hurriedly. "All right! I'm not taking the way from you! Only I do rather wish, Ronnie, I'd thought of something for your birthday."
 The same thought was buried deep in Ronnie's mind. After all, if you couldn't sell a car, well give away a car, and if you were much too proud to sell it, what on earth could you do with it? How, without emphasis, could you rid yourself of an automobile? Ronnie didn't know—and she decided, in the end, it was nothing to worry about anyhow. She would have to be more careful of Dick's feelings in the future, that was all—and maybe she could work up a little more interest in the fund.

"Knee! His knee!" shouted John Ferguson. "The fool kid runs into the car—wrecks the car—and comes out of it with a skinned knee!"

AFTER dinner she wandered out to the porch—and she was smiling a little. This was the time when Dick always drove around to see if she wanted to go to a movie, or to Milbank's for a soda. And she was almost positive he would be around tonight—although, of course, he would be a little more dignified than usual. "The crazy!" she thought, in a sudden, passionate wave of tenderness. "The old crazy—!"

She had just strolled absently across the lawn to the rose bushes when a familiar, rattling sound came to her ears. She turned swiftly. It was Dick, of course, coming down Wynperle Avenue as he always did—but Ronnie's eager and forgiving smile was frozen even as it came into being. Dick Hendricks—with merely a polite nod—went driving madly right on past the house.

Ronnie, her mouth still open a little, stared after him. He turned left, into Hildebrandt Terrace, which ran only a short block before coming to an abrupt halt at the high brick wall that hedged the grammar school. Frantically, Ronnie considered Hildebrandt Terrace. Nobody who wasn't about a hundred years old had ever lived on the street except—except Frieda Lewis. And Frieda was a redheaded girl who had always been a little bit too obviously interested in Dick Hendricks.

Ronnie struggled against jealousy as an engulfing tide.

"Why, darling!" said her mother, suddenly appearing on the porch step. "Don't stand in that wet grass like that! Your feet will be soaking!"

Ronnie looked at her.

"Feet?"

"Yes. . . . What's the matter with you, dear?"

Ronnie roused herself.

"Nothing!" she said, smiling brightly. "Nothing at all! I just thought I'd drive down to Milbank's—I just thought maybe Ginger Matthews might be there, or Kathleen Weston or somebody."

Mrs. Ferguson started to ask a question and thought better of it.

"Well," she said, "you will drive carefully, won't you, dear?"

"Oh, sure," Ronnie said. "I'll positively crawl."

She slid behind the wheel of her car and waved to her mother, reassuringly. Then she drove down Wynperle Avenue, engaged in an imaginary scene that satisfactorily solved the mystery of Hildebrandt Terrace. "I just turned down that block because I didn't even know what I was doing," Dick was explaining eagerly, in this dream of hers. "I was in such an awful state of mind at your being mad at me, Ronnie. And you ought to know I couldn't take any interest in a girl like Frieda Lewis—you ought to know that!"

Ronnie's lips were curving in a smile, a very gentle and understanding smile—but at this point she had to come, a bit suddenly, out of the dream world. There was going to be some trouble in parking in front of Milbank's. Ronnie darted valiantly toward the curb—misjudging her distance as usual, flushing crimson as she maneuvered vainly to get her front wheels past the rear bumper of Mrs. Peter Jeffries' blue sedan. "Oh, darn the car!" she muttered, between clenched teeth. "Oh, darn the darn, darn car!"

"Hey, Ronnie! Cut her short!" came the inevitable advice from the sidewalk.

"Cut her—that's right! Over to your left! Over to your left!"

Mrs. Jeffries' right rear fender was only a little scratched. Ronnie sank back, exhausted, her hands limp on the wheel. Then she turned a none too grateful eye on her adviser.

This was a certain Roger Perry, one of her own classmates in Melville high school. He had never paid her any particular attention. Roger's attitude toward the world in general was one of faintly amused condescension.

"That," he was saying now, in his patronizing way, "is quite a neat little bus you have there. Yours?"

"Sure, it's mine," Ronnie said without warmth.

ROGER put his foot on the running board and went on talking. His own car, it seemed, was now being sold in unrecognizable bits in a place called Andy's Junk Yard. Roger and his car had been in a pretty bad accident, but it had not been his fault, he told Ronnie. Only his family could not see eye to eye with him about the purchase of any new vehicle. Ronnie considered the matter.

"Well, but you take somebody like Dick Hendricks," she said. "Why, he'd pick up a car somewhere for maybe ten or fifteen dollars and then he'd simply take it apart and put it together again—I mean, he just wouldn't wait for anybody to buy him a car!"

Roger was not impressed.

"I wouldn't either," he said, "if I cared to be seen in some old tomato can. . . . Well, say, would you like to have a soda or a choc malt or something, Ronnie?"

(Continued on page 50)

For antiaircraft training, cadets go to Fort Hancock, New Jersey. Guns may be studied but not fired at the Academy because of unsuitable terrain

The dress parade is a magnificent show, but critics of Point training see it as an outward symbol of what's wrong

What Good

First-year men get some training in handling machine guns under the supervision of upper classmen. The guns they are using are old-style .30-caliber Brownings

United States Military Academy at West Point, New York, is one of the most beautiful institutions in the world. Its graduates have their names high on the honor roll for peace as well as war. Its cadets are of scrupulous honor, and they are as brave as they are intelligent as well as brave. At West Point elementary military training emphasizes greatly the parades and guard mountings. It requires—for perfection of performance—that too much of the cadet's time is spent in shoulder-to-shoulder drill in ranks on foot. Emphasis on training was necessary in Frederick the Great's day. But are not matters altered now? Should not the cadets spend much less of their time in formal close-order march—should not the time thus made available be devoted to learning the elements of piloting an airplane, to simple parachute work and to other modern engines of war? The exhibition during the graduation week show that the cadets graduate and become officers competent in the practical elements of warfare?

If the officer is able enough, he will be sent to the General Staff School at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas. A few years later, if he has shown still additional competence, he will take the course at the Army War College in Washington, which is the final postgraduate school. But that, if he is a West Pointer, will be fifteen or twenty years after he has left the quiet campus of the United States Military Academy.

It was a shimmering summer day when I visited West Point the first time. On the big parade ground the newly arrived members of the "plebe" class—they had been enrolled for hardly a week—were being drilled by the upper classmen. "Squads right, march! Right face, left face, about face!" sounded across the pleasant field—and the war in Europe seemed a dozen times 3,000 miles away. The humble plebes had already been initiated into the traditions of West Point. Soon they would be singing of their pride in treading "where they of the corps have trod." They had already been ordered to "keep your mouth shut and obey orders," and assured that "an order from a superior has the force of a cannon shot."

Naturally, West Point leans upon

"Cavalry hikes" during the summer months, when regular classes are suspended, give the cadets a close approximation to actual field training

WEST POINT?

By Henry F. Pringle

graduation week at present. It consists of horse shows, formal infantry parades on foot and which horses are used. Necessary cadet maneuvers are elementary and include only the 1,200 cadets. Also, the local terrain is so extensively to permit much modern artillery.

Four years of intensive study at West Point graduate is not a fully qualified lieutenant, because his education has been more cultural than taken precisely the same as all the other cadets and has specialization in no single arm of service.

He has an additional four, possibly five, years before he has obtained adequate knowledge of modern warfare.

West Point is defended by the authority of West Point as proper and the United States Military Academy. They insist, is not a training school for officers. It is a college for future officers and gentlemen. The purpose of West Point, to quote the department's official bulletin, is "to provide theoretical and practical training for the military service." It is an institution where the "cadets receive a comprehensive and general education of collegiate grade and a sufficient military education and training to enable them to pursue their careers as officers of the Army."

High-ranking men of the graduate class—possibly twenty-five in all—are admitted to enter the Corps of Engineers, which is regarded as the most important arm of the service. About half enroll in the Air Corps for a year's training, but only fifty per cent qualify. The rest of the graduates are assigned to troops. After the cadet has obtained additional training and experience for, say, two years, he is sent to one of the Army postgraduate schools, where he gets special training in cavalry, infantry or whatever happens to be. There, probably for the first time, he learns the details of modern warfare. In due course, tradition and the past. The mission of the Academy, the freshman cadets are informed, is primarily to "instill discipline and a sense of honor." Thus it has always been at West Point, since the institution was founded in 1802. The system of instruction at the Academy is, in its broad aspects, still the one established by Colonel Sylvanus Thayer, the "father of West Point," when he became superintendent in 1817.

"We have made changes, of course," a high-ranking officer of the Academy told me, "but we teach the same fundamentals—honor and integrity and discipline."

The honor and integrity of West Point men may be assumed. There isn't the slightest question about that. Doubt has been cast, however, on whether the West Point elementary discipline is the best for war of today, when nothing happens according to schedule. The average graduate is a good mathematician, knows engineering, is an expert in close-order drill and a fine horseman. But he has spent only ten hours or so in the air—and as a passenger merely. He has commanded no troop bodies larger than platoons, and very little of those. He has had a smattering of field-artillery practice and has watched a big gun or two fired. He has impeccable manners and is an excellent dancer.

"Even as a field-artillery officer, in which he has had as much experience as in any arm," another West Point man told me, "the second lieutenant just out of the Academy isn't worth a damn."

In the face of these admitted facts the question is now being raised whether such luxuries as a four-year course with hours upon hours devoted to English composition, English literature, French, Spanish and ancient history can be afforded. The hours given to "cultural subjects," so called, at West Point are greater than at such civilian technical colleges as the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the engineering schools of Cornell University. For graduation from West Point 131 "semester hours" are required; that is, classes of one hour

(Continued on page 47)

Upper classmen help their military and tactical instructors by taking over many routine jobs. Here they are teaching close-order drill to plebes

Part-Time Baseball

By Arthur Mann

The semipros are on the loose at Wichita in baseball's biggest party. Do they have fun!

Baseball's first automatic home-plate duster goes into action at the Semi-pro Congress. The modern umpire steps on a button and compressed air does a neat whisking-off job

KANSAS is in the clutches of another cyclone that has centered in and around Wichita. When this particular twister has unwound itself completely, atop the wreckage will stand the champion of some 25,000 teams representing 500,000 affiliated semipro baseball players in the United States.

Officially this crescendo of sand-lot ability is known as the National Semi-pro Baseball Congress. Actually it is the dream and goal of all the part-time ballplayers in every state of the Union—baseball nuts who hang on to their year-round jobs and have terrific fun playing 100-game schedules that lead to this most democratic of championships.

For this annual shindig 100,000 visitors double Wichita's population and help pay the freight. Patrons of the Semipro Congress flock to Lawrence Stadium long before noon with basket lunches and cushions. Here and there you will see an energetic rooter putting on a fresh shirt between innings. They sit through three or four daylight games that are interlarded with a variety of band music and volunteer stunt men or comedians. After quick bites of dinner at home or at near-by lunch counters, another mob returns to view two or three nocturnal contests under high-powered lights. Sometimes an extra-inning game is called "on account of dawn."

Though the extravaganza is only six years old, each year brings new novelties and bigger attendance, with last year topping the four previous clam bakes. More than 110,000 fans paid to watch the 1939 tournament, but many went to see baseball's first automatic home-plate duster in operation. It's only a gadget that works by compressed air, but it puts the semipros far ahead of the field.

No mayor or governor throws out the first ball. That's too prosaic. They prefer, say, the most beautiful of the airline hostesses, dressed in her gleaming uniform, to do the tossing. Instead of having pompous and verbose, ax-grinding dignitaries award checks and prize cups, the Semipro Congress collects the prettiest gals in the Sunflower State to make the presentations. The spectators claim it's easier on the ears and eyes.

After two weeks of round-robin competition among thirty-two teams, the cream of semipro baseball floats to the top at Wichita. The winning team will leave town next week with a $6,000 slice of the gate receipts, plus a cash allowance for mileage to and from its home grounds. Last year's champions, sponsored by a cement company, carried away $5,119.52 besides train fare to and from Duncan, Oklahoma, and won a free trip to Puerto Rico. There they picked up another $1,500 purse, plus a shellacking from the Guayama team at San Juan in a real semipro world series while 35,000 islanders looked on.

After five years of intense promotion, this streamlined idea has mushroomed into the fastest-growing sports activity of all.

An energetic little guy with a big cigar, Raymond Dumont, is the inventor of the magnanimous scheme, and perennial president. Back in 1931, young Dumont was a wide-eyed, ambitious clerk of twenty-three in the Goldsmith Book and Stationery Store at Wichita. Dips in the business chart caused a few of the clerks to be pushed around, and Dumont was given sole charge of the "sports department." He knew that Wichita people were in no position financially to be high-pressured into spending more money on sporting goods. But, if people in Wichita were placed in the position of needing baseball bats, gloves, balls . . .

The Idea Grew Up

He concocted a state-wide baseball championship for Kansas, and guess where the final games were played. Yes, sir, right in Wichita. Only sixteen teams fought for the semipro championship of Kansas, but nobody went into debt, and the players went into Goldsmith's for a surprising number of odds and ends.

When the thing bounded past expectations in the next few years, and ultimately provided $5,000 in prize money to the surviving teams, Ray Dumont reasoned that simultaneous championships in all states would achieve the same results, only forty-seven times bigger and better. He propositioned key points in the nation.

The result was an avalanche of enthusiastic response that cascaded from

(Continued on page 54)

Pretty girls instead of politicians toss out the first ball for the semipros. Last year it was Katherine Wilson, Miss American Aviation. With her is Commissioner George Sisler

"There's Gull Rock!" she cried, pointing with her free hand. "And the old Pineo place. It hasn't changed at all"

Errand in Bangor

By Henry Meade Williams

ILLUSTRATED BY HARRY MORSE MEYERS

Sometimes it takes more a little persuasion to a girl realize what that she really wants

YRK TENNANT came to Bangor about five o'clock on a Saturday evening in July. It was very hot in the city and, to a man who had just come from the cold waters of the Atlantic Ocean East, this heat seemed oppressive like stale air in a huge oven. He had the 1936 coupé in the plaza of the Maine Central railroad station. This was the place he had used before on his occasional binges in town. He reached the key, slipped it into his watch pocket and stood there undecided, hesitating. Usually he would feel pretty good at this moment, thinking of the drinks at the bar on Hancock Street with a group of the boys from Upson Bay—those things that happened after the party. But this evening his mind was fixed on the girl he had seen a few minutes before. Instead of coming in directly from the bridge over the Penobscot River he had cruised around the city to see what was going on. The little car ambled along Washington Street past Broad and up the hill to Main where it turned right toward the triangle. There he went East on State and crossed the walled-in waters of the Kenduskeag stream and was stopped by a red light at the intersection of Exchange.

It was at that second he had seen Lola Ward, from Upson Bay, for the first time in seven years. She was walking down Exchange on the other side. She was wearing a white jacket and a red hat and carried under her arm a large red leather pocketbook. She looked like a million with her sheer silk stockings and the way she walked, swinging along, her head up. He had shouted to her but she didn't hear him. When the light changed he had tried to crowd the other car on his right to follow her down the street until he could find a place to park, but the cop at the intersection had looked at him in a funny way and told him to keep going.

Seeing Lola this way moved him. Standing there in the hot plaza, he wondered what things would have been like if he had gone away with her that night seven years ago as she had wanted him to. He remembered the anger and pride in her voice as she told him she would never, never come back to Upson Bay. He had heard through someone that she had gone to New York. He wondered now what she was doing here in Bangor —only sixty miles from her home. . . .

Tennant turned from the car and walked across the heat-reflecting cobblestones of the plaza. He would go back to Exchange and take a look around—he might catch her before she left that section of the city. He was a solid, well-built man without being tall—but his lean, serious face made him look slimmer. His skin had that deep red burn from working in the sun on salt water. Already, at this early age, his eyes had the crosshatch lines of a seafaring man. He walked leaning forward slightly, as if leaning into a wind. He wore store clothes—a blue serge suit and a stringy tie tucked into a white shirt. The sports shoes, still white, he had borrowed from Tommy Pineo. These were the clothes a man wore on a Saturday night in Bangor.

In the worn wallet he had about fifteen dollars but in the morning when he was ready to go home—through with the city for another five, six weeks—he would have maybe a dollar or so for gas and a cup of coffee. He held no regrets and he had no sorrow to drown, and this memory, of what had once been between Lola Ward and himself he kept to himself.

He had almost reached the intersection of State when he saw her coming out of a store near the corner. She had a small package in her hand now and she was looking at the window as she walked by.

He caught up with her. He said, "Lola! Lola Ward!"

She turned, startled—but when she saw him her face lighted up and her hand lifted toward him as if she couldn't believe he was really there in front of her.

"Burk!" she cried. He felt her hand in his, the quick pressure in it and the warmth.

Tennant said, "I saw you before. I had to park the car and then come back. Gee, it sure has been a long time, Lola."

She regarded him for a moment. Then she said, her voice more controlled now, her eyes taking him in, still smiling but wondering about him, "How are things going, Burk? What you doing now?"

Tennant folded his cap lengthwise and stuck it back into his hip pocket. He said, "Oh, same thing, Lola. Fishing. I got a new boat—she's a dandy. Lobsters are scarce—but I'm doing pretty good—can't kick."

He saw her still looking at him—her eyes softer now—the smile easier.

"How was it out West—in New York City? Did you like it, Lola?"

She smiled. "Oh, sure. It was fine. I was in Boston, too."

He kept thinking that this talk was slack for two people who hadn't seen
(Continued on page 38)

The Patriotic Murders

By Agatha Christie

ILLUSTRATED BY MARIO COOPER

The Story Thus Far:

SHORTLY after Hercule Poirot, noted Belgian detective, leaves the office of Henry Morley, a London dentist, Morley kills himself with a pistol. Such, at least, is the verdict of Scotland Yard's Inspector Japp—a verdict that he retracts when Poirot, investigating the case, convinces him that the dentist may have been murdered.

Reilly, Morley's partner, can shed no light on the matter. But Alfred, the office boy, testifies that a young American—Howard Raikes—had made an appointment with the dentist, had come to the office, and suddenly disappeared about the time of Morley's death. Raikes is, therefore, a suspect, as is Frank Carter, the fiancé of Morley's secretary, Gladys Nevill. But suspect No. 1 is a Mr. Amberiotis, a wealthy Greek, who had been the dentist's last patient.

Making a list of Morley's patients just before his death, Japp and Poirot interrogate them. Alistair Blunt, head of a great banking firm, and Miss Sainsbury Seale, a spinster recently arrived from India, have little of importance to offer. Next on the list is Amberiotis; but before the two detectives can question him, he dies of an overdose of adrenalin and procaine administered (so it appears) by Morley!

Japp feels certain that the dentist, realizing too late that he had made a dreadful mistake while treating the Greek's teeth, had killed himself. But Poirot does not agree with him; and, in search of important data pertaining to the case, he calls on a mysterious "Mr. Barnes." Mr. Barnes informs him that powerful conspirators are trying to undermine the existent order in England by killing off various stalwart pillars of society. It is his theory that the plotters tried, without success, to bribe Morley to kill Alistair Blunt; that they did bribe Reilly, who shot his partner to silence him; that Amberiotis—an international spy and blackmailer—had been murdered for reasons known only to the conspirators.

The disappearance of Miss Sainsbury Seale, who walks out of her hotel and does not return, adds another curious angle to the case. And Poirot is convinced that Howard Raikes knows more than he may care to admit. He calls on Raikes. Introducing himself, the Belgian remarks that he, too, had gone to Morley, shortly before his death, to have his teeth treated. "You'll excuse me," Raikes exclaims, "if I say I can't believe it." Poirot stares at the American. Then: "May I ask, Mr. Raikes, what you were doing there?"

IV

MR. RAIKES grinned suddenly and said: "Got you there! I was going to have my teeth seen also."

"You had, perhaps, the toothache," Poirot said.

"That's right, big boy."

"But, all the same, you went without having your teeth attended to."

"What if I did? That's my business."

He paused—then he said, with a savagery of tone, "Oh, what the use of all this slick talking? Were there to look after your big Well, he's all right, isn't he? No happened to your precious Mr. A. Blunt. You've nothing on me."

Poirot said, "Where did you go when you went so abruptly out of the room?"

"Left the house, of course."

"Ah!" Poirot looked up at the ceiling.

"But nobody saw you leave," Raikes.

"Does that matter?"

"It might. Somebody died in the house not long afterward, remember?"

Raikes said carelessly, "Oh, you mean the dentist."

Poirot's tone was hard as he said, "Yes, I mean the dentist."

Raikes stared.

"You trying to pin that on me? That the game? Well, you can't pin it on me. I've just read the account of the inquest yesterday. The poor devil shot himself because he'd made a mistake with the cal anesthetic and one of his patients died."

Poirot went on, unmoved: "Can you prove that you left the house when you say you did? Is there anyone who can say definitely where you were between twelve and one?"

The other's eyes narrowed.

"So you are trying to pin it on me? Suppose Blunt put you up to this?"

Poirot sighed.

"You will pardon me, but it seems an obsession with you—this persistent harping on Mr. Alistair Blunt. I am not employed by him, I never have been employed by him. I am concerned only with his safety, but with the death of a man who did good work in his profession."

Raikes shook his head.

"Sorry," he said. "I don't believe you're Blunt's private dick, all right. His face hardened as he leaned over the table. "But you can't save him, you know. He's got to go—he and everything he stands for! There's got to be a new deal—the old, corrupt system of finance has got to go—this curse of bankers all over the world, this spider's web. They've got to be swept away. I've nothing against Blunt personally—but he's the type of man who He's mediocre—he's smug. He's the sort you can't move unless you use dynamite. He's the sort of man who says 'You can't disrupt the foundations of civilization.' Can't you, though? Let him wait and see! He's an obstacle in the way of progress and he's got to be removed."

"There's no room in the world for him."

(Continued on page 31)

She turned to face him. "What do you mean when you said you had been expecting me to call you?" she asked.

Blow by Blow

Kyle Crichton

et Larry Adler, who blew himself into and fortune by making the lowly harmonica a respectable musical instrument

YOUNG man with the approximate stature of a guy wire and the rapt look of a Brooklyn fan comes on the stage and begins playing a mouth organ. He is dressed in white tie and tails, delicately hand-tooled by Kil-land French, Savile Row, London.
As he blows over his foolish instrument, he moves his hands about it in little fluting gestures. He inhales and exhales. He produces trills and pip-pips and chords that sound as if somebody had inadvertently stepped on a pipe organ. This young man is Larry Adler of Baltimore, Maryland, and he has made the harmonica respectable.

Adler is not only the gentleman made the harmonica a natural inhabitant of the dressing room but he has succeeded in drawing from it sounds of such astonishing loveliness and unabated fury that many conductors have laid hard on the line for the sake of having him as soloist, and Fritz Kreisler has granted that Mr. Adler has his permission to play Caprice Viennois until he has turned himself green. He has played before the king of England twice at commissioned performances; he has been paid $500 for one night to play for the king of Sweden; he was called before the late

Maurice Ravel to give an accounting on what he was doing to Bolero.

"Remarkable," cried the great composer, "but why do you play it so fast and why don't you play all of it?"

Mr. Adler replied rather tentatively that he played it fast because it was best fast on a mouth organ and didn't play it all because it tended to become repetitive.

"I like it the way it is," said M. Ravel, who died shortly after but not, it is believed, because of this.

What the young man (he is still only twenty-nine) started out to be was a pianist, but his formal career in this art ceased on that hot day in Baltimore when his mamma took him to a teacher and made the mistake of saying that the little man had already acquired some dubious mastery over the instrument.
The teacher beamed upon the genius and asked him to play something. He responded with Yes, We Have No Bananas, upon which the pedagogue recoiled as if she had been attacked by a bevy of demented moths and screamed:
"Take the little brat away!"

Thus thwarted, the little man waited until he saw a harmonica contest announced by a local paper. He had never played the strange object but nothing of this sort ever daunted Larry Adler.

He conquered the free-breather in two weeks' time and, naturally, won the city championship. This did nothing but un-settle the young wizard's mind. It obviously made it impossible for him to follow in his father's footsteps, which were those of a plumber, and it just as clearly indicated that a man of his talent couldn't remain mute and inglorious.
He came up to New York with his mouth organ in his hip pocket and started on the career of being a nuisance.

This spring our boy was playing in Keep Off the Grass with Jimmy Durante and Ray Bolger, but in 1928 he was a seventeen-year-old kid in New York over the week end with $10.70 in his pocket. Ma and Pa Adler wanted him to be a doctor or a lawyer but they gave him this one fling. If he could make it in New York, fine; otherwise back to a fate worse than death, to wit: Baltimore. He interviewed three theater managers and eight booking agents in one afternoon and was only saved from violence by his age.

Rudy Vallee had his own night club in those days and was somewhat startled to come into his dressing room after the first show and find himself confronted by a junior wraith who was playing a harmonica at him like a madman. Being on the crest of the wave at that period and slightly balmy from prosperity, Rudy was touched by the spectacle and put the kid on at the midnight show. The audience, narcotized by Vallee's voice and prohibition gin, thought the little tot was great. After several weeks, however, Vallee, obsessed by the notion that he was going to have this infant on his hands for life, palmed him off on Paul Ash, then master of ceremonies at the New York Paramount. Ash, being no sucker, passed him along to the nabobs of the Paramount Circuit, who hired him for thirty-six weeks to be a local boy in thirty-six different theaters from coast to coast.

"Ragged little urchin," says Larry.
"I'd be dragged up out of the audience in time to save the honor of Toledo.

(Continued on page 30)

MONAHAN

Daring Young Man

Struggle for supremacy on the flying trapeze—ten minutes of tense drama, high in the air

By Daniel Fuchs

ILLUSTRATED BY C. C. BEALL

"Isn't it all true, Georgie?" she asked him, her eyes shining. She could be sly, coquettish, perverse Litfin put his coffee cup down and to leave. He was almost at the door when he turned and walked back to Marty.

"Listen," he said. He seemed uncomfortable. "I didn't take your job. Nothing like that."

"I'm not asking you," Marty said, even looking at him.

"It's not the way it looks. I know it looks, but I didn't go out to get the job. Lucy Roche came to me and there was a spot in the act. She told me to go see Roche. He had a plan for me. So I went. I didn't know I had to go. I just thought Roche was a new man."

Marty glanced up at him. "You mean me out," he said quietly. "You want half my price. That's all there is in it."

"Listen, if you want to get sore, get sore at me. I haven't even got the old job in the act. Ferdie got it. I moved him up a week ago and put him down with the bunch of monkeys sends flying around for the preliminary stuff. So, as a matter of plain fact, I can't even say I got your job." His face had risen but now he calmed down and held himself stiff, in control. "No, it makes any difference to me what you think. Not that I care if you're sore, just wanted to say it, so you'd know."

"All right. You said it. I'm out. Goodby."

The boy halted a moment longer.

"You want money? Twenty bucks? Thirty? I could help you out. I—"

Marty cut him short. "No!" he said. "No! Get the hell off me. Beat it!"

Litfin smiled. His whole manner changed, becoming easy and contemptuous. He wasn't trying to make anything of it to Marty any longer.

"Okay," he said. "Any way you want to have it. I don't care." He hitched his pants up, smiled again and started for the door. He kept his shoulders high and there was something cocky swagger to his walk.

SARTO came up, his face showing relief that nothing had happened. He scolded Marty in the good-natured, fatherly way he had with the gym boys who ate at his place.

"What's the matter with you, Georgie?" he said. "What do you want to get mad at Nick Litfin for? He doesn't know what it's all about. He's just a fresh rooster, a kid first starting out. Don't be that way, Georgie. Don't get sore at the whole world."

"Maybe I feel like getting sore," Marty said.

"Ah, shut up, shut up," Sarto said, poking him in the ribs, but then his face changed. He knew it was almost a month that Marty had been out of the job with Roche and before that, before the summer season began, he had had little or no work at all that year. "Wait it out, feller," Sarto said earnestly. "You'll get a break. Sure thing."

"All right, I'm waiting," Marty said.

The café proprietor switched on the radio as he went back to work, and somebody with an accordion filled the room with a tune by Victor Herbert.

Marty looked around at the men sitting under the wall calendars which showed pictures of ladies with big breasts, half uncovered. Most of the acrobats here were out of work and they looked at the tabloids or foreign-language newspapers or else they just stared at the bright sidewalk outside. The trouble about them was their pride, in themselves and in their work, and that was funny because nobody wanted them to do what they could do. There were no tumbler acts. Nobody came to see skill on the trapeze any longer. It was a dying art, whichever you wanted to call it, maybe that was why these men were so proud and stubborn.

(Continued on page 42)

GEORGE MARTY walked into the Jersey Café promptly at noon, on time, but Cornling wasn't there for the appointment. Sarto, kneading dough near the ovens, saw who it was and came forward, looking worried. The café proprietor dusted the flour off his hands on his hips as he trotted up. He was so nervous that he seemed half comical. "Come on, Marty. Be a good guy," he said, coaxing softly to attract no attention. "No trouble now. No rough stuff in here, if you please." Marty didn't know what he was talking about at first. There were eight or ten other men in the place—trapeze workers like himself, tumblers, men with high-wire acts—and among them was Nick Litfin. The boy was finishing his breakfast. That was what it was, then. Sarto thought Marty was looking for the kid, to beat him up.

"I didn't come in for Litfin," Marty said. "Don't worry."

He walked away and sat down at one of the round-topped tables in a corner. Litfin had seen him, knew he was there, but went on with his meal, eating deliberately. Back at the stoves, Sarto smacked the lump of dough he was working up for the big Italian pies later on.

He kept his eyes fixed on the two of them. Marty forgot him, forgot Litfin, and wondered why Cornling had called him over from New York.

Now a Full Line OF CAB-OVER-ENGINE INTERNATIONALS!

Here's the New Model D-400

We've always wanted an in-between capacity, cab-over-engine truck.

Well, here it is—International's brand-new D-400—styled to the minute, incorporating features from both smaller and bigger models in the line, to make the best all-around traffic-type truck on the street.

Like all c.o.e. Internationals, the D-400 keeps the engine perfectly insulated under the seat—a practical International feature recognized by all owners. The engine is completely accessible and readily serviced. Load distribution is the ideal  $\frac{1}{3}$ - $\frac{2}{3}$ , balanced on front and rear axles on all four wheels.

The driver of this handsome truck gets all the breaks that make for efficient, safe operation. The cab provides wide visibility, perfect ventilation, nicely placed controls, and a comfortable adjustable seat. Brakes are hydraulic. Behind the driver is maximum-load space and short-wheelbase maneuverability.

Yes sir, cab-over-engine design solves the "tight-hauling" problem... And now you can go completely INTERNATIONAL in c.o.e. models. This new D-400 fits in the broad middle range between the very popular D-300 (13,200 lb. g. v. w.) and the beautiful heavy-duty D-500 and DR-700 (18,800 lb. and 26,900 lb. g. v. w.). Tell the International dealer or branch you want to "see and drive the new Model D-400!" And write for catalog.

INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER COMPANY
(INCORPORATED)

180 North Michigan Avenue

Chicago, Illinois

SURPRISING UTILITY!

The International D-400 is perfectly adaptable to MANY body and load variations. Four are shown here. Gross weight rating is 16,200 lb. And you can have the 2-speed-axle DS-400, with its extra-high ratio for economical speed and its extra-low ratio for economical power.

Rely on International ALL-TRUCK Trucks. In addition to the cab-over-engine sizes, the line includes standard chassis from  $\frac{1}{4}$ -ton light-delivery trucks to big 6-wheelers.

Copyright 1940, by International Harvester Company, Incorporated

INTERNATIONAL TRUCKS

Occupation: Widow

By William C. White

ILLUSTRATED BY GEORGE HOWE

The Story Thus Far:

CAROLA DIRLING, a singer, marries Paul Lesser, part owner with Rolf Blaerchen, a Nazi, of the night club at which she works in Berlin. A short time later, her young husband is killed in a mysterious "accident"—which she strongly suspects had been planned by Blaerchen!

Three years later, while she is in Rome, Blaerchen (who has become a power in the Foreign Office) forces her to return to Berlin and become a Foreign Office spy. She has one trusted friend—Karl Dietrich, with whom she presently falls in love. Working with Franz Ranke, Hans Klauss, Schebeler and others, Dietrich is plotting against the Hitler regime. Blaerchen (who professes to love Carola) loathes him.

Shocked by Blaerchen's brutalities, Carola finally rebels. Dietrich's employer, Franz Wagner, is opening a night club, Sans Souci. To his delight, she accepts an offer he has made her; then, "resigning" her espionage job, she begins rehearsing for her Sans Souci debut. . . . Karl Dietrich is arrested. Carola implores Blaerchen to order his release. And Blaerchen does so—but only after she has promised to make an engagement with Herr Praut, an important Nazi official.

By this time, Dietrich knows that Blaerchen is thoroughly dishonest—a conscienceless scoundrel. Working with von Maurer, a loyal Nazi; Froscetti, a member of the Italian embassy; Schebeler (who works at the Foreign Office) and others, he sets a trap for the crook. Knowing that Blaerchen will be at the Sans Souci opening, he tells Carola to sing one of her favorite songs that evening: The Handsome Widow. Then he sends an unsigned letter to Blaerchen—a letter in which he hints at a money-making possibility for the Nazi. He suggests that Blaerchen reply in a small newspaper advertisement reading, "Handsome widow, with brown hair and eyes," and give a box number.

His cupidity aroused, Blaerchen replies as directed. And von Maurer (whom he has never seen) meets him and, on the day of the nightclub opening, offers to purchase important secret Foreign Office data from him. To von Maurer's horror, Blaerchen leaps at the bait—says he will be glad to co-operate! . . .

The great night arrives. A brilliant crowd gathers at Sans Souci. Carola, nervous, excited, waits in her dressing room. A call boy enters. "Five minutes, Fräulein Dirling!"

VIII

KARL could not take his glance from Carola.

She smiled at him, for him. "I wish you were going on with me."

"I wish I were!"

"Wish me good luck, Karl!"

"The best of luck," he said.

"Stand near me, stand near," she said. She held fast to his arm as they stood for a moment in the wings. She seemed happy now, unconcerned, humming a song that Karl recognized very well. Then she kissed him again, lightly. "Remember, stand where I can see you!"

The curtain was up. Ritter, the master of ceremonies, said, "And now—!" He got no further. The audience knew what was coming and applause began at fortissimo. Carola smiled again and walked slowly to the stage. Now she was smiling for the audience.

The applause was louder, almost painful in the low-ceilinged room.

Karl looked at the audience. As if it were a planned entrance, carefully timed, Blaerchen and Praut, in green-gray Foreign Office uniforms, came to their front-row table. If Carola saw them she paid no attention. Karl chose a place behind the curtain, not fifteen feet from Carola, where she could see him and, more important, where he could watch Blaerchen, where he could search that face for some sign when Carola sang of the handsome widow.

As the applause quieted, Karl looked at Carola, expecting some sign of nervousness. He saw none. In her simplicity there was no place for fear. That beautiful simplicity was her strength and the audience saw it now and remembered. There was no need to be afraid of her. Not even the presence of Blaerchen and Praut a dozen feet away, where Carola had to see them, affected her. Blaerchen was smiling, laughing, turning to his friends with an air of proprietorship. The little, ugly fat man by his side did not smile. He just stared at Carola.

Then there was quiet, complete quiet, broken by a first chord from the piano. Looking into the room, Karl could see every face set, expectant, waiting. Carola began her first song, an old Austrian folk tune and the audience noticeably relaxed, settling back contentedly. Carola's voice did not waver once. Not once did she move or gesture or change the expression on her face, using perfectly her gift of making her audience think of the song and not the singer. The audience knew what she sang, and Karl could see the happy smiles on their faces.

When she finished, she glanced at him, to smile warmly, confidently.

Then Carola sang of the wife of the Hamburg fisherman. That had been the popular song of Berlin in 1934 and the audience cheered as if to entice back some small part of the past. Carola sang to repeat the song. Then she passed to Berlin songs, in the street dialect. Her smile was laughter now. Now she sang of a saucy street girl talking back to a cab driver, now a tired housewife arguing over a place at a bargain counter, now a perplexed mother with a string of small children, trying to shepherd them through a picnic at Wannsee. With these songs she was more than a singer. She was the saucy street girl, the tired housewife, the perplexed mother, one completely with the songs she sang.

SHE had only one more program song to sing, the story of a provincial and his wife in Berlin for a February holiday, of the husband's attempt to get off by himself for a little unchaperoned tour. Half the women in the audience looked at their own husbands.

Karl caught sight of Blaerchen, laughing. He could laugh now. He would laugh long.

Carola began the last verse and finished it. Then the piano's last chord sounded and Carola held a note over as soft and as fleeting as bird-flight.

Voices crying "Bravo" were louder than handclapping.

She had three encores to sing and did them, coming to the wings between each song. When she returned after the last one, Karl took her hand, held it a moment, and said, "Now, sing the Widow."

Carola moved toward the footlights as if to come closer to something that was going to enjoy. Karl did not watch her now; he was concentrated on Blaerchen. As the piano began an intro-

"You must not be worried," he said. "Other ladies have gone alone and gotten through." "Alone?" she asked.

CAUSE: Good old-fashioned Bulking

EFFECT: PALL MALL IS A SMOOTHER CIGARETTE

● Many smokers have wondered at the rare smoothness of Pall Mall.

This outstanding quality is the result of Pall Mall's rediscovery of the almost lost art of BULKING . . . an old-fashioned, slow and deliberate method for mellowing fine tobaccos.

In BULKING, the choice tobaccos used in Pall Mall are intermingled and . . . left to rest. The tobaccos themselves create a gentle warmth in which they bask. A slow miracle of nature transpires; harsh qualities grow mild, delicate flavors and aromas are released to infuse every shred of the tobacco. In time (and careful, conscientious, old-fashioned ways of working do take time), a fragrant mellowness results, providing a definitely smoother smoke.

It is significant, too, that with Pall Mall, there is noticeably less finger stain, or no finger stain at all.

Another advantage—the greater length of Pall Mall travels the smoke further; gives you a cooler cigarette.

Yourself, try Pall Mall critically!

"WHEREVER PARTICULAR PEOPLE CONGREGATE"

tion Carola focused her attention somewhere out in the audience. She sang one verse. Then the chorus:

*"Handsome widow,
Hair and eyes of brown,
Only twenty,
House in town—!"*

To Karl, intent on watching Blaerchen's face, the song was far away. As the chorus began, Blaerchen was whispering to Praut. If he heard the words, they meant nothing. His face did not change expression.

*"Seeks life's comrade,
Loyal, true.
Please send photo,
No postage due!"*

The audience laughed and Karl frowned in annoyance. More verses and more choruses would follow.

Carola finished the second verse. Again the chorus. Blaerchen was smiling as if he were enjoying this song more than any other.

Then, at the third line of the chorus Karl saw him jolt back in his chair. The smile was on his face but it was dried, like a withered remnant. Karl could smile now. Now Blaerchen was on the edge of his chair, not missing a word that Carola sang.

When the chorus was finished he glanced from side to side, looking quickly at his neighbors.

Karl did smile now almost sure that Blaerchen caught all that that chorus implied!

Without concern, Carola went into the third verse, the third and last chorus. There was no doubt about Blaerchen understanding now. He sat motionless, staring at Carola. And there was no trace of smile on his face.

Guards were put at the doors to keep the crowd backstage from getting any larger. Karl helped Carola find a way through and for a brief moment they were together in the dressing room. "Did you see Blaerchen?" she asked delightedly. "He knew, Karl, he knew!"

Wagner came in, followed by a dozen other people. In a moment the dressing room was as crowded as the rest of backstage. Karl could draw to one side contentedly. The next move was Blaerchen's but the song should have him checkmated.

After a little while the room cleared and Carola was ready to dress. "I'm tired now," she said simply. "I'd like to go and get a bite to eat. Then I want to sleep for a whole day!" She frowned. "What shall I tell Praut when he comes?"

"Tell him you aren't going with him!" He started to the door. "I'll wait for you outside." But before he could leave there was a little knock and the door opened without waiting for an answer. Blaerchen came in. He nodded to Karl then to Carola and said, "May I have a word alone with you?"

"Certainly."

Karl withdrew, and Carola sent the maid out. Blaerchen seemed cool, unconcerned, determined on something.

Blaerchen lit a cigarette and said carelessly, "You never sang more beautifully."

"Thank you!" Carola had not expected to have to face him alone.

She could not anticipate what he would say but she expected a storm of questions.

Instead Blaerchen said pleasantly, "I never heard such an audience reception!"

"Thank you!" Perhaps, in spite of everything, the implications of that song had passed him by. In that case she had reason to be afraid. But something searching in his glance made her sure he knew what that song meant. Something studied in his manner made her certain that he was here to ask about it.

"You are just as lovely as you used to be at the Krokodil," he continued, while she tried to weigh each word he said. Then, too sudden to be as casual as it sounded, he said, "You sang a song tonight I never heard you sing before!"

Carola nodded.

"What was it called?"

"The Handsome Widow."

"I never heard it before." His glance never left her face. "Where did you find it?"

"It's an old street song, like the others I sang."

"Interesting that you should sing it! How did the chorus go?"

That was unexpected! She could not repeat those words with that unwavering glance on her. "Don't you think I've sung enough tonight?" She tried to sound as if it were a totally unimportant matter.

His glance sharpened, then wavered. In the uncertainty of his glance she lost all fear. He did not know what else to ask! Unsure of himself, he did not know what to say, to do, and he could not conceal his dilemma. He began to pace the room, like an animal wanting a way to attack but not sure where to find it, not sure how it would be resisted.

Uncertainty was what Karl's scheme was planned to create. Its success was in Blaerchen's face, in his manner, even in his walk up and down the narrow dressing room.

"You were very kind to come back to see me," Carola said sweetly. She had to hold back a smile. "You'll excuse me now?" For the first time in their relationship Blaerchen was no longer the master, the man who could say, "Do this," or "Don't do that!"

A knock at the door interrupted them, a loud, demanding knock. Carola answered it and let in Herr Praut. He looked puffy in his Foreign Office uniform. Mopping the perspiration from his forehead and grinning at the same time he said, "You were wonderful! Wunderbar! Wunderbar!" He glanced knowingly at Blaerchen. Then, coming closer to Carola, "I can't tell you how much I enjoyed this evening. You'll be ready soon? I have the nicest party arranged."

Blaerchen was no longer the master and here was a chance to show it! Carola folded her hands like an obedient child, stepped back slightly, to face both men and said quietly, "I'm sorry, Herr Praut, but I'm not going."

"Wie?" Praut looked astonished. "But—!" He sounded astonished. "Herr Blaerchen—!" His face was red and perspiration broke on his forehead.

"I'm not going," Carola repeated, more clearly. "Now, if you gentlemen will excuse me, I must dress."

"Not going?" Praut reacted slowly. Then he turned from Carola to Blaerchen: "But Herr Blaerchen assured me—!"

"Herr Blaerchen does not make my engagements!"

"But before this evening began you said you were eager—!" Then, as if he had reached a sudden conclusion: "Why have you changed your mind?"

"I see no reason why I should explain that," Carola answered with a sharp glance at Blaerchen.

He was trying to appear unconcerned.

Praut rather swelled than straightened up. He clicked his heels. "Very well. Shall we go, Herr Blaerchen?"

Blaerchen started to say something, and checked himself. He followed Praut from the room.

Carola called back her maid and closed the door. She began to dance around. "Hurry, hurry," she said to the maid.

"Tonight was a great success, nicht wahr?" The maid beamed. "You were magnificent."

"It was an astounding success," Car-ola laughed. "And I was terrific!"

An hour later, alone with Karl in a little restaurant, she was jubilant. "It worked, Karl, it worked!" She laughed. "He was afraid of me!" Then she asked, "Is there nothing he can do to us?"

"What can he do? Arrest you? Arrest me? Then he has to risk having you tell the police what your song hints at."

"I wish you could have seen Praut's face!"

"I was outside waiting when they left your room," Karl said. "I saw his face, and Blaerchen's too. I'm sure Praut will demand some explanation from Blaerchen."

She sighed deeply. "It's unbelievable—no more threats!"

Karl smiled at her. There were other threats, from von Maurer, and, indirectly from Ranke. They were for another day. All that mattered tonight was that Carola was happy. . . .

Carola woke the next morning, to find sunlight and a pleasant day. It was luxury to lie abed, not to have to worry, and to remember every detail of the opening. She had Karl and they were in love and that would work out, somehow. Ahead was the success she had hoped for, ahead was a little more certainty about life, even in a cold, grim Berlin.

The telephone rang sharply. It was Wagner. He said gruffly, "Please come to my office at once."

"What's the matter?"

"Hurry! Please come!"

She had to make herself believe that nothing had happened to Karl. She hurried into her clothes, angry at herself for even thinking that a moment in this city would be free from worry.

She was relieved to see Karl waiting in Wagner's office. He said, "Hello," quietly. Wagner was pacing the floor.

"What's the matter?"

Wagner turned almost brutally. "We have an order from the police this morning to close the Sans Souci at once!"

For a moment she did not understand. Then she looked at Karl and saw the answer on his face. This was Blaerchen, doing something that could not be traced directly to him, an indirect hurt but a telling one.

Before she could say anything Wagner continued, "And I have an order to take all the artists I have on contract to Warsaw tomorrow."

"Why Warsaw?"

"To entertain the army of occupation there."

She heard it, understood it, but she was too confused to think clearly now.

"You see, Carola," Karl said gently, coming to her, "Warsaw is closed to the private German citizen. No one can go there without army permission."

"I don't understand!" She looked at him helplessly.

He explained for her: "I will not be permitted to go! You must go alone!"

"But I can't, I can't! I won't go!"

"You have no choice," Wagner said. "It's army orders." He began to pace nervously. "Everything is ruined! I'm going out for headache medicine!"

To be separated from Karl, in a strange city—! Carola asked simply, "Blaerchen?"

Karl nodded.

"Why can't we use what we know against him?"

"Blaerchen is clever," Karl said. "He gambles that we won't use it because the police would question us too. To have a threat over him is one thing, to have to use that threat—well, that makes it difficult for us."

Carola understood.

"I never expected we'd have to use what we know," Karl added.

"There must be something we can do. I can't go to Warsaw—!"

"There is one way we can be together, one way you'll be safe."

"I'll do anything," she said ately.

"I know that." Then, slowly must try to get out of Germany today!"

Karl had to walk some distance he found a public telephone chance to call Klaus. When he a woman answered in an old voice, "Herr Klaus is not well."

"May I speak to him?" It was not to sound desperate.

"Herr Klaus is not well." The connection was broken off.

He did not hesitate for a moment a decision. He had to go to his apartment, no matter what he might find there. Minutes were valuable, no matter how dangerous it might be, and Carola had to arrange to find him at once.

He found Klaus's apartment, in a house by the Spree. No one answered the knock. Usually Klaus was there and the silence now inflamed his nerves.

He had always taken Klaus for granted; it was unbelievable that anything should happen to him. He had courage, tenacity, the ability to turn fear aside, knowing that it did not in tight circumstances.

Again Karl knocked, and again waited. Then the door opened and an old woman looked out suspiciously.

"Who do you want?"

"Herr Klaus, bitte."

"He is not in."

"I must see him," Karl said desperately. Every minute counted. "Where is he?"

The woman was about to shut the door without answering when Karl heard Klaus call from a room, "It's all right, Berthe. Let the young man in."

Karl followed her into the study. A few minutes later Klaus came and as he walked into the light Karl was a different man. Once he had been young, unaging, as impervious to emotion as a slide rule. Now, in old slippers, his shirt open at the collar, he looked like an old man, his face deeply lined with years in the passing of hours.

"You'll excuse my coming," Klaus began. Then he forgot why he had come. "What's the matter? Is something wrong?"

Before Klaus could answer another man came into the room, a young, attractive man. It was Kuhlmann. He had met him at the railroad station.

"You've met," Klaus said without looking at Kuhlmann.

"Herr Kuhlmann is from the Gestapo."

The room whirled about.

"He is in the Gestapo," Klaus continued, "but he has been one of my loyal assistants, an invaluable source of information."

Karl felt steadier. He managed to smile at Kuhlmann.

In a monotone Klaus continued. He just brought me news. Dr. Rankin's son-in-law—!"

"What about him?" Karl could not catch in his throat.

"He is dead!"

Karl fumbled for something to say, and said nothing.

"He killed himself." In a cold voice Klaus continued, "Some of his friends set fire to a munitions factory in Treptow on Sunday. My son-in-law was not caught and Herr Kuhlmann says he was not even suspected but felt that he might be cornered and killed himself, to avoid being forced to give information." Klaus wavered little under the strain. "Thanks to the Gestapo has not got our trail time."

The old man could be proud and was pride in his grief.

Kuhlmann excused himself.

"Let me know what you can," Klaus said gravely. "And thank you!"

When Kuhlmann had gone Karl

HERE'S A HOT ONE ABOUT INSULATION!

• The Hindu fakir walks over a bed of red hot coals barefoot without burning himself! A miracle? Hardly. He merely insulates his body against heat with a damp mixture of salt and alum; and just before starting his walk over fire, he stands for a moment on a "sacred" mat on which more of the same insulating mixture has been deposited.

AND here's another hot one—the engine in your motor car.

A running engine gets hot, you know. And the hotter the day the hotter it runs—hot enough to break down ordinary oil.

But not Havoline Motor Oil. It's insulated by an exclusive Texaco process to stand up to heat.

Insulated Havoline won't break down—won't form harmful varnish or sludge in your engine.

Insulated Havoline is also distilled to eliminate carbon-forming impurities—to keep your engine clean and sweet running.

For safety and economy, change to Insulated Havoline Motor Oil at Texaco and other good dealers everywhere. No finer oil at any price.

TEXACO DEALERS INVITE YOU TO tune in the TEXACO STAR THEATRE—Starring Kenny Baker and Frances Langford—Every Wednesday Night—Columbia Network—9:00 E.D.T., 8:00 E.S.T., 8:00 C.D.T., 7:00 C.S.T., 6:00 M.S.T., 5:00 P.S.T.

DISTILLED AND INSULATED

... AGAINST HEAT... AGAINST COLD

"SURE I'M A TIGHTWAD when I buy a car on Time."

"And I Always Do My Own Figuring"

THOUSANDS of people these days are making their car dollars go farther by figuring the financing cost themselves. This is made easy by the GMAC Payment Chart which shows what you get and what you pay, right to the penny. With all the facts and figures in your pocket you'll know how and where the General Motors Instalment Plan saves money—how it gives you the insurance protection you need. Payments can be arranged to fit your budget, based on the amount of time you want, and the amount you wish to pay monthly. The plan is a complete General Motors service! To be sure of low-cost financing for your next car, send today for your

GENERAL MOTORS

You know what you get You know what you pay

"Open Book"

Instalment PLAN

This plan is available only through dealers in CHEVROLET, PONTIAC, OLDSMOBILE, BUICK, LA SALLE and CADILLAC cars.

"figuring chart"!

NO SALESMAN WILL CALL

GENERAL MOTORS ACCEPTANCE CORPORATION
1775 Broadway, New York 8-7
Please send copy of the GMAC Payment Chart for car checked below.

☐ CHEVROLET ☐ PONTIAC ☐ OLDSMOBILE ☐ BUICK ☐ LA SALLE ☐ CADILLAC

Name _____
Address _____
City _____
County _____ State _____ U. S. A.

silent, remembering the man's kindness to him, angry at having nothing to say that could soothe or comfort. This was the morning that he had to come, to discuss plans for going abroad.

Klauss sat up a little straighter. "Thanks to what my son-in-law did, the police have gotten no trail to me. But I feel like an old man now and this is work for younger men. If younger men do not do it, then, when we old men go, the work will stop. And for Germany and, perhaps, for the world, too, there will be no hope."

In a moment Karl would have to ask about arrangements for going abroad!

He walked to the window and looked down on the little Spree River. The world outside was washed clean by a blowing cold rain, as clean as if a thousand Hausfrauen had scrubbed since dawn.

Not far away Carola was waiting nervously. Here, in a book-lined room, an old man sat mutely with his grief. And in two or three days, with luck, Karl and Carola, too, might be abroad, free from the pressures of German life. He had a right to that. He had had three years in concentration camp, he had to think of Carola, facing something worse than concentration camp.

Klauss broke the silence: "I didn't expect you, Karl. Is there something I can do for you?"

He had to risk the old man's reproof. "I asked you some time ago about arrangements for getting abroad. Things have happened to us very fast. We must risk the journey."

"Certainly." The old man answered without reproof. "I can help you. At once?"

"At once." It was hard to answer his questions, harder to expect some rebuke, some criticism, and not to hear it.

"Very well." Klauss said firmly, "Take the train to Stettin. At eight o'clock tonight go into Schwartz's bar, near the waterfront. After a short time the proprietor will come to you; ask about 'Cousin Heinrich.' Fishing boats leave each night and he will get you on one of them and out past Wollen Island to the Baltic. Then, if they can make any contact with Swedish fishing boats, they will transfer you. Take nothing with you, no baggage at all, but take money. It will cost you about a thousand marks."

Karl looked for something in Klauss' voice but it was not there. If Klauss felt that this was desertion, he gave no sign.

"Good luck, my boy," Klauss added. He stood up. "You will excuse me now, Karl. I must lie down and sleep for a little while. Later I have much work to do. Auf Wiedersehen!"

Not one word of criticism, of complaint, of disappointment!

THEN Karl understood. There was no place in the Underground for those who had to be asked to do its work. Those people were valueless. "Take no baggage," Klauss had said, but Karl knew he would have to take something else abroad, something heavy and not as easily put aside as a valise. He would remember on quiet nights, in a foreign land, the old man who said simply, "I have much work to do." With that memory and the memory of flight there would be no peace in those quiet nights, with or without Carola. There would be quiet and safety, but there would be no peace.

"I shall telegraph my friends in Stettin to expect two people tonight," Klauss concluded.

Karl hesitated for a moment. Then he shook his head. "No! Just one person!"

Klauss looked up. His sad eyes showed that he understood. . . .

Karl pushed through the blowing rain on his way to Carola's. She could get along in Stockholm without him; she could find work in a night club there some day, in some happier time, she could meet again. She might not understand now; she might even refuse by herself. He was sure that if he told her the truth she would say, "I stay, I shall stay, too."

The fine rain beat like netting on his face.

He could not tell her the truth. She had to go or be hounded by Blaerchen by Praut. It was difficult to plan what to say to her but he would in of something.

CAROLA was eager but not impatient. "Have you made the arrangements?"

"Yes." It would be hard to lie to her but it had to be done and it would be acting. He told her all that Klauss had said about what to do in Stettin. He did not mention Ranke.

She did not ask one word about the journey. "We had better go at once," she said. "Blaerchen called me a little while ago. He wants to see me this afternoon. He sounded angry."

Karl agreed. "Have you money?" "Wagner has been generous. I have several thousand marks."

"Good! There is a train for Stettin in an hour or so." He paused. He had sounded truthful, yet without any special effort. "Take that train. I will be there this afternoon."

"Shan't we go together?" She seemed to have missed the implication.

"We may attract attention if we go together, if anyone is watching us."

"When will you come?"

"I shall arrive in Stettin before eight o'clock tonight, my dearest."

Carola rose from her chair and went to the window. Karl watched, feeling like an inexperienced actor alone on a large stage, his lines lost. Not for a minute did she say anything. The old man didn't like that. I hate to be separated from you!"

"We must do it."

"But if something should happen to you in the next few hours and I was in Stettin and you do not come? I would know what I shall do!"

"Nothing can happen." He was sure that she was grasping at any excuse to hide her uneasiness. "Let's be realistic. If I should be delayed, you must go through with all plans. Promise me that! I'll come and meet you at the gleezer in Stockholm."

She turned around quickly and looked at him. "I can't go alone!"

"You must, dearest. Believe me, it's best!"

She looked at him with a look that went through him. "And you will be low this afternoon?"

"I will follow." He kept a steady set face.

"I don't think I have the courage to go, Karl. I'm so afraid, I don't want to go alone." She clung to him, without any suspicion that he was deceiving her but feeling something unusual in his insistence.

"There's little time," Karl said mechanically. "You must not pack anything. Just leave things as they are."

"I can't take anything?" She looked around the apartment, at the pile of music, the clothes in the closets, the little ornaments on the dressing table.

"Nothing but money and whatever jewelry you have."

"I have no jewelry." Her voice trembled and she began to cry. "I can't go out you, Karl, I can't!"

He had not anticipated this and felt helpless as he held her close to him.

The telephone bell startled her. She watched as she went to answer, mechanically, her face pale, her eyes fixed.

She said nothing but, "Yes, yes," giving Karl no clue to the conversation. Then, before putting down the receiver, ed one phrase. "Yes, Herr Praut,"

d. "Yes!"
t was—!"
ala nodded. "He is outraged at der to send me to Warsaw. He ve it countermanded at once."
ice was dry.
is impossible that Praut could be
ed!

insists on seeing me immediy?"

discuss my going with him to next week!" She looked deter-now. "I am going, Karl."

ng?"
Stettin! If you say I must go shall go. Praut's voice reminded things I had forgotten. You'll take ernoon train?"

"Each repeated falsehood was difficult.

n we shall only be separated for hours. Tell me again the name bar in Stettin and what I am was ready in five minutes. "Are ng with me to the station?"

ill be best for you to go alone.
sure you aren't followed." To ewell would be hard, to know that t be farewell forever, but to give of that. He had to force himself casual as if they were separata half-hour.

go now," she said, still under con-hen she broke. "I feel that we're ing for all time!"

only a few hours, sweetheart!"
d to be cheerful and it was a dis-tempt. "I'll meet you at eight,
!"

all be frantic until I see you."

n't worry. I love you, Carola."

ve you." She held to him. Her as soft against his cheek and the her flesh was fresh and sweet.
was their parting.

throughout the day increased at tfall. Just before eight, Carola toward the harbor at Stettin. She ert and awake now, conscious of d, of the wind from the north.
had passed in dazed uneasiness
e would be with Karl soon and i no more.

had arrived in Stettin in the late oon and had walked the streets.
to a hotel might attract attention
the Gestapo flourished in the cial cities. Twice she walked down harbor. The gray water looked but it was a road to freedom and ier world. She found Schwartz's little place, with empty, dirty in an unwashed window. She enter, but as night came quickly e black-out seemed more dense than in Berlin she was glad she had learned the way.

The thought of leaving Germany forever, in a few hours, was of no importance to her. Her return from Rome had brought her close to Karl and she was glad for that. It had brought proof for herself that Blaerchen knew about Paul's murder but that knowledge was in no form to be used against him. She had never felt any desire for revenge.
The best possible revenge would be to escape from his hold on her and forever.
More fervent than any thought of revenge was her hatred of him, at what he had just done to her, because he prevented her and Karl from living quietly, because he had forced them to this dangerous flight.

It was a moment before eight. Somewhere, through this same blackness
Karl would be hurrying toward her.

She went into Schwartz's, half expecting to find him there waiting. The only person in the place was the proprietor who stood behind a small bar. He was short, fat man, wearing a vest over an old shirt and a dirty apron. He nodded as she came in and followed her to a table. She sat facing the door, to see Karl as he came in sight.

"Good evening, Fräulein," Schwartz said.

She remembered what she had been told to say, "How is Cousin Heinrich?"

Schwartz smiled. "I expected you. I have something hot for you to drink and something to eat. You must be hungry."

"I am." She watched the door, not Schwartz. It was a few minutes after eight.

"Don't be uneasy," Schwartz said.
"An old friend of mine will be here shortly to take you to his boat. You must not be worried." He was about to go to the kitchen. "Other ladies have gone alone and gotten through."

"Alone?"
Schwartz looked surprised. "Is someone with you?"

"Someone is coming!"
"Aber—Fräulein is surely mistaken!
No one else is coming."

Carola jumped up. "What do you mean?"

"I beg pardon, Fräulein." Schwartz was confused. "I had a telegram. It said just one person—!"

"Are you sure?" Carola's voice was hollow.

"Certain!" In a second everything was clear. That explained Karl's insistence on her coming alone.

Without a word, while Schwartz stood helplessly tugging at his vest, Carola wrapped her coat around her and ran out into the rain, into the street now filling with fog.

(To be concluded next week)

ABBIE AN'SLATS

—by Raeburn Van Buren

PERRY BARLOW

WHY let yourself suffer those dull days due to constipation? Why bring on the need for emergency medicines, when there may be a far better way? That way is to KEEP regular by getting at the cause of the trouble. If it's common constipation, due to lack of the right kind of "bulk" in the diet, a crisp crunchy cereal—KELLOGG'S ALL-BRAN—will supply just what you need. Eat it every day, drink plenty of water, and "Join the Regulars"! ALL-BRAN is made by Kellogg's in Battle Creek.

Copyright, 1940, by Kellogg Company

Join the "Regulars" with KELLOGG'S ALL-BRAN

Shore leave—and all was not well...

The second day ashore—the day of the Admiral's Ball—I developed a headache and a logy, sick feeling. I knew I needed a laxative. "There goes today's fun," I grumbled: "a laxative won't clear up this trouble for hours." "Take Sal Hepatica," advised my pal: "that'll help fix you up in a hurry."

So into the drugstore he piloted me and while the clerk mixed up a fizzy, sparkling glass of Sal Hepatica, my friend explained. "Sal Hepatica helps you fast two ways. First, it acts fast as a laxative—usually within an hour. Second, Sal Hepatica helps counteract excess gastric acidity, sweetens a sour stomach. You just try it." I did and...

Soon, my head clearer, my pep returning, I danced every dance at the Ball. And when I headed for the ship again, what do you think I had for cargo? A bottle of Sal Hepatica! "Why waste a whole day—on shore or at sea, feeling bad," opined I, "when Sal Hepatica can have you ship-shape in no time?"

SAL HEPATICA

for a faster come-back

TUNE IN! Abbott and Costello—laughs, music—Wed. at 9 P. M., E. D. S. T.

Blow by Blow

Continued from page 21

Terre Haute and Trenton. Cheers of local pride from all sides."

Finally, as was inevitable, he wound up at the Palace in New York, the ragged-newsboy harmonica player in a Gus Edwards unit. This would have meant nothing except that somebody told Eddie Cantor there was a kid down at the Palace imitating him and he came down on the run to tell the thief to lay off. After catching the act, Cantor installed himself in young Larry's life as a sort of Dutch uncle, which he remains to this day.

Cantor got him a job in Ziegfeld's Smiles, with the Astaires and Marilyn Miller, and this was a considerable step upward because it gave him a chance to get rid of the newsboy costume and also of the harmonica technique which was making the nights horrid in American variety houses. Instead of fox chases and imitations of birds and locomotives, he started to concentrate on making music. He went into a Lou Holtz revue and then into Flying Colors and then night descended upon Mr. Adler, vaudeville, stage and America. In short, the depression.

Stranded in Chicago, Larry had another inspiration: He wired Sid Grauman in Hollywood: "Larry Adler is great stop sign him without further delay. Signed Lou Lipstone." Next morning he went into Lipstone's office to submit to arrest; but Lipstone was no dope. He answered a phone call from Grauman and said the telegram meant just what it said. Larry Adler was great; sign him without further delay; get him out of Cook County. Larry went out to Hollywood, appeared in the Grauman stage show and was a riot.

The English Fell Hard

But it was when C. B. Cochran took him over to London to star in Streamline that his fame really spread. The English went completely off their tops about him. In addition to the show, he did four club engagements a night, playing at the Embassy Club, the Trocadero, the Savoy Hotel and the Berkeley Hotel. His recording of Smoke Gets in Your Eyes sold 200,000 copies. The Larry Adler harmonica sold 360,000 instruments through advance advertising before the first mouth organ rolled out of the factory. He put on his own revue, backed by his own money, and played forty-four weeks to tremendous business. His recordings of classical music by Kreisler, de Falla and Ravel sold as well as his popular numbers.

At twenty-three the kid from Bryant Avenue, Baltimore, was famous and wealthy. To settle the standing of the harmonica once and for all, he gave a concert in Grotian Hall, featuring the music of Vivaldi, Frank Bridge (English modernist), Kreisler and improvisations on three themes by Duke Ellington. And, finally, with the composer Cyril Scott at the piano, he gave the premiere performance of Scott's Serenade for harmonica and piano. He played his recital in tails, like Heifetz.

William Walton, the noted English composer, was moved to declare: "There are only two great instrumentalists in the world—Yehudi Menuhin and Larry Adler." Larry bowed his head in humility and thought of Gus Edwards and Baltimore. He toured the Continent and was a sensation in Paris. Albert Coates began writing a concerto for harmonica and orchestra for him. His empire tour was a series of triumphs, ending with his appearance with the Sydney Symphony, playing selected arrangements of the Brahms, Vivaldi and Bach etc. Adler is no longer a cherub but an extremely young-looking man, thin, very large-eyed and very looking somewhat like an Arab. He is accounted sharp of tongue. He is married to an English girl who is a good-looking. They have a five-month-old baby and the family have no plans for the little one.

But it is about the harmonica that man has views.

"Anybody can learn it," he says, a magnanimous liar. In truth, a complicated instrument. In addition to breathing both ways almost simultaneously, the operator has to hold a gadget at the side which regulates sharps and flats. For any decent player must be able to cover the holes of the instrument with his fingers but manipulate the tongue so that it may come through one of the apertures. Simple indeed!

An Expert in One Key

Larry can make your hair stand on end with the Bolero or with George Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue. When he is playing the piano, he plays the piano method acquired almost by instinct. He can't read a note and his fingering is much like Harpo Marx's harp technique but the proper tunes come forth. He can play in the key of C. He once had a controversy with Fred Astaire, another self-made pianist who keeps within the limits of mediocrity. He was to accompany sister Adele on Alexander Woollcott's radio program and she showed up with a demand that the number should not be done in one-half tone higher.

"Seven sharps!" moaned the pianist. "Nothing but the black keys."

Nevertheless Adele insisted, the program was about to go on the air and Larry was stuck. It was much like asking a man to run out and complete the Beethoven Cycle. Experts say this will probably go down as the only time in history that an accompanist finished a program without hitting a single right note.

Mr. Adler, complete with tails, was exhibiting his art at the Starlight Room of the Waldorf-Astoria for the remainder of the summer. After that he plans to tour a concert tour with Paul Draper. They will dance, Larry will harmonica and they will both be dressed to the nines. Draper is a great one for doing the fugal fugues of Bach and the madrigals of Purcell. Larry can play anything set down on a piece of music—provided it is played over enough times. He will hand on the phonograph until the hang of it. They will be very surprised if people are not overwhelmed.

The Patriotic Murders

Continued from page 20

like Blunt—men who hark back to the past—men who want to live as their fathers lived or even as their fathers lived! You've got a lot of old men in England—crusted old diehards—useless, worn-out symbols of a bygone era. And they've got to go! They've got to be a new world. Do you see a new world, see?"

He sighed and rose. He said, "I know, Raikes, that you are an idealist."

"What if I am?"

"I'm much of an idealist to care about the death of a dentist."

Raikes said scornfully, "What a death of one miserable dentist!"

Poirot said, "It does not matter. It matters to me. That is the difference between us."

He arrived home to be informed by George that a lady was waiting to see him.

"Is—ahem—a little nervous, sir," said George.

The lady had given no name, but Poirot was at liberty to guess. He was wrong, for the young woman came agitatedly from the sofa as he was the late Mr. Morley's secretary, Miss Gladys Nevill.

"Dear, M. Poirot. I am so sorry to trouble you like this—and really I don't know how I had the courage to come to you—I'm afraid you'll think it very silly of me—and I'm sure I don't want to waste your time—I know what time is to a busy professional man—but I have been so unhappy—only I know you will think it all a waste of time."

By a long experience of the people, Poirot suggested a cup of tea. Miss Nevill's reaction was all that could be hoped for.

"Really, M. Poirot, that's very kind of you. Not that it's so very long, but one can always do without a cup of tea, can't one?"

Poirot, who could always do without tea, assented mendaciously. George, instructed to this effect and in a very short time Poirot and his guest faced each other across a tea table.

"I must apologize to you," said Miss Nevill, regaining her usual aplomb under the influence of the beverage, "but the matter of fact the inquest yesterday was a good deal."

"I'm sure it must have," said Poirot.

"There was no question of my giving evidence, or anything like that. But I'm sure I ought to go with Miss Reilly."

"Mr. Reilly was there, of course, but he meant a woman. Besides, Miss Reilly doesn't like Mr. Reilly. So I'm sure it was my duty to go."

"It was very kind of you," said Poirot, encouragingly.

"No, I just felt I had to. You see, I worked for Mr. Morley for quite a number of years now—and the whole thing was a great shock to me—and, of course, the inquest made it worse—I'm afraid it must have."

Nevill leaned forward earnestly. "It's all wrong, M. Poirot. It's all wrong."

"What is wrong, Mademoiselle?"

"Well, it just couldn't have happened the way they make out—giving a man an overdose in injecting the gum."

"Think not?"

"I'm sure about it. Occasionally people suffer ill effects, but that is because they are physiologically unfit" subjects—their heart action isn't normal. But I'm sure that an overdose is a very rare thing. You see practitioners get so into the habit of giving the regulation amount that it is absolutely mechanical—they'd give the right dose automatically."

Poirot nodded approvingly. He said, "That is what I thought myself, yes."

"It's so standardized, you see. It's not like a chemist who is making up different amounts the whole time, or multiplying dosage where an error might creep in through inattention. Or a doctor who writes a great many different prescriptions. But a dentist isn't like that at all."

"You did not ask to be allowed to make these observations in the coroner's court?"

Gladys Nevill shook her head. She twisted her fingers uncertainly.

"You see," she broke out at last, "I was afraid of—of making things worse. Of course I know that Mr. Morley wouldn't do such a thing—but it might make people think that he—that he had done it deliberately."

Poirot nodded.

"That's why I came to you, M. Poirot. Because with you it—it wouldn't be official in any way. But I do think somebody ought to know how—how unconvincing the whole thing is!"

"Nobody wants to know," said Poirot. She stared at him, puzzled.

Poirot said, "I should like to know a little more about that telegram you received summoning you away that day."

"Honestly, I don't know what to think about that, M. Poirot. It does seem so queer. You see, it must have been sent by someone who knew all about me—and Aunt—where she lived and everything."

"Yes, it would seem as though it must have been sent by one of your intimate friends, or by someone who lived in the house and knew all about you."

"None of my friends would do such a thing, M. Poirot."

"You have no ideas yourself on the subject?"

The girl hesitated. She said slowly, "Just at first, when I realized that Mr. Morley had shot himself, I wondered if he could possibly have sent it."

"You mean, out of consideration for you, to get you out of the way?"

The girl nodded.

"BUT that really seemed a fantastic idea, even if he had got the idea of suicide in his mind that morning. It's really very odd. Frank—my friend, you know—was quite absurd at first about it. He accused me of wanting to go off for the day with somebody else—as though I would do such a thing."

"Is there a somebody else?"

Miss Nevill blushed.

"No, of course there isn't. But Frank has been so different lately—so moody and suspicious. Really, you know, it was losing his job and not being able to get another. Just hanging about is so bad for a man. I've been very worried about Frank."

"He was upset, was he not, to find you had gone away that day?"

"Yes, you see, he came round to tell me he had got a new job—a marvelous job—ten pounds a week. And he couldn't wait. He wanted me to know right away. And I think he wanted Mr. Morley to know too, because he'd been very hurt at the way Mr. Morley didn't appreciate him, and he suspected Mr. Morley of trying to influence me against him."

"Which was true, was it not?"

"Well, yes, it was, in a way! Of

"Not a Bite"

...Velvet
smokes MILD and COOL

JACK CLAYTON
Former Surf-Casting Champion

A fisherman with Velvet is a fisherman with luck. That mellow Burley flavor takes the "bite" out of a pipe and makes a cigarette smoke right. Whether you catch 'em or whether you don't, Velvet smoking's the best to be had!

Velvet

the Right Word for Smooth Smoking

MILD and COOL
Positively NO "BITE"

"Names...familiar as household words, freshly remembered!"

—Shakespeare (King Henry V, iv. 3)

What's in a Name?

By ALEXANDER McQUEEN

MANY WORDS commonly used in our everyday speech can be traced back to the names of famous men and places. Here are a few "tributes to greatness" with which the English language has been enriched. Who can tell? Your own name may become a part of the language of future generations.

SAXOPHONE

Most people don't know that the inventor of the saxophone, exactly 100 years ago, was Adolphe Sax; but they repeat his name whenever they mention that melodious instrument. So you see, its nickname of "sax" is really right after all.

LA VALLIÈRE

She flourished in the time of Louis XIV, but lives on today in the name of a type of necklace which she made famous—Louise Françoise de La Vallière, whose picture you see above.

TRUDGEN

Swimmers who use the trudgen stroke—the predecessor of the Australian crawl—might give a thought to John Trudgen, the man who devised the stroke in 1863. It is wrong to spell it "trudgeon".

BOBBY

It's the name of Sir Robert Peel, who in 1823 made a good job of reorganizing the London Police Force.

SILHOUETTE

"Etienne de Silhouette is stingy!" That's what folks said in France, two hundred years ago, about the man in charge of the nation's money-bags. Today the artist who draws a "silhouette" uses the fewest possible lines to make his picture.

CEREAL

Ceres, goddess of vegetation and grain, gave us the word for breakfast food, and supplied the name of the chief ingredient used in the beer that made Milwaukee famous.

FAHRENHEIT

Thanks to Mr. Gabriel D. Fahrenheit, born in Danzig on May 14, 1686, the freezing point for most of us is 32 degrees above zero. What would we talk about if we didn't know how hot it was?

Louise de La Vallière

BLANKET

Thomas Blanket loomed fine fabrics in Bristol, England, in the middle of the fourteenth century. His nice, warm woolly cloth became famous; some say that's where we get our word "blanket".

POINSETTIA

When you admire the large scarlet leaves of the poinsettia, just remember its noted sponsor, a gentleman named Joel R. Poinsett, of South Carolina. He brought it from Mexico 100 years ago.

SIDEBURNS

Time has left untouched one of the lesser monuments of General Ambrose E. Burnside—the use of his name, usually transposed as "sideburns", to denote the kind of whiskers he wore.

TARIFF

On the southernmost tip of Spain, beyond Gibraltar, there lies the town of Tariffa, where (legend tells us) a tax or toll was once collected from every ship that passed through the narrow neck of the Mediterranean. Some town's name was the today's word, "tariff".

any years ago, a Mr.
Plantagenet Guppy,
in the British West In-
some small tropical fish British Museum. Today
these poor fish Guppies.

PURIZE

you speak of a beverage pasteurized, you render to Louis Pasteur, who

ning!

probably contributed more to public health than any other man who ever lived.

POMPADOUR

Men and women who comb their locks straight up from the forehead are following a style set and named two hundred years ago by Madame de Pompadour.

VANDYKE

A neat style of pointed beard was made popular in the seventeenth century by Anthony Van Dyck, Flemish portrait painter,
whose name we still apply to a neatly trimmed
"Vandyke".

SANDWICH

In 1762, John
Montagu, Fourth

Earl of Sandwich, sat in a card game that lasted twenty-four hours. He called for layers of beef between slices of bread. Hence the word "sandwich".

* * *

There are some words, used everywhere, which have acquired such wealth of meaning that the thought they convey can be expressed in no other way.
These words are the names of great products.

So great has the name and fame of one product become that it has made a city famous.

This name is SCHLITZ.

And no wonder this grand old brew is known as "The Beer That Made Milwaukee Famous"! Served and preferred in more than 61 countries of the world—asked for by name in far-away places from Nome to Calcutta—Schlitz has long been acclaimed the greatest name in beer.

An Even Finer SCHLITZ

And today an even finer Schlitz, in the famous brown bottle, with its distinguished new label, carries on the tradition of leadership.

Truly, Schlitz is the beer to drink in celebration of the great occasions of life when nothing but the finest will do.

Order Schlitz today and discover for yourself how really good a bottle of beer can be.

Visit the Schlitz Palm Garden, New York World's Fair

EATEST

NAME IN BEER

Schlitz

For almost a century the supreme quality of Schlitz Draught Beer has made it the choice of those who love real draught beer

Copyright 1940, Jos. Schlitz Brewing Company, Milwaukee, Wis.

THAT MADE MILWAUKEE FAMOUS

HERE'S DAGGER-TOOTHED TYRAN-

NOSAURUS, who lived 60 million years ago. But even before that, Nature was mellowing and filtering the crude oils used today in refining Sinclair lubricants. These oldest crudes make such fine lubricants that...

...AIRLINERS IN THE U. S. FLY OVER 78,000 MILES DAILY ON SINCLAIR

Pennsylvania Motor Oil, a distance equal to more than 3 times around the world. This is the same quality Sinclair Pennsylvania Motor Oil sold by your nearby Sinclair Dealer. Try Opaline or Sinclair Pennsylvania in your car. You'll find they last so long they save you money.

"Miss American Aviation" — 1940 — Stewardess Margaret Mellon of Chicago & Southern Air Lines was awarded the title at this year's National Air Carnival.

course Frank has lost a good many jobs and he hasn't been, perhaps, what most people would call very steady. But it will be different now. I think one can do so much by influence, don't you, M. Poirot? If a man feels a woman expects a lot of him, he tries to live up to her ideal of him."

Poirot sighed. But he did not argue. He had heard many hundreds of women produce that same argument, with the same blithe belief in the redeeming power of a woman's love. Once in a thousand times, he supposed, cynically, it might be true.

He merely said, "I should like to meet this friend of yours."

"I'd love to have you meet him, M. Poirot. But just at present Sunday is his only free day. He's away in the country all the week, you see."

"Ah, on the new job. What is the job, by the way?"

"Well, I don't exactly know, M. Poirot. Something in the secretarial line, I imagine. Some government department. Things are so hush-hush nowadays. I know I have to send letters to Frank's London address and they get forwarded."

"That is a little odd, is it not?"

"Well, I thought so—but Frank says it is often done." Her voice lowered mysteriously. "I think, you know, it may be something in the Intelligence."

Poirot looked at her for a moment or two without speaking.

Then he said deliberately, "Tomorrow is Sunday, is it not? Perhaps you would both give me the pleasure of lunching with me—at Logan's Corner House? I should like to discuss this sad business with you both."

"Well—thank you, M. Poirot. I—yes, I'm sure we'd like to lunch with you very much."

FRANK CARTER was a fair young man of medium height. His appearance was cheaply smart. He talked readily and fluently. His eyes were set rather close together and they had a way of shifting uneasily from side to side when he was embarrassed.

He was inclined to be suspicious and slightly hostile.

"I'd no idea we were to have the pleasure of lunching with you, M. Poirot. Gladys didn't tell me anything about it."

He shot her a rather annoyed glance as he spoke.

"It was only arranged yesterday," said Poirot, smiling. "Miss Nevill is very upset by the circumstances of Mr. Morley's death and I wondered if we put our heads together—"

Frank Carter interrupted him rudely: "Morley's death? I'm sick of Morley's death! A lot of better men than he are being killed every day now. Why can't you forget him, Gladys? There wasn't anything so wonderful about him that I can see."

"Oh, Frank, I don't think you ought to say that. Why, he left me a hundred pounds. I got the letter about it last night."

"That's all right," admitted Frank grudgingly. "But after all, why shouldn't he? Look how he worked you—and who pocketed all the fat fees? Why, he did!"

"Well, of course he did—he paid me a very good salary."

"Not according to my ideas! You're too humble altogether, Gladys, my girl, you let yourself be put upon, you know. I sized Morley up all right. You know as well as I do that he tried his best to get you to give me the chuck."

"He didn't understand."

"He understood all right. The man's dead now—otherwise I can tell you I'd have given him a piece of my mind."

"You actually came around to do so on the morning of his death, did you not?" Hercule Poirot inquired gently.

Frank Carter said angrily, "What's been saying so?"

"You did come around, did you not?"

"What if I did? I wanted to see Miss Nevill here."

"But they told you she was away so?"

"YES, and that made me pretty suspicious, I can tell you. I told that headed oaf I'd wait and see Miss Nevill myself. This business of putting Gladys against me had gone on long enough, meant to tell Morley that instead of being a poor, unemployed rotter, I'd landed a good job and that it was about Gladys handed in her notice and the details about her trousseau."

"But you did not actually tell me so?"

"No, I got tired of waiting in that dingy mausoleum. I went away."

"What time did you leave?"

"I can't remember."

"What time did you arrive then?"

"I don't know. Soon after twelve should imagine."

"And you stayed half an hour or longer—or less than half an hour?"

"I don't know, I tell you. I'm not the sort of chap who's always looking at a clock."

"Was there anyone in the waiting room while you were there?"

"There was an oily, fat bloke who went in, but he wasn't there long. He said that I was alone."

"Then you must have left before about past twelve—for at that time a detective arrived."

"Dare say I did. The place got very nervous, as I tell you."

Poirot eyed him thoughtfully.

The bluster was uneasy—it did not ring quite true. And yet that might be explained by mere nervousness.

Poirot's manner was simple and friendly.

"Miss Nevill tells me that you have been very fortunate and have found a very good job indeed."

"The pay's good."

"Ten pounds a week, she tells me."

"That's right. Not too dusty, it shows I can pull it off when I set my mind to it."

He swaggered a little.

"Yes, indeed. And the work is not too arduous?"

Frank Carter said shortly, "Not too bad."

"And interesting?"

"Oh, yes, quite interesting. Talk of jobs, I've always been, interested to know how you private detective go about things? I suppose there's not much of the Sherlock Holmes in it really, mostly divorce nowadays?"

"I do not concern myself with divorce."

"Really? Then I don't see how you live?"

"I manage, my friend, I manage."

"But you're right at the top of the tree, aren't you, M. Poirot?" said Gladys Nevill. "Mr. Morley used to pay me so. I mean you're the sort of person who gets royalty calls in, or the Home Office duchesses."

Poirot smiled upon her.

"You flatter me," he said.

POIROT walked home through the deserted streets in a thoughtful frame of mind.

When he got in, he rang up Japp. "Forgive my troubling you, my friend, but did you ever do anything in the matter of tracing that telegram that was sent to Gladys Nevill?"

"Still harping on the subject? Yes, I did, as a matter of fact. There was a telegram and—rather clever—the man lives at Richbourne in Somerset. The telegram was handed in at Richbourne, you know, the London suburb."

Hercule Poirot said appreciatively: "That was clever—yes, that was."

ver. If the recipient happened to ice at where the telegram was ded in, the word would look suffitly like Richbourne to carry convic-
." He paused.
Do you know what I think, Japp?"
Well?"
There are signs of brains in this busis."
Hercule Poirot wants it to be mur-so it's got to be murder."
How do you explain that telegram?"
Coincidence. Someone was hoaxing girl."
Why should they?"
Oh, my goodness, Poirot, why do ple do things? Practical jokes, kes. Misplaced sense of humor,
s all."
And somebody felt like being funny on the day that Morley was going make a mistake over an injection."
There may have been a certain unt of cause and effect. Because s Nevill was away, Morley was more ed than usual and consequently was likely to make a mistake."
I am still not satisfied."
I dare say—but don't you see where view is leading you? If anybody a Nevill out of the way, it was prob-Morley himself. Making his killing Amberiotis deliberate and not an ac-ent."
Poirot was silent. Japp said, "You Poirot said, "Amberiotis might have killed some other way."
Not he. Nobody came to see him at Savoy. He lunched up in his room.
the doctors say the stuff was defily injected, not taken by mouth—it n't in the stomach. So there you are.
a clear case."
That is what we are meant to think.
the disappearing lady?"
The Case of the Vanishing Seale?
He still working on that. That womgot to be somewhere. You can't just out into the street and disappear."
He seems to have done so."
For the moment. But don't worry, boy. We'll find your missing beauty you—woolen underwear and all."
He hung up.
George entered the room with his al noiseless tread. He set down on a table a steaming pot of chocolate some sugar biscuits.
Will there be anything else, sir?"
I am in great perplexity of mind,
erge."
Indeed, sir? I am sorry to hear it."

Hercule Poirot poured himself some chocolate and stirred his cup thoughtfully.

George stood deferentially waiting, recognizing the signs. There were moments when Hercule Poirot discussed his cases with his valet. He always said that he found George's comments singularly helpful.

"You are aware, no doubt, George, of the death of my dentist?"

"Mr. Morley, sir? Yes, sir. Very distressing, sir. He shot himself, I understand."

"That is the general understanding.
If he did not shoot himself, he was murdered."

"Yes, sir."

"THE question is, if he was murdered, who murdered him?"

"Quite so, sir."

"There are only a certain number of people, George, who could have murdered him. That is to say the people who were actually in, or could have been in the house at the time."

"Quite so, sir."

"Those people are: a cook and housemaid, amiable domestics and highly unlikely to do anything of the kind. A devoted sister, also highly unlikely, but who does inherit her brother's money such as it was—and one can never entirely neglect the financial aspect. An able and efficient partner—no motive known. A somewhat boneheaded page-boy addicted to cheap crime stories.
And lastly, a Greek gentleman of somewhat doubtful antecedents."

George coughed.

"These foreigners, sir—"

"Exactly. I agree perfectly. The Greek gentleman is decidedly indicated.
But you see, George, the Greek gentleman also died and apparently it was Mr.
Morley who killed him—whether by intention or as the result of an unfortunate error we cannot be sure."

"It might be, sir, that they killed each other. I mean, sir, each gentleman had formed the idea of doing the other gentleman in, though, of course, each gentleman was unaware of the other gentleman's intention."

Hercule Poirot purred approvingly

"Very ingenious, George. The dentist murders the unfortunate gentleman who sits in the chair, not realizing that the said victim is at that moment meditating exactly at what moment to whip out his pistol. It could, of course, be so, but it seems to me, George, extremely unlikely. And we have not come to the

A MESSAGE TO Every CAR OWNER FROM MURRAY D. VAN WAGONER, Michigan State Highway Commissioner

"We Keep 1287 Trucks and Cars at Peak Efficiency Always by CHECKING ENGINE BEARINGS"

RECOGNIZED as one of the most modern and efficiently operated in the country, the Michigan state highway department has been under the direction of Mr.
Van Wagoner for seven years. He says:
"Operating 1287 cars, trucks, tractors, graders, snow plows and other units, and keeping careful records on each one, experience has shown us that when performance goes down and costs go up, we should check engine bearings. Worn bearings cause motor-fouling, power-stealing oil waste, and we replace with sets of new bearings to restore power, pep and economy."

Big fleet operators and experienced service men everywhere say the same thing
—check the bearings when oil pumping starts. Don't blame piston rings for oil waste caused by worn bearings, and bearings can be badly worn without a single warning knock in the engine! See the authorized Federal-Mogul bearing service expert near you. He can quickly check the bearings. If worn, replace with a set of Federal-Mogul Oil-Control Bearings to restore smooth, snappy performance and economy!

FEDERAL-MOGUL CORP., DETROIT, MICHIGAN

THE SIGN OF SCIENTIFIC CHECK-UP

Using oil? Stop where you see this sign. You'll find an engine expert who can accurately tell you what's wrong and what's needed to stop oil waste, restore fine performance! He knows this business. He knows there is no magic cure-all for oil pumping—he will give you the facts! Look for this sign!

GET THIS Quick TEST

Don't guess at the cause of oil pumping! Ask for the Federal-Mogul Oil Leak Detector Test, which now makes it possible to check internal engine conditions in a few minutes, without opening up engine. See for yourself what causes oil pumping, how to stop it!

"We shouldn't have stopped to look at the parade"

KAY KARAFFA

WORN BEARINGS CAUSE OIL PUMPING • REPLACE WITH ...

ENGINE BEARINGS FOR EQUIPMENT—FOR SERVICE • ENGINEERED FOR OIL-CONTROL

FEDERAL Mogul

LOWER YOUR TRUCK INVESTMENT

Save In Other Ways

A truck that stands idle is a "white elephant." By using a shuttle operation with Fruehauf Trailers, you greatly reduce waiting time, keep the truck almost constantly at work. With one truck you can handle several Trailers. You leave only the Trailers to be loaded or unloaded and use the truck to do a full-time job of pulling first one and then another of the Trailers ready to be moved.

HOW YOU SAVE—Your investment will be far lower because you need buy only one truck and the Fruehauf Trailers. The truck can be a small instead of a large one since its job is simply to pull the Trailers instead of carry the loads. A complete Truck-Trailer unit will cost considerably less than even one large truck.

Gas and upkeep for the small truck will cost much less. You'll easily save 30%—or more, depending upon your operation. Consider this, too! One small truck in place of several big ones . . . a smaller capital investment . . . therefore, far less to write off each year, a much smaller outlay at time of truck replacement. And the Fruehauf Trailers will last ten years or more. Think of the savings on interest alone!

And don't overlook the tremendous savings you'll make by releasing drivers for other work. The savings here, alone, are so great that every truck operator who can possibly do so should use the "shuttle" method.

GET THE FACTS—You may find a "shuttle" operation ideal for you. In any event, through the Fruehauf Truck-Trailer method of hauling, you should be enabled to greatly reduce your costs. A competent Fruehauf transportation engineer will gladly study your hauling activity and get the facts, so that you may reach a definite conclusion.

Oldest and Largest Manufacturers of Truck-Trailers
FRUEHAUF TRAILER COMPANY • DETROIT
Sales and Service in Principal Cities

FRUEHAUF TRAILERS

"Engineered Transportation"
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

MORE FRUEHAUF TRAILERS ON THE ROAD THAN ANY OTHER MAKE

end of our list yet. There are still two other people who might possibly have been in the house at the given moment. Every patient before Mr. Amberiotis was actually seen to leave the house with the exception of one—a young American gentleman. He left the waiting room at about twenty minutes to twelve, but no one actually saw him leave the house. We must, therefore, count him as a possibility. The other possibility is a certain Mr. Frank Carter (not a patient) who came to the house at a little after twelve with the intention of seeing Mr. Morley. Nobody saw him leave, either. Those, my good George, are the facts; what do you think of them?"

He looked encouragingly at George.

"Now, my good George, what have you to say about the matter?"

George pondered. He said, "It strikes me, sir—"

"Yes, George?"

"You will have to find another dentist to attend to your teeth in future, sir."

Hercule Poirot said, "You surpass yourself, George. That aspect of the matter had not as yet occurred to me!"

Looking gratified, George left the room.

Hercule Poirot remained sipping his chocolate and going over the facts he had just outlined. He felt satisfied that they were as he had stated them. Within that circle of persons was the hand that had actually done the deed—no matter whose the inspiration had been.

Then his eyebrows shot up as he realized that the list was incomplete. He had left out one name.

And no one must be left out—not even the most unlikely person.

There had been one other person in the house at the time of the murder.

He wrote down, "Mr. Barnes."

GEORGE announced, "A lady to speak to you on the telephone, sir."

A week ago, Poirot had guessed wrongly the identity of a visitor. This time his guess was right.

He recognized the voice at once.

"M. Hercule Poirot?"

"Speaking."

"This is Jane Olivera—Mr. Alistair Blunt's niece."

"Yes, Miss Olivera."

"Could you come to the Gothic House, please? There is something I feel you ought to know."

"Certainly. What time would be convenient?"

"At six-thirty, please."

"I will be there."

For a moment the autocratic note wavered.

"I—I hope I am not interrupting your work?"

"Not at all. I was expecting you to call me."

He put down the receiver quickly. He moved away from it smiling. He wondered what excuse Jane Olivera had found for summoning him.

On arrival at the Gothic House he was shown straight into the big library overlooking the river. Alistair Blunt was sitting at the writing table playing absent-mindedly with a paper knife.

Jane Olivera was standing by the mantelpiece. A plump, middle-aged woman was speaking fretfully as Poirot entered—"and I really think my feelings should be considered in the matter, Alistair."

"Yes, Julia, of course, of course."

Alistair Blunt spoke soothingly as he rose to greet Poirot.

"And if you're going to talk horrors I shall leave the room," added the good lady.

"I should, Mother," said Jane Olivera.

Mrs. Olivera swept from the room without condescending to take any notice of Poirot.

Alistair Blunt said, "It's very good of you to come, M. Poirot. You've met Miss Olivera, I think? It was she who sent for you—"

Jane said abruptly, "It's about the missing woman that the papers are full of. Miss Something Seale."

"Sainsbury Seale? Yes?"

"It's such a pompous name, that I remember. Shall I tell him, or will you?"

"My dear, it's your story."

Jane turned once more to Poirot. "It mayn't be important in the least, but I thought you ought to know."

"Yes?"

"It was the last time Uncle Alistair went to the dentist's—I don't mean the other day—I mean about three months ago. I went with him to Queen Charlotte Street in the car and it was to take him on to some friends in Regents Park. He came back for him. We stopped and Uncle got out, and just as he was about to get in, a woman came out of 58—a middle-aged woman with fussy hair and rather shabby clothes. She made a beeline for him and said—"Jane Olivera's voice rang in an affected squeak—"Oh, Mr. Blunt, you don't remember me, I'm sure!" Of course, I could see by Uncle's face that he didn't remember her in the slightest—"

Alistair Blunt sighed.

"I never do. People are always saying it—"

"He put on his special face," we heard Jane. "I know it well. Kind of a smile and make believe. It wouldn't do for a baby. He said in a most unconvincing voice: 'Oh—er—of course.' The woman went on: 'I was a great friend of your wife's, you know!'"

"They usually say that, too," said Alistair Blunt. "It always ends the same way! A subscription to something or other. I got off this time with five pounds to a mission or something."

"Had she really known your wife?"

"Well, her being interested in missions made me think that, if so, it would have been in India. We were married about ten years ago. But, of course, she couldn't have been a great friend. I'd have known about it."

Poirot said, "She did not try to find it up in any way?"

Blunt shook his head.

"I never thought of her again. I'd forgotten her name till Jane spotted it in the paper."

Jane said a little unconvincedly. "Well, I thought M. Poirot ought to be told!"

Poirot said politely, "Thank you, Mademoiselle."

He added: "I must not keep you, M. Blunt. You are a busy man."

Jane said quickly, "I'll come with you."

Under his mustaches, Hercule Poirot smiled to himself.

ON THE ground floor, Jane said abruptly. She said, "Come in here."

They went into a room off the hall. She turned to face him.

"What did you mean on the telephone when you said that you had been expecting me to call you?"

Poirot smiled. He spread out his hands.

"Just that, Mademoiselle. I was expecting a call from you—and the same."

"You mean that you knew I'd risk about this Sainsbury Seale woman?"

Poirot shook his head.

"That was only the pretext. You have found something else if not a sary."

"Why the hell should I call you?"

"Why should you deliver this tid information about Miss Sainsbury Seale to me instead of giving it to Scooby? That would have been the rational thing to do."

"All right, Mr. Know-All, how much do you know?"

"I know that you are interested in me. You heard that I paid a visit to the Elborn Palace Hotel the other day. It was so white that it startled him. He did not believe that that deep tan changed to such a greenish hue."

"He went on, quietly and steadily, not me to come here today because you wanted to pump me—that is, expression, is it not?—yes, to pump the subject of Mr. Howard Raikes."

"What's he, anyway?"

"I'm not a very successful parry. I do not need to pump me, Mademoiselle. I will tell you what I know—what I guessed. That first day I came here, Inspector Japp and I, we were startled to see us—alarmed. I thought something had happened to my uncle. Why?"

"He's the kind of man things happen to. He had a bomb by his side one day. And he gets lots of threats."

"He went on, 'Chief Inspector Japp told me that a certain dentist, Mr. Morley, had been shot. You may recollect the answer. You said 'But that's abnormal to her lip."

"I? That was rather absurd of me, wasn't it?"

"That was a curious remark, Mademoiselle. It revealed that you knew of the name of Mr. Morley, that you had expected something to happen—something to happen to him—but possibly to happen in his house."

"I do like telling yourself stories, don't you?"

"I paid no attention."

"I had expected—or rather you had—that something might happen at Morley's house. You had feared that something would have happened to your uncle. But if so, you must have known something that we did not know. I had been on the people who had been in Morley's house that day, and I had met once on the one person who possibly have a connection with which was that young American, Howard Raikes."

"Just like a serial, isn't it? What's the thrilling installment?"

"I went to see Mr. Howard Raikes. He was a dangerous and attractive young man."

"I paused expressively."

"I said meditatively, 'He is, isn't he?' He smiled. 'All right! You win! I'm scared stiff.'"

"I leaned forward."

"I was going to tell you things, M. Poirot. You're not the kind one can just go along. I'd rather tell you than have you snooping around finding out. That man, Howard Raikes. I'm crazy about him. I have been for years. My mother brought me over to get me away from him. That and partly because she hopes Alistair might get fond enough of me to leave me his money when he dies."

"Mother is his niece by marriage. Her mother was Rebecca Arnholt's sister. He's my great-uncle-in-law. Only he hasn't got any near relatives of his own, so Mother doesn't see why we shouldn't be his residuary legatees. She cadges off him pretty freely too."

"You see, I'm being frank with you, M. Poirot. That's the kind of people we are. Actually we've got plenty of money ourselves—an indecent amount according to Howard's ideas—but we're not in Uncle Alistair's class."

SHE paused. She struck with one hand fiercely on a table.

"How can I make you understand? Everything I've been brought up to believe in Howard abominates and wants to do away with. And sometimes, you know, I feel like he does. I'm fond of Uncle Alistair, but he gets on my nerves sometimes. He's so stodgy—so British—so cautious and conservative. I feel sometimes that he and his kind ought to be swept away, that they are blocking progress—that without them we'd get things done!"

"You are a convert to Mr. Raikes' ideas?"

"I am—and I'm not. Howard is—is wilder than most of his crowd. There are people, you know, who—who agree with Howard up to a point. They would be willing to—to try things—if Uncle Alistair and his crowd would agree. But they never will! They just sit back and shake their heads and say, 'We could never risk that.' And 'It wouldn't be sound economically.' And 'We've got to consider our responsibility.' And 'Look at history.' But I think that one mustn't look at history. That's looking back. One must look forward all the time."

Poirot said gently, "It is an attractive vision."

Jane looked at him scornfully.

"You say that too!"

"Perhaps because I am old. Their old men dream dreams—only dreams, you see."

He paused and then asked in a matter-of-fact voice, "Why did Mr. Howard Raikes make that appointment in Queen Charlotte Street?"

"Because I wanted him to meet Uncle Alistair and I couldn't see otherwise how to manage it. He'd been so bitter about Uncle Alistair—so full of—of—well, of hate really, that I felt if he could only see him—see what a nice, kindly, unassuming person he was—that—that he would feel differently. . . I couldn't arrange a meeting here because of Mother—she would have spoiled everything."

"But after having made that arrangement, you were—afraid."

Her eyes grew wide and dark.

"Yes. Because—because—sometimes Howard gets carried away. He—he—"

"He wants to take a short cut. To exterminate—"

Jane Olivera cried, "Don't!"

(To be continued next week)

"NO MORE WEEKLY
'ONE OPERATION POLISHING'
FOR ME"

Simoniz Gives Lasting Beauty

It's easy to Simoniz—the new quick way. Doesn't take any longer than a here-today-gone-tomorrow one-operation cleaner-waxing. And if it did you'd say, "It's worth it." Simoniz lasts! Month after month, it keeps the finish exquisitely beautiful. You seldom if ever have to wash your car. Dust and dirt wipe off easily with a dry cloth and the finish sparkles as bright as ever. So, get the famous Simoniz and Simoniz Kleener for your car today! If the finish is dull, first use the Kleener. It restores all the beauty your car had when new. Simoniz protects and makes the finish last longer . . . keeping it always clean and bright. Every car, new or old, should be Simonized. The sooner you give yours this deluxe beauty treatment, the better!

THE SIMONIZ COMPANY, CHICAGO, U. S. A.

MOTORISTS WISE
SIMONIZ
MAKES CARS STAY BEAUTIFUL

Always insist on these famous products for your car. Sold at hardware, drug, grocery, and auto supply stores, filling stations and garages everywhere.

Try New Way to Simoniz!

Hook

CROCKETT JOHNSON

Errand in Bangor

Continued from page 19

That boy and his mother, on the opposite page — know that the

HOTEL PENNSYLVANIA

is the Statler Hotel
in New York

Crowds of World's Fair visitors are making this a gay summer here at the Hotel Pennsylvania.

When you visit New York, plan to stay with us. Our rooms are spacious, comfortable, newly decorated—and air-conditioned rooms are available! We pledge courteous, friendly service. You'll enjoy delicious budget meals in the sparkling new Coffee Shop. Best of all, room rates haven't been increased one penny!

Our location is well-nigh perfect—just walk through a passageway to the Long Island Station where special trains whisk you to the Fair in 10 minutes, for 10 cents. You'll be delighted with this big, 2200-room hotel—but make your reservations early!

James H. McCabe
General Manager

→ DON'T MISS OPPOSITE PAGE! →

each other for so long. He said, quickly, "Lola—where can I—where do you live here in this place?"

Her eyes flashed to his. She shook her head. Her voice was urgent.

"Don't look for me, Burk. Promise me. Don't try to find me."

Burk looked at her, remembering now the thing that had driven her from home. He said, "That's all past, Lola. No one would think twice about it now. Those things are forgotten."

"I'll never go back again. Why should I? There's no one there now—no near kin. I've nothing to go home to."

He thought of her father in the pen up at Thomaston. He had heard in Upson Bay that old Mel was due out any time this month—but he felt it would be better not to say anything to Lola about it now.

She put her hand out and touched Burk's sleeve. "Don't tell anyone that I am here, Burk. I don't want them to know that I am so near home. You understand?"

"Why did you come to Bangor, Lola?"

"I don't know—I wasn't planning to, but I got here one day and then I got a job the next. So I stayed on. I've been here only three, four weeks."

"You're working?"

"Yes."

"What you doing?"

She looked at him—her eyes level, defensive. Then she shook her head. "Forget it. It's a job—a living."

For an instant her eyes held his, as if she wanted to say something more. Then, suddenly, she said, "Goodby, Burk."

She turned away and started walking rapidly down the street.

TENNANT stood there folding and unfolding his cap. He kept thinking about her as he had just seen her. She wasn't the same Lola Ward he had known in Upson Bay—the girl who liked to go out with him in his boat on fishing trips—the girl who was a part of that land—who belonged there and knew all the ways and tides of the Bay. This Lola Ward was just a swell-looking girl walking along a city street—something worth turning around for. She knew her way around, all right. She knew too much, probably. It disturbed him.

Tennant didn't go to Nate's bar that night. Instead, feeling lost, feeling unsatisfied, he drove the car back to Upson Bay.

It was dark crossing the water to his camp on the upper end of Harbor Island. He kept the engine of his converted twenty-six-foot lobsterman throttled down.

This reduced speed was not for fear—but for a mood, unconsciously acknowledged by him. Tennant was like an animal—feeling through his senses. Long before his mind knew, his body had reacted. Now that he was in his own environment, his mind had taken over this meeting with Lola Ward and was turning it about. And gradually, as he watched for the shape of an island, or a ledge, a new thought took possession of his mind. If he had seen this change in Lola Ward seven years ago, it would have hurt him like the cut of a jag-tooth knife. But now, with the years between, finding this change in Lola stirred him sensually. It was like discovering that the thing you had always taken for granted had suddenly been endowed with new and exciting possibilities.

Automatically he kicked the throttle into full speed and sent the boat through the black water with a recklessness that made him feel good. He stood up now, hand on wheel, wanting to sing.

He had decided something then. He was going to get Lola Ward back to Upson Bay. He didn't know how—or for what purpose—but he knew that what had been between him and Lola Ward wasn't yet finished.

He looked across the bow of his boat toward the twin hills of Harbor Island. Then, suddenly, he saw a light near lower cove where the old Ward camp stood. Probably some boys from town, down for flounder fishing in the morning. And then, like a shock, it occurred to him that that light might mean that Mel Ward had come back home to the Bay. But the thought was short-lived—Mel would want to pass the time of day in town for a while, basking in the notoriety of his return. He shrugged his shoulders. In the morning he would know soon enough.

HE FOUND Mel Ward the next day sitting in the sun outside the old camp. Tennant felt a curious excitement knowing now that Mel was really back.

Ward was a huge shell of a man with broad shoulders without any flesh. His eyes searched Burk, waiting to see what brought him to the camp.

Burk said, "Well, well—this looks natural—seeing you here again. How're things, Mel?"

Ward looked down into the grass and poked around with long, big-jointed fingers. He said, "All right."

That was all for the moment. Then Burk said, "Don't talk so much, you old buzzard." He squatted on the edge of the path and picked up a piece of yellow grass and began chewing it. He could feel the good, hot sun working on his back and the muscles of his arms warmed up and slackened after the hard morning haul.

He glanced at the broken shack. No one had lived in that camp for seven years.

Burk remembered it as it had been—a well-built two-room house when Mel Ward and his family lived there in the summer months before Mel got caught running rum. They had had a fine house uptown, too, with a radio and an electric refrigerator and a complete bathroom, and Mel had had the fastest boat on the Bay. The Wards had had everything in those days—everybody in town looked up to them and envied them. That was why it hurt so much when people found out where their money came from. Mrs. Ward and Lola left town one night soon after the federal men sent Mel up to Thomaston. They weren't the kind that could stay and take the pity and patronage of the people of Upson Bay.

Mrs. Ward hadn't lived long after that—they said the shock brought on her death. Most everybody knew why Mel had fallen for slick and easy money, and even some of the other fishermen of the Bay would have done the same if they'd had the fast boat Mel had. Winters were hard and lean, and lobstering, never a fortune-making way of living, was bad then—and Lola, the best-looking girl in high school, should have everything a girl could want. What Mel himself felt, no one could guess. It was just as hard to know what the old man was feeling now that he was home again. Burk had a restless urge to shake him out of his obstinate silence. He said, suddenly:

"How did you like jail, Mel? Did they treat you good?"

Ward looked startled.

"You want to know, or are you just making talk?"

Burk laughed. "I don't give a hoot.

You're here now with us again and I want you to know that I'm glad to see you back."

Mel said, "Took you a long time to get around to it."

Burk was shocked at the way Mel was living. The old man had come into the camp without making any attempt to clean out the place. He had down-river all his worldly goods—a lot of tools, a few fathoms of line, some mangy blankets, a little food and clothing rented from Ira Walters.

He asked Burk to have a cup of coffee with him. "If you can take my coffee in." The coffee was terrible. Mel boiled it in was rusted and wasn't enough coffee to darken the water. He had seen the bumbling way Mel handled over the stove, fussing without any sense anywhere.

Burk was sitting on the bench at the lower bunk. He said, "How do you traps you fishing, Mel?"

"Eight, nine."

Burk picked up a piece of scum and began whittling. "Nine traps, Mel said. "Can't do much with the traps of gear."

"Do fine," Mel said.

"Sure, talk that way all you want but it won't catch enough lobsters for your bait."

Ward turned to him. He didn't say anything, but he looked carefully at Burk's face. Then he went back to whittling the head for a lobster trap.

Burk was silent, for a time. Then he said: "I got a lot of extra gear. I'm glad to let you have the loan of it."

Ward turned quickly, his fingers flying at a knot. He held the shank of his other hand. "Thank you just the same, but I don't need 'em."

"All right," Burk said, "suit you or not."

"I'll do just that," Ward said.

AFTER a minute or so Burk said, "I use letting it rot on the bank. I got forty-five traps, twelve to each trap. Might as well use them. I'll give you a hand with them this morning after we haul from my boat. Use in your pushing around that critter of Ira Walters'. My boat's on a top."

Ward kept on working on the head, his back to Burk.

Burk said, "You need some paint here. And five, six panes of glass. There's a good stove I know about at Lord's Point, we can load it in a scow and tow her down. I got some boards for the floor and four square new spruce shingles kicking around to Aunt Millie's. Patch this shack and she'll do. You'll be all set for one thing, Mel. What this place will need is a woman."

Ward said, turning smartly, dropping the heading twine, "I wasn't figuring about it, but you've pushed me into it. I'm going to speak, now. I'm into trouble once. That mess of my wife, my daughter, all I own in seven years. What I aim to do now is keep myself to myself. I don't want why you're fishing around in my mess. It's going to get you now!"

"Maybe I have a reason." Burk was silent for a moment. Then: "Lola yesterday in Bangor."

"Lola!" Ward eased himself in a backless chair. He drew his big eyes slowly across his face, as if he were coming out of a dream. "Lola?" repeated. "In Bangor?"

"What did you think happened to Mel?"

"I dunno. I thought she was go-

The child who wouldn't go home

"IF YOU'VE EVER STAYED at a hotel with a lively six-year-old to keep tabs on," said the young mother, "you know with what dread I started on my trip with Johnny."

"But, thank my lucky stars, we chose a Statler hotel—your Hotel William Penn, in Pittsburgh. And the week's stay was a revelation."

"The first meal in the Statler dining room won Johnny completely. Special children's china for him. Then a special children's menu with so many wholesome dishes that the problem was to keep him from eating too much."

(All Statler hotels serve special children's meals—planned by experts. Children love the special china and amusing menu cards.)

"The next pleasant surprise was the competent attendant you supplied to stay with Johnny, while I went about my shopping and to the theater," said the mother. "Why, Johnny had such a gorgeous time that I think he was actually disappointed when I returned."

(At any Statler, a capable attendant will care for your youngsters while you shop, attend to business, or take in a theater.)

"Say!" concluded the grateful mother, "did I say that Johnny didn't want to go home? I should have added that I didn't either!"

More for your money at a Statler

Special attention to your comfort when you travel with children is just one of the extra values that Statler hotels offer you. Add to this the greater comfort of spacious rooms, superlative Statler service, finer food, meticulous cleanliness, and many another Statler innovation—and you get, at Statlers, what we confidently believe is the greatest hotel value in America.

Going to the World's Fair?

Visit Romanian House Restaurant. Hotels Statler operated. Charming, old-world atmosphere—really delicious food at really reasonable prices.

STATLER OPERATED
HOTEL PENNSYLVANIA $3.50
NEW YORK
HOTEL WILLIAM PENN $3.50
PITTSBURGH

More for your money at a
Statler Hotel

HOTELS STATLER IN BOSTON . . . . $3.50
BUFFALO . . . . $3.00
CLEVELAND . . . $3.00
DETROIT . . . . $3.00
ST. LOUIS . . . . $2.50

Protection Against Wear!

Mobiloil not only retards wear, but also resists carbon, sludge, "oil drag" ...gives you complete "Balanced Protection"! Stop for Mobiloil, Mobilgas, and Friendly Service!

GET RIGHT TO THE "SEAT" of engine trouble with tough, dependable protection! Where precision-fitted engine parts race and churn... that's the place where Mobiloil works best!

It stands up under heats as high as 400° F...resists crushing pressures in clearances less than half the thickness of a cigarette paper!

Here's the point! An oil with only one or two good qualities can't take this punishment. But Mobiloil is made to! It has all four good motor oil qualities...retards wear...won't thin out dangerously...even helps save on gasoline. Change to Mobiloil. See how it...

1. Retards wear. Flows fast at starting temperature; resists thinning under heat.
2. Resists sludge formation. Mobiloil distilled, refined, dewaxed, filtered.
3. Reduces wasteful "oil drag." Helps you save on gasoline.
4. Resists carbon formation because unstable elements are removed from the oil.

SOCONY-VACUUM OIL COMPANY, INC. AND AFFILIATES
Magnolia Petroleum Co.—General Petroleum Corp. of C.

JEEVES! THE BUTTER BLOTTERS!

WHEN YOU SERVE CORN
ON THE COB SERVE KLEENEX
TO CATCH THE BUTTER
DRIPPINGS. YOU'LL FIND
IT'S A BIG HELP--SAVES
NAPKINS AND CUTS
LAUNDRY COST.

(from a letter by
M. J. W., Gary, Ind.)

"Tell me Another" says
KLEENEX
and win $5<sup>00</sup>

for every "Kleenex True Confession" published. Mail to KLEENEX at 919 North Michigan Avenue
Chicago, Ill.

IT WAS A DAMP SHAME

OH, THOSE TERRIBLE
MONDAYS WITH DOZENS OF HANDKERCHIEFS TO WASH!
BUT SINCE MY FAMILY
USE KLEENEX FOR HAY FEVER AND COLDS THERE'S NO MORE MONDAY
MOURNING!

(from a letter by
E. B., Pittsburgh, Pa.)

ONLY KLEENEX TISSUES HAVE THE SERV-A-TISSUE
BOX TO END WASTE!
PULL A DOUBLE-TISSUE STRAIGHT UP... NEXT ONE POPS UP READY FOR USE!
KLEENEX* DISPOSABLE TISSUES

SHE'S GOT WHAT IT TAKES!

SMART GIRL! CARRIES
KLEENEX TO THE BEACH...
USES IT TO WIPE OFF HER HANDS
AFTER APPLYING SUN-TAN OIL... TO WIPE THE BOTTLE... TO REMOVE THE OIL BEFORE PUTTING HER SWANKY ROBE BACK ON.

(from a letter by
B. M., Glencoe, Ill.)

BRINGING UP BABY!

IT'S LOTS LESS WORK
SINCE I STARTED USING WONDROUS SOFT
KLEENEX FOR WIPING BABY'S SMEARED FACE. NO MORE UNSIGHTLY STAINS TO SCRUB OUT OF MY LINENS!

(from a letter by
M. B., Logansport, Ind.)

Adopt the Kleenex Habit

* Trade Mark Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Daring Young Man

Continued from page 22

Marty thought of the cheap, cut-throat tactics people used nowadays to get what jobs there were. He thought of the lunatic stunt acts good men were making themselves do—shooting themselves out of cannons, running motorcycles around circular tracks seventy feet in the air, standing on their heads without nets below them to make the thrill better. The music rasped. "Hey, Sarto, shut the damn' thing off," Marty said. The accordion stopped. His lips felt dry and he licked them with his tongue.

CORNLING didn't come in for another half-hour. He was a short, square man and he ran the amusement park up the Hudson where Roche worked his trapeze act. Cornling squinted around until he found Marty and then told him at once, even as he sat down, that there might be a job for him. He was too abrupt. Marty resented it. Roche hired the men he wanted but it was Cornling who signed the pay roll. Marty made a point of refusing to let the fat man get away with anything because of it. He called him down for being late.

"Don't get fancy," Cornling said. "Roche held me up an hour. I said I think there's a job for you, didn't I?"

"The hell with you and your job," Marty told him. "You said twelve o'clock. It's past one."

"I apologize," Cornling said, bitterly. "I get down on my knees and beg your pardon." He scowled and took his hat off. "I never saw people like that any place. All you guys ever do is stand up on your dignity and yap." He waved his hand at the men in the café. "Everybody sits around with a private gripe. Everybody waits for the lucky break, for a phone call or telegram telling them, hey, hurry up, there's a million dollars waiting for you, come get it quick. They lay around all day and do nothing, and if somebody offers them a job, they get insulted."

He spoke with the quick anger of a man who was losing money every week and couldn't help himself. He went on and on. Marty let him talk. Cornling had thought up some kind of stunt he called The Leap of Death. It would be a financial lifesaver for him, he said, but he couldn't find anyone willing to do it. It involved the heavy tape piano-movers used, and the idea was to pack the tape away so that it wouldn't open for a second or two while the aerialist seemed to go spinning out without support. As the fat man described the stunt, he lost himself and forgot to complain. He spoke eagerly, apparently hoping Marty might consider doing it.

"See, you swing out thirty, forty feet. The impression is maybe here is a guy who's going to get his neck broken. But, of course, you don't."

"That's nice. Thanks."

"What do you say, Marty? It's a million-dollar thrill. It ought to go over big."

"Nut stuff. It isn't my line. You know that. Is this the job you called me over for?"

"It would be a feature act all by itself," Cornling said, persisting. "Good dough goes with it. How about it?"

"If this is the job," Marty said, and began to get up, but Cornling put his hand out to stop him.

"Sit down," he said. The sour scowl went back on his face. "It's not that. Roche sent me. He wants you back in the act."

"Roche sent you?"

"Yes."

Marty couldn't understand it. Corn-ling clearly enough hated to do it, and if he was here it was only because Roche must have insisted. But there wasn't much sense in firing him and then asking him to come back.

"I didn't think I stood in so good a chance," he said. "I didn't know you took the trouble to fix a spot for me."

"It's not Lucy," Cornling said. "This is an idea of my own. I want you to have a new idea, but Roche says he was with him for it. If you're reasonable, you can put you on."

"Who's getting fired this time, Marty?"

"Nobody's getting fired. The four-man act—you, Ferdie, Luc, Roche doing the catching. That's the way you have to be reasonable about it," Cornling said. He blinked unhappily and spoke slowly, carefully. "It's a new man on the pay roll, a new load. You'll have to take less."

"Eighty bucks a week," Marty said. "Nuts!" The fat man stood up and grabbed his hat. "You'll starve before I pay you eighty. I—" he hurried out.

"Ah, you crazy Georgie," Sarto came up as soon as Cornling was gone. The café man had been listening to all. Now he shook his head as he approached Marty. He wouldn't leave the place.

"Hang around," he said. "Wait till he goes back and sees Roche. Roche pays but Roche does the hiring and it looks like he really wants you. Maybe he'll call up looking for you. Maybe it's not all over."

Marty realized there was something in what Sarto said. He kept sitting at the table and twenty minutes later the phone rang. It was Roche, asking Marty was still there. Sarto was talking.

"Yes, yes," he said over the phone. "I'll tell him right away." He hung up and ran over to Marty. "Roche wants to see you. Now be sensible, Cornling. Don't get chesty. It don't pay to need money for the winter. You need a job." He shoved Marty up out of his chair. "Hurry up there!"

HE FOUND Roche in his room under the outdoor stage. The big man was ready to go out for the noon show and there wasn't much time.

"We'll see Cornling after the show," he said as he went to the door. "He wants me to use Litfin but the show will be there in his office and we have it out all together. Maybe I can fix it for you. You wait."

"Sure," Marty said, nodding. "Lucy?"

He asked only out of politeness. Roche looked at him, a puzzling glance, and then waved his hand out answering. It was a gesture of disgust more than anything else. He knew enough to keep silent.

Outside Roche had a half-dozen young ones already flying in the air among them. Marty stood on the yards and watched. They worked the bars and didn't have a good deal of time.

than their gay spirits and a lot of Litfin was a born gymnast but it took Marty long to understand Roche wouldn't use him in the act or in the four-man combination way Cornling wanted it. It was order Roche didn't like the boy.

was standing on the platform of age, waiting in her wrap to go on, every time Litfin finished a trick, the thing he did was to look down how she had liked it. It was a for her he was putting on, not for audience. Roche was standing by time, his face clouding and getting as he took it all in, but Litfin didn't see him or else just are.

kids swarmed down and then Ferdie and Roche climbed up the ladders to the higher trapezes they stuff," Marty said as Litfin went on his way to the dressing room. "I have to hand it to you." "Don't break your heart," Litfin said. "You had to smile. 'But why don't you keep your mind on your work? You think of what you're doing.' I don't think. I just do it. I don't think."

apped out the words and then along.

picked up Marty as soon as the performance was over and the two went to the office. Litfin was already standing straight with his hands in his pockets.

use bringing him around," Cornling stepped out as soon as they came. "It's too swell. You got to get a just to talk to him."

ay didn't say anything, deciding to let it all to Roche.

wants his regular price, that's the big man said. "I told you that you went to see him."

Litfin!" Cornling was shouting, and and helpless to know how to himself. "Litfin's good enough!" "en," Roche said quietly, reasonably. "This was your idea—this Duel of stuff. Not mine. You want to be showy, a thrill. Two guys doing tricks up there like it's a fight thing. Well, they got to be two men, Cornling. I won't have it unless they're both good."

about me?" Litfin said, stepping forward.

turned smiling to him. He was kindly, but Marty didn't miss the eyes suddenly seemed to light as though the big man was going to enjoy himself.

ore good, sonny," Roche said. "Don't it, don't worry. But you'll be a lot better four, five years from now, that's why I asked Cornling to have you here now. So you'd understand no hard feelings. It's just that you've been around longer than you. A few years longer. You can't take it like that personally."

can't get it at all," Litfin cried.

First you knock me down for it. Now a new chance turns up, and you want me, and you bring in a man from the outside—"

it easy," Roche said, still patient. "Marty's really not from the outside. He was here before you and he's a man who can do things you know nothing about. Full twisting somersaults, and double. On a good day, if he can do it, he can do a triple."

had to pause. "A full, twisting, somersault?" he said. He didn't want to.

can do it, sonny."

the biggest thing on the trapeze. anywhere could top it. There are many men who could do it and don't try it often.

a minute," Cornling spoke up, interested. His anger was gone.

"Will he do it?" he asked Roche. "Will he guarantee it?"

Roche looked at Marty, waiting for him to answer.

"You think I'm crazy?" Marty said. "I'm not breaking my head for nothing. If I feel like it, maybe I'll do it, some time. If not, not."

Litfin laughed out sharply at once. "If he feels like it," he crowed. "Maybe. Some time. He can do it, yes, sure, but he won't." He faced Marty. "Four-flusher!" he said.

Marty raised his eyebrows. "Pip, pip," he said. "Look at the kid go."

"Listen!" The boy seemed to go blind with fury. He planted himself on the floor, legs apart. "Anything you can do, I can do it better. Anything! On the bar, on the ground."

"You like yourself," Marty said.

"I'm not bragging. I'm just saying it as a plain fact."

ROCHE had been listening to the two of them, liking it, but now he brought the talk to a close. He went up to Cornling's desk.

"Yes or no," he said, as quietly as ever. "You want this Duel of the Air or you don't. It's all the same to me. But we don't go up without Marty."

Cornling took a moment longer. He frowned and looked worried and weak as he thought it over.

"All right," he said. "You can have him. I'll put him on. . ."

Roche didn't wait to hear more. He led Marty outside.

"When do you want to start?" he asked as they went down the steps.

"Tonight," Marty said. "I practice every day whether I'm working or not. I'm always ready."

"All right." The big man told him to find some work clothes and go down to the barn where the aerialists drilled. "You limber up," he said. "I'll come down later and catch you for a while, so we can get to working together again. And I'll be able to see what you've got." He went off.

He was taking pains. Marty didn't understand it but it was clear enough at least why he had his job back. Roche was using him, keeping him around because it annoyed Litfin. He had probably fixed it for Marty to meet the boy at Sarto's, knowing there'd be bad feeling. Certainly he had arranged the mix-up at Cornling's office. He had really worked the whole thing, egging Litfin on.

Roche was a peculiar sort of man. Even when you were with him, you had the feeling that he kept to himself. He didn't talk much if he didn't have to, and you could never tell exactly what was going on in his mind.

Roche came into the barn and worked Marty forty minutes before he was satisfied.

"Okay," he said finally and prepared to leave. "You'll do for tonight."

"Hey, Roche, what's going on?" Marty asked.

The big man was some distance from him but he stopped. "Nothing," he said, annoyance in his voice. "You just got your job back, didn't you? Then what the hell are you asking questions for?"

He walked out of the place without another word. He'd get the boy, Marty knew. He'd hurt him bad, in his own time and way, but Marty told himself that wasn't his worry. He still had an hour's practicing to get through and he swung out on the bar.

But later, when he started out for the bus to New York to get his stuff, he had to pass Lucy and Litfin outside the dressing rooms. Lucy was talking along glibly, details out of her past life, and the boy listened eagerly, believing everything she told him.

"Yes," she went on. "I am really trained for the ballet. I was entered in

Do you know why OLD TAYLOR is signed with this name?

You'll find many bourbon whiskies on the market—but only one Old Taylor. For down through the years, this famous brand has been acclaimed Kentucky bourbon at its glorious best. Few, if any, whiskies have so distinguished a heritage, and none can match the distinctive flavor of this prized bourbon of a master distiller, the late Colonel E. H. Taylor Jr., who proudly signed it with his name.

Copyright 1940

National Distillers Products Corporation
New York

Cleaned! Polished!

IN ONE OPERATION

MOBILGLOSS

the Double-acting Car Cleaner and Polish

• Yes, you can do two things at once. You can clean and polish your car at the same time—with Mobilgloss.

The rapid-acting solvents quickly remove grease, grime, and road film. Back come your car's original color and lustre. It takes surprisingly little time and effort. And when you're through, your car looks new again—with a brilliant, long-lasting polish.

Remember—ask for Mobilgloss.

MOBILWAX

• If, in addition, you wish a wax finish—use Mobilwax. This is a special blend of tough, long-lasting waxes in easy-to-apply cream form. Rubs up with little effort.

Buy Where You Buy Mobiloil or Mobilgas

Mobil Specialties

MOBILGLOSS • MOBILWAX • MOBIL STOP-LEAK
MOBIL HANDY OIL • MOBIL RADIATOR FLUSH
MOBIL WINDOW SPRAY • MOBIL UPPERLUBE
MOBIL HYDROTONE • MOBIL SPOT REMOVER

BY THE MAKERS OF MOBIL OIL

the Imperial school when I was five years old. . . ." She stopped. She had seen the smile on Marty's face. "Isn't it all true, Georgie?" she asked him, her eyes shining. She could be sly, coquettish, perverse. "Wasn't I supposed to be a prima ballerina?"

"Anything you want to say," Marty said. "Any kind of baloney you feel like telling the kid."

Litfin went black and started forward but Lucy held him back. "Oh, goodby, goodby, you," she called out and Marty kept on going.

He was halfway down the road to the bus station when Litfin caught up with him. The boy grabbed his shoulder and turned him around.

"I took enough," he said. "I got all I want out of you. Sarto's, the office before, now when I'm talking to Lucy Roche . . ."

Marty brushed the boy's hand off his shoulder without getting mad about it. "You want to watch your step, kid," he said. "That girl's got a lot of serious trouble in her."

"What do you mean?"

"You know what I mean. She's Roche's baby."

"That's what you think," Litfin snapped. "It's not true. She told me."

"Told you what?"

"They're not married. He's her father. He don't want people to know he's so old, so they keep it a secret like that. Professional reasons."

Marty laughed. He couldn't help it. "Did you ever hear him tell you himself he's her father?"

"No!" the boy said. "Naturally!"

"Well, she gave you a bum steer, kid. She lied."

LITFIN'S face was nasty, threatening. "You think they're married?"

"I don't say they're married, but she's not his daughter." He paused. "If you want the real truth, kid, she's his mother."

The boy cursed, blazing. "You've been looking to louse me up from the start," he shouted. "You're riding me and you don't care what you say or do. That's the only reason you make up this bunk now about Lucy and Roche. You found out I'm going up in the main act tonight and you're sore!"

"What?" Marty stared at him. "You mean to say you're working the main act? You're going up with Roche?"

"You knew it before you started this! You knew Ferdie got boils on his wrists and I was taking his place. That's why you came looking for me again."

Marty whistled. "You certainly picked yourself a beautiful spot to get a guy sore at you," he said.

The boy went wild, still thinking Marty was riding him. He lunged in, punching. Marty tied his arms up and shoved him to the ground, but the boy got up and flailed away again, crying out crazily. Marty had to hit him. The boy kept coming in for more, kicking himself up off the ground each time Marty knocked him down, and he didn't stop until the strength was all gone out of him.

Marty told himself he wasn't going to trouble his head over Litfin, but when he finished packing his valise, he found himself going up to the hotel on Seventieth Street where Ferdie lived. He walked into the room, dropped his bag, and took hold of the other gymnast's wrists. If he really had boils, he would have cried out in pain, but all he did was stand there and wonder what Marty was doing.

"What's the matter?" Marty said. "Why can't you work tonight?"

"Ask Roche," Ferdie said. "I got bad boils."

"What happened?"

"What happened?" The man snickered. "A guy, a big guy, comes in and tells me my boils are getting worse by the minute. I can't work and I have to rest and lay low. I go to the phone and get Roche. That's right, he says, you need a rest. Better do everything just like the guy tells you, he says. So I got boils," Ferdie said. "I lay low."

Marty sat down on the bed, thinking. Cornling's screwy stunt fitted in perfectly. It was all clear now. That was why Roche had been so anxious to make sure Marty had his stuff. Roche knew Litfin couldn't match it but he also knew the boy would eat his heart out trying, out of pride, because of his grudge against Marty.

HE'D take chances until he slipped and missed for a bad, jarring fall into the net. Or, more probably, Roche would wait until he had a good excuse for juggling him on the catch. He'd pull crosswise so that the boy in falling would hit the edge of the net and bounce off altogether. That was better, surer. It might mean weeks in the hospital, months out of work. It might mean worse. Roche would make it look good. Marty could see it. After the fall, the big man would pull himself up, sitting on the bar and swinging with it, sad but helpless. He had done his best, he would seem to say. Nobody could really blame him. It was all the boy's fault.

Ferdie was standing at the window, watching Marty.

"You going to tell the boy?" he asked. "You're going to tip him off?"

"No," Marty said, wondering. "Why should I tip him off?"

Ferdie pursed his lips, blowing air cheerfully. "Maybe it'll rain," he said, glancing out the window. "Maybe they'll call the show off tonight."

"It won't rain," Marty said.

Ferdie started to grin, showing his teeth. "Some fun," he said.

Marty didn't feel like going outside in the cool evening air and he waited alone in the dressing room for the youngsters to get through with their preliminary fireworks. A man stuck his head inside the door to yell it was time, but when Marty reached the alley outside he saw Roche coming to him.

"Ferdie's not working. We go up with Litfin."

"I know," Marty said, and a flicker of irritation passed over the big man's face. Apparently the less Marty knew, the better Roche liked it.

"Come on," he said, and they went ahead to join Lucy and Litfin.

The first thing Marty noticed was that men were dismantling the nets. They were kicking out the rigging underneath and lowering the drops at the sides, hauling the whole business over the far edge of the stage platform. Marty turned to Roche.

"Hey?"

The big man smiled. "Cornling's idea again, not mine. He wants it dramatic, a regular duel to the death. I had no part in it, naturally."

"Well, I don't like it," Marty said.

Roche shrugged his shoulders. "net's down. How about you?" he asked Litfin. "You got objections? A afraid too?"

The boy had been standing silent, head straight. He was serious and determined. He hadn't looked at Marty once. Now he wouldn't even answer Roche's question. "What do?" he asked.

"The regular first part of the routine. The double passes ending up with Lucy's one and a half when I catch Then Cornling's Duel stuff." His voice turned oddly lazy. "You anything you like, the second time ways topping the first, of course. ever has enough first, he quits a game's over. It's entirely up to Now it's just a stunt, an act," he said quietly. "You boys don't want it too serious, you know."

He stopped talking and studied faces. He seemed happy, grimly enjoying every moment, and Marty could be surprised by it. The whole set beautifully neat. The way Roche worked out, it was automatic. The man didn't even have to juggle the catch to make him miss the net. There was no net.

Marty climbed the ladder, going with them. The show began and there was no way of stopping it now. It breezed through the old routine, a lence except for a brief signal or two when they had to speak. They moved along as though they were patient to get this part of it out of way.

LUCY knew what was happening. Marty could tell. Her eyes were nervously from Litfin to Roche on the other side. She was excited, agitated, but at the same time Marty knew whether she wasn't enjoying it. Then she swung out for her final sault. Roche caught her by the hand, helped her to the ladder and the men were up there by themselves. The spotlight picked up Litfin for the jump. The white glare lingered on moments, was abruptly turned on the boy reached out for the bar.

They started with the simpler working slowly into fancy stuff. times they used Roche to catch at his end or else they waved him calling for him to send the bar to meet them as they came in. Litfin his jaws set. His eyes didn't show whatever he felt, he didn't show the smallest trace of fear or indecision.

The people below soon became a vague spread of red dots created cigarettes they smoked. Little flashes of yellow sprung up all among them as they constantly matches to light new ones. Cornling had it figured out well. The audience certainly holding them. Marty felt a tenseness in the audience but each he followed the boy, he told him he only had to do his trick as perfectly as he knew how. It was his job, getting paid for it, and that was a didn't have to know anything else.

But once or twice, when Litfin in at the other end for the finish trick, Marty caught himself belly-aching as he watched, praying the boy safe landing. It was a habit of many aerialists had while their partners were in the air. It was almost instinctive but Marty had to realize that it.

"Quit, kid, quit," he told him as they stood together. He spoke impulsively. They had been at it eight or ten minutes now, beginning to reach stunts a ster with Litfin's lack of experience no right to try, even with a net him.

Another two or three minutes the boy would be shooting hope over his head. "You've got

New improved Willards give you 4 Extra advantages at NO extra cost!

"WHEN YOU PUT THIS CAP ON THE 'SAFETY-FILL' VENT YOU SEAL AN AIR POCKET—THAT KEEPS WATER FROM RISING BEYOND CORRECT LEVEL—PREVENTS OVERFILLING" Safety Phil

CHART OF FORMER WILLARDS

READ RUBBER	32 MONTHS
GOOD	25 MONTHS
PRICE LINE	20 MONTHS
ORIGINAL EQUIP. BRANDS	20.5 MONTHS
REPLACEMENT	15 MONTHS

8 12 16 20 24 28 32
AVERAGE DRIVING—10,000 MILES PER YEAR

LONGER LIFE

10-15% more miles and months

Former Willards were noted for power and long life, but new Willards are still better. The finest batteries Willard ever built! This year, Willard has outdone themselves with new, greatly improved line of batteries that give 10 to 15% average life even than former Willards—and at no extra cost.

FORMER ELEMENT

MORE RESERVE POWER

Plate materials increased 7-9%
Heavier elements in each cell—either thicker plates, heavier plates or more plates. That means not only more life but more reserve power to handle the extra current demands of modern cars easily month after month.

GUARANTEED CAPACITIES

You know what you're getting Willard has clearly and permanently molded the guaranteed ampere hour capacity in the case of each new Willard battery. You see exactly what you are getting. And you pay only for what you get. You're guaranteed full measure.

"SAFETY-FILL" CONSTRUCTION

Stops Dangerous Corrosion

No acid spray on motor and wiring. With "Safety-Fill," the battery never drinks too much. This exclusive Willard device is very simple. Very effective. "Safety-Fill" prevents overfilling with all of its attendant ills. It definitely guards against corroded cables and terminals that cause current losses and unexpected starting failures.

★ ★ ★

The new improved Willards are on sale by Willard dealers everywhere. See them! Enjoy longer battery life—more reserve power, guaranteed capacity—and freedom from corrosion. Look for the red-and-white Willard sign in your town, or the name Willard in the classified section of your telephone book under "Batteries."

WILLARD STORAGE BATTERY CO.
Cleveland • Dallas • Los Angeles • Toronto

Willard

SAFETY-FILL BATTERIES

MORE BATTERY FOR YOUR MONEY!

FOR YOUR FRIENDS...

YOUR DISTINGUISHED GUESTS...

AND YOURSELF...

There is nothing better in the market

Famous OLD FORESTER

America's Guest Whisky Since 1870

BROWN-FORMAN DISTILLERY CO., INCORPORATED, At Louisville, In Kentucky, Since 1870

enough," Marty said. "Climb down after I get through this one. Quit!"

"Nice for you if I did," Litfin said. He was sneering, all confidence and contempt. "Quit if you want to. After me."

"You dumb idiot! Don't you see it? Roche worked this specially to get you. The whole thing's a fake, a trap!"

"Bunk," the boy said. "You're supposed to be a big shot. Do you need this kind of baloney to beat me?"

It was a waste of time. Litfin was altogether too sure of himself to listen to reason. The boy was asking for it. Marty told himself he had done all he could and more, and he pulled in the bar. Nettled, angry, he changed his mind as he swung out. Instead of the trick he had planned to do, he went over for a full twisting single somersault. Roche let the trapeze slip out to him.

"You hurried it with that one," he said as Marty came up. "You passed up a couple of them, didn't you?"

"What about it?"

"Oh, nothing," Roche said. "I don't mind, not at all." He was elaborately innocent, but the strange satisfaction in his eyes was dirty, obscene.

Marty crossed back so that Litfin could go out if he was insane enough to try it again. The boy couldn't expect to top a full twisting single without trouble and even if he managed to get away with it, he'd surely fall on the next one or the one after that.

"Get down!" Marty said, speaking in spite of himself. "Quit! You'll break your neck."

Litfin glanced carelessly over his shoulder at him and then faced the bar again. He was smiling, easy and calm. He'd go through with it, Marty knew. So long as there was a trick in existence to beat the one Marty had done, the boy would try it, every time. He'd never stop until he fell and smashed himself. Marty watched helplessly. Litfin set himself to draw in the trapeze, ready to go out again.

And then, suddenly, almost without realizing what he was doing, Marty had stepped close and elbowed him aside. It all came so quickly that the boy was caught off guard. Before Litfin knew exactly what was happening, Marty had taken the bar himself.

IT WAS a dumb, crazy chance to take but it was the only thing he could do now. Litfin was one of them, a true workman with all the stiff-necked pride and stubbornness that went with it, and the only possible way of making him stop was to do something absolutely unbeatable—something the boy would have to admit couldn't be topped, whether he wanted to admit it or not. Marty swung out to attempt a full twisting triple somersault and all he could do now was to hope he'd finish it.

A startled murmur went up in the audience but he didn't care what they thought. He didn't care what Roche thought. Hanging on the bar, he swung back and forth, taking his time. He had built up all the momentum he wanted. He released his hold and went up into the air. Bundled up tightly, he went over and over, and then straightened himself out, twisting separately to meet the trapeze.

ROCHE had to send it out but he had hated Marty fiercely. He had hated what the full twisting triple somersault had to end any show.

"What's the idea?" he growled furiously as he saw Marty hook up the trapeze to the stand rope. Marty hooked it up for good that night.

"It's all over," he said. "It's a trick. Litfin can't beat it. No one can beat that."

"Who the hell asked you?" he said. "You know that." "Who the hell asked you?" he said. "You know that."

He had been cheated at the last moment. Now his face was distorted with rage.

"You didn't really want to do that kid," Marty said softly. "I know. A nifty little worker like him."

"Get out," Roche said. "You're through!"

Marty brought his finger tip to his forehead, a wry salute. He was done. It didn't take long to shower his street clothes and get his things together. He started out for the bar. Winter was ahead of him. He had a job and now he'd have to go hunting for one by himself again, waiting until a call might come in for an extra man to replace some aerialist working in the team.

He was moving along down the street when he noticed a man behind him. He stopped and waited. It was Litfin.

"What are you following me?" Marty said.

The boy seemed clumsy. The man came hard. "I guess I was a sap," he said. "I see it now. You got fired. I just followed you out."

"So what?"

"Well..." He faltered again. "We work in good together. A good team you and me. We could find a job easy. That is, if you want it."

Marty looked at him without speaking. "All right," he said finally, turned his face away as he started walking again. "Stick around, then. We'll make out."

The two men walked together in silence for a time until Litfin spoke.

"You might have killed yourself," he blurted out. "There was no need. You could've broken your own neck."

Marty grinned. "Who, me?"

He was good. "I never miss, kid," he said. "I never fall."

What Good is West Point?

Continued from page 17

stated number of times each season. Of the total of 131 during four years, hardly a third are courses directly related to being an officer in the Army. The rest are "cultural subjects," science, engineering.

In the summer months, it is true, the courses are suspended and the cadets are sent on something, at least, about work in the field. They go out on what are called "hikes," expeditions of twenty to fifty miles a day on which various problems are studied. They study such engineering problems as the design of pontoon bridges and they get practical field-artillery training. Many maneuvers are also staged. A point cadet knows how to deploy. He knows the rudiments of tactics.

In the summer months the young men at West Point grow hard and brown and cannot be overemphasized, I think, that an Academy graduate is a well-co-ordinated physical specimen in addition to being a well-educated, disciplined, honorable man. That the summer work at West Point is more immediately related to modern war is not entirely the fault of the Academy authorities. For decades the physical work has been limited by the size of the reservation. Now this has been expanded. For the field work is of very great value, aside from the training, however, such equipment as tanks, motorized units and modern guns must be supplied. There must also be a change of viewpoint as to the true function of West Point. West Pointers have, themselves, recently suggested some changes, but have been brushed aside on the grounds that they are not familiar with West Point of today. Occasional officers have had the temerity to suggest that radical changes should be made. Would it not be wise, they have asked, to make West Point a graduate school with enrollment limited to men who have college degrees? Then the academic work could be curtailed, a thorough education substituted and commissions as second lieutenants granted after two years. Twice as many cadets could thereby be graduated to the Army.

Wars Spoil the Routine

The United States Military Academy is friendly, gracious and hospitable. All questions are frankly answered. But complacency and self-satisfaction are not absent. West Point is a institution was not greatly disturbed by the Civil War, although the years were marked by heartache and bitterness between Northern and Southern cadets and although West Point officers fought bravely and with distinction on both sides, the four-year routine was maintained. The war with Spain, too, hardly disturbed the tranquility of the Academy, although two classes were graduated ahead of time. In the World War, in the words of an officer by the Academy's department of economics, government and history, "there was an upheaval."

But, "every war in which the United States has been involved . . . has brought some disturbance to the normal routine of the Military Academy's activities." The Academy does not like upheavals; a normal tenor is vastly preferable.

The "upheaval" of the World War was particularly severe. Memory of it often resistance of the older officers at West Point to similar changes now that the nation is again confronted with danger. The class of 1917 was graduated two months ahead of time—which was regarded as proper enough. But the other three classes were also assigned to active duty in short order; the class of 1921 was graduated thirty-two months ahead. The distress of the Academy administration was not that these young men were sent to fight, some to die. What bothered them was the disorganization of West Point when the war ended.

"No second- or first-year men were on hand to teach the plebes the tradition of the Academy," I was solemnly told.

All of which is partly sound and partly bunk. The upper classmen, it might be noted, take a vast amount of work off the shoulders of the regularly assigned tactical and military officers at West Point. They get, themselves, some training in teaching close-order drill. But a degree, at least, of the work of the upper classmen is about as vital as that of a sophomore hazing a freshman at any college. He sees to it that the plebes ascend and descend stairs two steps at a time without touching the banister. He keeps the plebes from speaking unless spoken to.

Outside Criticism Might Help

West Point might benefit from outside inspection. The United States Naval Academy at Annapolis is inspected annually by a Board of Visitors on which habitually serve such distinguished men as the presidents of Northwestern University, the University of California, the University of Wisconsin and of Lafayette College. Also on the Board of Visitors are members of the House and Senate. To Annapolis journeys this distinguished body of men each year. It spends about a week in exhaustive inquiry and drafts a comprehensive report.

West Point, too, has a Board of Visitors; made up of a dozen or more members of the Senate and House Military Affairs committees. Two years ago three members of the Senate appeared for the annual inspection and last year three members of the House! They were tendered a luncheon by the superintendent, watched the glamorous dress parade and went home at the end of the day. A report of a few hundred words was drafted and printed in the Congressional Record where nobody saw it. The truth is that West Point has no desire for stringent outside supervision. A proposal by Senator Sheppard of Texas to add five educators to the Board of Visitors was opposed by the then superintendent, Major General William D. Connor. Brig. Gen. Jay L. Benedict, now the superintendent, has said he would welcome investigation by any specially drafted commission, but that he has small faith in routine boards. Anyway, nothing is done. West Point still runs itself.

In theory, the Academy is run by the superintendent and his staff under the supervision of the War Department. Actually, I am convinced, it is run by a permanent group of officers called the Academic Board. This is composed of the heads of the various collegiate departments, the superintendent and two or three other officers. Their devotion to West Point is sincere and complete. So, I suspect, is their control. I don't think any superintendent, whose assignment to the institution is normally for four years, would cross swords with the Academic Board. I doubt that the

WHAT WILL A BARBER ROOF DO FOR ME?

EVERYTHING YOU WANT! In fact, read the points below, and match them against any other roof. Ask yourself where else you can get so many advantages.

LOW COST — For a daily cost about equal to that of having a man's shirt laundered you can protect your entire home with this unexcelled roofing quality (for an average-size home, under easy FHA terms covering two years). It costs little to buy, little to apply and little to maintain.

DURABILITY — It's tough . . . lasts for years! Fine materials, fine workmanship and the added weather-resistance of genuine Trinidad Native Lake Asphalt make a combination that's hard to beat. It's exclusive with Barber.

BEAUTY — You don't have to guess about color. Barber Roofings are "color-styled"! Just take your choice of a wide range of lovely, lustrous hues that blend with the sky and the landscape.

FIRE-SAFETY — Your Barber Roof has it . . . and is listed as "fire-safe" in municipalities with stringent fire-safety regulations.

EASY TERMS — For reroofing your present home or buying a roof for your new home, take advantage of easy FHA terms. Look in your local classified telephone directory for the name of your nearby Barber dealer-applicator. His advice is yours for the asking. See samples. Call him today!

BARBER ASPHALT CORPORATION

BARBER, NEW JERSEY

Barber Products include Shingles, Sidings, Roll Roofings, Bonded and other types of Built-Up Roofings, Waterproofing Asphalts and Fabrics, Resurfacer, Asphalt Protective Products (Plastics and Liquids), Spandrel Beam Waterproofing (Spandrel Cloth and Cement).

BARBER

GENASCO QUALITY

means a good Roof

War Department would oppose its will.

A brief historical note will throw some light on today's West Point. As far back as 1777 Congress authorized the establishment of a military school for "young gentlemen." George Washington energetically supported the plan, but it was not until 1802 that the Academy became a permanent institution. The United States, needless to say, was a far different nation in 1802 than today. No college of first rank existed west of the Allegheny Mountains and there were few in the East. High schools were almost as rare. It was essential that a military school for "young gentlemen" provide for their higher education in cultural subjects, and this was done. Today there are colleges throughout the land, yet at West Point, save in the summer months when the cadets are sent on maneuvers or to camp, collegiate subjects take up most of the time. During the academic year, military drill is limited to two hours per week! It is not unusual for men with two and three years of college to be admitted to West Point. College graduates sometimes become cadets. But so rigid is the Academy system that men with degrees are forced to take the identical courses with boys who have just left high school. They must go back over all their French, their Spanish, their elementary English composition and their mathematics.

German, incidentally, is not taught at West Point. Its authorities admit, somewhat lugubriously, that instruction in German might be a good idea and it is being "considered."

An Expert Speaks

I have encountered no West Point graduate, nor any outsider familiar with the Academy, who casts the slightest doubt on the sincerity of its administrative officers.

The criticism of West Point rises from its distaste for change when warfare has changed. Modern warfare demands in young officers the highest development of personal initiative and resourcefulness. A method of training the cadets in excessive accuracy in shoulder-to-shoulder marching is not conducive to developing the type of officer now demanded.

Among the leading critics of some features of West Point's elementary training in discipline and in military affairs is Major General William C. Rivers, now retired, who graduated with the class of 1887. General Rivers fought in the later Indian wars, at Santiago and in the Philippines, and in France had a line-of-battle command in all our major combats.

When the name of General Rivers was mentioned at West Point there was a discernable tendency to belittle his knowledge of the Academy and to discount his suggestions for change. But it seems to me, on the contrary, that the general has made a thorough and intelligent study of the institution and that he is scrupulously fair. Before making any of his suggestions for changes at the Military Academy, General Rivers spent ten days at West Point, in a quiet season, in order to freshen his knowledge of the school. He then went to Annapolis and spent a fortnight in detailed and careful study of the Naval Academy. General Rivers had the unusual privilege of being, as a young officer, twice ordered from the Indian country for duty at West Point. He has, therefore, passed ten years of his life at his Alma Mater.

"Some things about West Point I believe we all agree on," he told the House Committee on Military Affairs a few years ago. "Among these are that it is one of the noblest and most valuable assets of America. . . ."

But General Rivers believes, as he told the House Committee, that the cadets "are too closely confined." He thinks they are not given enough vacations. The midshipmen at Annapolis "have perhaps double the vacation time in four years—aside from the cruises." Greater freedom "would result in better work and in better physical and general development."

"Too much segregation and too many rules and regulations," General Rivers added, "do not aid the development of character, in my opinion. These merely add unnecessarily to the nervous strain and to the minor frictions of cadet life. The best means for developing personal initiative and personal resourcefulness are of paramount importance since the World War."

In short, war had changed even in 1918 and West Point had not—or too little. General Rivers went on:

"Many of us graduates—who have had extended battle work in war—believe that it is important gradually to modify and rationalize West Point's method of elementary disciplinary training in order to meet the modern demand for officers possessing the highest degree of personal initiative."

It was "disturbing," he said, to see to discard the same baggage when training and commanding the conscripts of 1917, 1918."

Colonel Mott thinks that "discipline is not really taught at West Point; it is merely enforced." He does not think the second lieutenants who emerge from the Academy can deal out any such discipline to free Americans in an army. Colonel Mott disagrees, too, with the educational system at West Point, where the vast majority of the teachers—even those who teach "cultural subjects"—are Army officers. But his main objection is that so little military knowledge is imparted. Says Colonel Mott:

Anyway, They're Educated

"Boys are accepted at West Point and are educated there for the simple purpose of making them useful soldiers, and yet during the first three years hardly one military subject is taught in the classroom. Intellectually they are, during those years, as little in contact with military ideas as the girls in Miss Spence's School."

That crack seems a little unfair. I don't wonder that mention of Colonel Mott arouses no enthusiasm at West

"I knew something like this would happen the way Congress is rushing things!"

THURSTON GENTRY

that none of the graduating cadets could execute "simple maneuvers with a training airplane, and that the chief daily military exhibition in June week remains the formal dress parade. Why not release the seniors from the ranks after two years shoulder-to-shoulder training, some of which is suited for mass maneuvers and for attacking hollow squares at close quarters?"

Even more drastic criticism has been offered by Colonel T. Bentley Mott, who graduated from West Point in 1886, served as an instructor in tactics from 1890 to 1894, was on General Pershing's staff in France and then military attaché at the American Embassy in Paris. Colonel Mott, too, is severely condemned at the Academy on the ground that he is not familiar with the West Point of today. He insists, however, that he has repeatedly interviewed recent graduates, young instructors and officers whose sons are at the Academy.

"From this examination," Colonel Mott wrote in his book, Twenty Years as Military Attaché, "there comes out the uncomfortable fact that West Point has not adapted its conception of military discipline to the conditions which have existed in our country since the Spanish War period. In the next great conflict its graduates of today will have to unlearn much of what they are absorbing, just as those of yesterday had Point. My own guess would be that West Point's system of instruction is better than at the majority of colleges. The classes are small, only fourteen men. Each cadet recites every day. The relationship between the students and teachers seems close and harmonious. But sharp criticism of West Point's educational system has been made, too. Professor Leroy T. Patton of Texas Technical College wrote in the Journal of Higher Education that West Point officers, in his judgment, did not make adequate professors. Too few had proper training in the subjects they taught. A minority held advanced degrees. There was small incentive for an officer, holding a teaching post for only four years and then returning to active duty, to exert himself.

But West Point men are brave. West Point men tell the truth. West Point men are gentlemen. To suggestions that the Academy be made a graduate school, the authorities answer that it takes four years to instill these qualities. To suggestions that less English literature be taught and more military science, it is answered that an officer must be an informed and intelligent man.

Abroad, the military schools are far more closely geared to the art of war. At England's Royal Military College (Sandhurst) and Royal Military Academy (Woolwich) the course is only eighteen months and the education strictly military and professional. It is, naturally, to speak of schools today. They are doubtless the Nazis have ordered. But until the collapse of France the cadets spent two years at the famous L'Ecole Supérieure Militaire at St. Cyr or at the Polytechnique in Paris. German five academies just before the war. Candidates for admission had to show "proof of Aryan descent," and had the equivalent of two years' college. The courses at all of them lasted about a year and a quarter. Italy has a two-year course. West Point, as I can learn, is the only military academy except the Royal Military College in Canada which gives a full college education. At Sandhurst, indeed, desperate exigencies of war have reduced a reduction of the normal eighteen months course to sixteen weeks.

It was late afternoon as we prepared to leave West Point after our final inspection and crowds were gathering to watch the dress parade, famous throughout the world. The sun was still hot. It was a warm day. I wondered, as the military band began, how the cadets could stand it in their high, tight collared, stiff uniforms. These, too, were a symbol of a day that has passed. They fit young men, however. They gave no sign of discomfort or fatigue. The ranks were mathematically precise. Near me stood an elderly couple who had obviously driven in from the city to see the spectacle.

"How do they ever learn to do that well?" I asked the man.

"I dunno," he answered. "The cadettes at the Music Hall in New York are just as good, though."

It Depends on What You Want

That, too, was an unfair crack. Rockettes' precision dancing may be accurate, in its way, as the dress parade at West Point. But the dress parade is only an outward symbol of what is wrong at the United States Military Academy. Is West Point any good? That depends on what you want. Is it an institution which turns out men of honor, men of intelligence, men who believe in tradition, men with cultural background, men who will do their duty, men who are brave—why then, West Point is very good indeed. West Point doesn't pretend to train for today's war. Possibly it doesn't even build men for tomorrow's war. It sends out men who, the course of further training and years of service, will become competent officers.

"Every war," to quote again the official history of the institution, "has brought some disturbance to the maintenance of the Military Academy's activities." If you want a West Point cadet up to immediate combat, to tank warfare, parachute troops and totalitarian efficiency and lightning thrusts and modernization and horror and death—then, West Point is not much good.

Some statistics: The total number of the graduates of West Point from 1802 to date is 12,238. From 1802 until the Civil War the Academy turned out 1,887 graduates. About 1,250 of these all ages, were living in 1861. There were about 100,000 officers on both sides in the Civil War. However, during the years of conflict there were 445 graduates—on both sides—from the number of West Pointers living in 1861. At the close of the Civil War armies on both sides were commanded by graduates of West Point. Also commanders of nearly all the corps divisions in the Union army and Confederate army were West Point graduates. The above is a truly remarkable record of men who had no special political influence or prestige to them in being given army commands.

inge—The Penn-justly proud of the
ry Bar Lounge. For,
ern decorations,
s lounges and com-
airs, it symbolizes ication, taste and ny type of transpor-
rought to railroad and at the cocktail
e groups of people
atomizes the spirit
itality which pas-
preciate so keenly.

ing bedrooms—
at this spacious of modern lounges,
rug, and restful
er, you could ask,
a bedroom on a T answer is, "Yes!
o bedrooms." For the connecting completely equipped
s are formed—ing two full-sized
led toilet facilities.
oning, and indi-
temperature controls.

The roomette—At little more than the cost of an open section, the roomette offers not only complete privacy but a world of comfort . . . an air-conditioned world in which you command a full-sized bed, complete toilet facilities, a wardrobe, an illuminated mirror, a magic vent to whisk away cigarette smoke, and controls which enable you to adjust the temperature to suit yourself.

In addition to railroad passenger cars, Pullman-Standard designs and manufactures freight, subway, elevated and street cars, trackless trolleys, air-conditioning systems, chilled tread car wheels and a complete line of car repair parts.

ation car—Modern streamliners abound in places where people can meet. On the Broadway one of the most observation car. For, with its glass-enclosed loggia, speed windows, perfect air-conditioning, radio, soft reading welcome supply of current periodicals, it forms an pleasant place in which to relax. A pleasant place in eertain, too, because adjoining it is a buffet from which a full-sized dinner can be obtained at any convenient hour.

In All the World No Finer Train Than THE PENNSYLVANIA'S BROADWAY LIMITED BUILT BY PULLMAN-STANDARD

THE WORLD'S LARGEST BUILDERS OF RAILROAD AND TRANSIT EQUIPMENT

OUT of New York and Chicago every 24 hours glides this aristocrat among the streamliners which spans in a single night the 900 odd miles that separate those two great cities. It is the Broadway Limited—proud flagtrain of the Pennsylvania System and one of the most famous among that fast-growing group of streamliners whose presence in every part of the country offers dramatic proof of Pullman-Standard's leadership in modern railway transportation and of the fact that in this free country industrial policies no less than governmental ones are shaped by the people's will!

The railroads have kept faith

If you will review the railroads' record for the past 6 years you will see how true this is. In February 1934 Pullman-Standard announced the completion of a new kind of train . . . the first streamliner to be built in America. It was not as large as the giants that now ride the rails, yet in the principles it demonstrated—the elimination of dead weight, adoption of streamlining, articulation, and a lowered center of gravity for a smoother, safer ride and development of spacious air-conditioned interiors—it foreshadowed all the improvements which make travel in today's streamliners such a thrilling and satisfying experience.

You have made these trains gross the highest revenues

Now the promise made by Pullman-Standard's first streamliner is a national reality because millions of travelers like yourself have made it possible. You encouraged the railroads by filling these trains to capacity as fast as they went into service. You made them the best money producers in operation. And it was in response to your demand that progressive railroads have added these new trains to their carrier systems in ever-increasing numbers. Significantly, 16 of the leading railroads have bought from Pullman-Standard more than 70% of all the new lightweight equipment which has been purchased.

PULLMAN-STANDARD CAR MANUFACTURING COMPANY—CHICAGO
Copyright 1940, by Pullman-Standard Car Manufacturing Company

Tops"
IN STREAMLINERS

ARE BUILT BY

Pullman-Standard

The Big Mistake

Continued from page 15

"Does he mean
— ME?"

The Heart Throb was helping me plot how to pop the question to the old folks . . . when this floated out the window: "A rather untidy, careless young man, I'd say, Martha. Look at his car, for instance."

The H. T. nudged me. "Come on out to the garage," she whispered. "I've an idea." She rummaged a bit, then handed me a can. "This is Pa's private Du Pont No. 7 Polish," she said. "Let's change his ideas right now!"

Well, I never dreamed polishing could be that easy! In no time at all my old car was outshining the moon! Then we parked her out front, where her Pa just happened to see it a little later. One surprised look at the dazzling car, and he said, "Har-rumph! Er—how are you getting along at the office, Jim?"

DU PONT
No 7 POLISH

made by the makers of DUCO* and DULUX*

* Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

WANT A SAMPLE?

E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. (Inc.), Dept. 7-B, Chemical Specialties Division, Wilmington, Del.

Please send me a sample of the improved
No. 7 Polish—enough for hood and fenders. I enclose 6¢ to help cover mailing costs.

Name _____

Address _____

City & State _____

(Offer good in U. S. only)

SCRATCHED FENDERS can be easily renewed with DU PONT TOUCH-UP BLACK. Brush provided with can. Dries in 30 minutes.

Ronnie was on the point of refusal. But just as she started to shake her head Mrs. Peter Jeffries pulled her blue sedan out of the space in front and Dick Hendricks promptly pulled in his old jalopy.

Ronnie stared. Frieda Lewis was Dick's companion. But now Dick was jumping out. He was rushing around to open the door for Frieda and to help her to the curb. Not until he was assured of Frieda's complete safety did he send an inclusive glance toward Ronnie and Roger, and it was a pretty satirical glance.

Roger was amused.

"Well, Frieda!" he said. "You don't seem any too particular what you ride in, these days!"

Frieda put her hand over Dick's arm and hung on him.

"Why!" she said, "I'm simply crazy about that little old car!"

"Some girls," Dick explained, "happen to be a lot more particular about the company they're with than the car they're in. If you know what I mean."

That was final. A few minutes later Ronnie and Roger seated themselves at the soda fountain where Dick and Frieda were perched side by side. Dick, Ronnie noticed, was talking a lot and Frieda was laughing.

"Look—" Roger was saying. "You know that dance on the sixteenth—the one for the senior class—"

"Yes."

"Well," he said, "how about going with me?"

Ronnie hesitated. She glanced at Dick, but Dick was still making Frieda Lewis laugh.

"The only thing is," Roger went on, "I hope you wouldn't mind if—well, it's a kind of a long run for a taxi. . . ."

"Oh, well—" Ronnie told him, "we could go in my car as far as that's concerned. . . . But I don't know. I had a sort of a date—"

Roger looked at her possessively.

"Forget it," he said.

It was at that very moment that Dick leaned toward Frieda Lewis and asked her if she wouldn't like another root beer. Ronnie actually heard him. She turned back to Roger.

"Maybe I will forget it!"

"Sure you will," he said, picking up the check in a lordly way. "But now maybe you'd like me to drive you home."

And he did drive her—in her car. He was, it seemed, a fool about driving. . . .

SO IT was that Roger Perry came into her life. Ronnie herself was a little surprised and not too pleased to find him there. But Roger was putting himself out to be pleasant—making a point, too, of being almost sensationally polite to Ronnie's parents.

He came over late one afternoon to find John Ferguson perfecting his putting on the newly clipped lawn.

"That's form, sir!" he cried enthusiastically. "That's what I call form!"

John Ferguson straightened his back and stared at the young man.

"There's one thing about that opinion," he admitted. "It's unique."

But Ronnie's mother turned, smiling, from her precious rose bushes.

"Don't let him tease you, Roger!"

She need not have bothered. Roger had a great deal of aplomb for one of his tender years. He smiled benevolently at Ronnie's parents and then he turned to Ronnie:

"I'm supposed to go over to Helm City this afternoon—pick up some fool package for my mother at the railway express. I sort of thought you might like to come along."

"No," Ronnie said. "Helm City is no particular thrill for me."

He hesitated a second.

"Well," he said, "I suppose I'd be speaking out of turn if I—well, Ronnie, you wouldn't really mind lending me the car, would you?"

Ronnie looked a bit startled. Then she took the keys out of her pocket.

"Of course not!" she said. "Take it away!"

So Roger took the car away, turning very sedately around the corner of Wynperle Avenue. Marcia Ferguson smiled.

"That boy," she said, "has delightful manners!"

John Ferguson tapped his golf ball into the sunken cup.

"Well—yes," he agreed. "He's a regular Chesterfield. But what's happened to the Hendricks kid, Ronnie? I kind of miss falling over his feet every time I come up on the porch."

"Well, I don't!" cried Ronnie, with vehemence. "Because if a person doesn't care enough about another person than to mind the person having a darned old 1937 automobile—"

"Oh! I see. But this young Perry is being pretty big about it."

"Well, yes—he is."

"Just the same, I'd rather you didn't lend him your car, Ronnie."

"Well, all right," mumbled Ronnie, "but what are you supposed to say when people want to borrow your car?"

"Say no."

"Well, all right," Ronnie said again, consolately, "but I don't see why a car has to complicate a person's life the way it does!"

The beautiful summer afternoon continued to drag along in a dreadful, leaden way. Ronnie dispiritedly thumbed her way through several magazines—until the telephone rang.

She ran into the house and listened, her face gone very white, to the incoherent outburst at the other end of the line. She turned helplessly to her father, standing in the doorway.

"It's Roger—" she stammered. "It's the car—"

He took the telephone away from her. A few seconds later he put it down and stared at Ronnie.

"He's got a few cuts around his head. And he's skinned his knee, he says. Knee!"

Marcia Ferguson's eyes were widened over an armful of red roses.

"What—" she faltered. "Oh, John—"

"His knee! His knee! His knee!" shouted John Ferguson. "The coal truck runs into a coal truck—wrecks it—and gets out of it with a knee!"

He stalked into the living room, his wife and daughter trailed after him.

"Roger said," Ronnie put in, "the coal truck ran into him."

"Of course—" John Ferguson choked. "Oh, of course! . . . I'd better get hold of that con-insurance agent—"

"Yes," Ronnie's mother said. "But, oh, bad—this whole thing— But, oh, isn't it a wonderful thing that he didn't really hurt himself!"

ROGER himself concurred more fully in this opinion. He was none the worse for his experience. His knee was not bothering him at all, the neat little white strips over his knee and cheekbones merely gave him a mildly adventurous look. He saw the top step of the front porch and Ronnie how quick-witted he had been.

"The thing I don't get," he admitted, "is this attitude your father seems to have. Anybody would almost think it's my fault! And besides, the car was practically covered, wasn't it?"

"Oh, I don't know," Ronnie said. "My father says it's not his fault."

He says he just isn't exact about a thing like that happening to a car."

"Anyway," Roger said, "you've been swell about it."

"Well, but my mother seems awfully glad you're still alive."

"I should think anybody would be," he assented warmly. "But, look, are they doing to that car?"

"Oh! The insurance company."

"It sure is good to see people still having fun in these horrid times."

The Man She Loved

By John Cheever

ILLUSTRATED BY C. C. BEALL

The Dexters loved their daughter Lila. So did Lord Devereaux. So did Joe. And so, apparently, did a horse in the sixth at Saratoga

MRS. DEXTER overheard Joe ordering chop. That was the way it began. They were late in going up to the diner and the tables were taken. The waiter gave them the occupied chairs at Joe's table. They nodded the way strangers nod to one another in a dining room and then everybody sat down and stared at them. The waiter returned a few minutes later and ordered the pork chop. "But, young man, you shouldn't eat pork," Mrs. Dexter told him, "you don't look well and you shouldn't eat pork—fried pork."

Lila broke the embarrassed silence that followed her mother's exclamation. "Tilly, darling," she said, "let the gentleman eat what he wants." She gave an apologetic smile. "Yes, Tilly," Charles said, "it's really none of your business, you know." That was how the Dexters met him. They spent the trip together in the club car. That was about the time the race-track special pounding through the mill north of Albany on its way to Saratoga.

Joe Clancy was a good-looking Irishman with an apprehensive scowl of a man watching his horse on the stretch. Years of gambling had drawn fine lines in his forehead that even sleep failed to erase. Mr. and Mrs. Dexter were a well-dressed middle-aged couple. Lila, their daughter, was not quite as beautiful as her mother. Her fine features, her long lashes and blue eyes were less noticeable than the impression of youth and confidence she gave. They were a confused and friendly couple and when the train drew into Saratoga Mrs. Dexter told Joe: "It was very nice to have met you. Will you be at the track tomorrow, and come up to the hotel for dinner on the first evening you're free." That was the last they saw of him. He turned and began to wave at a policeman and a crowd of people. "Redcap! Redcap! Redcap!" She was quite startled.

Twenty years earlier the Dexters had made a trip from the Saratoga depot to the Grand Hotel in a private carriage. It had been partly to commemorate the fact that they had returned. In the intervening years they had seen a great deal of change. On their first trip they had been people of wealth and position. People of extravagance and reckless speculation had introduced them to living in a modest apartment off the main street. Charles made money from selling cars.

Lila had finished secretarial school that spring and was going to work in the fall. Both her parents had owed her at least one glimpse of a world that was known rather well. They were giving it to her as a birthday present. It was largely for this reason that they were making a trip they could not afford to make in the world they had tried to forget.

"They haven't changed a thing," Mrs. Dexter said that evening, gesturing around the dining room of the Grand Hotel. Lila noticed a dark-haired man in a tuxedo approaching their table. "The same windows, Mrs. Dexter rattled on, "the same decorations—"

SHE stopped speaking when she became conscious of someone standing at their table. It was the man Lila had noticed. Mrs. Dexter gave him the rudeness of those who are very nearsighted. Then he smiled. "Lord Devereaux! Lord Devereaux! How young you look! Why, how young you've grown! You've grown so much younger since I saw you last. You've—"

She seemed confused. Then she smiled again with even more enthusiasm. "But you're Percy Devereaux, are you? You're Napier Devereaux! Little Napier Devereaux! For a minute I thought you were your dear father. How you've grown! How you've grown! Charles! Charles this is Percy Devereaux. My daughter, Lila."

The Englishman sat down at their table. He was a man in his thirties with a sharp, aristocratic face, a thin chin and dark, wet hair. He waited for the Dexters to finish their coffee and he joined them after dinner on the veranda. "Isn't it extraordinary, meeting you here?" Mrs. Dexter was saying. "Of all the places in the world, of all the people! You're here for the first time of course."

"No," Napier said quietly. "I abominate the East. I'm up here to take the cure. To drink the waters. My physician recommends them. I've been out to India y'know. Joined the Ragi cult. Done a lot of good. Made a new man out of me."

"That sounds wonderful," Mrs. Dexter said. "Doesn't that sound wonderful, Charles? Ragi is a very serious."

"Mysterious in a way," Napier went on. "But I'll tell you a series of sound hygienic (Continued on page 53)

We said goodbye. Out by the closed paddock. We kissed, but then he turned and walked off.

How to get rid of an Inferiority Complex

A true story of a man who found that self-confidence is not a matter of education or luck

HE WAS GOOD in his job. No one denied that. But he felt inferior to his associates. Most of them were college men. He envied them the mysterious thing called "background."

Today he happens to be one of the principals of the business. But more important, he has lost his inferiority complex. Instead of envying his once better informed associates he is their equal.

His case is by no means unusual. He has learned the secret that the reading of great literature opens the gateway of the mind and offers a broader view of life. This broader view inspires self-confidence. In a word, it's culture.

There are thousands of men today who lack the essential background so necessary for success in every field of life and who don't know where to turn for it. The cold stone front of a public library suggests groping among thousands of books. "What are the really great books?" you ask.

DR. ELIOT'S FIVE-FOOT SHELF OF BOOKS THE HARVARD CLASSICS

The question has been wonderfully answered by America's greatest educator, Dr. Eliot, forty years president of Harvard. He made it a vital part of his great life work to assemble in one set the really worthwhile writings. These books place you on an equal footing with the best educated of your associates.

HERE IS THE GREATEST BOOK BARGAIN EVER OFFERED

This supreme library of 418 immortal masterpieces is unified into a living, powerful educational force by the marvelous working index containing 76,000 entries, guiding the reader to an understanding of world culture.

Not only is the new price of these famous books amazingly low! You are given the most liberal terms in the history of The Harvard Classics! For an initial payment as low as $2.00 you may have this luxurious edition placed in your home with all shipping charges prepaid by us!

THESE FAMOUS BOOKLETS FREE!

The fascinating book, "Fifteen Minutes a Day," furnishes you with complete information about this marvelous set which can do so much to bring you life's satisfactions. It describes Dr. Eliot's own plan of reading and is filled with a wealth of helpful, practical information. For a limited time, we will also send you "The Men Behind the Classics" containing the dramatic biographies of the men whose immortal writings appear in the Harvard Classics. You will receive both of these valuable booklets absolutely free, postpaid and without obligation. Simply fill out and mail coupon below.

MAIL THIS COUPON FOR FREE BOOKLETS (FOR ADULTS ONLY)

P. F. COLLIER & SON CORPORATION
The World's Largest Subscription Booksellers, 250 Park Avenue, New York City

HM 438

Yes! I am interested in receiving by mail, free and without obligation, your valuable booklet, "Fifteen Minutes a Day," describing the famous library, Dr. Eliot's Five-Foot Shelf of Books (The Harvard Classics) and containing Dr. Eliot's own plan of constructive reading. Also the beautiful brochure, the "Men Behind the Classics," dramatic biographies of the men whose immortal writings appear in The Harvard Classics.

Name { Mr. _____
Mrs. _____
Miss _____

Address _____

NOW
at the LOWEST PRICE
In the History of the HARVARD CLASSICS!

COST PER VOLUME  $\frac{1}{3}$  THE PRICE OF POPULAR FICTION

50
LUXURIOUS VOLUMES
FOR 50¢ A WEEK

ATHLETE'S FOOT

ITCHING FEET and TOES

Broken Skin, Blisters Or Itching Here May Mean You Already Have Athlete's Foot

In summer, your feet are more apt to sweat easily between the toes. In this hot, moist area the spores of Athlete's Foot Fungi thrive, burrow deeply in the tissues and spread rapidly. If itching on your feet occurs and the skin between your toes cracks, is thick and white or reveals tiny blisters, it may mean this dangerous and stubborn infection has already taken place and may spread to other parts of the feet and body.

Be on the alert—look between your toes tonight. If there are tiny blisters or the skin is broken, use Dr. Scholl's SOLVEX, a treatment exclusively for Athlete's Foot. Quickly relieves intense itching, kills the fungi of Athlete's Foot it contacts and helps heal the broken tissues. Get Dr. Scholl's SOLVEX (Liquid or Ointment) 50c at your Drug, Shoe or Dept. Store. Free Booklet on Foot Care—write to Dr. Scholl's, Inc., Chicago, Ill.

Dr. Scholl's SOLVEX FOR ATHLETE'S FOOT

PREVENT ATHLETE'S FOOT

To prevent reinfection of Athlete's Foot, spray inside of shoes with Dr. Scholl's Shoe Deodorizer and Fungicide, kills the Fungi it reaches on insoles and shoe-linings; dispels odors caused by sweaty feet. Large bottle with sprayer 50c, Drug, Shoe, Dept. Stores, everywhere.

BECOME AN EXPERT ACCOUNTANT

Executive Accountants and C. P. A.'s earn $2,000 to $10,000 a year. Thousands of firms need them. About 20,000 Certified Public Accountants in the U. S. We train you thoroughly at home in spare time for C. P. A. examinations or executive accounting positions. Previous experience unnecessary. Personal training under supervision of staff of C. P. A.'s, including members of the American Institute of Accountants. Write for free book, "Accountancy, the Profession That Pays." LaSalle Extension University, Dept. 840-HA, Chicago. A Correspondence Institution

REWARD! For a little of your spare time as a special Subscription Representative. WRITE TODAY. Independent Agency Division THE CROWELL-COLLIER PUBLISHING CO. 250 Park Ave. New York, N. Y.

FOR THE 1 MAN IN 7 WHO SHAVES EVERY DAY

A Special Shave Cream—It's Not a Soap, Needs No Brush!

Daily shaving leaves many men's faces raw, sensitive. This is especially true of the man who, because of his business and social status, must shave every day.

To meet this condition Williams, for 100 years makers of fine shaving preparations, has now developed GLIDER—a special cream for daily shavers. With no soap base, it's a complete departure from ordinary shave creams. No brush. No lather. Not sticky or greasy.

A superabundance of moisture in this rich cream softens each whisker, yet forms a protective layer over your face to keep blade from scraping. Swiftly, gently your razor glides over your skin. Like a cold cream, Glider helps smooth, soften your skin and prevent chapping and roughness.

FREE—tube of Glider. Send name, address today. The J. B. Williams Co., Dept. EG-14, Glastonbury, Conn.

Offer good in U. S. A. and Canada only sand lots everywhere, from factories and corporations with sponsored teams, from playground outfits, athletic clubs, and neighborhood groups. The first "national championship" in 1935 was a bit on the makeshift side, but in early 1936 Dumont had obtained sixteen responsible commissioners to supervise state and regional tournaments and, in Cleveland, he organized the National Semipro Baseball Congress.

There was devised a system of national semipro player contracts to prevent team-jumping and proselyting. This was followed by the formation of leagues to be self-supporting by a strict apportioning of gate receipts from regular playing schedules. He arranged state championships, regional title tournaments. He regimented umpiring ability by instituting a local training system. The best of these officials are rewarded annually with a trip to Wichita to work the tournament games under the appraising eye of Ernest Quigley, supervisor of umpires for the National League.

Dumont's rules for membership were so simple and costs so low that no one could step in and make a racket of any branch of the organization. State commissioners from the beginning were beyond reproach, and he points with pride to factors like Arthur B. Corey, Massachusetts commissioner, who is sheriff of the city of Concord; E. T. Williams, of Greenville, Arkansas, a medical doctor who finds time to act as semipro commissioner for the state; and Honorable Earl Welch, Oklahoma commissioner, who is also a judge in the Oklahoma Supreme Court.

Professional Semipros

The free-for-all quality of the Dumont setup was particularly welcome because of the stranglehold on independent baseball in the big cities. The mere mention of semiprofessional baseball around New York City means Brooklyn's famed and prosperous Bushwicks and their limited number of opponents in the Metropolitan Baseball League; or the colored Pittsburgh Crawfords with their memorable battery of Satchel Paige and Josh Gibson; and the many bewhiskered House of David outfits.

The semipro booking situation in Metropolitan New York approximates a territorial monopoly. Most independent bookings must be made through the office of the late Nat Strong, and Max Rosner, two pioneers who grew wealthy by controlling semiprofessional baseball in the East for almost thirty years. They book traveling dates for the Cuban Stars, of Havana, and the Puerto Rico Stars, and collect booking fees from teams of the Metropolitan Baseball League.

Chicago's counterpart of the Strong-Rosner office is the A. M. Spaperstein's Sports Enterprises, which books for the Chicago American Giants, Cleveland Bears, Jacksonville Red Caps, Mohawk Giants of Schenectady, New Orleans Crescent Stars, Norfolk Virginia Grays, the bearded Davidites, the Puerto Rico Botafogos, and several nontraveling Chicago units.

These bottlenecks at Chicago and New York made the semiprofessional situation ripe for combat, because thousands of other strong teams went begging for dates in territories dominated by out-and-out professional players. Dazzy Vance received more from the Brooklyn Bushwicks in one season than he did for his last year with the Brooklyn Dodgers. They paid Waite Hoyt $150 a game, and not much less to George Earnshaw, another world-series hero, for two seasons after he quit big-league ball. The average salary of the line-up regulars approximates $350 a month. Genuine semipros, who work and play, point to this as professional baseball, possible only at a sacrifice of open competition.

Part-Time Baseball

Continued from page 18

The Semipro Congress members pass up this high finance and the opportunity of playing headline heroes. They will sign a player from organized baseball, but none after June 1st. Thus the rosters are never top-heavy with big names of ability, and no team can head for the Wichita tournament with too-recent member of the professional leagues.

While some have tried to set him up as a czar of the semipros, a sort of Lan-players have been spied and signed organized-baseball contracts, at prize pickup is Freddie Hutchinson, big right-handed pitcher. He left Wichita for a Tacoma team and then went to the Detroit Tigers via a $50,000 and $25,000 worth of Joe Gordon, now with the N. Yankees, starred on two semipros in Portland, Oregon, the Wolfe Feders, before Scout Joe Devine placed him at the University of Oregon for the N. Yankees.

There is one drawback here, —the age of the players. They are grown men with steady jobs and families to maintain. Earning $1,200 to $1,500 a year at work can pick up from $300 to $500 playing the semipro schedule. Organized-baseball law rules that a player signed by a big-league team must be sent to a minor-league team at least a year, and that produce

Minor-league salary limits, et law, can't compare with the year-round job plus the semipro pickup since the regular job would have to be abandoned during the summer. In the smallest leagues, Class E, average pay per season, with a $1,000 maximum. Class D pay averages $900 a season, while Class C leagues pay a maximum of $1,800 for stars, an average of $1,200.

A Really National Pastime

With a full schedule extending from early May to late August and thanks to little Dumont, the player of today considers himself in most instances than the kid in the smaller leagues, with or without the chain-store baseball. There are more than 150 member teams in the Baltimore alone. Down in Texas hail the Semipro Congress for a restored life to a game that had been as softball advanced. New York contains more than 100 teams along with the congress. Canada has clubs from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Ontario.

The congress runs smoother than anything ever tried. There are no black and white rules, no Disobey and out you go, that's all if the players pay their quarterly dues ($10 annually for a full year) carry their membership cards and follow the schedule according to ordinary ball rules—which is what has been thus far—all goes well.

The major leagues have blessed the idea through their promotion and by ready co-operation. Old Wagner, baseball immortal, helped the start as a high commissioner, which George Sisler now holds. Men of organized baseball watch madhouse tournament at Wichita year and gasped in amazement at the freshness, pace and relentless competition.

"That's because they have been too long in the delusion that baseball was confined to their little world of major and minor leagues," Dumont explains. "They called it the pastime, and never paused to think that kids and grownups need open competition, regular schedule, places to play. Well, some day we'll see the semipros using the parks when their teams are on the field. Then we'll really grow. Up to now just a half a million baseball nuts are having lots of fun. And, as president, having the most fun!"

dis with a final say in the destiny of sandlotters, Ray Dumont is anything but this.

"Somebody would've done it sooner or later," Dumont explains. "The country's full of baseball nuts like me—guys who either play the game or wish they could. Well, back in '31 there were too many who only wished they could. Then softball started to prove it. So now we have so many teams and leagues organized that no club anywhere in the United States or Canada goes begging for opponents, and we're only beginning."

"The program brings out all kinds of players—from the rich boys right down to the teams of CCC and WPA workers. It's loaded with color and fierce competition, because nobody's life or livelihood is at stake. Most of our players are everyday workers—earning from eighty to one-hundred-fifty a month steady as butchers, bakers, lumberjacks, factory hands and what not. They pick up from two to five bucks a game and play three times a week—two twilight contests and one on Sunday."

The big-league scouts are watching this baseball baby. Dumont reserves a special section for them during the Wichita tournament. Jack Ryan, of the St. Louis Cardinals, hasn't missed one since the first. Other scouts have found it an oasis of talent.

More than 200 Semipro Congress

What Happened to France

Continued from page 10

provinces wrote to thank him for having saved their country from war, from bombs and their children's death. Old women on French streets knitted mittens for him "so that," as they wrote in their letters, written in a trembling hand, "he would not be cold on his airplane. . . ." All this apparently touching to Mrs. Chamberlain, a sweet and tender woman, who encouraged us and to persevere in the path of duty.

After Munich, ceased to be a popular one in England. English opinion had been forced to swallow Munich, for want of preparation in the air force. But she said that medicine very bitter and satisfaction less than honorable. She determined at once to make all the necessary in order never again exposed to such humiliation. In May, 1939, I went to Great Britain for a series of conferences that took me to the corners of the country. There I found that public opinion was now in the government. The latter was eager to adopt conscription; the government was energetically demanding it. I was English men and women of this said to me:

"We must not allow this man Hitler to dominate Europe; we must have a strong and a strong air force."

When I returned to Paris I wrote an article in which I declared that England would institute conscription in 1940. At that time most of my French friends said I was crazy, that Great Britain would never impose obligatory military service because one of her most cherished traditions was against it. But in March, 1939, conscription was introduced.

The entrance of the Germans into France was a painful blow to Neville Chamberlain and to all those who, with the support of a policy of appeasement, the British prime minister was and profoundly shocked. He determinedly hoped, in the face of the possibility, that Hitler would never attack German peoples. Now he was proved to the contrary. He became convinced—a fact of which many people were aware—one of Hitler's most determined opponents in England. It was the influence of this emotion and the fact that he unexpectedly gave me a guarantee. I was in America at the moment. Immediately I said to him: "This means war." For it was, on the one hand, that Germany would continue her policy of expansion, would attack Poland, and, on the other, that England would remain as she always has throughout history, to her formal, written com-prompt return of England to the European political co-operation was necessary to a closer understanding of France. In June, 1939, the British alliance gave a formal dinner in Paris at which were present Hore-Belisha, British minister of war; Bonnet, French minister of foreign affairs; and General Gamelin. On that occasion Hore-Belisha announced that in time of war the British would be under the orders of the commander and that he was able to say "our General Bonnet." The latter remained impassive through prolonged applause. At the banquet we went with Hore-Belisha to the Polish embassy, where a great ball was being given; he showed by his presence the new bond between England and Poland.

I retain a tragic memory of that occasion. It was a beautiful summer night. In the gardens of the embassy (formerly the de Sagan residence) the white marble sphinxes gleamed beneath the stars; an orchestra was playing Chopin waltzes and pots of red fire threw on the scene the glow of a conflagration. On the lawn beautiful women in crinolines (among them the two lovely daughters of the German ambassador) were dancing with Polish and French officers. We all thought the war was near, that Poland would be the first to be attacked and that this ball resembled the one given by Wellington in Brussels on the eve of Waterloo. Negligently sipping champagne, members of society discussed trifling subjects. There was talk of the maiden voyage of the Pasteur, and some of the persons present spoke of trips they were planning to South America.

A few days later Hore-Belisha returned, with Winston Churchill, for the review of July 14th. It was a magnificent occasion—Paris' last happy day. Never had the French army been more magnificent. We had assembled in that parade everything that constituted our glory; the chasseurs, the zouaves, the marines, the Foreign Legion and the regular infantry. Winston Churchill beamed. "Thank God for the French army," he said. We did not know at that time that the courage of men, their military virtues and the traditions of even the finest regiments are powerless when the mechanical equipment is not worthy of the army. The procession of tanks reassured the onlookers in the Champs Elysées and filled them with enthusiasm, but the latter were uninformed of the situation in Germany; they did not know that the Germans possessed many more tanks, more heavily armored, and invulnerable to our cannon.

IN THE afternoon Hore-Belisha came to see me at Neuilly with a colonel who was his aide-de-camp. He talked to me of the difficulties he was encountering in building up a British army:

"Conscription," he said, "is all well and good, but for the moment it is more a formula than a reality. I cannot call up all the men who have registered because I have neither equipment to give them nor officers to train them."

"What about the officers from the last war?" I asked.

"They do not understand the new weapons."

"And if the war were to break out tomorrow, how many divisions could you send us?"

"Right away? Not more than six."

That figure frightened me. I was even more terrified when I learned, a short while later, that our general staff had asked from England for the whole duration of a European war only thirty-two divisions. I remembered that in 1918 we had had as many as eighty-five British divisions and at that time the Americans, the Russians, the Italians and the Japanese were our allies; nevertheless, we won the war only by a hairbreadth. Here was cause for grave alarm.

Such was the opinion also of Georges Bonnet, who was then minister of foreign affairs. I heard him recount the following incident:

"A few days before the war," he said, "toward the end of August, 1939, I called into my office two of the commanders who were responsible for our army and our air force. I told them that we were drifting toward war and that if

HE BRAGS OF VACATION DAYS "ON THE TRAIL"....

BUT HE REALLY TOOK HIS EXERCISE IN A HAMMOCK

Anyone can make big claims...
But performance is what counts!

Prove this Performance at our Risk!

We absolutely guarantee that Alemite Motor Oil will Go Farther—and Last Longer—than any other oil
you've ever used... or it doesn't cost you a penny!

PROVE IT AT OUR RISK!

Have your crankcase filled with genuine ALEMITE Motor Oil... and keep the sales slip. Then if you don't drive farther than ever before without needing to add oil, send us the sales slip and we'll refund every cent you paid!

Stewart-Warner Corporation, Chicago
Stewart-Warner-Alemite Corp. of Canada, Ltd., Belleville, Ont.

ALEMITE
100% Pure Super-Pennsylvania
MOTOR OIL

ANOTHER STEWART-WARNER PRODUCT

BASIC COLLEGE WARDROBE

HATS

- 1 snap brim for campus
- 1 snap brim for town
- 1 opera
- Optional: Cap or rain hat

COATS

- Camel's hair polo coat or reversible balmacaan or tweed or covert
- Double-breasted gabardine with sheepskin lining
- Single- or double-breasted town coat
- Raincoat or finger-tip corduroy

SUITS

- 1 covert, single-breasted, three-button notched lapel or tweed
- 1 worsted town suit, single- or double-breasted
- 1 flannel, single- or double-breasted
- 1 odd sports jacket

SLACKS

- 1 covert
- 1 gray flannel

SHIRTS

- 8 colored; 2 white
- 2 dress (stiff bosom for tails; pleated or soft collar-attached for dinner jacket)
- 2 wing collars

GARTERS

- 2 pairs, solid color or striped

HOSE

- 5 heavy wool
- 5 lisle or lightweight wool or silk
- 2 black silk for evening wear

SHOES

- Heavy brogues of polished or reverse calf with gum rubber soles or black and white saddle shoes with rubber soles
- Black or brown town shoes
- Black patent leather oxfords or pumps
- Norwegian peasant slippers

HANDKERCHIEFS

- 1 dozen white
- 1 dozen colored
- 3 silk foulard

BELTS

- 1 narrow pigskin
- 1 club striped, or calf, etc.

SUSPENDERS

- 2 for general wear
- 1 for evening wear

TIES

- 1 dozen foulard, wool and stripe ties
- 2 bow ties
- 2 knit ties
- 2 black dress ties
- 2 white dress ties

WAISTCOATS

- 1 white washable waistcoat with tail coat
- 1 black silk waistcoat with single-breasted dinner jacket
- 1 black silk cummerbund with double-breasted dinner jacket and white summer dinner jacket
- 1 fattersall flannel

UNDERWEAR

- 6 shirts
- 6 shorts
- 1 robe, flannel or lightweight silk
- 3 pairs of pajamas

MISCELLANEOUS

- Crew-neck Shetland sweater
- Dress set for tail coat and dinner jacket
- Collar pin
- Key chain
- Tie clasp
- Cuff links
- Wool or knitted muffler for cold weather
- White muffler for evening wear
- Leather jacket
- Knitted or fur-type gloves
- Pigskin gloves for town

WHAT TO WEAR GUIDE

Your correct guide to college dress—all around the clock. Copies are available at ten cents each. Send coin or stamps to Collier's, The National Weekly, Department M.W., 250 Park Avenue, New York City, New York

Poland did not give in that war would be inevitable within a short period. 'Nevertheless,' I added, 'if you, the commanders of our armies, tell me that we have no serious chance of being victors, then I shall ask Poland to cede Danzig and the Corridor to the Germans. I know that in doing this I shall run grave risks. People will say that I have betrayed Poland after having betrayed Czechoslovakia. But that makes no difference to me. I prefer anything to the destruction of my country, which, moreover, would carry with it the destruction of Poland. Do not make the mistake of thinking that I have any illusions about the Germans' willingness to fight. Germany has been preparing for seven years for a European war and sooner or later she will make it, if she cannot win by simple threat of war the hegemony she desires. But it might be to our interest to delay the outbreak. It might be to our interest to gain six months or a year which we could devote to an intense effort at rearmament. That's why I turn to you and ask: "Are there pressing military reasons for demanding this sacrifice from Poland?" They answered me, each one separately, that they saw no military reason for postponing the outbreak of war and that a delay would be as useful to Germany as to ourselves. In these circumstances there was nothing more I could do."

Nevertheless, he made a final effort. On the thirty-first of August, at one o'clock in the afternoon, François-Poncet, who had been appointed French ambassador to Rome, telephoned him that Count Ciano had offered to call a conference to settle the Polish problem and also the other disputed claims. Georges Bonnet believed that the sincerity of Count Ciano was above question. Italy was not ready to engage in a campaign; her treaty with Germany still allowed her three years' respite; Italian public opinion was averse to war; the last interview between Count Ciano and Mr. von Ribbentrop was said to have been less than cordial; Italy could obtain without fighting, in the course of a conference, a large part of what she desired. Such a conference, therefore, seemed as much in Italy's interests as in those of France and England. Bonnet determined to do everything in his power to support this project. He went, so he told me, to see Daladier, informed him of the affair and added: "There is a meeting of the Council of Ministers at six o'clock this evening; I shall recommend the acceptance of the Italian proposal. I ask you to support me. In this way we shall confront Germany with a fait accompli."

Daladier promised. But Bonnet knew only too well the character of the premier. That evening at the meeting, Daladier, far from supporting him, fought against him. The Italian proposal was not definitely rejected but the council expressed the desire first to see the direct negotiations between Poland and the Reich continued. The official communiqué, published at nine o'clock in the evening, said simply: "The council took a unanimous stand in support of France's commitments." On the first of September at dawn the German army marched into Poland.

THE next day at 2:15 P. M. Bonnet, who was in his office at the Quai D'orsay, heard his telephone ring, picked up the instrument and was astounded to hear, with no preliminaries: "This is Count Ciano. I have in my office Mr. François-Poncet and Sir Percy Lorraine. I believe that it is still possible to take up the subject of a conference. . . ."

Georges Bonnet promised Count Ciano not to send a definite ultimatum to Germany until the next day, Sunday, at noon. At this point there occurred a very strange episode which, I believe, has never been explained until now. It is known that France, in conformity with the promise given by Georges Bonnet, waited before sending her ultimatum until Sunday at noon and, before declaring war, until five o'clock. England, on the contrary, declared war on September third at eleven o'clock in the morning. Here is the reason for this strange procedure:

Contrary to the state of affairs at the time of Munich, English public opinion in 1939 was extremely hostile to the idea of a new capitulation. The members of Parliament who had just had the opportunity during their vacations of talking with their constituents had been struck by the extraordinary determination of the whole population. Convinced that war was inevitable, the English masses thought it better to get it over with quickly. The members of Parliament had been much impressed by this state of popular opinion and they were determined not to let Mr. Chamberlain show the same weakness as in the preceding summer. The result was that on the third of September at nine o'clock in the morning, Lord Halifax called Georges Bonnet by telephone and said to him:

"I am aware of the reasons which prevent you from sending your ultimatum before noon, but we have not made the same promises to Count Ciano and we are obliged to send ours this morning. The House of Commons convenes at noon and if the prime minister appears there without having fulfilled his promises to Poland he may be overthrown by a unanimous motion of indignation. . . ."

This is why two allied nations declared war at an interval of five hours. Thus on the third of September war began for which Germany had been preparing for a long time, while England and France were unready and which Germany, by its premeditated adroitness, contrived to make France and England declare.

Today one can say that the war was lost, so far as France was concerned, at the very moment it was begun.

IT WAS lost because we did not have enough airplanes, or enough anti-aircraft guns, or enough armor, or enough reserves of men and riches. It was because our ally had only a tiny part of what we lacked. It was because we did not possess the means of which would have permitted us to take quick advantage of his reserves of men and riches.

In the course of the war, about which I spoke at the beginning of this article, Winston Churchill gave a figure of speech that was striking. When I asked him, in London, at the time of the San Remo conference, given in and allowed the Italians to have their way.

"Have you ever," he asked me, "served the habits of lobsters? They plied that the habits of lobsters have never been one of my principal occupations."

"Well," he said, "if you have the opportunity, study them. They are interesting. At various periods of life, the lobster loses his protective armor. At this moment of molting the crustacean retires into a crevice, the rock and there waits patiently for a new carapace has time to form. As this new armor has grown, the lobster sallies out of the crevice and is once more a fighter, lord of the sea. In England, through the fault of its and cowardly ministers, has lost its place; we must wait in our crevice until the new one has had time to grow."

Circumstances, alas, were such that France and England to sally out of their crevices, without a carapace, to fight against the most terrible of enemies.

In the following articles we shall explain why the Allies failed to take advantage of the eight months' respite granted them to rebuild and strengthen their armaments.

We shall show how Hitler, by his "I'll make their war fall to their hands," succeeded in doing that; how the clash of personalities, particularly the rivalry between Daladier and Reynaud—impeded the conduct of the war, and why the troops were not trained for the kind of combat in which they would be upon to engage.

We shall see why the German army met with such stunning success. We shall describe the life in Paris during the last days of the campaign and tell how England learned the armistice and how the British leaders reacted to the news.

Circumstances, unhappily, did not allow the author to observe the whole of this tragic venture at firsthand—in the armies in the field where he was a son officer, and in part in Paris, where he chanced to know some of the political leaders.

Painful though it is for a Frenchman to recall events that have brought terrible consequences to his country, he considers the truth, which he sets forth, less harmful to France than certain unfounded stories that have gained currency.

He will tell only what he has seen, withholding nothing.

The second of this series of articles will appear next week.

Mr. and Mrs. Jim Post add up the cost of their World's Fair Vacation

... and Jim wins an argument

... and Mrs. Jim a new dress!

Jim: It was grand, Jim—like a second honeymoon. But I told you before we left it would cost us at least $100. You're wrong there, Amy. Wait 'til I see the figures. First, two round trip tickets to New York on the Pennsylvania Railroad from Canton, Ohio—$32.50. Right?

Mrs. Jim: Yes, but what about that wonderful first day in Washington? That must have cost plenty.

Jim: Free stopover, my dear, on the Pennsylvania—so that cost us nothing. Hotel, $4; three meals for two, $4.50; sightseeing, $3.10. $11.60 altogether—dirt-cheap!

Mrs. Jim: But Ben Franklin would never have called us thrifty in Philadelphia.

Jim: Only extravagance there, Amy, was extra portions of that Philadelphia Pepper Pot. Hotel, meals, seeing the Liberty Bell, Independence Hall, Betsy Ross House, everything—$10.00, that's all.

Mrs. Jim: Yes, but what about those three heavenly days in New York?

Jim: Saw everything, didn't we? Our hotel right near the Pennsylvania Station. You gadding about the stores, I giving Broadway the once-over. $23.35 for 3 days—yep, the whole shooting match!

Jim: But Jim! You didn't add in the air.

Shucks! County fairs have cost us $100. Four admission tickets—$2. "Rail-on Parade"—25c each. Hot dogs, sandwiches, ice cream—a dollar. That's all!

Mrs. Jim: All right, now add it up. It still sounds like $100 to me.

Jim: This is one time I win. Thirty-two fifty ... $11.60 ... $10.00 ... $23.35 ... $3.50 ... $5.00 for incidentals ... grand total World's Fair visit: $85.95*!

Mrs. Jim: Wonderful, dear! And the difference will buy me a nice new dress. You don't mind, do you, dear?

Jim: No-o-o-o. Fact is, I never thought myself a Fair visit would cost so little.

And this "Direct Route" made it so convenient for "Mr. and Mrs. Jim" to go to the Fair.

As your Pennsylvania train glides into Pennsylvania Station, New York, merely step to waiting electric train... and in 10 minutes, for 10 cents, you're at the Fair! No confusion or inconvenience.

See how little Fares to the Fair are!

Examples of 60-day Round-Trip Coach Fares to New York

From Chicago	$27.25
From Cleveland	$17.15
From St. Louis	$31.75
From Cincinnati	$22.55

Still lower fares on week-end Excursions from Detroit, Dayton, Cincinnati and intermediate points; also on 1-day and week-end Excursions from Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh and nearby points. Practically all trains carry coaches.

Ask about low Pullman fares

Hard to believe that you can enjoy a World's Fair vacation—and cover so much of scenic and historic interest—for so little money. But it's a fact. Look into the low fares Pennsylvania Railroad quotes for both Pullman and Coach travel. Go straight to the gate by its "Direct Route" or via Washington, Philadelphia, Niagara Falls at

NO EXTRA COST from many western points. New Travel Credit Plan for purchasing railroad tickets and new low all-expense tours make World's Fair vacations possible for everybody—ask Ticket or Travel Agents about them. Above all, go to the Fair—there's no attraction that offers so much in fun, thrills and education for so little money!

*Cost figures are given as examples only and are subject to variation depending upon hotels and restaurants selected.

Pennsylvania Railroad

Coming from Chicago? Ride the de luxe all-coach Trail Blazer! Observation Car... Radio... Club Lounge... smart Diner, low-priced meals... Luxury Coaches with large "panorama" windows, big washrooms... Reserved individual reclining Seats... Attendants. All at regular low coach fares.

See two Fairs for one Fare! San Francisco as well as New York. Easy on a Grand Circle Tour. From your home station and back again... $90 in Coaches, $135 in Pullmans, plus reduced Pullman charge. At San Francisco Fair, see Pennsylvania Railroad's "Magic Movies."

SHORTEST WEST-EAST ROUTE... DIRECT ROUTE TO NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR... STATION ON FAIR GROUNDS

Both brothers and hazers stoutly affirm
"We'd rather paddle freshmen who squirm!"

Take a Complete Jockey Underwardrobe to School

Two-piece
75¢ and up, per garment

If you'd rather not look too conspicuous in the locker room or dormitory, you'd better wear Jockey. Because at most good colleges and preps, Jockey is like a pair of slacks or an odd jacket—something that practically everybody wears. The reason, of course, is the unequalled job Jockey does of combining comfort with trimness. As the only undergarment made with the patented Y-front construction which eliminates bulk, bind and buttons . . . it is the only one which combines squirm-free masculine support with a conveniently angled, non-gap opening. Your dealer will show you the units needed to make your Jockey underwardrobe conform. They are—Short and Midway for daily wear . . . Long and Over-Knee for cold weather sports . . . and Bellin for dances.

EASY TO REMEMBER

Jockey

Insist on Jockey and look for the name on the garment. No other underwear can have the patented construction features which have made Jockey famous. Remember, it isn't Jockey without the Jockey label. If your dealer can't supply you, write us.

Coopers INC.
KENOSHA WISCONSIN

NEW YORK CHICAGO LOS ANGELES SAN FRANCISCO SEATTLE

Made and distributed in Canada by Moodies, Hamilton, Ont.; In Australia by MacRae Knitting Mills, Sydney; In British Isles by Lyle & Scott, Ideal House, London; In New Zealand by Lane-Walker-Rudkin, Ltd., Christchurch, S 1

Left
JOCKEY SHORT
Mild support for all active sports

Right
JOCKEY MIDWAY
Squirm-free comfort for office and street wear

Left
JOCKEY BELLIN
A trim, youthful waist line for dress-up occasions

Right
JOCKEY OVER-KNEE
Keeps trousers from wrinkling

COPYRIGHT 1940 BY COOPERS, INC.

The Man She Loved

Continued from page 52

laws though. Breathing exercises in the morning. Strict diet. No tobacco. Nothing worldly. Seat of the soul in the diaphragm and all that sort of thing."

"Lila, did you hear that?" Mrs. Dexter asked. "Napier has joined the Ragi cult. I'm sure Lila would love to hear about the Ragi cult." She stood. There was something hurried about her departure that even she could not conceal. "Come along, Charles, come along. You know we have a lot to do. Let Napier tell Lila all about the Ragi cult. Good night, Napier. Good night, Lila." Then she disappeared into the lobby, followed by her confused husband.

ONCE upstairs Mrs. Dexter spent a long time pacing the floor of her bedroom. She had begun to imagine a birthday present that was more spectacular and enduring than any month at Saratoga. Her days were numbered, she knew, and her funds were limited, but on her side was an old and distinguished family that would be as important to Napier as the color of Lila's eyes.

Fate was generous, she thought, and she felt her eyes smarting with tears. She had been dealt an unexpected hand and she knew exactly how to play it.

"That's him, sir," Joe whispered. "Look, Miss Dexter, look, that's Juan."

In Manhattan the milk wagons would still be making their rounds. It was very early. The wet grass spotted Lila's riding boots. The breath of the horses who were crossing the road and coming up toward the track smoked on the cool air. "Look, Miss Dexter, look," Joe whispered. "They sold him last year. For nine hundred dollars. I saw him in Havana. Look at his legs. Look at that chest. Did you ever see anything like it?"

They moved over to the rail. Juan, Joe's favorite, entered the track. He took two furlongs easily and then their hands tightened on the rail when they heard that faint, profound pounding rise up from the homestretch on the other side of the field. He was going then, rocketing down the track, pounding the loose dirt for everyone to hear. They eased him off again. "Nobody knows who he is," Joe said, "oh, glory be!"

"Where's Casanova?" Charles asked. "Over there," Joe said, "the black one with the blinders."

"That's mine," Charles said, "that black one's mine."

"Aren't they beautiful, Miss Dexter?" Joe said. "Did you ever see anything as beautiful?"

The sun was higher. More and more horses, blanketed and bandaged like feudal mounts, were filing across the road. That was early in the second week of the Dexters' stay at Saratoga and Joe and Lila and Charles were already familiar figures at the morning workouts.

Mrs. Dexter did not join them. She had her own work to do. She spent her morning walking up and down the drink hall of the spa with Napier, drinking a glass of saline water. She began with the long and distinguished history of her family. Then she turned her talk to more personal subjects. "Lila is such a lonely child, such a lonely and sensitive child," she said. "Of course you wouldn't think it to see her, but a great deal of her gaiety is bravado, sheer bravado. She feels that so few people understand her. She enjoys talking with you. She found you so different from the men, mere boys, that she knows."

"Really," Napier said.

"It's unkind of me," she said, "to burden you with my troubles. But I'm not a young woman any longer. and there are so few people I care to confide in. But I do worry about Lila. She needs someone to take care of someone understanding. Beneath that gaiety is a great sadness and ing. She tries to conceal it from me. She's so considerate. But I know!"

In the evenings Mrs. Dexter saw Napier and Lila were left together. She felt assured of the success of her plan in Lila's frequent references to Napier and in the covetous and melancholy glances Napier gave her daughter.

Joe Clancy had rented a car for a month and he usually drove the Dexters out to the track. In those few weeks he had come to feel that he was a member of their family. It was a casual and unself-conscious relationship whose strength he would not know until it came time to say goodbye.

One day when Lila and Joe and Charles were in the paddock, Mrs. Dexter accepted a dinner invitation for herself and her husband. She forgave until the end of the seventh race. They were working their way out to the parking lot when she remembered the engagement. She and Charles were already there. Lila and Joe were following. They turned and called over the heads of the crowd: "You take Lila home, Joe. We're driving out with the Van Kirk. For dinner. You eat dinner with Napier, darling. He'd like that. You take her home, Joe, take good care of her." Then her voice grew faint and she was carried off by the crowd.

The main road to town was choked with traffic and Joe took a back-country road.

"Do you want me to leave you at the hotel, Miss Dexter?" he asked.

"Don't call me Miss Dexter."

"All right," he said.

"My name is Lila," she said. "Come Lila. And don't take me back to the hotel. Take me for a ride. A long ride. She slumped in the seat and crossed her legs and lit a cigarette.

JOE raced the car over the dirt road of the Saratoga plain for some time before he spoke again. He finally moved a question: "What about Lord Deaux?"

"Oh, he'll be all right. He's not expecting me." She moved closer in the seat to Joe. It was not a flirtatious move. It was candid and friendly. "Tell me about yourself," she said. "Tell me about where you come from and where you want to do and where you're going."

"I come from Chicago," he said abruptly. "I'm a gambler. When I'm not I wait on table. I like horses. I—"

His voice lapsed into something that seemed static. "You don't want to know about me," he said.

They drove another five miles without speaking. They passed through a small village. When they passed a saloon Lila made Joe stop.

"You don't want to go into a place like that," he said.

"Oh, yes I do," she said. He followed her and she ordered drinks for both of them.

After a few beers Joe felt more at ease. He began to talk. He told her he was an orphan, that he had worked as a street boy, an exercise boy and a bookie's runner and that he occasionally ran enough to live as a gambler. He made a killing that spring in Belmont. He told her the story of his life, long history of rooming houses and fortune, without an interruption. He was going to wait and see Juan run in My stakes," he said, "and then, win or lose I'm going to drop it all. It's a bad racket and I'm just beginning to see it. I'm tired." His story ended abruptly as it had begun.

They drove back in the dusk.

"What about Lord Devereaux?" Joe asked.

"Oh, I like him," Lila said. "He's very nice. Mother likes him too. As a matter of fact, I may marry him—if he asks me."

The sun had set. From the distance came the hooting of a train and the rumble of freight cars.

"Napier has a big house in England," Lila said. "Mother's been there. She likes it."

They crossed a bridge and at the next crossing they found the striped awnings down, the lanterns still swinging. A locomotive rounded the bend. Freight cars passed slowly through the glare of Joe's headlights.

"Mother says his house has a moat and it," Lila was saying. "And it has towers and—"

"What's the matter, kid?" Joe asked. "What's the matter?" He put his arm around her shoulder. He was awkward. "Nothing. I was just thinking how you must be. Never staying in one place. Traveling all the time. Oh, stupid; I'm such a fool." She wiped her eyes with a handkerchief. The car rumbled past. The gates went up. They started back to town.

They finished the ride without speaking. She said good night to him in front of the hotel and there was something something self-conscious in the way she spoke, the way they avoided facing each other.

"OLD still," Mrs. Dexter said, "hold still." She was tying her husband's tie. "Stop sticking your neck out." "I've got a hunch on that horse," Lila said, "the black one."

"Stop talking about horses," she said, "tell me what Napier told you. You don't told me a thing yet."

"Oh, he said the usual things. He said I ought to tell me."

"Tell you what?" "That he liked Lila. That he would consider it an honor to marry into your family. Does he know we're broke, by any chance?"

"Of course he knows we're broke. He and well-connected. I've told him."

"Well, he said he would consider it an honor to marry into your family. He didn't say anything about my family. And he said he felt that he ought to tell me his intentions were serious. That's all."

She gave the tie a last touch and stepped away.

"That's fine," she said.

"I don't think it's so fine," he said. "I can't help it, darling, but I've never liked that sort of Englishman."

"I didn't mean that. I meant the tie. But I think it's fine about Napier too. It really is, Charles."

Mrs. Dexter sat down at her dressing table and began to comb out her hair.

"That black devil," Charles said, "Casanova. I've got a hunch. I had a dream about him."

"Casanova who, dear?"

"The horse. The one that ran Tuesday. The big black one."

"Yes, it's fine," she said. "It will be such a nice change for Lila, living in England."

MRS. DEXTER was patient. Morning after morning she discussed her distinguished antecedents. Napier told her he was tired of cattle millionaires and theatrical people and that her modest and well-born family was a relief. It was her best card with an English nobleman, she knew, and she played it shrewdly. In the third week her patience was rewarded. Napier told her the nature of his intentions and outlined his plans. He would cancel his passage to England and spend the fall and winter in New York. Their engagement could be announced after Christmas if Lila were willing, and they could be married in the summer. He asked Mrs. Dexter to notify Lila and he arranged to meet them all at the hotel at four that afternoon for a discussion of the situation.

Returning to the hotel that morning, Mrs. Dexter felt a happiness she had never known before. In the taxi she anticipated the scene over lunch when she would announce the good news. But when she hurried into their suite she found a note propped up on the parlor mantel. "Lunching with Joe," it read. "See you out at the track. Love, L."...

The usual things that delayed Mrs. Dexter, the loss of her glasses and the fact that her watch had stopped, kept her from getting out to the track that

ATHLETE'S FOOT Fungi Feed on Steaming Feet!

● Did you know that the fungi that cause Athlete's Foot actually thrive on excessive perspiration and dead skin? That's why it's important to be extra careful when your feet perspire profusely. When the skin between your toes gets irritated and cracks open, Athlete's Foot is especially "catching."

CRACKS between your toes WARN YOU

Laboratory tests prove that Athlete's Foot fungi actually grow twice as fast when they feed on excess perspiration and dead skin. When cracks appear they get under the skin, through the cracks, and spread unseen beneath the tissues. Itchy, red toes and skin peeling off in dull, whitish patches are signs you have dreaded Athlete's Foot.

Drench those cracks TONIGHT

Play safe! Look between your toes tonight. At the first sign of a crack drench the entire foot with Absorbine Jr., full strength, night and morning.

1. Absorbine Jr. is a powerful fungicide. It kills the Athlete's Foot fungi on contact.
2. It dissolves the perspiration products on which Athlete's Foot fungi thrive.
3. It dries the skin between the toes.
4. Soothes and helps heal broken tissues.
5. Relieves itching, pain of Athlete's Foot.

Guard against reinfection. Boil socks 15 minutes. Disinfect shoes. In advanced cases consult your doctor in addition to using Absorbine Jr. $1.25 a bottle at all druggists.

ABSORBINE Jr.

Kills Athlete's Foot fungi on contact!

Also QUICK RELIEF for:

Sore, aching muscles • Tired, burning feet • Sunburn • Bites of mosquitoes and other small insects.

Fungi growing fast
Photomicrograph of Athlete's Foot fungi. This parasitic plant life burrows under the tissues, attacks delicate nerve endings. No wonder Athlete's Foot causes such severe pain!

Fungi dead
Photomicrograph showing that Absorbine Jr. kills Athlete's Foot fungi on contact—they can't grow and cause you pain and misery.

Sample Bottle FREE

W. F. Young, Inc., 201 S. Lyman St., Springfield, Mass. Send me sample bottle of Absorbine Jr. FREE.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____

"He makes it look easier than it really is"

CHARLES PEARSON

AN OVERHEATED RADIATOR is a danger sign. Power is being wasted. You may be headed for expensive repairs. Keep radiators clean. Use Sani-Flush twice a year. (Directions on can.)

You'll find Sani-Flush in most bath-rooms for cleaning toilet bowls. It cannot injure motor or fittings. It cleans out rust, sludge, scale and sediment. Keeps water circulating freely. Do the job yourself for 10c (25c for the largest truck or tractor). If you prefer, get your service station to do it for you—insist on Sani-Flush. Sold by grocery, drug, hardware, and 5-and-10c stores. 10c and 25c sizes. The Hygienic Products Co., Canton, Ohio.

Sani-Flush Safe
CLEANS OUT RADIATORS NOT CAUSTIC

FISH
NEEDS THIS
flavor
A-1
SAUCE

"ASK FOR IT IN EATING PLACES.
... AND AT HOME TOO"

Aids in the Relief of
HAY FEVER
Dr. Weaver's
Original
NASAL FILTER

Nothing else "Just as good"
COMFORTABLE — SCARCELY VISIBLE

FILTER
the AIR
YOU Breathe!

More Than 30,000
in Use

Fitted by leading Physicians'
Supply Houses in 600 cities.
Ask for demonstration or write
The Nasal Filter Co., Dept. C, Columbus, O.

afternoon in time for the first race. Charles had gone on ahead and when her taxi entered the grounds they were saddling the horses for the second. She gave the driver a large tip and hurried onto the terrace. Lila and Joe and Charles were sitting there quietly. "Hello, hello, hello," Mrs. Dexter sang. Charles and Joe stood. "Hello, Charles. Hello, Joe. Hello, Lila. I expected to have lunch with you today, Lila. I have something very important to tell you. Vermouth, un peu de vermouth," she told a waiter. "What are you looking so glum about, Charles? And you, Joe. You look ill, both of you."

"Shall we go?" Charles asked Joe.

"All right."

"Wait a minute, wait a minute. Where are you going?"

"To bet."

"Well, wait a minute. I want to pick a horse. It's no fun watching a race unless you have some money on it. Or is it?" She rapped the program with her glasses and scanned the entries. "Crepe," she said. "That's a pretty name. Don't you think that's a pretty name, Lila? Put two dollars on Crepe for me."

The two men walked off.

"WELL what are they looking so glum about?" Mrs. Dexter asked.

"Oh, Dad has a hunch," Lila said. "A horse named Casanova. He's putting his bank book on the nose."

"But why should that make him glum?"

"I don't know. He's not sure. The price is too good and a hunch is a hunch."

"What's the matter with Joe?"

"Same trouble. He's got a horse running in the Holly stakes. Sixth race. A horse named Juan. He's been watching him all year. A long shot."

"Well, I'm sure I don't know why the men come out to the track if it's going to make them so unhappy," Mrs. Dexter said. "Oh, I forgot. I've a very important message for you from Napier. Terribly important. I wanted to tell you at lunch but I missed you. I went out to the spa with Napier this morning. And—"

Joe and Charles returned to the table. They sat down. They were very unhappy.

"Well, to get back to Napier," Mrs. Dexter said. "I went out to the spa with him this morning and—"

"There they go," Charles groaned. He was leaning forward a little as if his stomach pained him.

The sweet, desultory fall of hoofs came to them there as the entries filed up from the paddock. The jockey's silks burned in the sun.

"Which is he?" Mrs. Dexter asked.

"Which is he?"

"Number four," Joe said.

"That black one? Well, I don't think Crepe is an awfully good name for that horse. Do you, Charles? Do you think they ought to name a black horse Crepe? Why, I think that's gruesome."

"That's not Crepe," Charles said. For one of the few times in his life he spoke to his wife with impatience. "That's Casanova. The one with my money. Crepe is the bay. Number six."

"Oh, I see."

Checked, bridling, the entries paraded up by the clubhouse. They turned and cantered over toward the barrier.

"Well, as I was saying," Mrs. Dexter began again, "I went out to the spa with Napier. He wants to see us all. This afternoon. I told him we'd meet him at the hotel at four. He said—" She stopped speaking when she realized that her rather penetrating voice was falling on an unnatural silence. Everyone was watching the horses. They were at the barrier.

The bell rang. That profound, heart-breaking mutter of they're off went up like an articulate roll of thunder and was heard by the farmers cultivating their gardens two miles away. The backstretch smoked, the entries streaking, drumming the loose dirt, going faster than anything you can imagine and somehow not fast enough. The numbers went up: the favorite, a horse named Morristown, Crepe, and then Casanova. At the far turn a horse named Battlebridge came up.

Charles said nothing. His hat was drawn down over his eyes. At the turn the favorite rode way out and then it was a horse named Lairdson, Crepe, Casanova, and Battlebridge. Then Lairdson lost out and it was Crepe, Casanova, with Crepe on the rail, and then it was Crepe and Battlebridge, with Casanova nearly seven lengths behind, and then it was Crepe.

The excited roar of the crowd died down into a few heated arguments. A silence settled over the Dexters' table. Charles was staring into his empty glass. Joe was examining his shoes. Lila looked sick. Mrs. Dexter was the only one who seemed unconcerned, but it was a long time before even she spoke. "Well, I've won twenty dollars," she said quietly. "Here, Joe, take my ticket and get the money. Whisky for the men," she told a waiter, "and I'll have vermouth."

When the drinks were finished, Charles and Mrs. Dexter left. Lila promised to leave after the next race and meet them at the hotel. It was not until they were alone together in the taxi that Mrs. Dexter asked Charles how much he had lost.

"A thousand. All we have. I don't know how we'll pay the hotel bill. Poor Lila. We'll have to go back tomorrow. Poor kid."

"I have my jewelry."

"Yes."

They rode for sometime without speaking. They were both thinking the same thing. She was the one who mentioned it. "There's always Lord Devereaux," she said; "he'll stake us."

"Yes," he said tiredly, "there's always Lord Devereaux."

THEY were back at the hotel, counting their change, when they heard the metallic sound of a key in the lock. The door shot open, banging the wall, and Lila came in. She looked as if she had been running. Her hair was loose and she was carrying her hat. She ran through the parlor into the bedroom. "I'll go," Mrs. Dexter said.

"It's Joe," Lila sobbed. "After you and Dad left we just sat there and had a drink and I made a two-dollar bet on the next race. Then I said I ought to go, and he said all right. Then he said he thought we ought to make it goodby. He said he was going to leave the track for good, win or lose. He said we wouldn't see each other any more. So then he walked out toward the gates with me. We said goodby. Out there by the closed paddock. You know. We kissed but then he turned and walked off and I felt as if they were tearing my arm away from me. I didn't know it could be like that. I can't live without him."

Mrs. Dexter said nothing. She let her arm rest on her daughter's shoulders. Then she stood and left the room, closing the door after her. She hesitated in the corridor between the parlor and the bedroom. It was the time to make a decision, but she was too bewildered, too stunned, to think. Her hard work had been mistaken and in vain. She was unprepared for this. When she entered the parlor Charles was shouting into the telephone: "I don't care if they haven't run the sixth yet. Get him for me, get Joe for me and tell him to come to Charlie Dexter's hotel. Tell him it's important. No. It's nothing about a horse." He slammed down the receiver.

Fifteen minutes later Joe came into

THIS RAZOR FLIES
175,000 MILES

EVERY DAY

Modern planes must have modern equipment down to the last detail, for the convenience of passengers...

Enders Speed Razor is standard equipment on American Airlines Coast-to-Coast Service, Canadian Colonial, TWA, United Lines Mainliners.

That's not surprising to those who know the new simplicity and speed of Enders Speed Razor. Enders Razor is designed for today's streamlined world.

Like to simplify your shaving? Like to cut your shaving time in half? Get an Enders Speed Razor.

ENDERS SPEED RAZOR

DURHAM  DUPLEX

DURHAM DUPLEX RAZOR CO., Mystic, Conn.

WAKE UP YOUR
LIVER BILE -
WITHOUT CALOMEL

—And You'll
Jump Out of Bed
in the Morning
Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pints of liquid bile onto the food you swallow every day. If this bile is not flowing, your food may not digest. You get constipated, feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk. It takes those good, old Carter's Little Pills to get these two pints of bile flowing to make you feel "up and up." Amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Pills by name. 10¢ and 25¢. Stubbornly refuse anything else.

TRUTH ABOUT CORNS

• Corns are caused by pressure and friction. No easy to remove them. Blue-Jay Corn Plaster relieves pain, moving pressure. Stimulation gently loosens corn so it can be lifted out. By avoiding pressure and friction that cause corns you can prevent its return. Blue-Jay Corn Plaster for 6. Same price in Canada.

BAUER & BLACK BLUE-JAY CORN PLASTER

For RELIEF of

Sunburn MENTHOLATUM
Cooling, soothing
relieves sunburn quickly

EARN EXTRA MONEY QUICKLY
Amazing Christmas Card Sale

NEW 21 CARD Assortment
Everybody wants new $1 Assortment of 21 beautiful Christmas Cards. Added Feature! Extra GOLD METALLIC SEALS. FREE, personalized personalized cards to Mother, Dad, Relatives and Friends. 50c profit. Extra bonus, 10 other Assortments. Christmas Cards with name—$50 for $1. Start earning NOW! Get Samples on approval. FRIENDSHIP STUDIOS, 843 Adams, Elmira, N. Y.

For a Lady in Distress

YOU'LL find a way to make money spare moments here in the Pin Money Club, a friendly money-making Club for girls and women. Do send for our booklet today!

Margaret Clarke, Secretary, Pin Money Club Department 117, Collier's Weekly
250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

om. "She's in there," Mrs. Dexter gesturing toward the bedroom. He in and she closed the door after her. The telephone began ringing. Charles answered it.

Lord Devereaux calling on Mr. and Mrs. Dexter," the clerk said.

and him up," Charles said.

They retreated to their chairs and waited. They heard the creak of the elevator mounting its shaft. They heard a rap on the door. "Come in," Mrs. Dexter said. "Oh, Napier!"

Napier stood by the door, waiting for someone to take his hat and stick. Then he stepped on the floor, the hat upturned like a receptacle.

"Don't people ever put ashes in it?" Mrs. Dexter asked.

"What?"

"Your hat?"

"Nonsense, no!"

"Stop it, Charles, stop it!" Mrs. Dexter said impatiently. "It's the heat," she explained, fanning herself with a handkerchief; "it's the frightful heat. It made us all ill-tempered. Can I order some iced tea, Napier?"

"Thank you, no," he said. "Never mind. Frightful stuff. Is Lila here?"

"Lila?" Mrs. Dexter asked first her husband. Her time was wasted. It was the decision of her life that she should have the greatest consequences, the strain of making it told on her.

"Lila? No, she's not here right now. Her voice was lifeless. 'She went out a minute.'"

She began fanning herself again. In the silence she heard Joe and Lila's voices from behind the closed door.

"I wonder where Lila is?" she said, raising her voice. "She's not exuberant. There's something you don't know, Napier. I should have known before. Lila has never been so punctilious."

"I—" Napier began.

"No, no," she sang, "don't interfere. I feel that I ought to tell you that Lila is frequently late. Sometimes as much as a day late. She's not the sort of person you can depend upon. In New York we never know where she is. Sometimes gone for days at a time. Sometimes for weeks. Last winter she disappeared for three weeks. In the city. We never tell the police. It's something you must remember if you're married. Never call in the city. You can't tell where you're going to find her. Frightfully embarrassing." Mrs. Dexter's face blanched and his mouth opened as she spun. Mrs. Dexter had been circling the room slowly, picking up and blowing imaginary dust from the loose object she passed. "I've always thought of it as amnesia," she went on, arching her harried imagination for a moment. "Personally, I've always thought of it as amnesia. At least, that's the most discreet way of looking at it. Don't you think? There's nothing hereditary about amnesia. Or is there? Personally, I've always thought of it as amnesia.

"Now when we were playing Reading, Pennsylvania," she said, and her flagging imagination seemed to have taken on new strength, "when we were playing Reading, Pennsylvania, she disappeared for nearly a month. Remember, Charles? We were playing a theater there called the Opera House. I did a little number with a rose between my teeth. Charles did a buck-and-wing. Did you know Charles can do a buck-and-wing? Or perhaps we haven't told you about our theatrical life. Or have we?"

"You haven't." The voice was the voice of an outraged man.

"Yes," she said tiredly, airily, "we were in the theater for years and years. Lila was born backstage. In a theater called the Strand. That was in Omaha, Nebraska. Her middle name is Strand. Lila Strand Dexter. Nice, don't you think? We were playing the intermission at a burlesque house then. Remember my costume, Charles? And that little number I sang." She stood in the center of the floor, swaying a little to some remembered melody.

For all her chattering, her absent-mindedness, her indiscriminate collection of friends, no one, until then, could ever have accused Tilly Dexter of anything that was either comic or undignified. She was a woman who cherished her dignity, and now that she was destroying it, it was with a great effort. She took three steps, first to the left, then to the right and made a frank attempt to kick. Her face was flushed with the exertion and her hair was coming loose. She began to sing:

"I'm not too young and I'm not too old,
I'm not too hot and I'm not too cold—"

The door slammed on Lord Devereaux.

IT WAS in the prolonged silence that followed Lord Devereaux's departure that they became conscious of the silence from the further room. Lila and Joe had stopped talking. Then Mrs. Dexter began to cry. She wept quietly, bitterly. Charles went to her and he felt her thin shoulders shaking under his arm. "There's no reason to cry, Tilly," he said quietly. "She has what she wants. That's what we came for. There's no reason to cry."

He stood and went to the window. The races were over and the crowds in their summer clothes were coming back into town. "Extra! Extra!" a newsboy was crowing. "Long shot takes Holly stakes by four lengths! Juan wins Holly stakes! Extra! Extra! Read all about it!"

COPYRIGHT 1940 BEAU BRUMMELL TIES, INC., CINCINNATI, OHIO

IF YOU want extra funds for clothes, travel or 1,001 other things, try this practical plan. You have nothing to lose—and a real income to gain! Hundreds of men and women in almost every walk of life are earning extra dollars by taking advantage of our attractive offer.

In the same way, you may increase your income by looking after new and renewal subscriptions for COLLIER'S and the other popular Crowell-Collier Publications. Accept this invitation to write for our free booklet—"Six Plans For Building Extra Income." Just paste the coupon on a penny postal and mail now!

-----Clip Here!-----
Independent Agency Division, Desk C-34
The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company
250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.
PLEASE send me your free booklet—"Six Plans For Building Extra Income."

Name.....
Address.....
Town.....
State.....

WILLIAM L. CHENERY

Editor

CHARLES COLEBAUGH

Managing Editor

THOMAS H. BECK

Editorial Director

HEMISPHERE OR QUARTER-SPHERE

CONSIDERABLE crawfishing on the Monroe Doctrine is being suggested here and there.

It's argued that the South American countries below the Brazil bulge are more in tune with Europe than with the United States; that if we undertake hemisphere defense it will be an ungrateful task at best, so we'd better be careful how we team up with South American countries whose political views don't match ours. We're urged to retire to a policy of quarter-sphere defense—try to hook Brazil, Venezuela, Colombia, Central America and Mexico into our defense orbit, and let the rest of South America go by. We seem to sense a confusion of thought in all this. Are we out to spread democracy just now, or are we out to defend our own democracy?

The Monroe Doctrine was first thundered in a time of blood and terror much like the present; and it was not based on idealism, or on the proposition that it is our duty to spread democracy like a gospel. The idea was to keep this nation strong in the Western Hemisphere.

James Monroe was not telling the South American republics what kind of government to establish when he uttered the famous Doctrine. He was thinking about protecting the United States against European interference. Curiously, the same kind of ideas that the Austrian Hitler is preaching today, another Austrian, Prince Metternich, was urging more than a century ago. We didn't want Europe's battles to be fought on American soil in 1824 and we still don't in 1940. What sort of government our neighbors arrange for themselves is their business. Any expeditionary force from Europe that seeks to impose a European system upon American people, North or South, is our business by the Monroe Doctrine.

Defense should come first, for the present. We can go back to spreading the gospel of democracy after we've insured our own democracy.

STATE SPLITTERS WEAKENING

WE QUOTE from a recent issue of Highway Highlights, a valuable publication got out by the National Highway Users' Conference, Washington, D. C.:

Kansas guardians of the ports of entry, the border patrol, have been asked by the chief executive to go out of their way to build good will with tourists. The governor is quoted as "requesting the patrol to take off their coats and help a tourist change a tire if necessary," asserting that many reports about the Kansas port-of-entry system are tending to discourage motorist travel.

A far better way for Kansas to build good will, of course, would be simply to abolish the port-of-entry system—that state-border scrofula which has been spreading alarmingly, and which, if it isn't stopped, will break up this country into a lot of hostile nations, Balkan style.

We're hoping such abolition will come in time, not only on the Kansas borders but also on the borders of all states now maintaining little camouflaged customhouses for the bleeding of "foreign" trucks and the annoyance of tourists.

The fact that the Kansas governor is telling his border patrolmen to mind their manners is an encouraging sign. When little job holders get orders from big job holders to act as if the public was composed of ladies and gentlemen, it usually means the big job holders are afraid of something. In this case, we suspect the Kansas big shots fear that the port-of-entry racket is in danger of being rubbed out by an enraged public opinion.

Hope so, anyway—and that friends of the interstate free-trade system that made the United States the world's wealthiest country will redouble the fight to restore interstate free trade.

LADIES AT THE WHEEL

IT'S no doubt cruel to stab at popular delusions; stirs up so many people to the disagreeable activity of thinking. Here goes, though:

Dr. Harry R. DeSilva, research expert, has just finished a study of 3,000 motorists, picked practically at random from among Connecticut's motoring population, in an effort to find out how much there really is in the popular belief that women are far worse drivers than men.

Dr. DeSilva's statistics boil down to this: That in this cross section of 3,000 motorists, women drive about half as much mileage as men but get into only one third as many accidents.

Which shows, the doctor unfeelingly points out, "that women are still safer drivers, and that they do not have fewer accidents merely because there are fewer women drivers."

In case it's objected that the doctor didn't study enough drivers to get a true picture, there is the gritty fact that in the auto accidents which took about 32,600 lives in this country last year only 6.6% of the drivers involved were women.

Here's one crumb of comfort for the gents, though. From our observation, when you do see a bum lady driver leaping from lane to lane and performing signals that aren't, she's worse than any man driver you ever see, anywhere.

THE RLA IS STILL WORKING

EARLY in July, about 30,000 employees of the Railway Labor Agency decided to strike. Writing, fair betting odds against strike of these rail workers are 5 to 1.

What happened was what has happened since the Railway Labor Act of 1926 (amended 1934) was passed. President appointed a board of men to look into the dispute and back within thirty days. A strike bidden for sixty days after a strike. In this interlude there is a lot of grievances, a chance for all to blow off steam, and so on—the habitual outcome is that there is a strike.

What constantly irritates us in connection is the fact that we don't have labor laws that will operate in the manner in all labor disputes.

Why can't a hold-everything-talk-it-over amendment be dubbed the Wagner Act, to apply to industries engaged in interstate commerce? Can't a constitutional amendment be under way, aimed at intrastate commerce industries? Meanwhile, while all states have delay-and-discuss laws applying to threatened strikes within their borders?

The main answer to those questions is that labor leaders generally oppose reforms. Laws like the Railway Labor Act cut down labor leaders' influence though they by no means make labor leaders unnecessary; and such laws make unjustified strikes almost inevitable.

This is tough on the racketeer labor leader. It is a lot easier, on the general public and on those who don't want to be rushed into action without fair warning and full explanation. We hope the highly probable success of the RLA in avoiding the particular strike may increase the pressure on our lawmakers for abolition of the delay-and-discuss policy throughout American industry.

August 31, 1940

5¢ A COPY

Collier's

NATIONAL WEEKLY

"ALL THE WORLD'S A STAGE"

Britain's Labor Boss By Quent

THE CROWELL-COLLIER PUBLISHING COMPANY—PUBLISHERS OF COLLIER'S—THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE

MODELED IN CLAY BY ALAN FOSTER

2101X
CALIF BURLINGAME
PUB LIBR
A 82641
C
1/20

The "Bottle Bacillus" or Pityrosporum Ovale, magnified many times.

your scalp behind the 8-BALL?

Listerine Treatment gives hair and scalp soothing antiseptic bath as it fights infectious dandruff. In clinical test 76% of subjects quickly benefited.

You are constantly annoyed by distressing, scaly dandruff flakes . . . excessive falling hair . . . and irritating scalp—watch out! You may be suffering from a real scalp infection, for dandruff is often due to it. So, start today with the famous Listerine Antiseptic treatment for infectious dandruff.

Kills Infectious Dandruff Germs

Simply douse Listerine Antiseptic on full strength each night and massage the scalp vigorously with the finger tips.

Antiseptic and massage helps to relieve and remove annoying flakes and scales. Aids in cleansing the scalp, leaving it feeling of invigoration.

Well, Listerine gives scalp and hair antiseptic bath . . . kills, by the way, the germs with infectious dandruff, including Pityrosporum Ovale. This strange "bottle bacillus" is recognized by outstanding dandruff specialists as a causative agent of infectious dandruff.

Rabbits and Humans

Rabbits inoculated with Pityrosporum Ovale developed definite dandruff symptoms, which disappeared shortly after being treated daily with Listerine.

Even more impressive results were revealed in clinical tests on men and women. In one clinic, 76% of dandruff sufferers who used Listerine Antiseptic and massage twice a day showed complete disappearance of or marked improvement in the symptoms of dandruff within 30 days.

Enthusiastic letters from all parts of the country give credit to this famous antiseptic for relief from dan-

THE TREATMENT

MEN: Douse full strength Listerine Antiseptic on the scalp morning and night.

WOMEN: Part the hair at various places, and apply Listerine Antiseptic right along the part with a medicine dropper, to avoid wetting the hair excessively.

Always follow with vigorous and persistent massage with fingers or a good hair brush. Continue the treatment so long as dandruff is in evidence. And even though you're free from dandruff, enjoy a Listerine massage once a week to guard against infection. Listerine Antiseptic is the same antiseptic that has been famous for more than 50 years as a mouth wash and gargle.

dandruff's annoyances; just as other letters praise its results against colds and sore throat.

If you have the slightest sign of dandruff, don't delay. Neglect may aggravate the symptoms. Start with Listerine Antiseptic now.

LAMBERT PHARMACAL COMPANY, St. Louis, Mo.

LISTERINE the medical treatment for INFECTIOUS DANDRUFF

WILLIAM L. CHENERY Editor
CHARLES COLEBAUGH Managing Editor
THOMAS H. BECK Editorial Director

WALTER DAVENPORT
AIMEE LARKIN
QUENTIN REYNOLDS
KYLE CRICHTON
KENNETH LITTAUER
JAMES N. YOUNG
MAX WILKINSON

Politics
Distrust
Sports
Screen and Theater
Fiction
Fiction
Fiction

WM. O. CHESSMAN
HENRY L. JACKSON
GURNEY WILLIAMS
DENVER LINDLEY
FRANK D. MORRIS
IFOR THOMAS
CLARENCE H. ROY

Art
Fine Feathers
Humor
Articles
Articles
Photographs
Syntax

W. B. COURTNEY
FRANK GERVASI
MARTHA GELLHORN
JIM MARSHALL
WM. HILLMAN
ROBERT McCORMICK
JOHN T. FLYNN

THIS WEEK

AUGUST 31, 1940

SHORT STORIES

RICHARD ENGLISH

No Summer Love. Romance was a luxury she couldn't afford. Page 9

HARRY SYLVESTER

Friend of the Warden. Tough guy meets tougher guy. Page 13

KYLE CRICHTON

I Cherish that Sentiment. How Brooklyn's Dodgers became a patriotic institution. Page 16

CLIFFORD DOWDEY

Gun Smoke. Things that are not for killers. Page 22

THE SHORT SHORT STORY

His Daily Bread, by Henry Meade Williams. Page 21

SERIAL STORIES

AGATHA CHRISTIE

The Patriotic Murders. The fifth of nine parts. What happened to the missing witness. Page 14

WILLIAM C. WHITE

Occupation: Widow. Conclusion. When thieves fall out. Page 20

ARTICLES

ANDRÉ MAUROIS

What Happened to France. The second of five parts. Modern history by a great historian. Page 11

HELEN HILCKEN

Shell Game. Just pick your lobster. Page 12

QUENTIN REYNOLDS

Britain's Labor Boss. Ernest Bevin, the workingman's friend. Page 15

JIM MARSHALL

The Bear Looks Over the Mountain. Where Britain waits for Russia. Page 18

JOHN DURANT

Tough On and Off. The villain pays off the screen too. Page 24

COREY FORD

Fair and Warmer. The heat wave makes the headlines. Page 41

FRELING FOSTER

Keep Up with the World. Page 6

EDITORIALS

Sparks Out, Please.
Forget the Class Stuff.
Prize Boner—1940. Page 50

COVER

ALAN FOSTER

ANY WEEK

WE HAVE a number of spirited yet less than gay letters from Europe. They have to do with a wide variety of subjects—from the plight of that most pathetic of men, the aged Henri Philippe Petain, to the furious potentialities of the possible Nazi invasion of South Ireland. The latter picture, vividly drawn by Mr. Jeremiah Stewart Grant O'Feragh of Limerick, Eire, is a sort of delayed-pass warning to Mr. Hitler. Mr. O'Feragh admits that the appearance of the Nazis in Ireland would touch off a bit of internal trouble, the furiosos of the Irish Republican Army being better than ready, indirectly, to assist any enemy of England in whatever way it will add to England's discomfort. "Nevertheless," writes Mr. O'Feragh, "it's likely to be a bad time for visitors. I'm reminded of a passing incident in the festivities attending the christening of my twin nieces, Nora and Moira, not two years since. It was at the height of the merrymaking that a misguided young man, a stranger in the country, tried to make off with one of the many beautiful lady guests. Caught, he was dispatched with great thoroughness. At the ensuing inquiry, the chief constable after lecturing the culprits on the seriousness of murder, said: "Did you not have the courtesy to ask the poor young man what he wanted?"

BUT WE shall pass over the misery of old Marshal Petain and the wretched whimperings of crooked French politicians and military poltroons who are now licking the boots of a conqueror who quite rightly despises them for it. If you'll continue to read this admittedly superior magazine, as of course you will, you'll be armed with the whole truth and remain free. Therefore we'll tell you, without guarantee, that one of our ever-dependable agents, Mr. Richard Randy English of Hollywood, California, was shopping for trinkets not long ago. While waiting to be served, Mr. English overheard a lady ask for one of those enameled and jeweled American flags to be worn on the lapel. The salesgirl got out the tray and the lady, after looking them over, asked: "Have you got them in any other colors?"

AS WE say, we give you Mr. English's report as we received it. We were not present. We pass it on hoping that it will not offend Mr. Francis A. Adams, director general of The Minute Men of America. From his office in New York City, Mr. Adams asks for an explanation of how the word "guff" was used in one of our recent editorials—The Big Job for Americans—which otherwise has tetched us a considerable number of congratulatory letters. It was, we thought, a pretty skillful piece of common-denominator writing, bidding ourselves be rational and steadfast in our patriotism and not physical. The paragraph Mr. Adams objects to with the unerring swiftness of the ever-alert minute man was: "Professional patriots are yawping that we've all got to take to saluting the flag at the drop of a hat—any hat, anywhere—and the Supreme Court, no less, fell for one aspect of this guff in the recent Jehovah's Witnesses decision." Mr. Adams deserves a more intelligent answer but we don't seem to be able to get any further than a reinforced conviction that guff's guff. And we ought to know.

SOME time ago we seem to have said something over-airy about that tree-planting program in the Great Plains sector, a desert-rescuing shelter belt from Canada to Mexico. Mr. E. L. Perry of Lincoln, Nebraska, in the United States Forest Service, read it and bided his time. He now writes that the Forest Service has planted some hundred and fifty thousand trees on 25,000 prairie farms and "in spite of dismal prophecies, drought, jack rabbits and grasshoppers, the plantations have done right well. No Jack-and-the-beanstalk stuff, you understand, but certainly good enough to kill the argument of a grizzled Texan during the early days of the project. I was making a speech," goes on Mr. Perry, "when the old boy demanded the floor and got it. 'Listen to me, young feller,' he roared, 'if God A'mighty had fingered trees'd grow on these here damn' plains, He'd done the plantin'.'"

SOBERED by a series of bad guesses, we're refusing numerous demands that we predict the outcome of the forthcoming elections. Nevertheless the battle's on and while lying low we're content to let you do the prophesying and labeling. Thus far we can't say much for your reasoning and less for the aptness of the tags you are tying to the two candidates. Mr. Willkie is called The Huey Long of the Station Wagon Set and Mr. Roosevelt a Coy Caesar. Bad, very bad—and we refuse to give the names of the guilty correspondents for which we hope they thank us. However, we don't look forward to much inspired sloganeering this year, with the world in the dismals. But maybe we got off to a bad start. We asked one of Mr. Roosevelt's best skills to explain that Chicago convention to us—the shanghaiing of those bemused delegates, for example, and why, if it was an unbossed gathering, Jim Farley's sober contemplation and a of reckoning was ignored. "The truth," said he, "the American through those fine, enthusiastic gates, were so insistent that nate the boss that we had to quickly. We were afraid we can people, through their gates, would take matters into their own hands." We recovered pretty quickly, and asked matters into their own nominate Mr. Roosevelt?" said: "Exactly."

IN ANSWER to a large number of demands that this magazine publish a few pages of facts about our progress toward preparedness, we only say be patient, continue upon us and inevitably be. But the customary calm of Elmo Thackera of Washington is upset. "What happens, Thackera, 'if by the time we get to lick somebody, this unredeemed Hitler, has quit fighting and trying to find the answer?'" he has won that he pays no attention to us, all dressed up in airplane battleships and bombs? Does he pose he's low enough to look the lurch like that?"

WE WOULDN'T be surprised if Mr. Thackera be the grined one. We got to talking recruiting sergeant the other asked him about the stories that it was becoming harder to recruit volunteers. Thackera admitted that business was denied that this indicated ingness of our young men. "The trouble is," said he, "a fight but that they don't want any of the fancy peacetime had two mugs in this month told me they'd sign up if we guarantee them they would to do any parading. One of them that his old man served two years in the Army and spent half his life parading up and down all the Streets in the country whooping for something and being a politician. This kid had a job. He wanted to know why he didn't review the politician while."

GUFF again. . . .

Vol. 106, No. 9. Entered as second-class matter at Post Office, Springfield, Ohio, U. S. A., under Act of March 3, 1879, and at Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, Springfield, Ohio, Publishers of Woman's Home Companion, The American Magazine, Collier's. Copyright, 1940, The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, in the United States, Canada and Great Britain. Executive and Editorial Offices: 250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.; 6 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London. Published weekly at Springfield, Ohio, U. S. A. Joseph P. Knapp, Chairman of the Board; Thomas H. Beck, President; Albert E. Wincer, Executive Vice President and Treasurer; Gertrude B. Lane, Vice President; John S. Brehm, Vice President; William P. Larkin, Vice President; J. A. Welch, Vice President; Denis O'Sullivan, Secretary. Manuscripts or art submitted to Collier's, The National Weekly, should be accompanied by addressed envelopes and sufficient postage for their return. The fee for return of unsolicited manuscripts or art. Price $2.00 a year, $3.50 for two years, in the United States, Canada, Mexico, New Zealand, Argentina, Balearic Islands, Bolivia, Brazil, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Greenland, Labrador, Mexico, Newfoundland, Nicaragua, Uruguay and Venezuela. Price $5.00 a year, $5.00 for two years, $7.00 for three years, $10.00 for four years, $15.00 for five years. Remit check in United States funds to The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, Springfield, Ohio. To avoid mistakes in delivery, send address five weeks in advance. Give business address.

velopes and sufficient postage for their return. The fee for return of unsolicited manuscripts or art. Price $2.00 a year, $3.50 for two years, in the United States, Canada, Mexico, New Zealand, Argentina, Balearic Islands, Bolivia, Brazil, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Greenland, Labrador, Mexico, Newfoundland, Nicaragua, Uruguay and Venezuela. Price $5.00 a year, $5.00 for two years, $7.00 for three years, $10.00 for four years, $15.00 for five years. Remit check in United States funds to The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, Springfield, Ohio. To avoid mistakes in delivery, send address five weeks in advance. Give business address.

Should you be on the lookout for Diabetes?

do not have the disease. If the possibility of diabetes is indicated, then a study of sugar in the blood can help the doctor detect the condition early—frequently before other symptoms appear. Thus, you can be guided to prompt control of the disease with diet and insulin before it has made much progress.

The most common signs of diabetes, frequently not recognized by those who have the disease in early stages, are: Excessive thirst; excessive appetite; loss of weight; constant weariness and unaccountable irritability; and, in older people, boils and carbuncles.

► Naturally, definite symptoms should call for immediate medical attention.

It is encouraging to realize that a healthy, active life is not only possible but probable for most diabetics who promptly discover their ailment and follow competent medical guidance. They easily become adjusted to the four vital conditions necessary for diabetes control: 1. Proper diet, 2. Insulin as prescribed, 3. Exercise, 4. Cleanliness.

For further helpful information concerning this disease and its control, send for the Metropolitan's free booklet "Diabetes."

COPYRIGHT 1940 — METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

Frederick H. Ecker, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD
Leroy A. Lincoln, PRESIDENT

1 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company
1 Madison Avenue, New York, Dept. 940-C

Please send me a copy of your booklet, "Diabetes."

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

Plan to visit the Metropolitan's exhibits at the New York World's Fair and at the Golden Gate International Exposition in San Francisco

OLKS should be especially on their guard against diabetes, as a tendency to this disease often runs in certain families.

Furthermore, the people it strikes are usually middle-aged and between the ages of 40 and 60. It occurs most frequently among people leading sedentary and inactive lives, and is more common among women than among men.

If you have reason to be on the alert for diabetes, it is particularly important for you to have regular physical examinations at regular intervals.

These examinations may reassure you that you

A BUSINESS MAN WITH MORE AT STAKE THAN PROFITS...

Your Florsheim Dealer

His business is bigger than just selling shoes; he's charged with the comfort and the health of every man he fits. He recommends FLORSHEIM SHOES because our 48-year-old reputation for quality workmanship is his best guarantee of perfect fit and lasting satisfaction. Visit your Florsheim Dealer; he knows shoes best—and he knows the best shoes are Florsheims.

FALL FLORSHEIMS FOR STREET OR CAMPUS

Whether your choice runs to a heavy pigskin Blucher or a correct custom half brogue, you'll find it in the Florsheim Fall line... exclusively styled, exactly made to the quality standard that has built the largest fine shoe business in the world.

Most Styles

$8<sup>95</sup> and $10

The HIGHLAND

The MAJOR

THE Florsheim SHOE

The Florsheim Shoe Company, Mfrs., Chicago • Makers of Fine Shoes for Men and Women

KEEP UP WITH THE WORLD
By Freling Foster

America now has more than three hundred Western dude ranches, ranging in size from 640 to 50,000 acres, where about 13,000 Eastern vacationists are spending approximately $3,000,000 this summer.

In the playing of certain classical compositions on the piano, the notes and fingering, accidentals, interpretations, pauses, phrasing, pedaling, meter and rhythm may demand as many as sixty mental operations a second.

Owing to the migration of population and business to outlying districts and the subsequent demolition of old buildings during the past decade, at least one third of the private land, in hundreds of American cities, is in the form of vacant lots.

The first execution in the electric chair in 1890 immediately created eighteen words, including electrocution, for this new method of capital punishment. The seventeen words, now obsolete, included: Electricide, electromort, fulmen, thanelectrize and voltacuss.

According to decisions of the United States Supreme Court, no one has a vested legal right to a government pension. Pensions are bounties that Congress may give, withhold or recall at its discretion.

The train of a peacock is not its tail. The beautiful, long plumes that the bird raises into a large, fan-shaped shield are in front of the short tail feathers that are used as a support.

Every queen bee imported into the United States must undergo an examination for parasitic mites in the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine in Washington, D. C.

The quantity of current consumed by the average electric clock is so little that it does not register on the meter when all other electrical devices and lights are turned off.—By Evelyn Kuelich, Union City, New Jersey.

Those who contributed gas year to the Crypt of Civilization at Oglethorpe University in Georgia, have been given a "perishable" metal card to the titles any descendant, of the generation, to attend the opening at noon on May 28, 8113.—By B. E. Bailey, Madison, Wisconsin.

In Algeria, as many as four Berbers may own a single trunk and the other two or three various branches.—By Marie Ger, Evansville, Indiana.

Based on prewar areas, Holland colonial empire is sixty times larger as the Netherlands, the Belgian Congo is eighty times as large as Belgium, the French possessions are twenty-two times as large as France, and British territories throughout the world is one hundred and forty times as large as Great Britain.

"Arab" is a loosely applied term as it is not a designation for any one race or religion. There are 35,000,000 Arabs in the world, being of numerous creeds and native to a score of countries.—By Frances Brandenburg, Louisville, Kentucky.

The following item, recently published inaccurately, is here corrected: Several states limit the amount of insurance that can be collected on the lives of children of various ages. For example, in New York, regardless of the number of policies, only $1,000 can be collected when the child is under six months, only $200 when between six months and one year, only $300 when between one and a half years, only $400 when between two and a half years, and only $500 when over two and a half years.

Five dollars will be paid for each unusual fact accepted for this column. Contributions must be accompanied by a factory proof. Address Keep Up with the World, Collier's, 250 Park Avenue, New York City. This column is copyrighted by The National Weekly. None of the material may be reproduced without express permission of the publisher.

"More Auto Insurance for your money!"

How a remarkable common sense insurance plan has spread to benefit more than a million car owners—

a statement by

G. J. Mecherle

G. J. Mecherle, Chairman of the Board,
State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company

These 4 State Farm Economies help make Auto Insurance available at Low Cost... help budget-minded drivers get more protection for their families and homes...

1 Six-Month Policies

State Farm introduced six-month policies to make auto insurance easier to buy. You need not pay a full year's premium in advance. This practice also makes it possible for State Farm to adjust rates at frequent intervals to keep rates as nearly on an actual cost basis as possible.

2 Only One Acquisition Cost

State Farm policyholders pay the acquisition cost of an auto insurance policy only once—not once a year, but once a lifetime! Savings made possible by renewing same policy are passed on to policyholders. Renewal premiums are therefore lower than charged by most companies.

3 Overhead Costs Lowered

All routine work in the issuance of State Farm auto insurance policies is handled in the State Farm office building in Bloomington, Ill. (pictured below) and in the branch office in Berkeley, Cal. Local agents are not burdened with this expense. The savings made possible are passed on to policyholders.

4 Only Careful Drivers Insured

Careless drivers raise the cost of insurance. Because every State Farm policyholder must be a safe driver, full value automobile insurance is made possible at the lowest rates consistent with sound operation.
Note: State Farm has 7,000 representatives strategically located across the nation to serve you promptly and intelligently.

"Why not price auto insurance so low that every one can enjoy the security and peace of mind it brings?"

"Why not deliver more auto insurance for the money by giving broader service and greater protection?"

"That was my aim 18 years ago. To do this, a group of us in Bloomington, Illinois, founded the State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company back in 1922.

"Since then, our common sense planning has made State Farm one of the largest insurance companies in the world.

"We threw overboard certain costly practices. Our modern methods have made it possible, over a period of time, to save our policyholders more than $40,000,000 in the cost of their insurance.

"State Farm is a mutual company—operated solely for the benefit of our policyholders.

"Just how State Farm can offer you more insurance for your money is explained briefly at the left. For more complete information—and for a valuable Auto Insurance Buying Guide—you are urged to mail the coupon. There's no obligation at all in requesting this new booklet."

Yours—FREE—Common Sense Insurance Buying Guide

MR. G. E. MECHERLE
State Farm Insurance Companies
Bloomington, Illinois C-80

Dear Mr. Mecherle: Please send me your new booklet, "The State Farm Common Sense Way of Buying Automobile Insurance at Actual Cost." This request, I understand, will place me under no obligation.

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

STATE FARM

Insurance Companies

BLOOMINGTON, ILLINOIS

PHILCO brings you a NEW KIND OF RADIO-PHONOGRAPH THAT PLAYS ANY RECORD ON A Beam of Light!

THE PHILCO PHOTO-ELECTRIC Radio-Phonograph gives you glorious new Beauty and Purity of Tone. Record wear and surface noise reduced by 10 to 1. No needles to change.

ANOTHER history-making invention is here from the laboratories of Philco engineers . . . a new kind of radio-phonograph that plays any record on a beam of light! For the first time, a Photo-Electric Cell is used in the reproduction of records . . . a brand-new principle that brings you new delights in the enjoyment of recorded music.

The old-fashioned, heavy crystal pick-up with its pointed steel needle that scrapes the music from the record is now a thing of the past. In the sensational Philco PHOTO-ELECTRIC Radio-Phonograph, a floating reproducer with a rounded jewel glides gently over the record grooves and reflects the music on a light beam from a tiny, fluttering mirror

to a Photo-Electric Cell. Only Philco

Utterly new in principle, you enjoy beauty you have never known before. The floating jewel lasts for 8 to 10 years . . . no need to change! You can enjoy your valuable records for 700 playings without fear of wear . . . times longer than before! And you get the beauty of the record, unmarred by scratches and needle talk . . . you hear the mellow "lows" without sacrifice of clear, brilliant "highs" . . . glorious new purity of

Make Your Own Records at Home

The Philco Home Recording Unit is optional equipment with every Philco Photo-Electric Radio-Phonograph. Record the voices of family and friends, permanent records of radio programs, mail "letters" to friends. Many fascinating uses. Easy

Only Philco Has the TILT-FRONT CABINET

A new kind of radio-phonograph cabinet, too . . . created by Philco. No need to remove ornaments and raise a lid to reach the phonograph. No dark, awkward, hard-to-get-at compartments. Just tilt forward the grille and the record turntable comes out automatically, in full view, easy to reach and convenient to use. Only Philco has it!

(Left) Philco 608P, only $12.95 down

Philco Radios and Radio-Phonographs: $9.95 to $395.
See and Hear Them at Your Nearest Philco Dealer Now.

In radios, too, Philco for 1941 brings you startling new inventions . . . more tubes for the money, bigger finer speakers, a complete variety of lovely console and table model cabinets . . . the greatest values in Philco history! See and hear the new 1941 Philco radios, radio-phonographs and auto radios today.

PHILCO 255T. The finest table model radio money can buy in tone, performance and beauty. Powerful 9-tube circuit gives amazing sensitivity and selectivity. Lovely Walnut cabinet. Only $5.95 down.

EVERY 1941 PHILCO IS BUILT TO RECEIVE TELEVISION SOUND
AND FREQUENCY MODULATION . . . THE WIRELESS WAY!

PHILCO 609P. This Philco Photo-Electric Radio-Phonograph combines the exquisite beauty of a lovely Period cabinet of authentic Hepplewhite design with the thrill of Philco's new and spectacular 1941 inventions. It brings you new vital benefits no other radio-phonograph can offer. Music on a beam of light. Tilt-Front cabinet. Automatic Record Changer for 12 records. New phono circuit, specially designed for finest record tone. Yours for only $15 down.

No Summer Love

By Richard English

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN HOLMGREN

The girl said: "I don't go in for summer love, Duke." She was wise. So was he DUKE WAYNE hesitated on the steps, gazing down on the long blue pool and the gay canvas of the cabanas. The pool looked cool and inviting with the tennis courts stretching out behind it, nestling there in the Colorado mountains. The Bristol itself was on the terraced hillside, white and imposing against the rugged purple of the horizon. It was a nice layout, he thought, and he should know. In the four years since he had won the Olympic four-hundred-meter championship he had seen them all.

"Down here," Pam cried. "Down here at the end, Duke!"

He smiled when he saw the crowd loafing before her cabana. No matter whether it was Miami or Sun Valley you could count on Pam Norton having sorted out the people who were fun or well-known, and while you were at that resort they were the crowd you ran with. They always had more money than they needed and the men were hard-drinking and easygoing, while the girls had too much time and too little to do. And because you were Duke Wayne and had fame instead of money, you fitted in as if you had always belonged: as if you had learned to swim in some exclusive club instead of a neighborhood Y.M.C.A.

He made his way through the people sunning themselves beside the pool and there were the whispers as they told one another that he looked just like his pictures. There was the dark hair curling around his forehead, the rather prominent jaw and the long, swelling biceps that you expected in a great swimmer. Duke could feel their eyes and it neither pleased him nor displeased him. It was just something that went with the championship.

Pam came running up and he grinned down on her, one big hand rumpling the honey-colored bob that was so smart against her summer tan. It was nice to see the cool blue eyes again, to watch the lips that were always a perfect, vivid arch. "How are you, Pam?"

"Fine," she said. And then, accusingly: "It's about time you got here. Staying over for that silly meet in Omaha!"

He glanced at her, wondering why she could never understand that it was at those silly meets that he picked up enough expense money to drift around the country; keeping in shape to retain his title and

"I think we'd better stay in our own leagues," she said. "Isn't it rather obvious? I'm sure no working girl could really afford you" at the same time having a lot of fun that he would never have had otherwise.

"I had to stay over," he said easily. "I'd promised the brass hats."

He had cracked the national record there but he didn't have to tell Pam that. She knew such things and it slid out in her conversation when others were around. She was introducing him to the others then and some of them he already knew. There were Tommy and Edie Farrell whom he had met at the Bristol the year before and there were Bob Miller and Dobie Renwick whom you ran into everywhere. He shook hands with them all and then stretched out in the sun.

Pam was sitting beside him and her eyes were never off him for long.

"I missed you, handsome," she said. "You might have written."

"I'm sorry, Pam. I keep meaning to write but by the time I get around to it you've gone somewhere else and I'm right back where I started."

SHE glanced at him, wondering if he really believed that. She had met Duke in Miami and at first he had been just another cute boy until she realized that he was content to leave things that way. While he hadn't said anything yet, he would. Things could go on building themselves up only so long.

"You've caught me now, Duke," she said. "What are you going to do about it?"

"Wrap you in cellophane," he said. "I'm no fool."

She made a face at him and he grinned. Presently he remembered that he would have to look up Bob Appleby in the next day or so. Bob handled the Bristol's promotion and he would want some publicity tie-up to write off against Duke's room and board.

The waiters were setting up a buffet lunch in the cabana. Duke shook his head when Pam wanted him to eat with the others. "Not yet," he said, stretching. "I'm going to take a plunge."

He wandered over to the springboard and it was then, for the first time, that he saw the girl in the red suit. She was sitting beside the board, her head thrown back to catch the sun. There was a fine, full mouth and lovely chestnut-colored hair but a lot of girls had that. It was her eyes that made you wonder who she was.

They were almost a sea-green and there was none of that casual invitation in them that most pretty girls had. She glanced at him and at the Olympic shield on his trunks and then she closed her eyes again, tilting her head back to the sun. There was that and nothing more.

His body arched in a clean dive and a moment later his head bobbed up some twenty feet beyond the board. The water was just cold enough for that familiar tingling feeling to begin flowing through him. His long, flat muscles responded and he was sliding up the pool, so easily and so smoothly that there was hardly a ripple.

He was still stiff from his long drive and it was a good half-hour before he felt limbered up. He floated there a while, and just when he was about to call it a day he saw the girl splashing her way up the pool. She was digging in too deep and her arms were threshing in awkward arcs.

When her face was turned to his he smiled. "You make hard work of it," he said. "Keep your feet up and you won't have to paddle so hard."

He made his way through and there were whispers as they told one another that he looked just like his pictures

Most girls would have liked Wayne's noticing them and they have shown it. But not this one. Water was dripping off her high, cheekbones and her eyes were amused than interested.

"Thanks," she said, "but I've so many faults that I'm afraid working one of them won't help much."

He looked at her a moment. "On down to the shallow end and I'll show you." He wasn't in the habit of things like that but this girl was it. She wasn't just a pickup and could tell it.

He must have spent twenty minutes showing her how to get her feet in, making her hold on to the ledge while she practiced. She was about twenty-four, he decided, and she was different from any of the girls he knew. She was pleasant but not the kind you move in on. Her name was Gerry Andrews. He told her he had just arrived and she nodded but didn't ask any questions. She didn't even ask him how he was going to stay.

"Duke," Pam called, "Duke, he's going in now."

"I'll be along," he said. "See you at the bar."

Pam still didn't leave and the girl at the pool glanced at Duke. "Perhaps you'd better run along," she said. "Your friends seem to be waiting."

He could feel the amusement in her voice and it annoyed him. "When I get through," he said shortly. "Let's go kick right before we call it a day."

She glanced at the clock over the entrance courts. "I'm afraid I'm through now," she said pleasantly. "I'll have to go in."

He followed her to the ladder. "Do you want to come down some more?"

"I couldn't promise," she said. "I'm not always free."

"Free?"

Her eyes were openly amused. "That's right," she said. "You can happen to work here."

SHE didn't show up at the pool and so one day Duke wandered over to the Bristol garage. A stocky mechanic was checking over the wiring system of an expensive roadster and he was sweating under his breath. Duke dug a finger in his ribs, and when he saw who it was Mike grinned.

"Hello, kid," he said, wiping his hands on some waste. "I heard you blew it. What goes?"

"Nothing much," said Duke. "V goes with you?"

"I got my two week's notice in," said Mike. "I caught a job with an airport outfit in Burbank and we're driving to the coast. The wife's pretty excited. She's always wanted to see California."

"She'll like it," said Duke. There was the familiar heavy smell of oil and cars that were in for repairs and it made him think of the trade school. He had always been interested in motors and was in his last year at the school when he won his first national title.

"What's wrong with that baby?"

"She keeps shorting out," Mike said. Duke nodded. You could spend ten hours on those big jobs looking for a lousy little short.

"Let me have the light," he said. He was holding it while Mike checked the ignition. It wasn't in there and both frowned. "How about the generator?" Duke asked.

Mike was still frowning. "I don't think so," he said, "but maybe it's hurt to check it."

In ten minutes he had located the short. It was in the generator itself.

He was working on it when Duke remembered what had brought him there.

"Mike, do you know a girl named"

(Continued on page 39)

land overwhelmed her soldiers with attention to prevent boredom. Above, Gracie Fields entertaining troops in France

© BRITISH COMBINE

What Happened in France

by André Maurois

TRANSLATED BY DENVER LINDLEY

The author, appointed "Official French Eyewitness" with the British army, sees the futile, brave efforts of the Allied soldiers trying to dig in against a war that never happens

THE FIRST EIGHT MONTHS OF THE WAR WERE WASTED

THE beginning of October, 1939, a short time after the first English troops arrived in France, I received a letter from the British Army inviting me to come to the Headquarters of that army as "Official Eyewitness." My duties were to follow the course of operations to maintain contact between British troops and the French people by varied means as articles, lectures and on the radio.

During the four years of the last war I was liaison officer attached to the British Army; I retained the pleasantest memories of my English and Scotch friends; I had, in fact, written my first book about them, and so I was naturally attracted by this offer which was made with a great deal of warmth and cordiality. I accepted a reserve officer in the French Army and transmitted the letter to my superior and at once received an order to go. Thus it was that I went to Arras as a lieutenant's uniform (my rank was not yet known) to present myself to Lord Gort, commander in chief.

General Viscount Gort was staying at the Château d'Habarcq near Arras. I was received there by his aides-de-camp, a magnificent Scotch officer in a kilt with the Gordon tartan and a beautiful silver-hilted dagger in his beribboned stocking, the amiable Lord Munster, illegitimate descendant of William IV of England. In the small waiting room Gordon Munster offered me a strange and delicious cocktail which they called "the Horror." Then they said to me, "Now we'll take you to the chief." I had a generalissimo had a simpler office. A scrawled card, affixed to the door by four thumbtacks, read: "Office of the C. in C." Inside the room, empty of all furniture, two trestles of white wood supported a bare plank. This was Lord Gort's worktable. The simplicity was intentional. Lord Gort believes that a chief should live in the same way as his men. Extremely active by nature, he found, in time of war, his only sport and relaxation in walking. He was to be seen at dawn on the muddy roads around Arras, his elbows close to his body, his head thrust forward, his red-and-gold cap defying the rain, followed by a panting aide-de-camp.

GORDON told me that one day his chief had taken him to the Hotel Crillon for a conference with General Gamelin. He, Gordon, had been delighted at the thought of passing a pleasant evening in Paris. But after dinner Lord Gort had said:

"Now we'll go for a walk."

Whereupon, elbows close to his body and head thrust forward, he made three very quick turns around the Louvre, by way of the Rue de Rivoli and the quays, and then went home to bed, still followed by the disconsolate Gordon.

The thing that struck me, on seeing Gort for the first time, was his air of youth, vigor and animation. Hore-Belisha had just rejuvenated the command of the British army and I think he had been right in doing so. The conversation was rapid and easy. Lord Gort spoke first of Hitler's plans.

"Will he attack through Belgium? I think he will," said the general, "because it is the only operation possible. You remember your Foch's dictum: 'In war you do what you can, making use of what you have!' Only I don't see how Hitler can launch an offensive in winter in this Flanders mud, and if several months are to pass without fighting I'm afraid our men will become bored. It's no joke, you know, when darkness comes at four o'clock, to go back to a damp barn with no light but a candle."

"But, sir, in 1914 we spent all our time in dugouts and trenches."

"That was different," he said, "at that time we had an enemy in front of us who saw to it that we had enough to do. Here I am holding a line in front of Lille and Douai." (He got up abruptly to show me the line on the map.) "I have nothing in front of me except Belgium, a neutral country. It's not easy in these circumstances to maintain a fighting spirit. No, if this inaction is prolonged, a way will have to be found to distract the men. Lord Nuffield has offered me radio sets, but that's a problem in itself. Our soldiers can't use radios that require an outside source of current, because they have no electricity in their cantonments. And so we must have radios that work from storage batteries. But then the batteries will have to be recharged. I'm engaged at the moment in having some cars equipped to go from unit to unit to perform this service."

Then he described to me the fortified lines that, according to information he had received from the Intelligence Service, the Germans had constructed in Poland against the Russians. This was at the time when people still hoped that these two nations would not long remain on friendly terms—a tenacious illusion, like so many others. Then he talked to me about the work I was to do.

"I want you," he said, "to talk to my men a great deal about the French army and to the French soldiers about our army. Then, too, we must make op-

Lord Gort, British commander in chief, an extremely active man, found relaxation in the early part of the war in long walks accompanied by an aide portunities for our regiments to meet each other. Yesterday my lancers had lunch with your cuirassiers. That's fine. I myself often see General Giraud, commander of your Seventh Army, stationed on my left. He's a splendid soldier."

The cigarette he had given me was starting to burn my fingers and I looked about for an ash tray.

"Oh, throw it on the floor," the general said.

For, as a matter of principle, Lord Gort, who discarded all useless objects when on a campaign, did not own an ash tray.

NEXT day I began my inspection of the front lines. These lines, as General Gort had said, had nothing opposite them except customs barriers and Belgian policemen, but they might, in the event that Germany invaded Belgium, become from one day to the next the scene of the great battle. I was horrified at their weakness.

I had known, to be sure, from hearing it often repeated, that the Maginot Line ended in the neighborhood of Montmédy, but I naively believed that it was prolonged along the Belgian frontier by a series of fortifications that were perhaps less strong but nevertheless formidable. I received one of the greatest and most painful shocks of my life when I saw the pathetic line which, on a part

(Continued on page 42)

Shell Game

By Helen Hilcken

The private life of the lobster is interesting, but gourmets prefer the post-mortem facts, with sauce

WHEN you mention lobster to some people they launch into a detailed account of what happened the last time they ate lobster. It probably wasn't the lobster's fault at all. A three-year-old child can eat lobster that is properly cooked and not eaten with an assortment of other foods that impede digestion. It's as safe as chicken or steak or any other fish or meat.

So let's lift the veil of mystery and bring the lobster right out on our own dinner table where it belongs. It's really one of our first American foods, because the Pilgrims who settled in Massachusetts caught and enjoyed the edible crustacean that so closely resembled the lobsters they had once found off the coast of England.

Today the state of Maine produces seventy per cent of the lobster catch of the United States, although lobsters are found from Labrador to North Carolina in a short strip 1,300 miles long, 30 to 50 feet wide and 6 to 600 feet deep.

In Maine you'll find families with their own theories about broiling, boiling or steaming lobsters and their own favorite recipes for sauce or stew. And all along the roads in summer you see tourists' cars lined up outside the restaurants, while the visitors are exclaiming over the live lobsters moving nimbly about on the tips of their slender legs in the ponds where they are kept awaiting your order.

On Martha's Vineyard Island, eight miles off the coast of Massachusetts, the lobster fishermen set their traps in the water off Menemsha, baited with a piece of stale fish. The lobster usually looks for his food at night and by nature is a cannibal, feeding on the sculpin, the sea robin and even young lobsters two to four inches long. Clams and eel grass too are part of his diet.

These traps, or lobster pots, are visited every two or three days, and are set in water 30 to 180 feet deep. The trap, with its funnel-shaped opening of tarred net, permits easy entrance, but prevents escape.

Huge fireplaces are the rule on Martha's Vineyard and much of the cooking is done in large kettles that hang on a trivet over a roaring fire. Usually the lobsters are steamed, because steaming makes them more tender than boiling. The lobsters are grabbed behind the claws and plunged whole and alive into an inch of water boiled in a kettle with a tight cover so no steam can escape. Lobsters weighing anywhere from a pound to two or three pounds are best for steaming. They are timed according to size—eight or ten minutes for the small ones and about fifteen to twenty minutes for the larger ones. After steaming they're taken out on the rocks, cracked, and the edible luscious meat from the shell piled into cups of melted butter.

At the west end of Martha's Vineyard is the Indian Reservation at Gay Head, where the sandy clay of the famous cliffs takes on myriad colors ranging from purple red, blue, yellow and orange. The fore dipping into the ocean. Across the road from the cliffs stands an old, white house, high and alone, swept by winds that blow in three directions. On Martha's Vineyard Sound and the Atlantic Ocean. Here an Indian family, the Vans, live, opening their doors in summer to visitors who come to buy native handicraft and eat their famous lobster sandwiches. Big chunks of lobster go between buttered slices of white bread and a tasty mayonnaise dressing complements the flavor of the lobster.

Over on Nantucket Island they eat lobster salads and at the Roberts Hotel where many notables dine, it appears on the dinner menu several nights a week. The meaty lobster is removed from the shell and placed on crisp beds of lettuce with mayonnaise, sliced tomatoes and hard-boiled eggs. Soft hot rolls and steamed blueberry pudding round out the meal.

If you feel more comfortable eating lobster (Continued on page 45)

It was too late to do anything about it. George was looking into the muzzle of his own .38 special

Friend of the Warden

By Harry Sylvester

A bad night for a guard in the prison ward
—but it led to the dawn of a better day

ILLUSTRATED BY HARRY MORSE MEYERS

FIVE minutes to midnight, George Burns, wearing his uniform of a prison keeper, walked the corridor leading to the prison on the sixth floor of the city hospital. Already the hospital corridors had, on the lighter, almost sinister stillness of the night, only an occasional in white moving silently through halls. Woody Olson got up from the bench in front of the ward and looked at George as he approached. "In time," Woody said, "and sober. He's Foley?"

"He's been detailed to take care of a wounded kid in a private room." "That's where my partner's been all night," Woody said. "You'll be alone. You got luck. Here, sign."

George Burns looked at the little slip of paper. The thing that caught his eye was the number on it, 14. "Fourteen," he said, signing the receipt. "Thirteen men and Langer," Olson looked at it again?" George said. "When hasn't he been at it?" Olson said. "Abusing the nurses, dumping his things on the floor when he doesn't like it. Calling the doctors names."

"Why don't you do something about it?" George said, knowing well why nothing was done about it.

"Why the hell do you think?" Olson said. "He went off down the corridor, a big hulk of a man, earnest and confident."

George put his lawbook, Pleading and Practice, on the bench beside him as he sat down and thought of the receipt. Fourteen men, he thought, and he had taken receipts for them like many cattle in a stockyard. It was a busy business and he would be glad to get out of it this spring when he finished law school.

He put a small, leather cushion against one end of the bench and half reclined against it while he tried to study. Even now, after a year in the prison ward, the night stillness beat on his ears. In dimnesses at the end of the corridors his eyes caught the whiteness of uniforms flitting by, and occasionally a moan floated along the corridor to him. He could think of when he had been at Central three years ago; before the cleanup, when the cons ran the place and Langer's friend, Clovis, had been a head keeper there. Clovis was deputy warden in charge of the prison ward now, and so far it was as though there had been no past enmity between himself and George. With Langer here again, and himself and Clovis, George wondered if there would be trouble again.

He drowsed a little, then heard feet on the corridor. He knew Foley and Dr. Levy stood over him looking at him, but didn't open his eyes.

"There he is," Foley said. "I don't know how he does it. It's bad enough working here without trying to study law for class the next morning."

"I'll tell you how he does it," Dr. Levy said. "He puts whatever book he wants to study under his pillow and then sleeps on it. In an hour or two, if we don't disturb him for the crass affairs of the hospital, he has it."

GEORGE BURNS opened his eyes and looked at them. He had a pleasant, homely face, lined somewhat more than is good for a young man's, but intelligent and possessing even a kind of querulous humor. "I don't sleep," he said. "I was just resting my eyes."

"That's what they all tell the commissioner when they're brought up on charges," Dr. Levy said. He was short, slight and dapper; in the hospital he always wore a stethoscope; in the street a small camera depended as regularly from his neck.

"How are you, Jake?" George said, sitting up. "You look rested and refreshed from your long vacation."

"You look like hell," Dr. Levy said. "What you been doing with yourself?"

George Burns put a slightly vacant look on his face and stared off into space while he enumerated on his fingers: "I work in the gow at night, go to law school in the morning and come home stiff in the afternoon. Simple, isn't it?"

"And sometime about evening one fine day," Dr. Levy said, "we'll be helping them bring you in in a strait jacket they've put on you to help stop you swinging at those blue alligators floating just over your head."

"Not I," George Burns said, "not I. What are you doing away from your post, Joe?"

"That kid died," Joe said. "I'm going back now to make out my report."

He left and George felt a slight, unreal sense of shock. "What's the matter?" Dr. Levy said.

"This kid, he got shot the first job he ever tried. I don't suppose I ought to feel bad about it."

"Oh, it's not a bad thing to feel bad about it. . . ." Dr. Levy said. Then, quickly: "I hear we have our friend, Langer, back? What's supposed to be the trouble with him? I haven't gone on duty yet and haven't seen the charts."

"He's supposed to have stomach trouble," George Burns said. "Personally, I think he just likes the food here. They brought him over from Central a few days ago. He's at it again, abusing the nurses, throwing things at the orderlies and raising hell in general."

"What about some disciplining?" Dr. Levy said.

GEORGE looked at him. "It's a long story, but Mr. Al Langer is a good friend of the warden here."

Dr. Levy nodded, now grave. "That's right. I heard something about a jam you got into with them a while ago."

"That was before the cleanup at Central," George said. "The first year I was on the job they put me over there. I wasn't there a week when I saw how lousy things were. There were four separate mobs operating among the prisoners there, each one under a ring guy. Langer was ring guy for one of them. I found junk in his cell one day and took it to Clovis, who was head keeper there."

"Junk?"

"Dope. Heroin. Clovis said he'd take care of it and I left it with him and didn't think much more of it until two days later when Clovis had me up on charges before the commissioner for bringing junk into the prison."

Dr. Levy whistled soundlessly.

(Continued on page 37)

The Patriotic Murders

By Agatha Christie

ILLUSTRATED BY MARIO COOPER

The Story Thus Far:

HENRY MORLEY, a London dentist, is found shot to death in his office. Inspector Japp, of Scotland Yard, says: "Suicide." Hercule Poirot, noted Belgian detective, (one of the dentist's last patients), says: "Murder—probably."

Investigating the case, Japp and Poirot call on one Amberiotis, a wealthy Greek who had been Morley's very last patient. The Greek does not receive them, for the very good reason that he has died of an overdose of dental drugs!

Japp at once evolves a plausible theory: Having killed the Greek accidentally, Morley had killed himself, in a fit of remorse. But Poirot does not accept the theory. Calling on a mysterious "Mr. Barnes," he learns in the course of a long interview that a band of conspirators are trying to undermine the existent order in England by killing off certain leading persons. According to Mr. Barnes, the plotters had tried to bribe Morley to kill Alistair Blunt, an extremely wealthy patient; and, when the dentist had refused to co-operate, they had paid his partner, Reilly, to do away with him—to silence him. . . .

The mysterious disappearance of a woman—Miss Sainsbury Seale, who had been in Morley's office shortly before his death—adds another curious angle to the case. . . . Poirot (at times assisted by Japp) interviews various suspects: Howard Raikes, a young American radical who makes it clear that he would like to see a new order in England; Frank Carter, with whom Gladys Nevill, Morley's secretary, is in love; and others. Putting two and two together, he begins to formulate a theory. . . .

Jane Olivera, niece of Alistair Blunt, telephones Poirot and asks him if he will come to her uncle's home. Having learned certain things concerning the girl, Poirot says: "I was expecting you to call me." Then, going to Gothic House, where Mr. Blunt lives surrounded by servants, he has a talk with Jane—alone.

Jane wants to know what he had meant when he told her he had been expecting to hear from her. Poirot tells her that she had summoned him because she hopes to pump him about young Howard Raikes. He tells her that he knows she is in love with Raikes; and she admits that he is right. Poirot then accuses Raikes of being a radical. Jane does not debate the matter. "Sometimes," she says slowly, "he gets carried away. He—he—" Poirot smiles. He says: "He wants to take a short cut. To exterminate—" Jane stares at him. "Don't!" she cries.

V

TIME went on. It was over a month since Mr. Morley's death and there was still no news of Miss Sainsbury Seale.

Japp became increasingly wrathful on the subject.

"Dash it all, Poirot, the woman's got to be somewhere."

"Indubitably, mon cher."

"Either she's dead or alive. If she's dead, where's her body? Say, for instance, she committed suicide—"

"Another suicide?"

"Don't let's get back to that. You still say Morley was murdered—I say it was suicide."

"You haven't traced the pistol?"

"No, it's a foreign make."

"That is suggestive, is it not?"

"Not in the way you mean. Morley had been abroad. He went on cruises, he and his sister. Everybody in the British Isles goes on cruises. He may have picked it up abroad. Lots of people like a gun when they're abroad. They like to feel life's dangerous."

He paused, and said: "Don't sidetrack me. I was saying that if—only if, mind you—that blasted woman committed suicide, if she'd drowned herself, for instance, the body would have come ashore by now. If she was murdered, we'd have found the body by now."

"Not if a weight was attached to the body and it was put into the Thames."

"From a cellar in Limehouse, I suppose! You're talking like a thriller writer, a lady novelist."

"I know—I know. I blush when I think of these things!"

"And she was done to death by a Greek spy or by an international gang of crooks, I suppose?"

Poirot sighed. He said, "I have told lately that there really are such things."

"Who told you so?"

"Mr. Reginald Barnes of Cassington Road, Ealing."

"Well, he might know," said Japp. "He dealt with aliens who were at the Home Office."

"And you do not agree?"

"It isn't my branch—oh, yes, there are such things—but they're rather rare as a rule."

There was a momentary silence. Poirot twirled his mustache.

JAPP said, "We've got one or two additional bits of information. She came home from India on the same boat as Amberiotis. But she was second class and he was first, so I don't suppose there's anything in that, although one of the waiters at the Savoy thin she lunched there with him about a week so before he died."

"So there may have been a connection between them?"

"There may—but I can't feel it's likely. I can't see a missionary and a being mixed up in any funny business."

"Was Amberiotis mixed up in a 'funny business' as you term it?"

"Yes, he was. He'd perfectly good business credentials and he was a genuine business over here—but he had other fish to fry. Espionage racket, you are sure of that?"

"Yes. Oh, he wasn't doing any dirty work himself. We wouldn't have been able to touch him. Organizing and receiving reports—that was his job."

Japp paused, and then went on. "That doesn't help us with the Sainsbury Seale. She wouldn't have been in on the racket."

"She had lived in India, remember. There was a lot of unrest there at that time."

"Amberiotis and the excellent Miss Sainsbury Seale—I can't feel they were likely teammates."

"Did you know that Miss Sainsbury Seale was a close friend of the late Alistair Blunt?"

"Who says so? I don't believe it in the same class."

"She said so."

"Who'd she say that to?"

"Mr. Alistair Blunt."

"Oh! That sort of thing. He must have used to that. Do you mean that Amberiotis was using her that way? It wouldn't work. Blunt would get her with a subscription. He would ask her down for a week end or something of that kind. He's not so stupid as that."

This was so palpably true that Poirot could only agree. After a minute or so Japp went on with his summing up of the Sainsbury Seale situation:

"I suppose her body might have been lowered into a tank of acid by a scientist—that's another solution theory."

(Continued on page 32)

The shoe buckle had been clumsily sewed on. Poirot said: "It is that I am dreaming!"

No respecter of tradition or old school ties is dynamic Ernest Bevin

CHURCHILL'S LABOR BOSS

million English workers take their orders from Bevin, minister of labor.
their side and they
a fact that gives him
second only to Churchill's

Quentin Reynolds

BILL ADAMS is a printer who makes about twenty-eight dollars a week. Bill lives in a small house in a suburb of London. On Sunday night he has the same supper that several other Englishmen have. He has beef, tomatoes, boiled potatoes and pickled onions. Just as he was about to sit down to dinner last Sunday a telephone rang. A voice said, "This is the office of the minister of labor. Bill Adams, in a moment there came a voice Bill Adams knew well. It was a voice with a strong West-country accent, a voice belonging to the second most powerful man in England. The voice said apologetically, "Bill, I'm Ernie. Could I come around for a bit of supper?" "Sure, Ernie, come along," Bill Adams said heartily. And then he went to the kitchen to tell the Missus to slice an onion and a tomato. Ernie likes tomatoes.

Within a few minutes his majesty's minister of labor entered the house. He sat down wearily, for though it was Sunday he had put in fourteen hours of work that day.

Bill Adams said, "You look tired, Ernie. Tell me just one thing. Are you on top of the job, have you got it in hand?"

Ernie Bevin nodded thoughtfully. "I think so, Bill. I really think so. There is only one thing that bothers me, Bill, I seldom get a chance to see the boys. They keep me working pretty hard, Bill."

Bill Adams told the story in his local pub a couple of days later and I heard it there. He and Ernie Bevin are old friends. Bill said that Ernie hadn't changed a bit since he had become a minister of the crown. Good people don't change, Bill Adams said. People like Ernie Bevin and his pal Dan Williams and Herbert Morrison. No, good people don't change. And, mark you, Ernie Bevin is a good man, Bill Adams added to his friends in the local pub.

Today England is saying that Ernest Bevin is a good man. I think it is very likely that tomorrow England may say that Ernest Bevin is a great man. Not all of England likes Bevin. The mudlarks don't like him because he cuts right through the lovely red tape that they and their ancestors have taken so many years to wind about the machinery of governmental operation. The old-school-tie boys don't like Ernie Bevin because his rugged, devastating honesty and his admitted keen intelligence mocks everything that they and their class deem sacred. Bevin stopped going to school when he was eleven, but today he is the smartest practical economist in England. The Communists, of course, don't like him because he kicked them out of his trade union years ago. But the man in the street loves Ernie Bevin.

Whose War is This?

The man in the street likes Bevin because he thinks that Bevin is going to make this a people's war, a war fought by the people and for the benefit of the people, not a war fought by one class for the benefit of one class.

The outsider, as he calls himself, is no respecter of school ties or tradition. The man in the street listens with intense excitement to the magnificent speeches of Winston Churchill and the man in the street wants to believe in the prime minister. But, asks the man in the street, is Churchill going to realize that this war belongs to the Ernie Bevin of England, not to the old gang to whom Churchill so far has been true?

Why, asks the man in the street, is 71-year-old Neville Chamberlain still holding a position in the government? The man made every conceivable blunder possible for a diplomat to make. Instead of giving his country guns he gave England widows. Lord Halifax, the dignified and dreary foreign secretary, is still in the cabinet. Never once did he raise his voice to dissuade his former chief from perpetrating the gigantic mistakes of the past. Sir Kingsley Wood, the little man who wasn't there, is still governing the exchequer. Sir Kingsley, who during the peaceful days of last autumn made soporific speeches lulling the nation into sleepy quiescence and into the belief that airplane production was in every way satisfactory, is still a powerful minister. And dismal Sir Samuel Hoare, who is called Soapy Sam in Fleet Street, is the inept advocate of England's cause in Spain.

There is so much that is progressive and magnificent about Mr. Churchill's cabinet that the man in the street hates to see it held back by the legacies of failure whom Churchill still tolerates. The man in the street is proud of dynamic Herbert Morrison, minister of supply, and of Lord Beaverbrook, who

(Continued on page 48)

I Cherish that Sentiment

By Kyle Crichton

The dizzy career of a baseball player named Dopey Gamback. MacPhail shook his hand

THE Dodgers knew they had something special in Dopey Gamback even before he reached training camp at Clearwater. The first inkling came the day after they checked in and began limbering up. It was in the form of a telegram from Yankton, S.D.: Slight delay had blowout bumped into truck arrive soon. H. Gamback.

They had to look up the roster of the club to find who the guy was.

"That's the outfielder Swatsy Milligan picked up in Wink, Texas," reported John McDonald, the secretary.

"Now all we got to do," said Leo Durocher, the manager, "is find Wink, Texas. Isn't that a hell of a jump for a guy to be making in one season?"

McDonald was still looking at the roster, his eyes bugging out.

"Say-y-y," he cried in astonishment. "This must be a misprint or something. It says this bird hit .612 in one hundred twenty-five games last year."

"That isn't a misprint," said Mr. Durocher ironically. "That's just a great big terrible lie. Nobody ever hit .612 in one hundred twenty-five games anywhere, anytime."

The next day another telegram arrived: Please wire ten dollars need new tire arrive soon. H. Gamback.

Next day there was another one: Slight delay heavy snow big drifts arrive soon. H. Gamback.

Mr. McDonald brought these tidings to Mr. Durocher on the field.

"Wire the bum to burn that jalopy and come the rest of the way on skis," hollered Durocher, not much caring whether the guy ever arrived or not.

It was a week before Mr. Gamback showed up. Meanwhile he kept the world informed of his progress: Slight delay hit by bus wire five dollars arrive soon. H. Gamback.

Then came a wire from Lake Wales, Florida, in the opposite direction from Clearwater entirely: Have just seen Singing Tower very artistically pretty. H. Gamback.

"Who's coming here, anyhow!" howled Durocher. "Little mister slap-my-wrist?"

Finally, Mr. Gamback made it. The players were sitting on the veranda of the hotel after supper when the car drove up. It was an old wreck with variegated portions of household ware sticking out all over it.

"It's the Oakies," said somebody from the shadows of the porch, but the others paid no attention because they were looking boggle-eyed at the girl in the seat with Mr. Gamback. Rookies simply don't bring their wives to training camp, being lucky to be there alone.

By this time our hero had climbed out from under the wheel of the car and was starting to unload. There was a bellhop standing in the door of the hotel but he made no move to go out.

"Why don't you help the guy with his stuff!" demanded one of the players.

"Why don't you?" asked the bellhop, but after a pause he started down the steps. As he went along the walk, he met Mr. Gamback coming toward the hotel with the first load. The bellhop, spurred by a belated feeling of duty, made a move to relieve Mr. Gamback of his luggage. At this, Mr. Gamback lifted his right limb and kicked the bellhop severely on the leg.

"Yow!" howled the bellhop, grabbing his shin and making the twilight tremble with his anguish.

The yell that went up from the Dodgers on the porch was even louder. They thought it was immense. Here was a man after their own hearts. As a unit they came down off the porch to greet the Gambacks.

"Come on in," they cried. "We've been waiting for you. Everybody's been waiting for you. Is this your wife?"

"Yes, sir," admitted Mr. Gamback proudly. "This is Sarah and that there right rear tire is the one you gentlemen bought for me."

"What's that your wife is carrying?" asked somebody.

"That there," said Mr. Gamback. "That there is a easel—a paintin' easel. Sarah she paints pictures."

They looked at the easel and at Sarah and at the right rear tire and then they looked at one another. Everything seemed to be in fine shape.

TWO things of importance happened next day. First, Mr. Gamback had the honor to be interviewed by Mr. Leland Stanford MacPhail, big boss of the Brooklyn club. What Mr. MacPhail had in mind was Mrs. Gamback. He intimated that it wasn't customary for a first-year man to bring his wife to camp. To this Mr. Gamback merely answered:

"Withouten Sarah, I just couldn't stay . . ."

The discussion dwindled away to nothing almost immediately.

The next thing was when Durocher ordered Mr. Gamback into right field to shag flies and noted with horror, fifteen minutes later, that Mr. Gamback was nowhere to be seen. They found him finally out behind the stands, sitting comfortably on the ground with his back against the fence.

"Bring that big dope in here!" bel-lowed Mr. Durocher.

When Mr. Gamback arrived, Mr. Durocher took a deep breath and was about to start his yowls when Mr. Gamback intercepted him.

"I don't like to do no fieldin'," he said simply. "Hittin's what I like."

It stopped Mr. Durocher where he stood. When he recovered he said sarcastically, "Oh, you don't like to field, eh?"

"No, sir; I just like to stand up there and hit."

"Well, you can't just stand up there and hit," said Durocher. "Two teams play this game and sometimes the other guys like to hit. Go on out there and shag like I told you or I'll beat you over the head with something."

This seemed very proper of Mr. Durocher and everybody agreed that it would be a sad case if a manager couldn't discipline his own men, so Mr. Gamback went out to right field again and Chuck Dressen started hitting flies to him. Mr. Gamback put up his hands for the first one and it fell ten feet away.

He put up his hands for the next one and ducked just in time to keep from getting hit on the head. He put up his hands for the third one and seemed amazed when it soared about thirty feet over his head and disappeared over the fence. "Come on in here!" howled Durocher and when Mr. Gamback got close Mr. Durocher added in the falsely consoling voice of the spider welcoming his fly, "Will you tell me how you managed to play one hundred and twenty-five games last year without getting killed?"

ILLUSTRATED BY EARL OLIVER HURST

They had a pretty near fence," said Gamback, "and the ball either went or it bounced against it and I got it." "Did you ever catch any of the—?" Mr. Durocher sought for beautiful words. "Any of the—uh—innocent short ones?"

"No, sir," said Mr. Gamback. "This Mr. Durocher threw his cap in the air, kicked at a pile of bats and began running around in a circle, making a fool of himself. When he recovered sufficiently, he yelled in a loud voice, 'Go on up there and hit!' By which he meant Mr. Gamback had better hit or he would soon be on his way back to South Dakota.

Mr. Gamback picked up a bat, strode to the plate, planted his feet in a wide stance, and waited for the pitch.

WYATT was on the mound and let go with his hard one. Fortunately he ducked at the same time. The ball went past his ear with the speed of a meteor that has fallen through the roof of a barn. The second pitch landed up against the left field fence with a thud that could be heard in parts of Miami Beach. The third one went over the left center fence, four hundred and twelve feet away.

"Throw him your hook!" howled Durocher.

"That was my hook," answered Mr. Wyatt, not very pleasantly.

Then Durocher hurled Tamulis, the left-hander, into the breach. His first toss was hit so hard down the third base line that Cookie Lavagetto was still talking at eleven o'clock that night about how the Lord was on his side, he managing to drop to safety just before the projectile went over him.

"That's enough!" yelled Durocher, fearful that he wasn't going to have any team left if that bird stayed up there. "Three laps around the track!"

"I'd druther not do no runnin'," said Mr. Gamback. "Too much exercise this time of day always seems to ruin my stummick."

And that is how Dopey Gamback made the jump from Wink to Brooklyn in one short semester. But if Dopey
(Continued on page 46)

Mr. Magerkurth, approaching with a look in his eye, the demonstration could only be aimed at the majesty of the law. If he had been red with anger before, he now became apoplectic

The Bear Looks Over the Mountain

By Jim Marshall

Trouble ahead in the Khyber country, where Tommy Atkins battles the Afridi tribesmen as of yore and, from north of the Oxus, Russia eyes India's lush plains

A British officer holds open court for Afghan tribal chiefs who complain about clashes with British military law in the Khyber Pass district. The two goats have been brought as presents for the officer

THE armored car went first, grumbling along the narrow, winding road between the hot shale slopes of the Kohat Pass. Gun muzzles poked out of slits in the brown steel shields, searching the hills and gulches of the Hindu Kush. After the car came lorry loads of small, trim Gurkha soldiers in gray shirts and brown shorts, kukris on their hips, stubby Lee-Enfields between their knees. The Gurkhas were clearing the road from Kohat to Bannu, eighty miles.

For two days each week the might of the British Empire kept open this slim winding strip of highway through Tribal Territory on India's bloody Northwest Frontier. The territory is a wind-lashed, sun-baked strip of godforsaken hills and gulches jammed in between Afghanistan to the west and north, and British India, to the south and east. It is the scene of the world's longest nonstop war—a tangled mass of shale, sand and rock, four hundred miles long, from ten to a hundred miles wide.

In this wild territory a hundred thousand dead-shot Pathans battle for the freedom of a million people. Year after year, they battle grimly against civilization, against artillery and airplanes and modern scientific weapons of death—for their freedom.

If they would surrender and take the vow of allegiance to the king-emperor in faraway London, the British would allow them to come down into the fertile plains of India, acquire land, grow crops, own goats and sheep and buffaloes. They prefer to remain free in their barren hills, living in caves or among the ruins of their bombed villages, half starved, always dodging death. They have preferred it that way for four thousand years, or more.

The sharp crack of a rifle cut through the exhaust barking of the armored car and from a ridge ahead the echoes rang in the blazing heat of the pass. A slim young British lieutenant jumped from the car and in a bored Bond Street voice sang commands. The rifle cracked again and dust spurted beneath the car. The Gurkhas piled out of the lorries and took cover behind the baking rocks. A machine gun in the car brrrrp-brrrrp'd and shale and dust jumped on the hillside. The ridge ahead was silent again. You looked in vain for the tribesmen who must be there—somewhere.

The Gurkhas moved forward, spread out, rifles ready, taking advantage of every bit of cover. The crisped shale burned knees and elbows. The little soldiers moved ahead from shadow to shadow.

Then, nine figures appeared momentarily in silhouette against the blue sky, and disappeared over the ridge top a hundred yards away. The Gurkhas chuckled and grinned and sent a volley that made little dust explosions along the sky line. An Afridi tribesman on the crest twisted slowly, fell and came tumbling down the slope, his rifle clattering on the rocks.

"Good shootin'," said the little lieutenant. "Up the hill, men, and we'll catch them on the next slope."

Ten Lives for One

He stood up, swept the hillside with his glasses and strolled forward with the little soldiers from Nepal, far away to the eastward in the Himalayan foothills where the rain forests are all full of butterflies and orchids—and death. The Gurkhas are the world's best trackers.

The machine gun spoke from the car, back in the road, and the ridge top exploded in dust and flying rock chips. The Gurkhas went forward up the slippery shale, stopping just short of the top. The young lieutenant climbed nonchalantly. Just short of the top he wriggled ahead between two rocks. The Gurkhas inched forward. Warily, they topped the ridge and looked over down the reverse slope. It was as silent as a tomb in the heat. The gully was about fifty yards wide; half that deep. Somewhere there, or on the farther slope, ought to be eight tribesmen—enough to make good the old hill rule: Ten lives for every tribesman drilled by a nickel-jacketed .303. The Gurkhas had the same rule.

The little brown men wriggled forward and shoved rifle muzzles through the cracks between rocks. A buzzard wheeled in the blue sky. A shot came from the far slope. A Gurkha made a little sobbing noise and slowly collapsed in a heap. The others, straining to find the hidden enemy, fired slowly and carefully. The far slope was silent in the sun.

"Gone away," said the boy. His men sent a final volley into the air and crept back down the hill to the taking the wounded man with the the hills you do not leave wounded—or dead men either—because unpleasant things happen to them. You get captured alive—because if you are the Afridi or the Wazirs or the wari will bury you up to your nose in sand and then pigstick you from the chest. The camels lurch and sway and sometimes it takes a very long while un-

Since we are going up into these passes to have a look at the oldest war in the world we might as well understand the layout. You can get an idea of India's frontier by imagining our own northern border consisted of a long mountain chain, running from California to North Dakota and then down to Virginia.

The western leg of this range is the Hindu Kush; the eastern is the Himalayas. The Hindu Kush peaks run up to about eight thousand feet and the passes through them are about four thousand feet high. The Himalayas run well over twenty thousand feet and the passes through them are fifteen and sixteen thousand feet high, usually snow-filled.

Up in the corner where these two ranges merge is the most famous pass in Asia—the Khyber. There are remains of forts and old rock walls in the Khyber that history sharps say are 3,500 years old. Men were fighting, even back in those dim years, to force—and to hold —the barren hills. Except for short intervals, they have never stopped.

Up along the Northwest Frontier there are four layers of country. South, there is the fertile Indian plain. That belongs to England. Then there is the Tribal Territory. That belongs to the tribes, but the British maintain roads through it by force of arms. North of this, there is Afghanistan, a despotism in which Britain, Russia and now Germany fight for domination—not with guns, but with cold cash, diplomacy and intrigue. North of Afghanistan again there is the Soviet Union, just across the Oxus River.

Training Camp for the Troops

For years, England has made believe she feared an invasion of India by Russia, and at the same time has said such an invasion was impossible. Military men on the frontier today say that, with modern defense weapons and methods, Russia could not force the passes. They say they have the tribesmen united against such an invasion, and that they would like nothing better than to see a Russian army in mass formation marching down to the northern entrance of the Khyber. We will go up into the Khyber in a few minutes and see why.

For a century or more England has kept alive the Russian menace story for two main reasons: First, she keeps 60,000 white and 250,000 native troops under arms in India and she has to have a reason—because every penny of the expense is paid for by the Indians, and there has to be an excuse. Second, the frontier is a first-class practice ground on which to train troops. England, in normal times, manages to give nearly every regiment a taste of battle, murder and sudden death on the frontier.

If you ask army chiefs in India why England long ago didn't conquer the tribes, as she has conquered tribes elsewhere, they will tell you cynically: "We keep the tribesmen to practice on." You think this is a gag and take the story to political agents, doubting it. No, they say, that's British policy, as made by the army. The civilian government would like the hills pacified; it would like to disarm the warriors and make farmers and traders out of them—but the army won't have it. Just now, it is costing the army about forty casualties a month to run its training school.

The tribesmen—and their women and children—are trapped in their barren, almost waterless hills. Sometimes they come raiding down onto the plains, but they are always driven back. On the north, the Afghans stop them. There is nothing for them to do but fight—or surrender. A few of them surrender temporarily, when the going gets too tough. They hire out to the army as road builders, or khasadars—road patrolmen. But usually they go back to their hills and their eternal feud with civilization.

(Continued on page 35)

Britain's Gurkha troops crossing a shallow river during maneuvers. The men in the foreground pause to put on their boots after the crossing

An officer of the tank corps on patrol obtains information from an Afridi tribesman of the Khyber Khasadar force, which guards the pass

© BRITISH COMBINE

© BRITISH COMBINE

gets you fairly and squarely and your torture.

When the British army wants to open the roads through some of the frontiers it sends out armored cars and soldiers under white officers. They fight their way along, manning the forts set atop ridges in enemy territory—that is, Tribal Territory. After the forts are manned, trucks, busses and cars roll through the pass between strongly defended cantonments surrounded by barbed-wire entanglements. Two days, the troops hold open the pass. Then they retire and the tribesmen come back.

The British are comparative newcomers to these wars. In their methodical wars they have recorded seventy-four wars in seventy-five years. In early wars, each war had an objective, but of late the fighting has become so confused that one war ends each December 31 and another one starts January 1.

Long centuries before there was an English nation, Genghis Khan and Tamerlane, Alexander and his Macedonians, Mahmud of Ghazni, Nadir Shah and many another half-forgotten conqueror fought through these mountains—fought through them, but never conquered their black-haired warriors.

Occupation: Widow

By William C. White

ILLUSTRATED BY GEORGE HOWE

The Story Thus Far:

CAROLA DIRLING, a singer at a Berlin night club, marries Paul Lesser, part owner with Rolf Blaerchen of the club. A short time later, Lesser is killed in a mysterious accident—planned (so Carola believes) by Blaerchen!

Three years pass. Learning that Carola is in Rome, Blaerchen—now a prominent Nazi—forces her to return to Berlin where he puts her to work as a Foreign Office spy. Loathing the man, who makes violent love to her, and shocked by his brutalities, she finally rebels and, leaving the apartment he has given her, begins rehearsing a singing role for the Sans Souci, a night club that will soon be opened.

By this time she has fallen in love with an old friend: Karl Dietrich. Dietrich, once a noted comedian, is deep in an anti-Hitler plot. Persecuted savagely by Blaerchen, who is jealous of him, he decides to obtain evidence that the fellow is a crook—evidence that, presented to Nazi headquarters, would ruin Blaerchen.

Making his plans with infinite care, Dietrich succeeds in inveigling Blaerchen into selling certain secret documents taken from the Foreign Office files. Then, when the Sans Souci has a brilliant opening, with Blaerchen and many other well-known Nazis present, he has Carola sing a song that makes it quite clear to the Nazi that he has fallen into a cleverly devised trap.

The following day, however, Carola and Dietrich receive a rude shock. Franz Wagner, owner of the Sans Souci, is ordered to close the club at once; and he is informed by the authorities that he must send his artists to Warsaw!

Realizing that the woman he loves will never be safe in Germany, Dietrich makes arrangements for her escape—on a fishing boat sailing from Stettin. Believing that Dietrich is to accompany her (he has told her that he is fleeing with her, although he has no intention of deserting his anti-Hitler friends), she goes to Stettin. Arriving on a disagreeable, foggy day, she reports to one Schwartz who is to tell her what to do.

Schwartz tells her that she is to sail alone. Carola is stunned. "Are you sure?" she gasps. "Certain," Schwartz says. Without another word, Carola turns, and walks out into the fog.

Conclusion

KARL spent most of that evening with Klauss, behind windows heavily curtained. They reviewed the damage done by Ranke's imprisonment. It was considerable. Kuhlmann from the Gestapo, came for a little while to report that seven men who had worked in the factory and who had contacts with men in other factories were now arrested.

"It is too bad," Klauss said factually. "We need help so badly." He outlined activities that astonished Karl; he had thought of Underground work as something extremely limited. "We have a press and we are able to print materials. We have our ways of getting information here and of sending information abroad to keep in touch with friends who are freer to act than we. We have manufactured false credentials, we have painted signs on walls during black-outs, we have distributed pamphlets in letter boxes, in desk drawers—they even got to Berchtesgaden! Soldiers find them in pockets of new uniforms just issued by the quartermasters'. And where do you suppose we learned many of our methods?"

Karl shook his head. "I haven't an idea."

"From the Nazis. We do the things they did before they came to power. We can use all their tricks but we have honesty and unselfishness on our side—which the Nazis have never had. We are not out for pillage! And if we are cornered, we will do as Ranke did. When the Nazis are cornered, and they will be cornered, they will turn on each other."

"Even if Germany wins the war?"

"Especially if she wins! Can you imagine Ribbentrop and Goering finding a satisfactory way to divide spoils? A split runs through the Nazi party! There is the split between Army and politicians—and victory will not bridge that."

When Karl was about to leave Klauss said, "We must meet every day. Meet at the Friedrichstrasse station at eight tomorrow night."

Back in his room Karl faced the problem of his job with Wagner. He would have to find something else, to cover his increased activity for Klauss. This was hard to think about a job. In his imagination he was with Carola, happy, she was safe. Of his own loss he would not think but it took will power not to remember the touch of her hair on his cheek, the softness of her hands. From his little window he could see a moon and a sarcastic comment on a black-out. Karl hoped that the skipper of a small fishing boat on the Baltic was not catching the bright moon and the brilliant sky.

At the office in the morning Karl found Wagner at his desk, trying to make some sense of the order to close. "I can't understand it," he said, and a depressive look of helplessness on his face. "I can't understand it." He stared at Karl as if remembering some unpleasant fact. "Blaerchen is responsible, nicht wahr? Answer me! Isn't that right?" He shook his head vigorously.

(Continued on page 26)

Stissing pulled a chair near the door. Werner sat beside him. For once did suspicion leave their faces.

THE woman stood in the doorway and looked at the sea. She folded her arms over her breast and leaned back and watched and waited.

Across the granite shoulder of the hill the river was talking. The spring storm had broken the ice in the river and the old yellow creases were marching out to sea. She could hear them groaning, muttering as they ground against each other on the hurrying ebb tide.

She was a strong-looking woman and her face held youth—but lines of waiting and work showed under the eyes and jaws. The hands she folded were bare from the soft snows and powdered with the flour of the bread she had made. Her color was high from the fire of the stove and when she breathed it was like smoke in the cold mid-morning air.

In the house behind her the radio music stopped and the station's call letters were pronounced.

The man she was waiting for came up the path, walking slowly in turned-down boots. The oilskin coat was still glistening with the wet of the sea and stiff with the cold as he moved his arms. His heavy feet dragged over the granite shoulder and the burden on his back bent him down. He looked up as the path he walked on joined the other from the spring hole, and his eyes stayed for a moment on the woman in the doorway. Not a single line in his face showed recognition—a sign of greeting. He walked on heavily toward his home.

He was a squarebuilt man and his layer of clothing made him a hulk of a man. He walked on—as if momentum carried him.

The radio spoke of the time and the man glanced in at the clock on the shelf by the bunk. Then, having seen that her man was safe, she turned and went inside. Even as she moved from stove to table, her eyes watched him through the window and she read the bitterness and fatigue on his face. She saw him stop a few yards from the house—throw off the burlap sack of rope and fishing gear, and turn toward the sea. He stood there, his broad back to her, his shoulders sagging, his legs bent at the knees; and she felt his resentment toward life—the bitterness he must feel toward defeat—her heart went out to him.

He came in and fumbled for a chair. He sat down and his legs went out straight. He pushed the door closed with a hand which cramped back without bones.

The radio was going. He stared at it blankly. The voice talked of the war in Europe, of famine, of death. But if the man heard he showed no interest.

He looked up at his wife. His eyes were hidden far under his sandy brows. They looked like an animal's, the film gathering tears at the corners. He lifted his hand to his face and drew it slowly over his forehead, across his nose, and pulled at his jaw. His face showed white at the marks of his fingers. The hand fell back to his knee, where it seemed to crumple. For a moment he didn't move. The radio's voice droned on and blurred in the room.

"FRANK!" the woman said sharply.

He raised his head—then shook it—as if to break the spell of sleepiness. He said, "Is it ready?"

"Take off your clothes, you can't eat with them on."

He said, "All right, all right. Don't get leveled."

He lifted one foot and placed its heel on the toe of the other and worked the boot loose. For the other, he put the heel in the loop of the brace under the sink and pulled. The boot fell to the floor. He peeled off the oilskin coat, a leather jacket, a grease-darkened sweater. With a stockinged foot he moved all to the corner near the door.

"I'm hungry," he said. "Quit foolin' around."

She placed in front of him a large bowl of fish chowder, yellow with floating gobs of butter fat and dotted with pepper. He moved in close to the table. But he waited.

Not for ceremony. Not for prayer. But for his bread.

The slices she dealt on the plate, like cards, were still warm and the powder of the flour whitened the brown crusts. She watched his battered, broad-fingered hand reach out, slide the slice toward him and lay on the butter.

"How is it?" she asked.

Swallowing, he said, "Good. It's hot."

He looked up then. A slow recognition came to his spray-burned eyes.

Instinctively, without study, her hand went out to him and touched his arm.

"Was it bad out in the bay?"

He pulled his shoulders together and leaned over the plate. He scooped up a spoonful of milk and flakes of fish. "Wicked," he said.

"I heard the ice," she said.

He tore at the bread, his teeth on the crust. Then, with his mouth full, he said, "I lost my dory. It got smashed to bits in the ice."

She inclined her head in sympathy. But the loss of a dory doesn't mean much to a woman when her man is safe. She said, "Any fish?"

"Nothing. There's no fish in the bay. The storm's drove them out."

WHEN he was through he pushed back the plate and searched his pocket for a cigarette. He drank coffee and sat there staring at the radio. The urgent voice was still talking, telling of the war in Europe, of famine, of death.

He said after a minute, "I'm going out again this noon."

She started. "No, Frank. No. You're tired. You've been out since three this morning. Rest now."

He shook his head. "I can't."

He reached for his gray sweater, the leather vest, the coat and his boots from the corner by the door. He put on his clothes. Then he put on his boots.

She said, "No—Frank. It's still bad out. I can't stand for you to go out again."

He rubbed the back of his neck. A smile came to his face.

"I got to go," he said.

He was standing now—looking at her. He moved toward her. She came to him, her arms lifted and put her arms around his broad chest. He could feel her hands on his back. Her hands couldn't meet around him. She kissed him. They held to each other for a moment—then he backed away. The tired film on his eyes was gone. His head lifted. His hands went out quickly, with life, and patted her on the shoulder. "I'll be back," he said. "Early."

She stood there watching him buckle up the oilskin coat. He laughed. "Don't get scared. This isn't war. This is just plain work."

He went out. She saw him through the window. He walked with a quick step down the path on which she had seen him come and go so many times. He walked with his head up. Once she saw him stop and look out to sea—his arms akimbo—his legs spread apart, defiantly. Then he leaned down and touched the ground. He seemed to pat the ground—feel it.

He looked back, embarrassed to see if she saw him. He must have caught her at the window, for he waved and shouted something she couldn't hear. She went to the door. He was laughing. "I feel good," he shouted back to her. "There's no war over here. I'll be sure to get back before sundown. So long. . . ."

He turned and walked to the shore.

She stood there watching him from the doorway—her arms folded across her breast. She thought, smiling to herself, "He sure likes his bread."

The tired film on his eyes was gone. His head lifted. His hands went out quickly, with life, and patted her shoulder. "I'll be back," he said

His Daily Bread

By Henry Meade Williams

ILLUSTRATED BY FRANK STREET

A SHORT SHORT STORY COMPLETE ON THIS PAGE

GUN SMOKE

Romantic interlude in the life of a young man who didn't know that a killer can never escape his past

By Clifford Dowdey

ILLUSTRATED BY DONALD TEAGUE

OF THE town they ruled with bright gold and hot guns, nothing is left now except scattered adobe walls, roofless and broken, hidden in a mesquite thicket. Even the main street is as trackless as the desert to which the town has returned.

Because no spot marks their deeds, the men seem as transient and as legendary as the abandoned town. As it sprang full-grown from the desert, lived its awful and sudden hour, so did they. Living only in and for that hour, they were unknown before and lost afterward, gone with the smoke of their guns.

Those guns were smoking and the men behind them were kings for that moment, when the thin line of Confederate soldiers straggled west after Appomattox in search of a new life. Some had never gone home, but kept walking west from the little Virginia court town across the hot miles to Texas. Some had gone to the place where home had stood, but the Yankees had been there first, and then they fell into the line of march where the other defeated men had passed.

Johnny Malvern was one of those, only twenty-one when he reached Texas. There the ex-Rebs were making trouble with the Yankee peace officers and he pushed on west into New Mexico. He was tired of fighting after four years in Jeb Stuart's cavalry. He worked on ranches, trying hard to be a good cowboy, until he landed with Tom Langhorn's big spread. It was a gun outfit and they took him for his fighting experience, but he didn't know that, not at first.

He didn't find out until Langhorn sent him and twenty others to another outfit in a northern county, and his work ended in a gun battle with the cowboys of Jed Withington's spread. Langhorn's foreman was killed and the men beaten off, and Johnny scattered with the rest. He rode hard all day with an older cow hand named Slim, and at dusk they emerged from a rocky canyon where a thin stream trickled through a wash.

They dismounted and drank, and watered their horses. Then they stared ahead, where sandy flats rolled for miles toward a ridge, smudgy black against the fire of the falling sun.

"We can make that by dark," Slim said, "and cross it in the morning. Then we'll be in another county, and safe."

Johnny turned to him in surprise: "Ain't we goin' south first, for to collect our pay from Langhorn?"

"Johnny," Slim said in a deliberate voice, "Langhorn don't figure he owes us anything. He sent us up here to fight for this other outfit, and if we'd 'a' won we'd 'a' collected from this outfit up here. But we lost, and when you lose Langhorn don't know you."

Johnny thought that over and slow shook his head. "Maybe he figures that way, but I don't. We was working for him and he never said nothing about win or lose to me."

"Son, you're new to the West but I'm an old hand here, too old to be fighting for other men any more. I'm going over to Arizona, come spring, and start a little outfit of my own. I want you to stick along with me, because you got the makings of a good cowboy, and I want to get you out of this ruckus."

JOHNNY'S face set in stubborn line. "I ain't made like that, Slim. I got winter ahead of me and not a Confederate dollar in my jeans. Langhorn owes me and I aim for to collect. I'll see you in Arizona in the spring and . . . and thanks for all you've learned me."

"Thanks nothin'!" Slim's seamy face set in lines as hard as Johnny's and his bleached eyes lit. "I've seen a heap of you unreconstructed Rebs out here, still trying to do things like they was in the South, but you're one what's gone. Listen to me. You was hired on a gun outfit, and all that learnin' you about quick draw that I done was on Langhorn's orders. He was fighting it out with Withington for control of this country around here and we lost. Withington owns it now and Langhorn's got t

"You're Johnny Malvern" were the words, but they sounded like some kind of insult selves. Out here the boys in the outfit did the fighting, and they stuck together like one of Jeb Stuart's troops, but the man behind them disowned them if they didn't win. He wasn't going to be disowned by any rustling cattle king.

THAT was the way Johnny felt when he walked into the ranch house and faced Tom Langhorn. He was a red-faced man with skin as tough as cactus and eyes that had never been afraid of anything and never would be. Johnny told him, politely but stoutly, what he was there for.

Langhorn had been sitting behind a table he used as a desk. He jumped up and a pearl-handled revolver showed on his belt.

"You was working for that northern outfit, even if I did send you up there. It's broken up and can't pay you. I don't see as I owe you a Mex dollar."

"You owe me, sir, because we both know I was working for you all the time. That outfit was really yours, up there to fight Withington, and I risked my life in that fight, which is more than I had bargained for. All I'm asking for is my pay as a cowpuncher."

LANGHORN'S face grew harder. "You're asking the wrong man then. If you value your hide, get out!" He was shouting and his skin was purple and his eyes had no color in them at all; they were just a hot light.

Johnny knew he had to go, or else stay and fight as Slim had said. Then, no longer curbing his anger, he said steadily, "Well, I ain't going!"

"And I say you are," Langhorn bellowed and went for his gun.

Johnny went for his, too, sweeping it up, just as he had practiced, and squeezing trigger when the barrel cleared the holster. He had no worry about shooting straight, because he'd used the pistol in the cavalry. Everything in him was bent toward shooting before Langhorn, and he must have been a shade quicker, for he heard Langhorn's bullet thud into the floor at his feet and he saw the older man drop his gun and clutch at his groin with both hands. He went down slowly, pitching forward.

A groin wound is mean and the grizzled rancher had a hard time dying. In the three days he lingered, he cursed the Southern cowboy from hell to breakfast. But Johnny Malvern made a great reputation killing his first man, because Langhorn was a famous cattle king with more killings on his record than any man wanted to count.

Johnny heard nothing about his reputation. He crossed two wide counties by hard riding and holed up in the hills for the winter. It was a hard time for the boy, cold and hungry and lonely all the time, and he was a harder man when he came down in the spring. He got a job right off. He would have held it too, because he was becoming a good cowboy, only the inevitable thing happened. The other cow hands said a deputy sheriff came up to Johnny one morning, in front of the bunkhouse, and after asking Johnny his name he went right for his gun. That was the second man Johnny Malvern killed.

That talk spread over the whole range and Johnny heard some of it, even though he had taken to the brush and crossed three more counties to get away from it. He turned up in northern Arizona on good outfits, but somehow his name followed him and he kept moving on. They say he was crowded into a dance-hall brawl by a bad man named Red Echols and killed him, and he shot a gambler in Prescott. He was never asked and he never told. It was nearly two years after the Langhorn fight that he turned up at Slim's ranch in southern Arizona.

It was in one of those fat valleys running south to the border, about twenty miles from the bad town that today has gone back to the brush. Then it was a sanctuary for desperadoes, a Broadway in the desert, and, as Slim said afterward, "If you wanted to act tough there, it took a tough man to get away with it." Johnny's reputation hit the town the day after he hit the ranch.

THIS was bad news for Slim on two counts. He wasn't running a gun outfit and he didn't want the outlaws in the valley to think he was trying to. Then, Jed Withington had moved into the valley from New Mexico and he would remember that Johnny had fought against him with Langhorn.

But Slim had promised Johnny a job, and besides he liked the boy. He took him on and got Johnny to promise he would keep out of saloons and dance halls, where some of the gunmen might crowd him into a fight (as they said Red Echols had) just to boost their own reputations.

Johnny did nothing to rile anybody. He made friends with the men in Slim's outfit and mostly kept close to the ranch. When the men galloped into town to squander their forty dollars in saloons and dance halls, Johnny went alone. He spent his time buying clothes. He had more shirts and the finest shop-made boots of any cowboy in the valley, and his chaps and hat were surpassed by none he ever saw. The other cow hands told him the bad men of the town were waiting for him to show, because the more he kept to himself the greater grew his reputation as a killer, but he knew it would mean a fight and he was very tired of fighting. He kept buying clothes and it was in his restless search for new ones that he met Esther Miller.

ESTHER MILLER'S father was one of the Confederate officers who did not tarry long at the ruins of his home after the surrender. His wife had died during the war, as a result of being moved while sick, and Esther had refugeeed with some kinspeople in Richmond. From the wreckage of his plantation, Mr. Miller salvaged a wagon and team of horses, some odd pieces of furniture and some silver that had been buried.

With those, he and Esther fell in with the remnants of Lee's Army of Northern Virginia moving west on its last retreat.

He didn't stop until he found the bad town in the Arizona valley. The town needed a good general store and Mr. Miller had started one. Slim bought all his supplies there. He had been thrown by too many broncs to have any heart for sprees any more, and when he came to town he spent most of his time haranguing Mr. Miller. While they argued, Johnny talked to Esther.

They had a natural bond in having been born in the same section of Virginia, though Johnny's plantation had not been one of the great places like the Millers'. Back home he had seen girls like her riding past in carriages, or in

(Continued on page 30)

"You make me feel better," he told her. "I thought something was wrong, that maybe you didn't like me any more." "I love you," she said

low. He wouldn't even let on he knew you. You go poking around him and you'll be in worse trouble than you are now. He'd just as soon kill you as would a snake, sooner because a snake don't put no notches on his gun." Johnny gathered up his reins. "That's the chance I'll have to take."

"But it ain't no chance, Johnny. He'll kill you or you'll have to kill him."

"Then I'll play it that way. Killing isn't nothing new to me. I've just come out of four years of it and I saw my mother go down beside me when I was sixteen years old." He swung up in the saddle.

THE light was dimming. Already the purple haze was spreading over the hills. Slim moved over beside Johnny. Killing one man personally is different, and remember that they never kill just once."

Johnny Malvern wasn't remembering that as he rode south toward the main house of Tom Langhorn. He was remembering the pile of ashes in Virginia that had been his home, and he was remembering what it looked like before the war, when his father and brothers had been alive and they raised the fastest horses in Hanover County. They'd taken those horses into the cavalry, where no man asked others to fight his battles for him. The generals never told you where they wouldn't go them-

TOUGH On and Off

By John Durant

The movie tough guys, Humphrey Bogart and James Cagney, take time out for—of all things—ice-cream cones

ONE evening Humphrey Bogart and his wife were sitting in the taproom of a New York hotel having a nightcap before retiring. A man walked across the room, stopped at Bogart's table and leaned over so that his face was inches away from the screen's perennial heavy.

"Bogart, they tell me you're a tough guy. Well, you don't look so tough to me."

Bogart knew what not to do. He had learned that before. "Sit down, chum, and have a drink." He grinned amiably at the stranger.

"Okay, Bogart, I will. Rye and ginger ale, waiter. I hear you don't like to sign them autographs for the kids, that you brush off the kids because you want to be tough all the time. Is that right, Bogart?"

Humphrey turned to his wife, Mayo, and said, "Honey, you look a little tired. Don't you think we'd better go up and turn in?" But now the stranger had Bogart by the arm.

"Just what I thought. Trying to run out. Tough, eh? That's a laugh."

The man was not drunk. He resented Bogart and wanted to be able to tell the boys next day what he'd said to that movie actor who is supposed to be so tough. A fine spot for Bogart. He isn't a fighter but he was beginning to get enough of his guest, who was now becoming menacing.

The movies' professional tough guys have to prove they can knock down the fans who want a fight instead of an autograph

Mayo was about to give her husband the green light to GO, when the stranger unraveled a right from somewhere beneath the table and threw it in the general direction of his host. It landed and caused no damage but the battle was on. The men fell into a bear hug, knocked over two tables and wound up rolling about on the floor like two school boys enjoying their recess. Mayo, trained in such emergencies, quickly removed her shoes and beat a tattoo on the stranger's noggin like a woodpecker attacking an old oak. The Bogart family was on its way to a clean-cut decision when the management stepped in and ended the contest.

In the elevator, Mayo turned to her husband and coyly said: "Darling, it must be wonderful to be a movie star and receive such recognition from your admirers."

Pity the Villain

The tough guys of the screen are constantly subjected to such attacks by known antagonists. Jimmy Cagney and George Raft receive their share, and have been forced many times to fend themselves from surprise assault. Whatever causes this ire, it is a fact that it has existed since the beginning of drama whenever the villain was cast off stage. Even in Elizabethan days, heavy was booed and attacked for leaving the theater. And more recently on the American stage, especially in touring companies on the small-theater circuit, it was dangerous to play the villain. The local boys used to wait outside the stage door for their man, and when he reluctantly appeared he had no choice but to run the gantlet.

Jimmy Cagney was a tough kid. Like Raft and Bogart, he was born and raised in New York City. His was a neighborhood of Irish, Jews and Germans on the upper East Side and Jimmy had to be his dukes as soon as he could walk to public school. He can still fight. In fact, he boxes to keep in shape but Jimmy is no longer tough. He likes books and has a passion for Martha's Vineyard off the coast of Massachusetts where he has an ancient New England home. No more fights for Jimmy. He had his share as a Yorkville kid.

But now and again Jimmy is forced into a situation where he must either fight or retreat. Once he was almost catching a late bite in a Hollywood cafeteria one night. Jimmy was at the counter waiting for his order when he felt a tap on his shoulder. He turned around to face a big guy.

"Mr. Cagney," he said, "I got a ten-year-old boy who thinks you're just about the best thing in pictures. A real admirer of yours, Mr. Cagney. Thanks you're swell."

"Well, that's nice. Say hello to him for me, will you?"

"Sure. He thinks you're swell. But don't, Cagney. I think you stink. How do you like that?"

With that he let a roundhouse go at Cagney, who ducked under it and came up with his right hand cocked and aimed at the big guy's jaw. A perfect shot. He knew he had the big guy. All he had to do was to touch the hair trigger to score an easy knockdown. But in the split second the Yorkville kid lost the decision to the mature Cagney, Jimmy dropped his hands to his sides.

"All right, guy. I could take you right now if I wanted to. But I won't. E

(Continued on page 49)

OTOR WITH CONFIDENCE... USE DEPENDABLE CHAMPION SPARK PLUGS !

IF YOU DECIDE to pick up and go on a motor car, it's wise to have the "pick up and go" that a set of Champion Spark Plugs brings to your engine. Make a friend of your car and you'll find it ready and fit for any adventure.

Champion Spark Plugs, the choice of the world's fastest racing champions on land, water and in the air, are particularly qualified to make every engine a better performing engine. Their new exclusive Sillment seal (material and process combined) keeps them permanently free from gas leakage, common to ordinary spark plugs, and holds them within their designated heat range. Thus, pre-ignition and fouling are eliminated and absolutely uniform ignition in every cylinder is assured.

This is but one of the many exclusive and patented features which make Champions the choice of champions and the majority of motorists throughout the world. For maximum performance and dependability demand Champions for your car. Remember, for the greatest economy, all spark plugs should be tested and cleaned at regular intervals and replaced every 10,000 miles.

Lou Fageol, owner and driver of the Gold Cup hydroplane "So-long", recently set a new world's one mile speed record of 97.45 miles per hour, using Champions. Fageol wired—"Congratulations on your record-breaking product." Use the spark plug champions use and assure yourself of championship performance in your car.

PICK UP AND GO" WITH NEW CHAMPION SPARK PLUGS

Occupation: Widow

Continued from page 20

"But don't tell me, I don't want to know!" He stood up quickly and happened to see a few handbills announcing Carola's opening. He threw them savagely in the wastebasket. "What shall I do?" he asked repeatedly. "What shall I do?"

A secretary interrupted: "A gentleman to see Herr Dietrich!"

Karl went to the outer office. Standing there, impatient and nervous, was von Maurer. He said anxiously, "I must talk to you."

"Certainly." He had to get Maurer outdoors, before anyone could notice him too carefully. Not sure where to go, Karl decided it would be best to walk the streets.

They walked along rapidly. Von Maurer began at once: "I can't forget Blaerchen. Such a man in an important government position can do Germany a lot of harm. I ask myself, will he sell Foreign Office secrets next?" As if it were a decision carefully made, he said, "He must be exposed at once."

KARL trembled for a second, as he guessed where this conversation was going. "There will be some way to punish him."

"That's too indefinite," von Maurer said finally. "I am going at once to the Foreign Office and tell the whole story. And I shall show them the contents of that envelope."

"And chance arrest for false pretense, by having him reveal that the whole thing was only a scheme?" That was the one argument that Karl could use.

It did not impress von Maurer. "A question of ethics is involved. No matter what my fate, or yours, as loyal Germans it is our duty to report him!"

At least, Carola was safely out of this!

"Believe me, there will be some way to have him punished," Karl said, trying desperately to think of any restraining argument. Without that restraint Blaerchen might be punished but the Gestapo would come swiftly for von Maurer and Karl, too. "Let me speak from experience," he said slowly. "Concentration camps are ugly places only a little better than execution blocks. Why risk either?"

"This is duty," von Maurer snapped, annoyed. "For all we know, Blaerchen might agree to sell Foreign Office secrets to foreigners."

Might agree? Karl remembered that Wagner had spoken of Blaerchen's underhand activities; he had mentioned an American dancer who carried material to the British. If Wagner was angry enough now to give details, Blaerchen might be reported for that and punished, without involving von Maurer or himself. "If you'll wait twenty-four hours," Karl said desperately. "You would not object if there were some other way to punish Blaerchen?"

"Of course not. But can you promise that in twenty-four hours—?"

"I can't promise," Karl said honestly. "I can only try."

Von Maurer considered the request from every side. "Very well," he agreed. "Twenty-four hours—"

They walked aimlessly, in silence. Then von Maurer said, "I've begun to wonder how many Nazis there are like Blaerchen. There may be others."

"Maybe," Karl said carelessly. If Karl could find some way to satisfy von Maurer in the next twenty-four hours, then, at a later date, carefully pointed conclusions might bring von Maurer on Klauss' side. He would be valuable. But what mattered now was the twenty-four hours.

When they separated Karl hurried to Wagner's office. Every hope had to hang on Wagner's willingness to tell what he knew and Karl could not be too optimistic about that.

Wagner was still at his desk. He looked up angrily at Karl.

"I need help," Karl began.

"You need help? What do I need?"

"This concerns politics." It would be best to be frank.

"I want nothing to do with politics,"

Wagner shook his head violently. "They've ruined me! Nein, nein, I can do nothing. Nothing!"

"But—"

"Leave my office. You're fired, Karl."

"Don't you think that an odd question to ask me?" Karl said coldly.

"Now, see here, Karl! You and I haven't gotten along well in the past but we can be friends."

He must need her very badly and Karl wanted to know why.

"WHERE have you looked for her?" "Everywhere. She wasn't at her apartment last night. You know where she is."

Karl nodded. He knew approximately where he hoped she was, in mid-Baltic! "I don't see why I should tell you." He had to know why Blaerchen needed her. "You'll only annoy her further."

like to see her before Herr Praut.

"Yes," Blaerchen snapped.

That was why he needed her. The moment Praut was probably somewhere around, trying to find her. In some way Karl was sure, their reason for her concerned the broken engagement at the Sans Souci. What was important was that each one was in the middle. Like a mouse caught in a mountain crevice, sharp, unassailable walls, he might find his way up one by pressure against the other. And he had only twenty-four hours!

Increasing the tension between two rivals might help. "I'm sure I would do you a great deal of damage if I could," Karl said carelessly. "Carola has told me some things that Praut said to her on the telephone about you."

Blaerchen laughed but his glance was poorly worn. "What?"

A little knowledge gained from last conversation with Schebelew fit here nicely! "She heard about you going down you got at the Foreign Office just a few days ago."

Blaerchen's face reddened. In his heart was hatred and with it fear, fear of damage that Praut could do him. But it, Karl was sure, was an eagerness to forestall Praut in any way.

"One could gossip about me," Blaerchen began. Then, checking himself, he asked impatiently, "What do you expect Carola?"

"I'm not sure." From this conversation an idea was developing.

"Tell her to see me before she sees Praut."

That was a sardonically simple promise. "Very well."

AS HE was leaving Blaerchen said, "I'm obliged to you, Karl. In any way, I'll see that the Sans Souci is committed to reopen at once."

As if that mattered now!

When he had gone Karl sat in Wagner's large chair, gripping it and holding tight to keep down nervous excitement. He had used well some part of the twenty-four hours but he had to plan what to do next. Somewhere, he was sure, Praut was waiting to find Carola; at this moment, perhaps, he was at her apartment, with no answer to his insistent knocking. Blaerchen, Nazis! Klauss had said: "The characters of the Nazis are their best weapons against them!"

He sat, undecided, for twenty minutes. Wagner's secretary interrupted him then. "There's a telephone call."

"For me?"

"For Fräulein Dirling!"

"I'll take it." He picked up the phone, hoping, hoping. "Hello."

A man's voice answered, "This is Praut. Can you tell me where I can reach Fräulein Dirling?"

"She isn't here," Karl said pleasantly.

"I didn't ask that, Dummkopf! Where can I reach her? Who's the man?"

"Karl Dietrich." He could be pleasant.

"I beg pardon." Praut recognized the name. "It is vital for me to reach Fräulein Dirling at once!"

"She won't be here for some time," Karl said frankly. He wished he could talk with the man.

"Can you tell me where she is?"

"If you could meet me—!"

"At once!"

Fifteen minutes later Karl was with Praut in the lobby of the Sans Souci.

"Carola's out of town," Karl "Look. . . I'll show yuh what I mean by 'deff'!"

ADOLPH SCHUS

Here was more than a blank wall!

Then a secretary knocked and entered. "There is a gentleman here, a Herr Blaerchen from the Foreign Office."

Wagner looked angrily at Karl. "To see me?"

"He wishes to see Herr Dietrich."

That brought Wagner to his feet. "I suppose this means more trouble. You might as well take over my office." He barked at the secretary, "Tell Herr Blaerchen to come in!"

WAGNER greeted him coldly as he passed, on his way out.

Blaerchen sat down quickly and wasted no time. "Where is Carola?"

It was an unexpected question and it took Karl by surprise. Perhaps Blaerchen had found out about the Stettin plan. Perhaps Carola had been caught and this question was a trap.

"I must find her," Blaerchen continued. "Where is she?" The imperiousness, the tone of balanced insult, was gone from his voice. He was asking the question as a man in need would ask it.

Blaerchen did not like that. "I could have you arrested at once."

"If you think threats will answer your questions," Karl said, equally blunt, "perhaps you'd like me to call the police for you."

"I'm sorry, Karl," Blaerchen repeated at once. "There is no need for threats." Then, innocently: "Is Carola out of town?"

"Why shouldn't she go out of town, after she had been ordered to go to Warsaw, alone?" He could think of no way to get from Blaerchen what he wanted to know.

"That order was a mistake," Blaerchen said. "It will be countermanded."

Karl remembered a telephone call to Carola the morning before. "Herr Praut has already promised to do that."

"Praut!" Blaerchen lost whatever composure he had. "Did he see Carola yesterday?"

When Karl shook his head, Blaerchen looked relieved. Praut was Blaerchen's reason for wanting to get to Carola! To test that, Karl asked, "You would

The Sign of Friendly Service

“You Can’t Beat That Red Horse!”

Frederic Stanley

You can't beat the Red Horse for quick getaway—long runs. He stands for all good gasoline qualities—full “Balanced Performance.” Stop for Mobilgas—and its teammate Mobiloil—today!

IF YOU ENJOY getting away first at the traffic light—flashing down the straightaway—soaring up hills in high—put your money on that Mobilgas Flying Red Horse!

For here's the one favorite that always delivers—rain or shine!

Mobilgas starts you fast—because it atomizes instantly. It keeps you going smoothly—because it fires uniformly, burns completely. Even power in every cylinder—no stall, no sputter, no ping. Long mileage with every tankful.

We call this Mobilgas Balanced Performance. Try it today...at the Sign of the Flying Red Horse!

1. Quick starts despite cool engine.
2. Fast warm-up—rapid acceleration.
3. Freedom from vapor-lock—no stalls.
4. Minimum crankcase oil dilution.
5. High anti-knock value.
6. Cleanliness—freedom from gum.
7. Full, smooth power under all conditions.
8. Long mileage—economical operation.

SOCONY-VACUUM OIL COMPANY, INC.
AND AFFILIATES

Magnolia Petroleum Co.—General Petroleum Corp. of Calif.

him. "We'll have news from her shortly."

"Will you please have her get in touch with me immediately?"

Karl smiled. "That's the second such request."

Praut flared up. "Who else asked you?"

"That's what I wanted to talk to you about, Herr Praut." This was dangerous but not as dangerous as waiting for von Maurer to call the police. "Herr Blaerchen asked the same thing."

"What did he say?" Praut asked brusquely.

"I scarcely think I should break ■ confidence." It was not hard to pretend decent modesty. Praut was no dramatic critic.

"There are ways of forcing—!" Praut said heavily.

All these Nazis worked alike, with bluff and threat! "I'm sure there are." Karl smiled pleasantly. "But by the time you forced the knowledge out, it might be too late, nicht wahr?"

"Pardon me!" Praut smiled pleasantly. "I think we can get further by being friendly."

"I'm sure of it."

"Did Blaerchen tell you why he wanted to see her?"

Karl shook his head.

Praut leaned forward, to speak in confidence: "You were backstage the night of her opening—I saw you waiting outside her dressing room after the performance. How long was Blaerchen in there alone with her?"

"Possibly ten minutes!"

Praut nodded his head. Karl was sure he had guessed right; this eagerness to find Carola came from that broken engagement. Then Praut looked at the time and prepared to leave. "Be sure you tell Carola to see me before talking to anyone. Anyone!"

PRAUT spoke like a man commanding the lowest menial. Here was the moment for Karl to jump in and direct the conversation. "I assume that you and Blaerchen are not friendly."

"Why should you think that?"

"Because of things he has said about you."

"To Carola?" In his face was hatred and with it eagerness, eagerness to dominate. With it, Karl was sure, was a deep sense of inferiority whenever he compared himself with Blaerchen. That could well explain his infatuation for Carola and the jealousy of Blaerchen that went with it. "What did Blaerchen say?"

"I know none of the details."

"There are a great many things that could be said about Blaerchen." Then, in a pleasanter voice: "Please tell Carola to see me before seeing anyone else."

Karl agreed and the men separated. It was almost noon. Karl walked to Wagner's office slowly, pushing through crowds out for lunch, ignoring them. Again and again he reviewed a plan, a plan that was dangerous; but waiting for von Maurer to report in the morning was more dangerous. From that there would be no hope of escape. Karl's plan had one slender hope. These two men, Praut and Blaerchen, were like two chemicals, waiting for ■ catalyst to explode them. Karl could smile; he knew that catalyst! What was missing was ■ way to bring the two men together. It had to be found somewhere, somehow. And at once! Before noon tomorrow, von Maurer would report.

He came into Wagner's office. The secretary was about to say something but got nowhere. Out of the inner office came Carola, her arms open wide, her eyes moist.

"I couldn't do it, dearest," she said. "I couldn't!"

Not letting go of her for a moment Karl took her into the inner office and closed the door. "I'm so glad you're here. So glad!" But he stopped and the smile vanished. She had come back into a greater danger than before.

She did not notice his worry. "You weren't coming, were you?"

Karl could not look her in the face.

"Klauss?"

He nodded.

"You are brave. But when I guessed I could not go."

And now she was back—! He held her tight and kissed her roughly. She had to be told of von Maurer. Then, as if suddenly berserk, he stepped away, laughing. With her here he had what was missing from the plan! "Listen! Don't ask questions now, sweetheart, but do just as I tell you. Call Blaerchen at once, at once! Tell him to meet you at your apartment at five. Then call Praut."

"Praut?" She looked bewildered.

"Tell him to meet you at your apartment. will insist on your explaining a wild-goose chase to them and they will not be gentle with you. You'll be under arrest tonight." Significantly he added: "And I shall be unable to help or to intercede for you or Carola."

"I understand," Karl said. That was a risk that had to be taken.

He hurried to Carola's apartment. "Are Praut and Blaerchen coming?"

"They will be here at five. Won't you explain?"

"I'll explain just what I want you to do. Now, listen, and don't be afraid!"

A QUARTER-HOUR before five two Gestapo men arrived, an old one, Stissing, a younger one, Werner. They were hard-faced men, with the preoccupation of surgeons, men to whom it would be difficult to have to explain any failure.

Stissing looked around the apartment

A few minutes after five the doorbell rang and Stissing glanced significantly at Werner. Listening intently Karl heard Carola open the door. Then he heard Blaerchen say, "It's nice to see you, Carola."

"You're very prompt," Carola answered. "Won't you sit down?"

Until Karl heard Blaerchen around the room he had not realized how he would have to depend on Stissing not only to know what was going on but whether anything threatened or frightened Carola and shook her courage. He was there alone; he could not help. He would have to stand here and his hearing to catch every modulation, every shade of meaning, like a manager caught behind scenery during opening night.

The doorbell rang again. Karl pondered if Carola looked nervous, elegant, amused. As she went to the door the two Gestapo men leaned forward lightly.

Karl wished he could see Blaerchen's face. "It's nice to see you," Praut was saying. Then, in a changed voice: "Herr Blaerchen! What are you doing here?"

"I could ask the same question," Blaerchen said coldly. "Perhaps Herr Dirling will be good enough to explain."

KARL heard her say quietly, "Will you please sit down?" She was excited as she said, "I understood that you both wanted to see me."

That was the opening line! Skillfully played, if Carola could control the conversation, the dialogue would lead to the things that Karl wanted Stissing and Werner to hear.

"I was most eager to see you." Karl took the lead as Karl had been sure he would. "I presume that Herr Blaerchen has been here long enough to be able to tell you what he wants you to answer."

"He has only been here a moment," Carola said quickly. "And I am perfectly able to decide for myself what to answer."

There was a moment of silence, in which each man were trying to decide who should speak first. Stissing moved uncomfortably in his chair.

Praut began again, more politely: "I want to ask why you broke your engagement with me the night before last."

Karl had been sure that that was what Praut wanted to know! He would have liked to smile but, with two Gestapo men liable to glance at him at any time, he knew he could not show any reason to anything said.

"Why should I give you any explanation?" Carola asked coolly. That answer should anger Praut and make Blaerchen confident for a moment. His turn would come later, abruptly.

Praut tried another approach: "In the early evening you told me that you were looking forward to our engagement."

"And later I changed my mind," Carola said bluntly.

"Why?"

The Gestapo men moved uneasily as if restless and not interested in what seemed to be a trivial quarrel. Karl had to hope they would be patient.

"Why did you change your mind?" Praut repeated.

Karl was sure that Blaerchen was sitting stolidly now, wondering if Carola would mention her song.

"Blaerchen was in your dressing room when you finished singing," Praut continued. He sounded more angry at Carola than at Blaerchen. "Did you mention your engagement with me?"

"No!" To Karl she sounded uncertain.

"Did he know that you had changed your mind?"

"No," Carola said, no less pleasantly. Blaerchen interrupted harshly. "I ment at five." He kissed her again. "Now I must go on an errand. I'll come to your apartment as soon as I can."

She held to him. "Where are you going?"

He smiled, he even looked happy. "To call a friend of mine at the Gestapo!"

It took time to arrange a meeting with Kuhlmann, through Klauss, and time was valuable. When Kuhlmann did meet him, near the Lehrter Bahnhof, he listened to Karl for a few minutes. Then he shook his head firmly and decisively.

"I can't help, Karl," he said. "The whole thing is too dangerous! It isn't myself—I could explain to my superiors how I happened to become acquainted with you, and I should have to explain that. But for yourself—what guarantee of success have you?"

"None," Karl said cheerfully. "But tomorrow at this time Carola and I will both be under arrest, so what does danger matter? And I'd like to be spared, to help Klauss, if for no other reason."

That persuaded Kuhlmann. "I will see that two men are sent," he agreed, "but if you're unsuccessful, those men as if surveying an operating chamber. "Are you sure we can hear from the bedroom?"

"Certain," Karl said confidently.

Stissing and his colleague walked to the bedroom without a word.

It was nearly five o'clock. Karl turned to the bedroom, smiling at Carola. She would be alone here, in her most important performance. She smiled back, no less confidently. She had been uncertain at first but Karl had reassured her, "We must assume that you can get them angry enough, not at you but at each other. Then, knowing what sort of men they are, you need only mention the murder of Paul—! Praut will jump at it!"

She had nodded, not asking what would happen if that was wrong.

He closed the bedroom door. Stissing sat down at once, pulling ■ chair near the door. Werner sat beside him. Not once did suspicion leave their faces. Karl stood behind them, glad there was no conversation, not letting himself think of what would happen if anything miscarried.

big to her about it if that's what he's hinting." Prout ignored him. "What was said when you were alone with him?" Karl could hear no nervousness as she said, "We talked about my singing, the audience, about a new song I wrote, 'The Handsome Widow. Didn't you like it, Herr Blaerchen?"

As the most delicate point of the conversation. If Blaerchen, in conversation, should question her about singing and what she implied by it, Gestapo men might become curious about Carola's motives. Stissing jumped up at Karl.

Carola continued, as if gossiping, "I told him that I'd changed my mind about going with you, Herr Prout." Blaerchen argued with you or Stissing?"

"Did you, Herr Blaerchen?" Prout's answer was all important and he held his breath. He said, "Why not?"

Karl heard a chair pushed back. His voice trembling, Prout said, "I made promises, Blaerchen—you tried me!"

Carola wanted to smile. Prout's anger was increasing!

She heard Carola's voice, calm and clear. "I ought to know about promises that concern me." As if she were talking with her warmest, friendliest, she asked, "Don't you think so, Prout? What promises were there?"

The sound of chairs scraping made Carola smile. The men were staying! Blaerchen assured me that he would not, Prout hunted carefully for words, "to become better acquainted with you."

"Really?" Carola sounded as if she found an opening. "Blaerchen could only have been sincere after the way he spoke of you to me."

"That was Blaerchen, suddenly." Prout snapped. Then, he said this morning that—"

They were now to mention the conversation with Karl, then Blaerchen said the same thing. The two men guessed that there was something suspiciously artificial in all this.

Carola interrupted at once: "I'm sure that you were taken in by anyone from Herr Blaerchen!" She saw the danger and she was avert- ing it. "He told me that such an ugly, active man—!"

That hit right at Prout's vanity! Prout will talk facts, Blaerchen." Prout's voice white-hot. "I paid you a sum of money for your promises, Fraulein Dirling. Where is it?"

Two Gestapo men leaned forward. This was the climax and Karl hoped Carola would see it. She had Prout under her control. "A moment, Prout! I believe your story about anything is possible from a man who murdered my husband."

"Murdered?" Prout repeated. "I wanted to embrace Carola. She was at just the right second. Murdered!"

"It's nonsense," Blaerchen shouted. "Murdered!" Prout repeated to him- self. "That's very interesting. What have you?"

"I have no proof," Blaerchen inter- rupted savagely. "It's nonsense!"

"Of?" Carola was scornful. "Look at this!"

"What about it, Blaerchen?" Prout said at the opening. "What about something, probably Blaer- chen's face, convinced him. "This will be investigated at once," he roared.

"You dare to mention this ridiculous accusation to anyone I'll tell what I know about some of your activities.

That won't be murder, Prout, that's treason!"

"Treason!" Prout's voice cracked. "What about things you have done?"

Karl was startled when Stissing jumped up quickly. "That's enough," he said. "We'll see that they have a chance to tell, specifically, of treason." The two men were out of the bedroom in one quick move. Karl followed, almost dazed.

Prout and Blaerchen were facing each other angrily, wholly intent on their fight. Carola stood beside them, as innocent as a passer-by. Then Blaerchen swung around, saw two strange men, and understood at once. He looked all his hatred at Carola. Prout squeaked something and collapsed.

"Meine Herren!" Stissing said coldly. "You have spoken of treason. Please come with us!"

THAT night they ate a quick supper before Carola was due at the Sans Souci. With permission to reopen, Wagner had not wanted to miss one evening.

Now they could sit side by side, freed from the fear of Blaerchen's agents. "I can't believe we're free," Carola said for the tenth time. "Won't the Gestapo men question us?"

"They'll set Prout and Blaerchen to accusing each other and finish with them quickly," Karl said. "They may question you about your accusation of murder but that will be nothing to worry about."

"I'm not worried," Carola said softly. Karl's arm was around her and she held tightly to his hand. "When I think of last night, in Stettin—"

"And tonight, in Berlin, for your last night of freedom! A year from tomorrow," he said gaily, "we'll celebrate our first wedding anniversary." He moved closer to her. Her hair was soft, her perfume sweet.

"We're lucky, Karl, so lucky." She smiled. "Against the war and everything else, our own troubles now seem so unimportant."

Karl shook his head. "They have a right to be important. For us they should be the most important thing in the world. That's what the Underground fights for, to let each individual be the most important person in the world, to himself."

A shadow passed quickly over Carola's face but it did not disturb her smile. "Come, we must go, dearest. We have less than an hour to get to the Sans Souci."

"Yes." Then Karl paused before saying something he had not told before. "I shan't be able to go. I have an appointment."

If Carola was disappointed, she did not show it. The appointment, she was certain, was with Klaus. There would be others. "Of course," she said gently. "Go, Karl, but be careful."

He did not need the warning. "I'll meet you at the Sans Souci when you're finished," he said lightly. "I must go now."

In the blackness on the street outside Karl kissed her gently. "You're smiling," he said. "I know it even if I can't see it."

"I'm smiling," she said. "I love you, Karl."

They separated.

He would go and she would await him and he would come. He would go again and again he would come. But one day he would go and that day he might not come. That had to be accepted, as a soldier's wife accepts what she never dares to put into words. Karl, at least, knew what he was fighting for.

He would go—! Until then, they would be together and she would not be lonely any more.

She hurried on, through the black-out.

THE END

How's your "Pep Appeal"?

—by Bundy

Sally: Of all the crust! Sending me a wilted lily and saying I should learn about pep appeal. It's signed "A Friend."

Polly: Your friend has imagination, anyway.

Sally: It's that cat who stole my Bill! Just wait till I get her on the phone!

Polly: Whoa there, impetuous! Maybe you ought to get even another way. Why not put on the pep and win back the boy? Quit living on cream puffs and get all your vitamins. Come down to the kitchen for a lesson.

Polly: Vitamins! We've got to have 'em and have 'em all for pep. And right in these delicious, crunchy wheat-flakes, called KELLOGG'S PEP, are extra-rich sources of two of the most important ones—vitamins B<sub>1</sub> and D.

Sally: But, gosh! Why didn't you tell me PEP tastes so good.

Sally: (another night) Am I going to turn on the pep tonight! That boy won't know what hit him.

Polly: Well—where there's pep there's hope.

Vitamins for pep! Kellogg's Pep for vitamins!

Pep contains per serving: 4/5 to 1/5 the minimum daily need of vitamin B<sub>1</sub>, according to age; 1/2 the daily need of vitamin D. For sources of other vitamins, see the Pep package.

MADE BY KELLOGG'S IN BATTLE CREEK

COPYRIGHT, 1940, BY KELLOGG COMPANY

Gun Smoke

Continued from page 23

little groups at race meets, and out here he had seen none at all.

It was a long time before Johnny realized she wanted to know something about his past life. He figured out, from the way she led around to it, that she was waiting for him to tell her. That was one day around noon when they were in the store alone, and Mr. Miller was having his lunch in the back room. When he understood that hers wasn't curiosity, but a real interest, everything about the past two years just came pouring out. When he finished his story, he said:

"I've never shot a man except in self-defense and never would. I know that some people think of me as a killer, but there ain't nothing to that. I want to work the same as any other fellow."

"I know there's nothing to that, Johnny." She spoke softly, as if it were a secret. Then in that gentle way she had, so that no one could think she was prying, she went on: "What do you want to do?"

All at once Johnny felt choked up and he could only mutter, "Like I said, I want to be a good cowboy."

"Wouldn't you like to have your own outfit, like Slim?"

"Maybe when I'm old like Slim and can't ride herd any more." Then he shut up fast, feeling what a fool he was, and sure Esther would think he had no more brains than a locoed steer.

SHE just kept looking at him with her shining eyes. The way she looked made it seem as if they were the only people in the world and he would never want anyone else in it. He didn't know what he was doing, only suddenly they were in each other's arms, with her clinging to him, soft and strong too. Then he felt her quiver as if she might be crying.

"Good Lord," he said, jumping back, "have I been a worse fool than I figured and gone and hurt you?"

She shook her head, and she was crying a little, but smiling too. "It—it's just that I'm so happy."

Then they heard Mr. Miller opening the door. They moved apart and tried to look as if nothing had happened. From the way her father halted, it must have stood out all over them. He turned pale and his tired eyes looked scared. Seeing him, Johnny knew what he had to say, as if he had to push the words out.

"It kinda has taken me by surprise, Mr. Miller, else I'd've told you before . . . I mean about Esther and me . . . how, you see, sir . . . I want to marry her."

The man's eyes went to his daughter and she nodded, her eyes very steady, and she said simply, "We love each other, Father."

"Yes," he said, "yes." Then he sort of shook himself, as if he were throwing off a pack, and turned back to Johnny. "It takes me by surprise too, son, and . . . well, you understand it's nothing against you . . . but out here where we're strangers, away from our own kind, I've just to be sure of my daughter's future, and . . ."

"Sure, I understand, Mr. Miller. There's lots of time yet. I've got to see about a better job and all. I'll be going back to headquarters, to talk it over with Slim."

Johnny didn't tell Slim what was behind his questions, when he started asking about how soon Slim was going to have a bigger outfit and wouldn't he be needing a foreman for it. Slim could figure out what was going on when a cowboy started worrying about his future.

Not letting on a thing, he said, "Well, if the rustlers keep letting us alone, and if our neighbors keep acting peaceable, maybe in two-three years. I been a little worried about Withington, to tell you the truth, and it might be a good idea for you to feel things out over there. Why don't you mosey over to his line camp and ask the boys there to help you find that red colt of ours that took to the hills?"

Johnny said, "That might take more'n a week."

"That's the point. It'll give us plenty of chance to see how that outfit feels about us, and how Withington feels about you in particular. When I know that, I'll know more about when I can spread myself wider."

Johnny perked up a little at that, and started out cheerfully enough the next morning. No sooner had he disappeared over the hill than Slim was cutting the breeze to town. He went straight to Miller's store and almost knocked over wouldn't have gone on. As it was, he blurted, "I'm goin' to tell Johnny, but I had to tell you what your pappy can't, on account of he just don't know about this country out here."

She started to say something that Slim figured he wouldn't have wanted to hear, only Mr. Miller cut her off: "You listen, Esther. Slim is doing something hard for him, for our own good. I will be grateful, Slim, for whatever you are kind enough to tell us."

"Well, sir—" he was scared to try Esther any more—"I told Johnny before he went down to beard Tom Langhorn that a man never kills just once, and he sure proved it. Once a man sheds human blood it gets easier for him the next time, and the more times he does it the more it gets like a habit, until after a while killing another man is just like killing a fly that buzzes too close."

"Johnny told me about those fights," Esther said, and Slim would never have thought such a sweet young lady could ing every man a chance, especially a man like him, from home and after in our army. . . . No telling what love might do for him. We'll see and not say a word about this to and don't you either, Slim."

Slim said he wouldn't, though he would have said anything to get her there.

He hated to face Johnny when he came riding back with the red colt. He was more carefree than Slim had seen him and full of fine plans.

"The Withington boys were saying as soon as he dismounted that say Withington was wondering what was doing here when I first came since I've been laying low he don't bother about me no more. They say I be boss of the range, so I reckon I spread a heap wider, Slim, with my riding in his way. That fellow runs over fifty miles south of here, across the border, and if you go a few miles northward, he won't know it."

Slim said he'd think it over. Johnny headed for town. He was slicked up in a new silk shirt and a neckerchief loose around his throat. His newly shined boots bright with polish. When he went in the store, Esther and Mr. Miller were busy with customers and he felt foolish in all his fine new gear and bear grease on his hair. After the customers left he didn't feel much better because Esther and her father didn't seem glad to see him. It wasn't that they were sorry but they were flustered from the last time. Even Mr. Miller left them alone, Esther and Slim like herself. That soft light that had been remembering shone in her eyes and yet she looked as if she was trying to puzzle him out, as if all they had fore had never been.

"LOOK," he finally said, "I've been in the brush for nearly a week. I'm goin' to stay in town tonight. I got a lot to tell you and I was coming if you'd go with me to the Chance for supper."

"I'd love that, Johnny," and it sounded more the way he remembered it. "That's just what we need, a change together."

"You make me feel better," he grinned. "I thought something was wrong, that maybe you didn't want any more."

"I love you, Johnny, and I remember—it's just because you've been away so long. You go now and come back in a little while. You won't have to wait long now," and he touched her cheek quickly, so Mr. Miller wouldn't see. He was glad now he wore his bright neckerchief and yellow shirt, glad of everything. He placed his hat on his slicked hair and stepped to the board sidewalk.

He turned toward the corner where he could kill time until supper. He saw someone called "Hey!" The voice was unfamiliar but the tone was no longer swinging around with all his senses.

Three men were walking toward him and there was something funny about the way they walked. Two were hung back a little, one on each side of the big man in the middle. They had been with the cowboys he had met at Withington's line camp. He didn't speak to him and that was all right. Then he noticed, just before the big man reached him, that the street was nearly empty and there was no sound anywhere. All that silence

"Here's a 'beaut' run off by that Frisco mob. Boy, they're real competition!"

JAY IRVING

a customer coming out. Esther was behind the counter and Mr. Miller was standing in the middle of the room. They both looked at him as if to ask what was troubling him. Slim came right to the point:

"Miss Esther, from the way Johnny's talking, I know you and him are serious about each other. You might think this ain't no business of mine, but you're new out here and there's something about men like him you don't savvy. I've known the boy ever since he started punching cows and I like him, but it's too late for him to be marrying any girl like you. I hate to say this and I wouldn't outside of these walls, but Johnny is a killer—and once a man's a killer, he don't never stop."

ESTHER stood very still while he was talking and her color grew dark red. Then she came around the counter to face him close and her voice was not gentle as he'd always heard it before. "Slim," she said, "if you feel that way about your friend, you tell him—not me."

Slim stepped back a little at that. He said later that except for Mr. Miller looking so troubled, and still friendly, he sound so cold. "He shot in self-defense, the same thing that could happen to any man anywhere."

"Not anywhere, ma'am, because this is the only place they fight with guns, and not to any man either, because you know some men are always having fights, only where you come from they fight with fists. It looks as if trouble knows when a man ain't running from it and Johnny Malvern is one of them men. Trouble'll always find him and then somebody's goin' to be daid, and most likely it won't be Johnny. He'll just keep moving on until the day somebody shoots faster than he does . . . and that's goin' to happen to every man if he keeps at it."

Esther was silent after that, and Slim started to go. But Mr. Miller gestured weakly for him to stop. "Slim," he said in a voice not much more than a whisper, "don't you think we should at least give the boy a chance?"

Seeing the despairing hope in the gentle man's eyes, Slim could only think that he wished he had made it to the door. He swallowed and half nodded, and Esther said, "Then you will give him a chance, Father?"

"Certainly, Daughter, I believe in giv-with the big man's booming voice. Johnny Malvern were the ones that they sounded like some kind of thing at all, Johnny nodded, his king in the important way the cried himself, the way Tom had.

"Withington," he said then. "I know you know who I am."

Johnny nodded again. "I want to know what you were doing last week for nearly a week, hills by yourself?"

Johnny's glance flickered to the two men who had laughed with when he had left their camp. Now they fanned the air from their boss, their faces and their eyes measuring him as he had been measured before. He was next words carefully: "I'm looking for a red colt of ours. I'll send him to your men and they'll know and knew he was wearing our hat. There was a week because it took that long to find him."

Withington reared back, bracing his hips. His coat fell back, a gun on his belt, and somehow it was just the way Tom Langhorn had when Johnny went to ask for his

"You tell your boss that no one's working again. I know you're against me before and I know your reputation now, and I'm not taking chances on gun outfits fooling me any day range. Tom Langhorn was a good one and I've just learned that your outfit is with him too, and there's too much rustling around here for me to take outfits like yours. You got that, but do I get it straight or are you saying we're a rustling outfit, Withington?"

Johnny didn't say what you are. It's your boss that you tell your boss to get his hired killers off my land, or come again, to come shooting. "Come on, men."

"It ain't all," Johnny said. He was keeping his voice low, so he couldn't hear inside the store. It was lower now but it carried more, it was hot. "I went on your range looking for a cowboy and I been talking to one, but this talk of hired killers is something else. No man is calling that unless he proves it—or back."

Withington paused, half turned away, his hands hanging by his sides again. "I'll tell you all I have to say to you."

"You're wrong, mister. Maybe you're singing low because you got men with you. That wa'n't the way. If you had two thousand, they'd shoot me any quicker than I can say 'u'."

Withington turned fully back to face Johnny, his lips twisted for some reason that he never said. All at once he was looking into different eyes. They were gray and quiet, now there was a color at all. There was just a little, merciless hunger. Withington backed back at his two men. He was looking at the same Johnny Malvern's eyes that he had seen they must be thinking too that way he looked before he killed Langhorn and all the others.

Johnny was empty, and the whole street was filled with a waiting silence. At the moment they had waited for the faro dealers and the bartender-cowboys and the miners, the men and the honky-tonk women. Johnny Malvern came to town. He had given it to them with his words, because he wanted to be the biggest man in the valley. He could kick the famous killer off the main street with his words. He had them and the man was still there and everybody knew what the man was waiting for. He called on all his self-importance, all his bluster. With the eyes of the town on him, he said in his loudest voice, "Nobody's talking about shooting."

"Yes, they are. You started it and you're going to finish it—one way or another."

Then Withington knew it was too late for words. What had been the face of a quiet cowboy wasn't even a man any more. It was a mask. The only thing alive in it were those merciless eyes. Now he had to go ahead, or his men would lose respect for him. He would be laughed out of town, the town that, silent and unseen, waited on him now, to see if he was as big as his words, to see where death would strike.

He smelled the death himself as he took a backward step, tried a smile, tried to signal to his men. He listened and there was only silence. From the mask before him he knew his men had not moved. Then he clawed at his gun. It barely cleared the holster.

The cowboy to his left got his gun out and Johnny Malvern's second bullet smashed his shoulder and knocked him flat. The man to the inside of Withington never went for his gun. He dived for the door into Miller's store.

Inside the store, Esther and her father had been talking of Johnny and heard nothing of the argument. Esther had just turned to go back and dress when they heard the two shots almost together and then a terrified man came plunging through the door. He took one wild look around and scrambled for the back door. The next moment Johnny came in, a smoking gun in front of him and above the gun a face she had never seen.

They all stood staring at one another, and slowly Johnny's eyes changed.

"I didn't want to do it," he said.

Esther just shook her head. Before his eyes changed, Esther had seen what Withington saw just before the slug hit him an inch below his heart.

"I can't come back for supper," Johnny said. "I—I'll see you later."

"No . . . no . . ." She was standing rigid, fighting back the horror that filled her. Then yells broke outside and they could hear the wooden doors in the adobe buildings banging as the crowds came out of their hiding. Johnny backed to the door.

HE MUST have seen the way she felt, for he turned away and glanced out into the street. He slipped two bullets in the cylinder and then glanced back once at her. She had seen Confederate soldiers look like that when they said goodbye in Richmond, on going back into the lines, and she knew he was going back into the lines again and always would, and life such as he had snatched these past weeks with her would be only interludes. Then he was gone, with a touch of his hand to his hat, and she was seeing him for the last time.

The yelling soared up with a rush and guns began to crack, as they had so often in this town, and then came the familiar thunder of a galloping horse heading for the brush. She had always shuddered before and gone into their home in the back room. This time she ran to the door and flung it open.

Men crouched in doorways and behind buildings, firing at the lone rider. He was leaning back and his big pistol flared and she heard bullets singing through the street. Then he was out of town, leaning forward in his saddle and urging his horse. His bright neckerchief fluttered in the wind. He was still dressed for their supper as he rode toward the Dragoon Mountains, where he would hide out . . . and then move on. None of it was his fault. He was a good cowboy but, as Slim said, they never killed just once.

QUALITY WRITING INSTRUMENTS SINCE 1858

Esterbrook

RE-NEW-POINT FOUNTAIN PEN

99% of your satisfaction depends on the point

Choose Your Pen by the Point

Let your hand try a few of the 18 different styles of Esterbrook pen points, and let it make its own selection. You'll find that your hand has steered you to the most satisfactory fountain pen you ever owned.

18 Re-New-Point Styles

Duracrome is the metal especially developed for writing points that permits this accuracy of point grading . . . an accuracy never before possible. No other pen offers this advantage.

The Pen You Never Have to Part With . . .

Even if accident should overtake your Esterbrook, you can duplicate your point without repair delays. You can screw a new Re-New-Point into the barrel yourself. The Esterbrook Pen Company, Camden, N. J., or The Brown Brothers, Limited, Toronto, Canada.

Complete
ESTERBROOK FOUNTAIN PEN $1.00
Black or Colors and up

Esterbrook Re-New-Points fit every writing style and purpose
DURACROME RE-NEW-POINTS 25c
Osmiridium-tipped 50c and 75c

Esterbrook PUSH PENCIL

to match your Esterbrook Pen $1.00
A push of the thumb feeds the lead. It is the only Push Pencil with the non-jamming continuous guide tube for lead . . . and the tip that grips the lead firmly at the writing point. and up

FOR SALE BY LEADING STATIONERS AND FOUNTAIN PEN DEALERS
(Prices slightly higher in Canada)

The Patriotic Murders

Continued from page 14

very fond of in books! But take my word for it, these things are all unbelievable. If the woman is dead, her body has just been quietly buried somewhere."

"But where?"

"Exactly. She disappeared in London. Nobody's got a garden there—not a proper one. A lonely chicken farm, that's what we want!"

A garden? Poirot's mind flashed suddenly to that neat, prim garden at Ealing with its formal beds. How fantastic if a dead woman should be buried there! He told himself not to be absurd.

"And if she isn't dead," went on Japp, "where is she? Over a month now, description published in the Press, circulated all over England—"

"And nobody has seen her?"

"Oh, yes, practically everybody has seen her! You've no idea how many middle-aged, faded-looking women wearing olive-green cardigan suits there are. She's been seen on Yorkshire moors, and in Liverpool hotels, in guest houses in Devon and on the beach at Ramsgate! My men have spent their time patiently investigating all these reports—and one and all they've led nowhere, except to getting us in wrong with a number of perfectly respectable, middle-aged ladies."

Poirot clicked his tongue sympathetically.

"And yet," went on Japp, "she's a real person all right. I mean sometimes you come across a dummy, so to speak—someone who just comes to a place and poses as a Miss Spinks—when all the time there isn't a Miss Spinks. But this woman's genuine—she's got a past, a background! We know all about her from her childhood upward! She'd led a perfectly normal reasonable life—and suddenly, hey, presto—vanish!"

"THERE must be a reason," said Poirot.

"She didn't shoot Morley, if that's what you mean. Amberiotis saw him alive after she left—and we've checked up on her movements after she left Queen Charlotte Street that morning."

Poirot said impatiently:

"I am not suggesting for a moment that she shot Morley. Of course she did not. But all the same—"

Japp said, "If you are right about Morley, then it's far more likely that he told her something which, although she doesn't suspect it, gives a clue to his murderer. In that case, she might have been deliberately got out of the way."

Poirot said, "All this involves an organization, some big concern quite out of proportion to the death of a quiet dentist in Queen Charlotte Street."

"Don't you believe everything Reginald Barnes tells you! He's a funny old bird—got German spies and Communists on the brain."

Japp got up, and Poirot said: "Let me know if you have news."

When Japp had gone out, Poirot sat frowning down at the table in front of him.

What was holding him up? He knew the answer. He was waiting for something.

Something inevitable, foreordained, the next link in the chain. When it came—then—then he could go on. . . .

It was late evening a week later when the summons came.

Japp's voice was brusque over the telephone:

"That you, Poirot? We've found her. You'd better come around. King Leopold Mansions. Battersea Park. No. 45."

A quarter of an hour later a taxi deposited Poirot outside King Leopold Mansions.

It was a big block of mansion flats looking out over Battersea Park. No. 45 was on the second floor. Japp himself opened the door.

His face was set in grim lines.

"Come in," he said. "It's not particularly pleasant, but I expect you'll want to see for yourself."

Poirot said—but it was hardly a question: "Dead?"

"What you might describe as very dead!"

Japp led the way down the passage and Poirot followed him.

The room they went into was a small lumber and box room. In the middle of it was a big metal chest of the kind used for storing furs. The lid was open.

Poirot stepped forward and looked inside.

He saw the foot first, with the shabby shoe on it and the ornate buckle. His first sight of Miss Sainsbury Seale had been, he remembered, a shoe buckle.

His gaze traveled up, over the green of forty-odd. Pays her bills, fond of an occasional game of bridge with her neighbors but keeps herself to herself more or less. No children. Mr. Chapman is a commercial traveler.

"Sainsbury Seale came here on the evening of our interview with her. About seven-fifteen. So she probably came straight here from the Glengowrie Court. She'd been here once before, so the porter says. You see, all perfectly clear and aboveboard—nice, friendly call. The porter took Miss Sainsbury Seale up in the lift to this flat. The last he saw of her was standing on the mat pressing the bell."

Poirot commented: "He has taken his time to remember this!"

"HES had gastric trouble, it seems, been away in hospital while another man took on temporarily for him. It wasn't until about a week ago that he happened to notice in an old paper the description of a 'wanted woman' and he said to his wife, 'Sounds quite like that old cup of tea who came to see Mrs. Chapman on the second floor. She had ily have come down the stairs and out without his seeing her. But the porter told him that Mrs. Chapman had gone away rather suddenly. There was just a big, printed notice on the door the next morning: 'NO MORE TELL NELLIE I AM AWAY.'

"Nellie was the daily maid for her. Mrs. Chapman had gone suddenly once or twice before the girl didn't think it odd, but what odd was the fact that she had for the porter to take her luggage or get her a taxi.

"Anyway, Beddoes decided to go to the flat. We got a search warrant and a passkey from the manager. Found nothing of interest except in the room. There had been some hair being done there. There was a pool of blood on the linoleum—in the corner where it had been missed when the floor was washed over. After that, it was a question of finding the body. Mrs. Chapman couldn't have left with her luggage or the porter would have noticed. Therefore, the body must still be in the flat. We soon spotted that fur box, airtight, you know—just the place where the body was. It was in the dressing-table drawer.

"We opened it up—and there was the missing lady!"

"What about Mrs. Chapman? Poirot asked.

"What indeed? Who is Sylvia? (name's Sylvia, by the way), what's the name? One thing is certain. Sylvia, or Sylvia's friends, murdered the lady and put her in the box."

Poirot nodded. He asked, "—was her face battered in? Or was it nice, that?"

"I'll say it isn't nice! As the body was well, one can only guess. She was a nice, pleasant woman, perhaps. Or it may have been with the idea of concealing her identity."

POIROT frowned. He said, "I don't conceal her identity."

"No, because not only had you a pretty good description of what Miss Sainsbury Seale was wearing when she disappeared, but her handbag had been stuffed into the fur box too, and the handbag there was actually a letter addressed to her at her home in Russell Square."

Poirot sat up. He said, "But that does not make the common sense. It certainly doesn't. I suppose it was a slip."

"Yes—perhaps—a slip. But—He got up.

"You have been over the flat."

"Pretty well. There's nothing missing. I should like to see Mr. Chapman's bedroom."

"Come along then."

The bedroom showed no sign of hasty departure. It was neat and tidy. The bed had not been slept in, but it was turned down ready for the night. There was a thick coating of dust everywhere.

Japp said, "No fingerprints, so far as we can see. There are some kitchen things, but I expect they belong to the maid's."

"That means that the place was dusted very carefully after the murder?"

"Yes."

Poirot's eyes swept slowly around the room. Like the sitting room it was furnished in the modern style—furnished, so he thought, by someone on a moderate income. The articles were expensive but not ultra-expensive. They were showy but not first-class. The color scheme was rose-pink. He

"Now if you can manage a high soprano, say: 'Get out of my boodwor!'"

LAURENCE REYNOLDS

wool coat and skirt till it reached the head.

He made an inarticulate noise.

"I know," said Japp. "It's pretty horrible."

The face had been battered out of all recognizable shape. Add to that the natural processes of decomposition, and it was no wonder that both men looked a shade pea-green as they turned away.

"Oh, well," said Japp. "It's all in the day's work—our day's work. No doubt about it, ours is a lousy job sometimes. There's a spot of brandy in the other room. You'd better have some."

The living room was smartly furnished in an up-to-date style—a good deal of chromium and some large, square-looking easy chairs upholstered in a pale fawn geometric fabric.

Poirot found the decanter and helped himself to some brandy. As he finished drinking, he said:

"It was not pretty, that! Now tell me, my friend, all about it."

Japp said, "This flat belongs to a Mrs. Albert Chapman. Mrs. Chapman is, I gather, a well-upholstered, smart blonde on a green wool suit and buckles on her shoes.' And after about another hour he registered again: 'Believe she had a name, too, something like that. Blimey, it was—Miss Something-or-other Seale!'

"After that," continued Japp, "it took him about four days to overcome his natural distrust of getting mixed up with the police and come along with his information."

"We didn't really think it would lead to anything. You've no idea of how many of these false alarms we've had. However, I sent Sergeant Beddoes along—he's a bright young fellow. A bit too much of this high-class education but he can't help that. It's fashionable now."

"Well, Beddoes got a hunch at once that we were on to something at last. For one thing this Mrs. Chapman hadn't been seen about for over a month. She'd gone away without leaving any address. That was a bit odd. In fact everything he could learn about Mr. and Mrs. Chapman seemed odd."

the built-in wardrobe and handled the clothes—smart clothes but again not first-class quality. His eyes fell to the shoes—they were largely of the sandal popular at the moment, some exaggerated cork soles. He balanced one in his hand, registered the fact that Mrs. Chapman had taken a 5 and put it down again. In an cupboard he found a pile of furs, piled in a heap.

"Come out of the fur chest," Japp nodded.

He was handling a gray squirrel coat. He remarked appreciatively: "First-class skins."

He said: "There's something worrying you, Poirot. What is it?"

Poirot said: "But, yes, I am worried. I'm very seriously worried. There is something you see, for me an insolvable problem."

Absolutely, he went once more into the room. . . .

JUNNY-BUSINESS MEN

Self-Portraits
Collier's Cartoonists—No. 1

Laurence Reynolds began to shine on his artistic ability by putting his first drawings for Collier's, chewing gum and cigarette pictures in Mt. Vernon, N.Y., where he was born twenty-eight years ago. Knows what it's like to be a caddy, grocery clerk, carpet designer, ditch digger, cashier and hotel clerk; knows all sports, amateur photography, music and movies. Favorite actor: Donald Duck. Cartoon specialty: dumb burlesques. See opposite page.

He took hold of the shoe on the dead man's foot. It resisted and came off with difficulty.

He examined the buckle. It had been tightly sewed on by hand.

Mercule Poirot sighed. He said: "It is a dream!"

He said curiously:

"What are you trying to do—make the problem more difficult?"

"Exactly that."

He said: "One patent-leather shoe, complete with buckle. What's wrong with that?"

Mercule Poirot said: "Nothing—absolutely nothing. But all the same—I do understand."

Merton of No. 82 King Leopold Mansions had been designated by the police as Mrs. Chapman's closest friend.

It was, therefore, to No. 82 that Japp and Poirot betook themselves next.

Merton was a loquacious lady, snapping black eyes, and an elaborate coiffure.

He needed no pressure to make her talk. She was only too ready to rise to a dramatic situation.

" Sylvia Chapman—well, of course, I don't know her really well—not intimately, so to speak. We had a few bridge evenings occasionally and we went to the pictures together, and, of course, shopping sometimes and we attended antigas lectures. But, oh, do tell me—she isn't dead, is she?"

Japp reassured her.

"Well, I'm sure I'm thankful to hear it! But the postman just now was all agog about a body having been found in one of the flats—but then one really can't believe half one hears, can one? I never do."

Japp asked a further question.

"No, I haven't heard anything of Mrs. Chapman—not since she went away. She must have gone away rather suddenly, because we were going to do our first-aid classes, and she said nothing about going away then. She's missed three of them—"

Mrs. Merton had never heard a Miss Sainsbury Seale mentioned. Mrs. Chapman had never spoken of anyone of that name.

"And yet, you know, the name is familiar to me, distinctly familiar. I seem to have seen it somewhere quite lately."

Japp said dryly, "It's been in all the papers for some weeks—"

"Of course—some missing person, wasn't it? And you thought Mrs. Chapman might have known her? No, I'm sure I've never heard Sylvia mention that name."

"Can you tell me anything about Mr. Chapman, Mrs. Merton?"

A RATHER curious expression came over Mrs. Merton's face.

"He was a commercial traveler, I believe, so Mrs. Chapman told me," she said. "He traveled abroad for his firm—armaments, I believe. He went all over Europe."

"Did you ever meet him?"

"No, never. He was at home so seldom, and when he was at home he and Mrs. Chapman didn't want to bother with outsiders. Very naturally."

"Do you know if Mrs. Chapman had any near relations or friends?"

"I don't know about friends. I don't think she had any near relations. She never spoke of any."

"Was she ever in India?"

"Not that I know of."

Mrs. Merton paused, and then broke out:

"But please tell me—why are you asking all these questions? I quite understand that you come from Scotland Yard and all that, but there must be some special reason."

"Well, Mrs. Merton, you are bound to know some time. As a matter of fact, a dead body has been found in Mrs. Chapman's flat."

"Oh—?" Mrs. Merton looked for a moment like the dog whose eyes were as big as saucers.

"A dead body! It wasn't Mr. Chapman, was it? Or perhaps some foreigner?"

"It wasn't a man at all—it was a woman," Japp said.

"A woman?" Mrs. Merton seemed even more surprised.

Poirot said gently, "Why should you think it was a man?"

"Oh, I don't know. It seemed more likely somehow."

"But why? Was it because Mrs. Chapman was in the habit of receiving gentlemen visitors?"

"Oh, no—oh, no, indeed." Mrs. Merton was indignant. "I never meant anything of that kind. Sylvia Chapman wasn't in the least that kind of woman—not at all! It was just that, with Mr. Chapman—I mean—"

She came to a stop.

Poirot said, "I think, Madame, that

"MUM pays you dividends in the hotel business—or any business"

"In my business—or any other—the man with perspiration odor has two strikes on him. I urge every man on our staff to follow my example . . . and make a daily habit of Mum!"

says Mr. Kenneth Lane, personnel director of the famous Hotel New Yorker

PERSPIRATION ODOR has doubled-crossed many a capable and able citizen. Socially or in business it's an unforgivable fault. And the tragic part of it all is that a man may offend and never know he's guilty.

"Too many men trust their shower alone to guard them from underarm odor. But smart men take no chances! They make sure they never offend . . . they make a regular daily habit of Mum!"

Take No Chances Yourself!

That's sound advice for success—and thousands of men are following it. For Mum is quick and easy. A dab under each arm after your shower takes only 30 seconds and you definitely veto perspiration odor for hours! Remember, a bath only takes care of past perspiration, but Mum prevents risk of underarm odor to come.

Mum can't harm your shirts . . . won't irritate your skin . . . prevents underarm odor without attempting to stop perspiration itself.

Ask the ladies, they know! Your wife, sister or mother uses a deodorant—probably Mum. But shy away from daily arguments and don't try to "borrow" theirs. Druggists are selling jars to thousands of men who like the self-confidence Mum brings—safety from underarm odor. Get yourself a jar of Mum, today!

MUM

takes the Odor out of Perspiration

[ Socially or in business—Play safe with Mum! ]

Your morning shower takes care of yesterday's perspiration, but Mum prevents underarm odor to come—carries on where your bath leaves off.

The people you meet in business—and your family and friends—like you better when you avoid risk of underarm odor with Mum.

you know a little more than you have told us."

Mrs. Merton said uncertainly:

"I don't know, I'm sure—what I ought to do! I mean, I don't exactly want to betray a confidence and, of course, I never have repeated what Sylvia told me—except just to one or two intimates whom I knew were really safe . . ."

Mrs. Merton paused to draw breath.

"What did Mrs. Chapman tell you?"

Japp asked.

Mrs. Merton leaned forward and lowered her voice.

"It just—slipped out, as it were, one day. When we were seeing a film—about the secret service and Mrs. Chapman said you could see that whoever had written it didn't know much about their subject, and then it came out—only she swore me to secrecy. Mr. Chapman was in the secret service, I mean. That was the real reason he had to go abroad so much. The armament firm was only a blind. And it was terribly worrying for Mrs. Chapman because she couldn't write to him or get letters from him while he was away. And, of course, it was terribly dangerous! I've often wondered—perhaps he's actually in Germany now—!"

As they went down the stairs again to No. 42 Japp ejaculated with feeling:

"Shades of E. Phillips Oppenheim and Valentine Williams, I think I'm going mad!"

THAT smart young man, Sergeant Beddoes, was awaiting them.

He said respectfully:

"Haven't been able to get anything helpful from the maid, sir. Mrs. Chapman changed maids pretty often, it seems. This one had only worked for her a month or two. She says Mrs. Chapman was a nice lady, fond of the radio and pleasant-spoken. Girl was of opinion the husband was a gay deceiver but that Mrs. Chapman didn't suspect it. She got letters from abroad sometimes, some from Italy, two from America, one from Spain and one from Russia. The girl's young man collects stamps, and Mrs. Chapman used to give them to her off the letters."

"Anything among Mrs. Chapman's papers?"

"Absolutely nothing, sir. She didn't keep much. A few bills and receipted accounts—all local. Some old theater programs, one or two cookery recipes cut out of the papers. Some A.R.P. stuff and a pamphlet about the missions."

The divisional surgeon came out of the bathroom where he had been washing his hands.

"Most unsavory corpse," he said cheerfully. "Send her along when you're ready and I'll get down to brass tacks."

"No idea of the cause of death, Doctor?"

"Impossible to say until I've done the autopsy. Those face injuries were definitely inflicted after death, I should say. But I shall know better when I've got her at the mortuary. It may be a job to identify her—oh, you know who she is? That's splendid. What? Missing woman there's been all the fuss about? Well, you know, I never read the papers. Just do the crosswords."

Japp said bitterly, "And that's publicity for you!" as the doctor went out.

Poirot was hovering over the desk. He picked up a small, brown address book.

The indefatigable Beddoes said:

"Nothing of special interest there—mostly hairdressers, dressmakers, etc. I've noted down any private names and addresses."

Poirot opened the book at the letter D.

He read Dr. Davis, 17, Prince Albert Road; Drake and Pomponetti, Fishmongers. And below it: Dentist. Mr. Morley, 58 Queen Charlotte Street.

Miss Morley had moved to the country. She was living in a small country cottage near Hertford.

The Grenadier greeted Poirot amiably. Since her brother's death her face had perhaps grown slightly grimmer, her carriage more upright, her general attitude toward life more unyielding. She resented bitterly the slur cast upon her brother's professional name by the findings of the inquest.

Poirot, she had reason to believe, shared her view that the verdict of the coroner's court was untrue. Hence the Grenadier unbent a little.

She answered his questions readily enough and with competence. All Mr. Morley's professional papers had been carefully filed by Miss Nevill and had been handed over by her to Mr. Morley's successor. Some of the patients had transferred themselves to Mr. Reilly, others had accepted the new partner, others again had gone to other dentists elsewhere.

Miss Morley, after she had given what information she could, said:

"So you have found that woman who was Henry's patient—Miss Sainsbury Seale—and she was murdered, too."

The "too" was a little defiant. She stressed the word.

Poirot said, "Your brother never men-said: "That girl was with you in London, was she not?"

"Agnes? Yes, she was house parlor-maid. I let the cook go—she didn't want to come to the country anyway—and Agnes does everything for me. She is turning into quite a nice little cook."

Poirot nodded.

HE KNEW very accurately the domestic arrangements of 58 Queen Charlotte Street. They had been thoroughly gone into at the time of the tragedy. Mr. Morley and his sister had occupied the two top floors of the house as a maisonette. The basement had been shut up altogether, except for a narrow passage leading from the area to the back yard where a wire cage ran up to the top floor with the tradesmen's deliveries and where a speaking tube was installed. Therefore, the only entrance to the house was by the front door, which it was Alfred's business to answer. This had enabled the police to be sure that no outsider could have entered the house on that particular morning.

Both cook and house parlor-maid had been with the Morleys for some years and bore good characters. So, although it was theoretically possible that one or the other of them might have crept down to the second floor and shot her master, tioned Miss Sainsbury Seale particularly to you?"

"No, I don't remember his doing so."

"Do you remember hearing of a Mrs. Chapman amongst your brother's patients?"

"Chapman? No, I don't think so. Miss Nevill is really the person to help you over all this."

"I am anxious to get in touch with her. Where is she now?"

"She has taken a post with a dentist in Ramsgate, I believe."

"She has not married that young man Frank Carter yet?"

"No. I rather hope that will never come off. I don't like that young man, M. Poirot. I really don't. There is something wrong about him. I still feel that he hasn't really any proper moral sense."

Poirot said, "Do you think it is possible that he could have shot your brother?"

Miss Morley said, slowly, "I do feel that he would be capable of it—he has a very uncontrollable temper. But I don't really see that he had any motive—nor opportunity, for that matter. You see, it wasn't as though Henry had succeeded in persuading Gladys to give him up. She was sticking to him in the most faithful way."

"Could he have been bribed, do you think?"

"Bribed? To kill my brother? What an extraordinary idea!"

A nice-looking, dark-haired girl brought in the tea at this moment. Miss Morley's parrot said: "A cup of tea, a nice cup of tea, a nice cup of hot tea," and added, "Ha, ha—to hell with Hitler." As the maid went out again, Poirot the possibility had never been taken seriously into account. Neither of the two had appeared unduly flustered or upset at being questioned, and there certainly seemed no possible reason for connecting either of them with his death.

Nevertheless, as Agnes handed Poirot his hat and stick on leaving, she asked him with an unusually nervous abruptness: "Does—does anyone know anything more about the master's death, sir?"

Poirot turned to look at her. He said: "Nothing fresh has come to light."

"They're still quite sure as he did shoot himself because he'd made a mistake with that drug?"

"Yes. Why do you ask?"

Agnes pleaded her apron. Her face was averted. She said rather indistinctly: "The—the mistress doesn't think so."

"And you agree with her, perhaps?"

"Me? Oh, I don't know nothing, sir. I only—I only wanted to be sure."

Hercule Poirot said in his most gentle voice: "It would be a relief to you to feel beyond any possible doubt that it was suicide?"

"Oh, yes, sir," Agnes agreed quickly. "It would indeed."

"For a special reason, perhaps?"

Her startled eyes met his. She shrank back a little.

"I—I don't know anything about it, sir. I only just asked."

"But why did she ask?" Hercule Poirot demanded of himself as he walked down the path to the gate.

He felt sure that there was an answer to that question. But as yet he could not guess what it was.

All the same, he felt a step nearer.

When Poirot returned to his flat he was surprised to find an unexpected visitor awaiting him.

A bald head was visible above the back of a chair, and the small, neat figure of Mr. Barnes rose.

He had come, he explained, to turn M. Hercule Poirot's visit.

Poirot professed himself delighted to see Mr. Barnes. George was inclined to bring some coffee unless his visitor preferred tea or whisky and soda.

"Coffee will be admirable," said Barnes. "I imagine that your servant prepares it well. Most servants do not."

Presently, Mr. Barnes gave a cough and said:

"I will be frank with you, M. Poirot. It was sheer curiosity that brought me here. You, I imagined, would be posted in all the details of this curious case. I see by the paper that the missing Miss Sainsbury Seale has been found, that an inquest was held and adjourned for further evidence. Cause of death was stated to have been an overdose of medicinal."

"That is quite correct," said Poirot.

There was a pause, and then Barnes said, "Have you ever heard of Chapman, Mr. Barnes?"

"Ah, the husband of the lady in the flat Miss Sainsbury Seale came to see. Rather an elusive person."

"But hardly nonexistent?"

"Oh, no," said Mr. Barnes. "He exists, yes, he exists—or did exist. I heard he was dead. But you can't trust these rumors."

"Who was he, Mr. Barnes?"

"I don't suppose they'll say at the inquest. Not if they can help it. They trot out the armaments firm's story."

"He was in the secret service, was he?"

"Of course he was. But he had no business to tell his wife so—no business at all. In fact, he ought not to have continued in the service after his marriage. It isn't usually done—not, that is, if you're one of the really honest people."

"AND Albert Chapman was?"

"Yes. Q.X.912. That's what he was known as. Using a name is most important. Oh, I don't mean that Q.X.912 is specially important—or anything of the kind. But he was useful because of an insignificant sort of chap—the one whose face isn't easily remembered. He was used a lot as a messenger in down Europe. You know the story. One dignified letter sent to the ambassador in Rumania—one official ditto containing the directions Q.X.912—that is to say: Mr. Chapman."

"Then he knew a lot of useful information?"

"Probably didn't know a thing," said Mr. Barnes cheerfully. "His job was just hopping in and out of trains, boats and airplanes and having the story to explain why he was going he was going!"

"And you heard he was dead?"

"That's what I heard," said Mr. Barnes. "But you can't believe a word I hear. I never do."

Looking at Mr. Barnes intently Poirot asked: "What do you think happened to his wife?"

"I can't imagine," said Mr. Barnes. He looked, wide-eyed, at Poirot.

Poirot said, "I had an idea—"

He said slowly: "It is very curious."

Mr. Barnes murmured sympathetically: "Anything worrying you in particular?"

Hercule Poirot said slowly: "The evidence of my own eyes. . ."

(To be continued next week)

The Bear Looks Over the Mountain

Continued from page 19

We let's go up into the Khyber and the war. You crawl across the north-pins, through the badlands, in the not, dust-layered Frontier Mail, Chaklala and Rawal Pindi and Mellpur and other army posts, tling with guns and trucks and the very of war. You cross the Indus. station is a fort; every bridge is house-protected. The cantonments are ringed and here and there old ig gun-nests make little bumps on n. The hilltops have monuments n—monuments to forty men of iment, twenty-seven men of that on, fallen in some long-forgotten with the hillmen.

Better Stick to the Roads

owshera you cross the frontier. ig, bearded Sikh infantrymen reg the station fort have their sained to them. A rifle is worth cross the border; without the rt was too easy for a Pathan to a Sikh, twist his gun from him, away like a shadow.

w miles farther on is the old city Peshawar, an important point on the caravan trail down through the re the city towers the old fort, s King's Own Regiment, ready to at the drop of a hat. Peshawar, a sun-baked town of narrow alleys, cluttered bazaars, is ringed with wire, entered only through heav-guarded gates. At night, no white ay stay in the city. Through it occasional hillmen, guns slung on eying with interest the trim uniformed British Tommies. In re there is war, grim and deadly. re there is armed truce.

past Peshawar is the cantonment, ned camp, also wire-guarded. o, march its dusty streets. You roll ond in a car, through the heavily d gates, and ahead rise the brown f death. A few miles over the ind you come to Jamrud Fort and rewire barricades. Beyond the bar- ere are two roads—one for cars, her, winding along parallel, is for trains, herds of goats, foot soldiers. y had better stick to the car road, ny people tell you. That is all the ia Empire can make safe. If you a feet off the highway you are in tribal territory. If you get pot-shotted, or kidnaped, there is nothing much anyone can do about it. If you are important enough the British government may enter into solemn negotiations with a tribal malik about your case. And maybe not.

Along with the highways runs the railroad, hacked and blasted and tunneled through solid rock. It cost nearly two million dollars—and a hundred lives—for each of its twenty-five miles from Jamrud to Landikhana, a few rods from the Afghan frontier. Its few stations are rock forts; every foot of it is patrolled by riflemen—for steel is worth its weight in silver in the hills.

Off the road, in Tribal Territory, are Afridi and Shinwari villages. Every few miles is a graveyard—filled with the bodies of those who were a little slow on the trigger. Natural death is a curiosity in these hills, where every mud and rock house is a loopholed fort, and where feuds linger on and rifles crack in endless fighting. Here and there the British have won a few square yards atop a ridge to plant a machine-gun emplacement and to establish a relay station for flag-signaling down to Peshawar if the hillmen cut the phone lines.

The road loops and twists upward through the pass. Sometimes the towering rocks come down and the ravine narrows to a few yards; elsewhere it widens out. You come to the army camp at Landikotal, with the little Gurkhas rattling away at machine-gun practice and the big Punjabis snapping to salute as the car goes by. The Tommies are there, too, bringing the usual home touch: At an intersection a sign says: Whitehall-Victoria Street.

Ancient Land of Battle

The road winds upward and you come to the top of the pass. There is a fort there, and more wire and a barrier guarded by khasadars. Far below, a spot of green marks the frontier camp. Beyond, lifting up in range after range of dun hills, is Afghanistan, and far in the northern sky are the snow peaks of the main range. You roll down the hill, around the corners, past the rock-hewn memorials to half-forgotten Indian and British regiments that have held the pass, and come to a pipe gate across the road, and a notice board.

This is the famous frontier—and it is an anticlimax. There are no complicated fortifications—just a tumble-down barbed-wire fence and a pipe gate that swings up and down. On the Indian side lounges a tribal guard. His rifle leans against a rock. You pick it up and look at it and he grins broadly. Across the line, on a small flat beside a tin hut, a ragtag and bobtail Afghan soldier, bayonet fixed to his old rifle, ambles about in worn shoes. If you go too near the wire, he aims the gun at you.

Atop a hill near by is the last British fort. It looks down on the road through which Alexander's mounted bowmen came 2,277 years ago, a few short years before the Boy Conqueror died at Babylon sighing for the lack of opportunity. It looks down on the road up which British soldiers have marched to victory—and massacre—in Kabul, the Afghan capital. It looks across the other ridges, topped by the remnants of forts and walls so old that Alexander thought them ancient.

The modest notice board by the roadside says this is the Frontier of India. If you drive on, you twist and climb over a rough track, through Afghanistan, up past Jalalabad and Kabul, five hundred

CALOX MOVIE QUIZ
NO.10

His Famous CALOX SMILE thrills millions in "A Date with Destiny"

... a new Paramount Picture

WHO IS HE?

CLUES by Sheilah Graham
Hollywood Movie Reporter

1. What splendid English actor just celebrated his thirteenth wedding anniversary?
2. Who played Sherlock Holmes in "The Hound of the Baskervilles"?
3. Like Bing Crosby and Cary Grant, he uses Calox, too. Who is he?

(Check your answer below. Star's name is at bottom of page)

TRY THIS FINGER-NAIL TEST
—PROVE CALOX
POLISHES
SAFELY

A STUNNING SMILE... haven't you often wished for one? Then take a tip from the movie stars. Discover, as many of them already have, how Calox Tooth Powder helps to reveal the natural lustre of your teeth!

Prove this by pouring a little Calox on a nail buffer and rubbing your finger nails vigorously. Now look at their high polish. Proof that Calox CLEANS—without harming the softest tooth enamel! For Calox Tooth Powder contains not only 1 or 2, but 5 CLEANSING AGENTS that attack ugly film and surface stain. Brush your teeth with Calox for 30 DAYS. Get that "Hollywood Sparkle"!

CALOX TOOTH POWDER

Try Calox Antiseptic—Refreshes
the mouth, sweetens the breath

*Basil Rathbone

Now Marie thanks that
"HOLLYWOOD SPARKLE"!

1. Marie: "Hollywood at last! When are we seeing the sights, Uncle Harry?"
Uncle: "Starting right now... come on. I'll show you how a picture is made."

2. Marie: "Gosh but she's beautiful. And her smile... it puts mine to shame!"
Uncle: "Ah, my dear, that's the 'Hollywood Sparkle.' And the secret is Calox, the tooth powder with 5 cleansing agents. Why don't you try it, Marie?"

3. Bill: "Sa-a-y... take a look at Marie. Her Hollywood vacation sure has helped her smile!"
Jack: "Sure has! And did you notice how attentive her old beau, Dick, is?"

Helps your "Teeth shine like the stars" by bringing out natural lustre

THE TRUTH about Detroit's War Orders

NEXT WEEK'S COLLIER'S

Detroit's Defense Headache

By Walter Davenport

jarring miles to the Oxus—and Russia. We'll look at the northern border in a minute.

Afghanistan still is a primitive jumble of mountains, growing higher as they march northward. It is an autocracy, bone-dry because its people are Moslems, camera-shy, barely tolerating strangers. It has a conscript army, rigged out and armed with the castoffs of a dozen nations; its soldiers get a few dollars a year—if they get paid. The country boasts forty-six planes of varying types and has a small air force trained by an ex-Royal Air Force pilot. The RAF man says the Afghan boys are good fliers, and brave, their only weakness being a firm belief that you can train an airplane like a horse and that it will fly itself after a few lessons.

Afghanistan has a king with a solid chromium car, and a sort of newspaper—Islah—which means Improvement. The newspaper never carries any news except social items and so most Afghans know nothing of the bitter, hidden battle of three nations to control their country.

The British have always hankered to control Afghanistan as a sort of buffer state against Russia. They started back in 1838, sending in an army and establish Shah Shiya as king, hedged around by British bayonets. This move ended in disaster, with 16,000 British troops massacred. Punitive expeditions followed and the place was more or less a war zone for decades.

The Russians Are Busy

During the World War the British made a great many promises to the Moslems, and afterward these promises were broken. In 1919, the Afghans went on the warpath, invaded India and, after some battling, won nominal independence. Then Russia started to intrigue—hampered by her antireligious policy. This policy today is the British hope for Afghan neutrality, or even hostility to the Soviets.

On the north, or Russian side of the Oxus, the country is lower than on the Afghan side. Thus, Afghan forts look down on Russian ones across the river. There are no bridges. Most of the crude ferries are run by Russians. From their troop concentration points north of the border, the Russians are busily building half a dozen roads to the river. There are plenty of Russian troops up there, well equipped with artillery and transport—and bombers.

British agents have had an eye on those Russian airfields and bombers for some time—but they are not much worried about them. They have done their own spot of bombing in the hills and know how futile it can be.

To bomb any Indian cities, the RAF boys tell you, the Russian planes would have to fly a thousand miles—and another thousand home. They don't make bombers with that range—yet. As for bombing the passes—well, the Russians can try that forever and a day. And there is nothing better British pilots would like than to see a Russian army trying to get through the Khyber or the Kohat or any of the other passes. It would just be a slaughter.

The British in the frontier country and in Delhi and in every army camp say that invasion from the north is impossible. But the fact is that India has been invaded through these passes for centuries. Army after army has battled a way through, against all the defenses the wit of the hillmen could contrive. Maybe things are different now; maybe defensive weapons are far in advance of offensive machines—but no one will know, until the trial comes.

That Russia would seriously try to take India the British do not believe. They fear, though, that she may try to create a diversion for Hitler's benefit.

Any Russian drive south through Afghanistan would force the British to rush troops, guns and planes up into the passes over the single rail line from Karachi. They might easily need a quarter of a million men for defense—at a time when every man is vitally necessary in Europe and every plane sent to the frontier fields is one less against the Germans.

Just what is going on along the Oxus is hard to find out. In Peshawar the bazaar rumors float around, correspondents file stories and military censorship blots them out. In the bazaar you hear of a score of masons, sent north to build a fort on an Afghan hill near Imam Sahib, overlooking the river. Relatives of some of them, you hear, have been told some of the masons will not come back. The Russians bombed the fort to rubble and dust ere it was built. You ask the tired, dusty British agent in Peshawar, just in from the north—and he smiles and says how about a drink; you can't get a drink, up there.

The British bomb the hill villages in Waziristan—and the fliers hate it. It is mud and rock village beside the road. If you can get a pass to go inside the walls you will find there a complete rifle factory, operating right under the nose of the British army. When you ask how this can be, the big black-haired Afridi who shows you around will grin and say, well, if the British want us to fight against them and help train their army for war, they must allow us guns and shells. And beside, the tribesmen have joined forces before and gone raiding down onto the plains—slaying, burning and looting. And they can do it again.

Frontier Diversions

Inside the gun factory are piles of stolen iron and steel—old car parts, steel bars, rusty odds and ends of metal. There is no power in the place. Everything is done by hand. It takes a dozen workmen three days to make a rifle—not a good rifle, but one that will take the standard British ammunition, and last for a few score shots until the shallow rifling wears away.

Only a few years ago, when the pass

there is no quarter in hill warfare. If you are a luckless trader and captured your relatives will shatter a demand for so many thousands of rupees. If the cash is not forthcoming, your friends quite likely will get a new age containing an ear, with the left on for identification purposes. This doesn't work, other parts of the body are taken. Some luckless kidnapes, who are particularly popular with their relatives, are considerably whittled down before they're released.

Kidnaped people, too, are a currency in the hills and sold around among the various tribes. The British don't interfere much—it's an old tribal custom.

But the Northwest border is the only one across which India may be invaded. Far to the westward lie the plateaus, intrigue goes on. Recently the New Dalai Lama, a bewildered figure, installed with ceremonies in the Potala at Lhasa. Both British and Chinese showered him with gifts—gold and rich embroidery, tame birds, priceless jade, silver and lacquer. Russians, too, sent down their gifts and with them soft-spoken messages around among the villages, talking the wonders of Communism.

Proving It Can Be Done

In India they say invasion across the Himalayas and Tibet is impossible. It has been done. In 1904, when the Russian army started into Tibet, the British beat them to it and got up from the south side, over the 15,000-foot passes, to Lhasa. In 1910 a Chinese general, Chao Erh-feng, took a route up from Sinkiang, with horses and artillery, over tremendous, almost trackless passes, in midwinter. He captured Lhasa and held it and the roundabout until 1919, keeping communication open. Then he went back into western China.

So it has been proved that peace on both sides can be forced, despite the cold and icy winds and breathing precipices. In Tibet, on top of the world, the plots twist and thicken and dissolve—for here, too, Russia may force a diversion and hold British troops from the battlefields of Europe.

Up in the Kohat, on the road from an army base up to Bannu, the old mules are plodding along through the heat haze with the little 2.75 mule guns—one gun to four mules, no spare mule to take care of the cauldrons and the little five-foot Gurkha soldiers through the silences. The tribes have sent down a challenge, often do—and there will be blood. The baking rocks before the soldiers down across the Hindu Kush. Gurkhas and the Wazirs and the Afghans and the Shinwari know nothing of international politics—the pulling and hauling, the bribery and promises. German propaganda leaflets flood the Afghanistan cities, the soft-spoken Russians, talking, talking, talking south of the Oxus.

Up there, in the bloody corner where the great ranges join, the war, the war, the war that was history. Tamerlane and Genghis Khan and young Alexander came marching on.

Tommy Atkins marches as along the tree-lined Grand Trunk Road and up into the dusty, death hills. If them perishin' Roosians come, let 'em try coming down the blinkin' Khyber. Tommy, a phlegmatic soul, goes swinging along, packing back, rifle at the slope, singing the Barrel Polka and the one that has the last line: "Oh, ain't it grand to be well dead!"

Especially the last one.

"We have a date. I hope he gets knocked out of the box early"

BARBARA SHERMUND

is what the army chiefs, down at the base camps, call punitive—retribution for sudden raids and night attacks.

Because they are built from rocks on hillsides, and because half the people live in caves, it is hard to spot objectives and harder to hit them, even with the low flying that is possible because the tribes have no defense, except home-made rifles.

The bombs fall, crashing and booming through the hills. A heap of rubble marks the site of the village. Every poor possession of the hill people is destroyed. And in a waterless country, where food is scarce, this may mean slow death from hunger—and thirst.

The British claim that bombing is the only way to subdue the tribes, so that more roads may be hacked through the mountains and new airdromes laid out in the few high valleys—against the time the Russians come down. To accomplish these things, besides the bombing there is bribery, and propaganda—and in some cases strange compliance with tribal doings.

Up in Kohat pass, only a few miles from the armed camp at Peshawar, you will hear hammers ringing on anvils in was not as well guarded as it is now, it was a favorite diversion of the hillmen to stop cars, strip the occupants of everything and turn them loose—and then melt down the cars for rifles. Now they steal metal anywhere they can find it—or buy it with silver rupees.

They make the rupees, too, in half a dozen counterfeiting plants in the grimy bazaars of Peshawar. Half the silver currency along the frontier is phony and no transaction is ever made until each separate coin is rung and rung again against the rock. Thirty rupees will buy an Afridi-made rifle in the Kohat—but production is so slow and the demand so great that elsewhere, traditionally, a British rifle is worth its weight in silver. Rifle shells, along the border, cost thirty cents each—and are seldom wasted.

When they are not battling the soldiery, the tribesmen go in for a spot of kidnaping as a revenue-getter. The British army has a story that the ransom for a British officer is 20,000 rupees—about $6,000—and that the government will pay it and then take it out of the officer's pay.

But soldiers are seldom kidnaped, because they are all blood enemies and there were no witnesses. It was against mine. And they don't do much of him at the office. I with a reprimand, which was the thing as an acquittal."

Friend of the Warden

Continued from page 13

Levy stared down the corridor for a moment. "Clovis himself looks to me like he takes dope."

"Lies," George Burns said. "We're all junkies. But I never talk about superiors. At least not much. Besides, he might have me transferred to a different place and onto a night shift, and that would kick hell out of my schedule at law school."

"I've been meeting a blonde regular in the lobby," Dr. Levy said. "She's the wife of someone. I don't know the medical school I used to fancy as a cynic. But this place goes to my head. It's the screwiest setup I've ever seen."

"That's what they call us," George murmured, looking at his book. "Keepers are called screws and the screw driver is the screw driver. Ask me."

"Neither one of us is going to be here much longer," Dr. Levy said, looking at the Lord. "I'm going into private practice and you'll be in law. But I'm glad to have these few months of my income here."

"A few months here is enough," George said to the doctor's retreating back. "I've been here a full year."

EGAN to read again. The light, the steps now coming toward him in the hall were Mrs. Bracey's, he looked up. She was a pleasant-looking woman, verging on middle age, who had lost the death of her husband had retired from her profession of nursing to raise her two children. She had a colorless face that had once been bright and the hard, drawn look which the older employees of the hospital acquired, had, on her face, become one of sorrow and great

"Quiet tonight, isn't it, George?"

"I didn't notice, Mrs. Bracey," he said, getting up to unlock the door into the prison ward. "Want me to go in with you?"

"Don't bother," she said. "Go ahead and study. They'll be asleep, Langer, I hope. I just have to take temperatures and give that boy a shot in an injection. I'll be out in a few minutes."

George was out in not much more than a minute, paler than usual and shaken. He looked at her without getting up. "Again?"

Mrs. Bracey nodded, biting her lip. She got up and put the book down. "It's a dirty place," Mrs. Bracey said. "I didn't come to work here knowing it was that. But I've heard anyone say the things to me that a man says."

Before George could speak, Mrs. Bracey had walked away so that he could not see the tears that came unwillingly down her face. George drew a deep breath and blew it slowly out, trying to think the thing out. If he spoke to Langer, there was no telling what would happen. Langer had hit guards before now. If he hit Langer in return, Clovis wouldn't discipline Langer, George knew. He would discipline George.

ON THE other hand, George Burns recognized that certain sensibilities had been definitely blunted in the four years he had worked in the prisons. If he allowed what had happened to Mrs. Bracey to pass without any sort of word or gesture on his part, George realized that it would be just one more contribution to the blunting of those sensibilities.

Joe Foley came along the hall and George unstrapped the gun belt from his own waist and handed it to Joe.

"What are you going in for?" Joe said.

"Langer's been getting nasty with Mrs. Bracey."

"Let me go in," Joe said. "I'll take that ape apart."

"Sure, and get yourself suspended indefinitely on Clovis' recommendation." George unlocked the door of the prison ward again and stepped inside. It was a great, bare room, lit up by two dim lights. All but two of the sixteen beds were occupied, most of the prisoners asleep, but two or three followed George with their eyes as he approached the narrow bed on which Langer lay, propped up comfortably on pillows. Langer was a man of indeterminate age. His hair was white but his face seemed young, although hollowed and lined. The mouth was thin but prominent and his eyes were deep-set and seemed at times to burn.

He had been arrested and charged in his time with almost every known felony and had been convicted six times. He was the most hated con in prison; hated by both prisoners and keepers alike.

Watching George Burns come toward him now, Langer even sneered a little: "What the hell do you want, screw?"

"I've come in to tell you that if you bother Mrs. Bracey again, I'm going to report you."

"You wouldn't have the guts to," Langer said.

"And if that doesn't work we'll have charges brought against you."

"You'll get fat doing that," Langer said. "I've beaten tougher raps than that a dozen times." His voice dropped. "Listen, smart guy, why don't you get wise to yourself? You know I got connections and I can break you or any other screw. Now, get to hell out of here."

Anger, George Burns suddenly discovered, he had not known in a long time. He was unprepared for it now and had raised a hand as though to cuff Langer with the back of it. He caught himself, but Langer had seen the upraised hand and came up out of the bed, almost snarling. With his elbow George broke apart the hands aimed at his throat and swung his right fist at Langer. The convict went inside the swing and the two men grappled in silent rage.

Langer's wiry strength surprised George. If he was going to whip Langer it would take a while, George knew. There would be noise and confusion and possibly an attempt on the part of other prisoners to escape. He found that he

A Good Kind of Garden to Cultivate

There's one thing you'll like about America's new kind of beer gardens and taverns—you can see instantly that they are clean, decent, inviting places worthy of your patronage.

They sell good beer—refreshing, appetizing, wholesome—the beverage of moderation.

Most of today's beer retail establishments are like this. The Brewing Industry wants to make sure that all beer taverns are.

To protect your right to drink good beer, we have instituted a "clean-up or close-up" program to cooperate with law enforcement officers in removing anti-social influences from the retail sale of beer. This program is now in effect in some States. It is being extended.

We think you ought to know about it. May we tell you—in an interesting free booklet? Write: United Brewers Industrial Foundation, Dept. B17, 21 E. 40th Street, New York.

BEER... a beverage of moderation

would have liked to fight and whip Langer, although he had tried to divorce himself from any liking for violence since he had come to work in the prisons.

But that kind of fight would take too long. The strong, wiry fingers worked toward his own throat. George reached back, slipping the blackjack from his pocket. His fingers twined in the cord and he half struck, half drew it across the base of Langer's skull. It was an expert blow, designed to render a man unconscious without doing any serious injury or leaving a mark.

Langer sagged, George catching him and easing him onto the bed. George pulled out two pillows and put Langer's head on the third, covering him with the sheet and blanket. Langer breathed easily as in sleep. Leaving the ward, George felt the eyes of the other prisoners on him. He had been friendly, without any great effort on his part, with most of the prisoners he knew. Now, their eyes made him feel uncomfortable.

"I had to tap him," he told Joe.

"I hope you made it good," Joe said.

George shook his head vaguely. Joe saw he didn't want to talk about it.

The sounds of morning had begun in the corridors. George was suddenly tired. Joe said: "You should maybe've thought what Clovis could do before you busted Langer."

"I got tired of thinking of it," George said.

Dr. Jacob Levy came jauntily down the corridor, fresh and immaculate, attended by an orderly and two young and pretty nurses. "Good morning, gentlemen," he said. "Good morning. You both look as though the night had been long and weary."

"JUST routine stuff," Joe said. "But George had to nudge your friend Langer."

"Not gently, I trust, not gently," Dr. Levy said. "And you a lawyer." He clucked in mock sympathy.

"Not too gently," George said. "I wish you'd look at him. I don't think he's hurt much but look at him for luck."

"Presently," Dr. Levy said, "presently. There's a little matter of a suspected volvulus down the hall, and beyond that a touch of peritonitis. After I attend to these trivia, I shall see to your friend."

"He's a daisy, all right," Joe said, watching the dapper little figure move briskly away.

George sat down heavily, his face in his hands.

"Go down and get some coffee," Joe said, "before you have me feeling like you do. I'll be with you as soon as the morning-shift boys come on."

"I hope Jake looks at Langer before Clovis comes in."

"You should've thought of that before," Joe said.

In the refectory, the food was more tasteless than ever to George. Joe Foley came down at eight and ordered a hearty meal. "Clovis came in on time with the morning shift," he said.

"What did he say?"

"I didn't wait to find out."

George sat there out of sheer weariness until a quarter to nine, when it was time to change his clothes and leave for his first class uptown at nine-thirty. He had just stood up when Dr. Levy came into the room. The doctor was quite grave and motioned George to sit down again.

"We're having a time upstairs," Dr. Levy said, "and I think you'd better know about it, George. Langer knocked my orderly unconscious with a chair, broke a nurse's wrist and tried to get hold of my scalpel. Strangely enough, he's not a madman, at least not in the accepted sense. But by virtue of the strange setup, or influence he has in the prisons, he's become used to a freedom

—so to speak—in prison which he can't enjoy as fully even outside. It involves a number of psychological twists. I won't bother going into now.

"I can't put him in a strait jacket without a psychiatric prescription, and psychiatrists have already refused to accept Langer as psychotic. I've ordered 'restraints,' so-called, in the form of muslin strips, tied about him and anchored to the bed, but Clovis has countermanded this order. The delegation of authority in the prison ward is something that has never been cleared up. Langer has gotten away with this and worse in the past, so I have no illusions as to what I'm up against."

"If it's us for witnesses you want," Joe said, "we've got plenty. If we only get told that Clovis can't crack down on us."

Dr. Levy went on: "Clovis says I can't put 'restraints' on Langer because Langer is no longer violent. And that's true. When Clovis went in and spoke to Langer alone, Langer became quiet. Now, Clovis says that Langer is no

George hesitated but obeyed.

"Now go down and get the car warmed up," Clovis said.

The prisoners' entrance to the hospital opened on a narrow yard just big enough for one car to turn in. Waiting in the car, with the motor running, George saw a cheap coupé drive up and a flashily dressed blonde get out. He couldn't see where she went, but her face seemed familiar.

The car George was in was a black sedan, undistinguished except by a single heavy bracket fixed in either side of the rear seat to which a prisoner could be handcuffed in the event an emergency ever made it necessary to move a prisoner with only one guard, and that one driving.

Clovis and Langer came out and got into the back seat of the car. George Burns noticed how lonely and isolated the prisoners' entrance was . . . how no one had been there to see them get into the car. It was too late to do anything about it now, without laying himself get into the cheap coupé driven by blonde George had seen at the hospital. The car swung around and headed toward the hospital. George turned to Langer. The handcuffs hadn't locked, George saw, but it was too late to do anything about it. George looking into the muzzle of his own special.

"All right," Langer said, "go screw."

George got out of the car. He thought that this was the way it feels to and tried to pray.

"Now get in the back of the car," Langer said.

George wondered whether he would be killed or just handcuffed in the back of the car, to be found that way, prisoner escaped. The weariness was strong in him and he could believe for a moment that it was a bad dream. The dream, even, Langer seemed to sway, his eyes to dilate and close naturally.

George was in the back of the car and Langer tossed him the handcuffs. "Snap them on, screw. If you don't, I'll snap them on you," Langer warned. Langer hesitated and the rage came in slowly to Langer's face. The guard's hand snapped up to point at George. Only then did George realize he had dropped. . . . "Quick," Langer said, the snarl in his voice was slow and though forced. . . .

ANGER and self-pity worried George. His heels had hooked under the lower edge of the doorway, and suddenly he had launched himself at Langer. He saw again, the sense of uneasiness strong in him, that Langer's guard had dropped and Langer himself was as though wilting. When George pressed with his shoulder it was like hitting an empty sack.

Langer lay unconscious under George. George got up and stared at him. He braked to a stop near by and tried to grab for the gun and duck behind his own car, all in one motion. Levy and Joe Foley got out of Langer's car. George stood up.

"Very nice indeed," Dr. Levy said, "even though I have to disillusion you. You probably think you're a tough and theoretically you are. But actually it was I and not you who did the work of our friend here."

"You're drunk, Jake," George said. "Or else the life at the ward finally gotten you."

"It's just the way he talks, Corbin," Joe Foley said. "He didn't like any of things this morning and just before he put some knockout drops in Langer's coffee."

"Then," Dr. Levy took up, "opened to be going through the lobby, I noticed Clovis' blond friend. In any way, George, did you notice the facial resemblance between Langer and Langer; probably brother and sister. Anyway, when she started to follow people in her car, I summoned her here and we followed, he drove working my trusty 16-millimeter camera so that we have a fairly complete record of all things that happened."

"Well," George said. "Well—"

"We couldn't summon the photographer," Dr. Levy said, "as he had turned out so that we'd look for him."

"Well, I'm going to take this trial," George said, indicating "where I started out for."

"And then," Dr. Levy said, "all going to go over to the prisoner's office and we will have newspapermen with us and a developing outfit and I'm sure the commissioner will see us. And if the commissioner doesn't see us, the mayor I think your good friends, Mr. Burns and Mr. Langer, are going to give you a nice long rest."

longer ill and that he can be transferred back to Central, which he intends to have done right away."

A guard off the morning shift came in and told George that Clovis wanted to see him. The others at the table were silent as George got up and followed the other guard out. Upstairs, Clovis was seated at a desk in his office near the prison ward. He was a man going on to fifty with pale eyes and an expressionless face, round and cruel.

"Stand at attention," he said when George came into the room. George didn't speak. "You're ordered to report for emergency duty to aid in the transportation of a prisoner to Central. Be ready in this office in five minutes. That's all."

When George returned, Langer was in the office with Clovis. They were alone there. Ostentatiously, Clovis handcuffed Langer to himself. Langer was dressed in well-tailored civilian clothes and a Homburg hat. His face was actually composed, as was Clovis', so that George Burns, the weariness working in him, could think briefly that it was himself who was the prisoner. . . .

"Leave your gun here," Clovis said. "I'll take mine."

open to charges of insubordination. He started the car.

Central Prison lay on an island in the bay and could be reached only by a ferry. The ferry was reached by a single road that led through ugly, stinking meadows and blocks of abandoned factories.

Coming into this part of the drive as they left the city proper, Clovis tapped George on the shoulder and spoke for the first time since they had started: "Stop the car."

George braked it easily to a stop. Two huge factories were on either side, their windows boarded up. Clovis got out of the car.

"What's the matter?" George said.

"Oh, I just thought of something. I have to go back to the office." It was the nearest approach to a smile George had ever seen on Clovis' face. "A friend is going to drive me back. You take Al here in alone."

"Listen—" George said.

"What?" Clovis said.

George paused. Despite his feeling of foreboding, there was still nothing wrong that could be seen. Langer was handcuffed to the bracket on the right. George watched Clovis leave him and

No Summer Love

Continued from page 10

"Andrews? She works somewhere
h hotel."
H?" said Mike. "She works in the ce
Q"
He looked up and he was grinning.
ing the stalleroo? I heard she wou."
Hard?"
Se," said Mike, enjoying himself.
matter of fact, she mentioned it
She said you were a nice guy."
He was watching him and he was inning. "Why don't you call her Wandering around asking quesever did anybody any good."
He was smiling himself. "Maybe he said. "Don't bet against it."

voice was pleasant but cool over the phone and for a moment he thought he could make it stick. "I haven't seen you and I wanted to. I wondered if you could have dinner with me," he hesitated. "I'm afraid that—" "You don't need to worry," he said. "I received a swell letter of recommendation from my congressman. With a rubber stamp signature and everything." "I laughed then. 'I'd never have the nerve to turn down a congressman,'" he said. "If you'll bring the letter we'll be able to make it tonight."

"This is the third year I've been in Bristol," Duke said. "It's odd I haven't met you before."

Her slender shoulders lifted and fell. "It's nothing so odd about that. I've only brought me out from Chicago once in my life."

"I've worked for the chain that runs the Bristol for the last four years, since she graduated from a small college back in Illinois. While it wasn't glamorous work, neither was it boring, and I liked it."

He shook his head. "I don't get it," he said. "It's no sales talk when I tell you're pretty. Your mirror tells me the same thing. So what do you want to work for?"

For a moment she was silent. "You should just sit back and wait for a nice man to come along and marry you," she said.

He could feel her amusement and it made him frown. "Not that," he said, "just the same—"

saw that he was in earnest and banter slipped from her voice. "I job," she said quietly. "There are of things I want and it's the only can get them and still be inde- bit, Duke. I wouldn't want a free I don't want any strings on me didn't put there myself." your life," he said, picking up the He was a little too terse and it her wonder then how much of the gr-boy business was real and how of it came from the league he ed in.

crowd came in just as they were
g. They had been laughing and was a sudden, awkward silence they saw Duke and the girl. Edie glanced at Pam and then Duke
the introductions.
When they left the tearoom, a mo-later, it was too early to go back to otel so they settled on a theater.
ouble feature was over by eleven they walked back up the hill to the el, munching the popcorn they had t at a little stand. It was a fine, night and, above, the moon was a g crescent and the clouds a ceiling.
was the girl walking beside him and the pleasant tang of the firs and pines drifting down from the slopes Duke glanced at her, thinking that it had been a quiet evening but a nice one.

It was pleasant watching her go down the corridor to her room, a step or so ahead of him. She had a proud carriage, shoulders that were held well back and swinging smoothly with her stride. When she bent to put the key in the lock the faint reflections of the light caught her hair, leaving it warm and burnished. She opened the door and he stood there, hoping she would ask him in and knowing that she wouldn't.

She smiled, holding out her hand. "Good night, Duke. It's been fun."

It had. Too much to leave it that way, wanting to kiss her and doing nothing about it.

"Gerry.

The clear eyes lifted to his and his arms went around her. For a moment her body was soft and responsive against his own and the response was in her lips, too. Then she was pushing him away.

"I don't play any little games, Duke," she said unsteadily. "I wouldn't want to be just another person you met at some summer resort. I—I think I'd better go in now."

PAM was already at the pool when he came down the next morning. It was still too early for the rest of the crowd and she was alone on the sand.

"You're up with the birds," he said. "Waiting for somebody?"

She nodded, one hand shielding her eyes against the sun. "Just you, Mr. Wayne." She looked at him and her voice was too quiet. "We haven't had much time together, Duke. Even less than usual."

"I'm sorry, Pam," he said slowly. "That's the way things break sometimes."

She rolled over so she was facing him. "Duke," she said wistfully, "do you know what we ought to do? Tommy Farrell has a place at Jackson Hole and he wants us all to come up there for a week or so. There would be just our own crowd and we'd have a lot of fun."

"We didn't say anything."
"We could drive up next week," she said eagerly. "How does it sound to you, Duke?"

He couldn't brush off that eagerness in her voice without hurting her. "It sounds all right," he said finally. "We'll see what gives."

Nothing went right that day. Once a girl got under your skin there wasn't much you could do about it. When he did go in the pool, his timing was away off. It stayed that way, too. He was always with Pam and the crowd and none of it made much fun.

And then one morning a letter was under his door.

His brows came together in a dark, puzzled line as he read it. He read it again and it still said the same thing. It was a statement from the hotel for one week at sixteen dollars a day. There was a polite memorandum from the credit office that they would appreciate a check for that amount.

"A hundred and twelve dollars!" he said softly. "They must be crazy!"

He went over and pulled on his sweater. It was a mistake, of course, but it would be better to go down and straighten it out personally. The girl in the outer office sent in his name. The door of the credit office opened and a girl was standing here.

It was Gerry.
"Hello, Duke," she said quietly.
"Won't you come in?"

“Whose Vacation Is This, Anyway?”

CAMPING out is fun—if it doesn't last too long. We speak of "roughing it" and brag about the hardships entailed. But only a few years ago it wasn't considered a hardship to live this way. For most people, it was the only way they had to live.

The tin washtub, for instance. It did duty Monday mornings and Saturday nights, and the water was heated in the reservoir at the back of the wood-burning range. Splitting the wood was good exercise—but it was no fun to get up in the middle of cold nights to keep the fire going. And the feeble kerosene lamps, though an improvement over candles, had to be continually cleaned and filled.

Sometimes we have to "rough it" to realize the improvements time has brought—many of them through electricity. Not only electric lights, and automatic heat, and electric appliances to make housekeeping easier, but also automobiles, better roads, better coats and dresses.

Wherever electricity has been put to work in industry, it has brought us better-quality and lower-cost products. And because General Electric scientists, engineers, and workmen are finding still more ways to make electricity useful, we can look forward to still greater improvements in America's standard of living through the continued creation of More Goods for More People at Less Cost.

G-E research and engineering have saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar they have earned for General Electric

GENERAL ELECTRIC

NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR—SEE THE G-E "HOUSE OF MAGIC"—SAN FRANCISCO EXPOSITION

Want This Useful Juice Extractor

HOW SIMPLE IT IS TO EARN ONE

Sell only two 1-year COLLIER'S subscriptions to persons living outside your home. Then pin subscribers' names and addresses to the coupon on the right with check or money order for $4.00.

*Independent Agency Division, Desk C-35
The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company
Springfield, Ohio*

I have sold these subscriptions at the regular price and am remitting in full. Please send the Juicer to—

Name .....

Address .....

Town.....

State .....

"We saved money—through the Classified"

"That's a reasonable price for a good job."

"I'm glad we looked in the Classified..."

"and got estimates from three firms."

When you need work done, the "yellow" pages of your telephone directory put you in touch quickly with several firms. Then you can compare estimates and choose the one best suited to your requirements.

This is just one of the many ways in which the Classified can help you get what you want when you want it.

Look it up
in the Classified

When the door closed behind them he shook his head as she indicated a chair. "No, thanks, Gerry," he said, trying to keep it casual. "I sort of got my signals crossed. They sent up a bill this morning and I should have had sense enough to give it to Bob Appleby."

She made herself look at him. "Bob Appleby hasn't been here for three months, Duke. He was overdoing that promotion business and they had to let him go. That's why they sent up that bill this morning."

IT WAS so completely unexpected that if it had been anyone but Gerry he would have thought it was a gag. He hadn't seen Bob around but that hadn't meant anything. Publicity men sometimes let things ride until the last minute. A couple times he had meant to drop in and find out when Bob wanted to grab some pictures but each time something had come up. But you couldn't tell Gerry that. It would sound like any other dead beat's alibi.

"I see," he said slowly. "I'd taken it for granted he was still here."

Her eyes wondered how often he had just taken such things for granted. His chin lifted but it didn't help much. It was hard going, standing there with a bill in his hand for a hundred and twelve dollars that he didn't have.

"You needn't pay it now, Duke," she said. "If it would be more convenient, you can sign for it; send it to us later."

He shook his head.

"I can't sign for it," he said wearily. "I might never be able to pay it, Gerry. You'll have to let me work it out."

She looked up quickly and some of that disappointment went out of her.

"Work it out?" she said. "How, Duke? By giving lessons?"

"I can't do that. You can't make an out-and-out deal for your services without turning professional." No matter how he said it, it was as if he was trying to eat his cake and have it, too. "I can give an exhibition, though," he said. "The brass hats will okay something like that."

Maybe, Gerry thought, a championship and the fun that went with it were like so many things you wanted too much. When you finally had it, it owned you.

"All right, Duke," she said. "The manager's been talking about some kind of a water carnival and I'll take it up with him."

He was just leaving the desk the next afternoon when Pam stopped him. She was upset and obviously trying to conceal it.

"Duke," she said, "I want to show you something."

It was a placard that had been set up at the end of the lobby. The Bristol was happy to announce that a Water Carnival would be staged on Friday evening. There would be dancing beside the pool, and as a special attraction Mr. Duke Wayne, the Olympic champion, would appear in an exhibition race.

He glanced at her. "What about it?"

"What about it?" she repeated, and her voice was no longer so cool and self-contained. "How do you think that makes me feel, Duke? You know we're leaving tomorrow for Jackson Hole. You've known it for a week!"

She was right, he thought wearily. He had forgotten all about it.

"I'm sorry, Pam," he said, "but I guess I'll have to skip it."

"Just to stay here for that silly exhibition?" she demanded. Her voice was getting away from her. "Or is it something else? Fun's fun, Duke, but—"

"Wait a minute," he said, trying to hold back the sudden anger that was surging in himself. "Do you want to know why I'm staying, Pam? I'll tell you. I owe this hotel a bill I couldn't pay. This is my way of working it off."

She stared at him, and after a moment a faint color crept into her face.

"Oh," she said, "I—I thought maybe it was that girl."

"Gerry fixed it for me," he said wearily. "If it hadn't been for her—"

Pam was watching his face. "I see." She hesitated, trying to keep the relief out of her voice. "I'm sorry I asked, Duke. Maybe we can still fix it up about Jackson Hole."

"Sure," he said listlessly, "maybe we can."

He went on down to the pool then, wishing that he was a little more on edge for the coming exhibition. The Bristol was importing a couple of kids from Denver, winners in some intercollegiate league, and you never knew when you might run into a sleeper.

He spent the rest of the afternoon in the pool. At six the pool was deserted. He was sliding into his robe when he saw a girl in a red suit entering the pool. He dived in and came up behind her. He smiled and all that staleness seemed to leave him.

"Hello, Gerry."

The girl glanced over her shoulder. Her eyes were the clear, cold green of a wintry sea.

"I wanted to thank you," he said hesitantly. "If you—"

"You needn't bother," she said. "It's part of my job."

HE STARED at her. She started for the ladder and he laid a detaining hand on her arm. "It's more than just thanking you, Gerry. You know how I feel about you. I was thinking—"

The cool contempt in her face made him drop his hand.

"I think we better stay in our own leagues, Duke. Just because I was silly enough to think this might not be the usual summer resort thing. . . ." Her voice had the bitterness of self-accusation. "I don't go in for this summer love, Duke."

"No?" he said shortly. "And what makes you think I do?"

"Isn't it rather obvious? I'm sure no working girl could really afford you."

The color ebbed from his face and that deep little line above his chin was suddenly white.

"Thanks," he said slowly. "I think you've got something there. I wouldn't want to be in your league!"

He was running up the steps and her face was hot and crimson.

The Polo Room was always crowded at seven and when Duke came in the booths were already filled. He took a seat at the end of the bar, ordering a Scotch and soda. In one corner a nickel machine was playing something called In the Mood. A waiter offered a tray of little sausages and Duke shook his head. He finished his drink quickly.

He was waiting for another highball when he felt a girl's arm slip to his. Pam had slid in beside him and made a little face at him.

"A fine thing," she said. "I've been looking all over for you. Since when are you loitering around bars?"

"Hadn't you heard? I come out of line of loiterers."

The bartender brought his drink for the lady," said Duke.

Pam sipped it slowly, smiling. She was cute even if she was a little possessive and he had been a sucker to go for her before. She knew he was in the chips, but with her it didn't make any difference. It was only when the were stale that it seemed like a merry-go-round, and Pam a brass ring dangling before you. It wasn't until you met some of these lovely people, simply brimming with self-respect, that you realized a merry-go-round wasn't so bad after all.

"Pam," he said, studying the ice floating in his glass, "you can count on that Jackson Hole business ought to be fun."

"It will be," she said eagerly. "Just our own crowd. Just us, Duke."

He frowned at his glass. "Well, an early start Sunday. If it wasn't that exhibition—"

Pam was staring at him. "But you don't have to stay for that, Duke," she said blankly. "I thought they had told you. I took care of that this afternoon."

The ice cube was no longer swishing in his glass. "Took care of it?" she asked slowly, turning to look at her. "Took care of it?"

For a moment she was uncomfortable. "I just had them put your bill on my account," she said. "It—it really doesn't matter, Duke. I can afford it."

The thing Gerry had said flared in his mind. He was on his feet and looking cold and white all the way through. When it got to the point where a girl was paying your freight. . . . If that was way you stayed on the celebrity circuit it was time to blow the whistle.

Pam's eyes were suddenly frightened. "But, Duke . . ."

HIS voice was so low and so flat that it was worse than if he were not there.

"Let's skip it," he said quietly. "It seems to have given a lot of people the same idea. So this is it, Pam. This is where I get off."

Gerry was finishing her salad. The tall, bronzed young man came in and stood down on her table. The other girls recognized him and they saw the bite her lips and start to get to her feet.

"You might as well sit down, Duke," she said. "I'm going to have dinner with you."

She was even lovelier when she was mad. There was the anger in her eyes, the deep warmth of her mouth. "You won't do any good to say it," he said. "I just found out what we're doing tomorrow you're going to take Pam's money."

After a moment she tried to say, "You mean—you didn't know about it?"

"Not until she told me. I'm through with the exhibition business. Going to be the last one. This is I bow out."

Her eyes were grave. "For good, Duke?"

"Once and for all. I've got a steady job."

"Job?" She tried to keep her voice steady. "Where, Duke?"

He grinned. There was that fine, feeling that was nicer than all the fun you had thought were fun and excitement. There was that warm feeling there was Gerry. That was all he needed.

"Right here in the hotel," he said. "Mike's leaving and I've already taken down and talked to him. He put the word for me at the garage."

Clear and Warmer

by Corey Ford

ILLUSTRATED BY NALA

Ford, literary impersona- goes into his act and the columnists reach for their shot- guns. Blame it on the weather short, ladies and gentlemen, it's better to live in a free country and suffer from the heat than in a dictatorship and suffer from the hate"

NE nice thing about our present crop of newspaper columnists—you can tell exactly what they're going to say next. Whether the subject is election or the war, the syndicated columnists have their professional attitudes all worked out in advance. This is a lot of them from taking the trouble to think, and it saves a lot of others taking the trouble to read.

For example, let us say that a heat wave of unprecedented proportions is sweeping the nation from coast to coast. Daily commentators roll out of bed to find heat-wave headlines staring at them from their respective newspapers.

How, then, would the boys and girls handle this timely subject that day in their syndicated dispatches? Here's how:

TODAY AND TOMORROW (In the Manner of Walter Lippmann) IS IT HOT ENOUGH FOR YOU?

In any consideration of the heat wave, we must remind ourselves that heat, or cold, depends upon weather, or not, and that they cannot be removed without getting rid of the weather first. It is as if in dressing for dinner one had finished fastening all his shirt studs and knotted his tie, and were then to discover in trying to tuck in his shirttail that he had on his suspenders inside his shirt.

How then, without taking off his shirt again, does one remove his suspenders? Does one let go the suspenders, lick the perspiration from his lips, then take a deep breath and grope around in back this time for the dangling ends? Does one succeed at last, undoing his tie and splitting his shirt clear up to the armpits, and, phoning some excuse to one's host, climb into bed and stay there until the heat wave is over?

For the fact is that there is one fundamental fallacy into which we fall when we think about the weather: It is The Fallacy of Not Understanding that the More You Think About It, the Hotter You Get.

We all must agree, it seems to me, that it is as hot in the summer as it is in the city. This is obvious and indisputable. There is no escaping it. For myself, I find that to accept this fact is perhaps to realize that it is not the heat, after all, but the humidity. And while you're up I'll take just a little more ice in mine.

ON THE RECORD (In the Manner of Dorothy Thompson) RISING TEMPERATURE

"Well, dear," said the Grouse, opening his morning newspaper, "I see where we're in for another scorcher today."

"The extreme heat of the past week is, from both a military and an ideological standpoint, a phenomenon of vast importance. It represents an orgy of mass madness, in which human suffering is sacrificed to a criminal program of unparalleled brutality."

"You're telling me," nodded the Grouse, sipping his coffee. "Why, yesterday I bet I perspired two quarts."

"The truth about the heat is so monstrous that men and women accustomed to the standards of Western civilization, who take the weather, like this column, for granted, cannot believe it. They cannot envisage a heat wave programatically conceived and executed, in which the temperature is part of a systematic campaign of demoralization and destruction."

"Look, dear," interrupted the Grouse, setting down his cup uneasily. "You don't want to get yourself all worked up, this hot weather."

"—in which the current civilian atrocities—freckles, sunburn, prickly heat—are the instruments of an insane society bent upon nihilism and world chaos. For the monstrous truth is that the present heat wave, which this column freely predicted in 1933 was already the subject of secret communication between Berlin and Moscow. In 1937, in a conversation between Hitler and your correspondent, the Nazi overlord deliberately ignored this column's observation that it was getting warmer. . . ."

"Maybe if I get you a nice drink of cold water?"

"Look at Czechoslovakia! Look at the federal debt! Look at the American Youth Congress! Look at the domestic policy of the New Deal! Look at me standing on my head and juggling six complete sets of statistics while holding an American flag in my teeth. . . . Look at me! . . . Look out! . . . Look—"

"It's okay, Doctor. I guess the blood just rushed to her head, that was all. It happens whenever she writes a column."

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen. Every Sunday night at this hour we present Walter Winchell, who brings you Flash News . . . Odd News . . . Exclusive News . . . So now to the editorial rooms of the Jingo Journal—in the manner of Walter Winchell:

Goodevening Mr. and Mrs. America and all the ships at sea! Let's go to press. . . . Di di di-dit! Di di di-dit! Flash! Washington, D. C.: The weather bureau, so your correspondent is reliably informed, will announce tomorrow that the heat wave will positively continue until it is cooler. . . . Di di di-dit! Flash! New York: A number of heat victims, overcome by thirst, were rushed to the Stork Club tonight in a serious condition. All will recover. . . . Di di di-dit! Flash! It isn't the heat but the bromidity. . . . Ti ti ti-tit. . . .

Dee dee dee-deet! Dee dee dee-deet! By Way of the High Seas . . . Dee dee deet! Debunking the Warm Propaganda . . . Berlin: Adolf Hitler has stated that he will "make it hot" for any nation that opposes him. Evidently Mister Hitler doesn't realize that when a dictator threatens to put on the heat—it leaves a democracy cold . . . Dee dee deet! . . . I'll be back in a flash—in the flesh. . . .

Duh duh duh-duht! Duh duh duh-duht! Attention, Mr. and Mrs. United States. During the past week, the people of this country have been listening to the reports of the weather. During the past year, the people of Europe have been listening to the reports—of guns. . . . In America today we are perspiring under the arms; in Europe today, they are sweating under—an army. . . . Over here we complain about the heat because we feel bum; over there, they complain because they feel—a

(Continued on page 44)

I think if we all tried to relax we wouldn't mind the heat so much"

What Happened to France

Continued from page 11

of that frontier, was all that separated us from invasion and defeat.

What was to be seen in front of Lille in the month of October, 1939? Here and there, at a distance of one or two kilometers from each other, were little concrete casements surrounded by barbed-wire entanglements. Each of these casements was occupied by a British detachment: five or six men under the command of a corporal or sergeant. Each contained a periscope for observing the terrain, a machine gun and a Bren gun (light machine gun). In addition each was supposed to contain an antitank gun, but only the emplacements were there. The guns were to come later.

Between the casements extended an antitank ditch, not very deep and half caved in. A little farther back the English soldiers were at work digging trenches and dugouts. But in the deep mud of Flanders, at this time of year, the work was hopeless. As soon as these unfortunates had dug down a few feet into the yellow earth they encountered water. They performed miracles of ingenuity in an attempt to drain these inexhaustible wells, they installed elevated duckboards and parapets supported by sod. The results were not encouraging. The English war correspondents, almost all of whom had, like me, taken part in the campaign of 1914-1918, looked at these trenches with a critical eye.

"If that's our line," they said, "God help us! The means of attack are ten times more powerful than in fourteen and the means of defense ten times weaker!"

THESE honest journalists were made extremely unhappy by the severe censorship which forced them to hide their anxieties and reassure the public.

The officers of the regiments that occupied this line did their best to take a less pessimistic view. One of them, showing me a miserable trench which his men were digging with great difficulty, said in an apologetic tone:

"Obviously this would never stop a tank. But, after all, there's a real forest in front of my battalion and it's reasonable to hope that the tanks won't come this way."

During the following weeks, however, French and British genius undertook extensive defense measures. Behind the front line of blockhouses many gangs of workmen toiled energetically in the construction of other concrete works. Almost anywhere you looked in the fields you could see the long iron skeletons that outlined future casements, while, near by, specialists in cement, who had come from England, were mixing sand and gravel. On the French sector, especially in front of Maubeuge, the new casements had been admirably camouflaged. Many of them had the appearance of houses or harmless sheds. They filled the High Command with great confidence.

At this time many members of the French army were reading a book by General Chauvineau entitled "Is Invasion Still Possible?" This general, a professor at the War College, had reached the conclusion that concrete pillboxes rendered an invasion absolutely out of the question. "Works of this sort," he wrote, "can be built so rapidly that, in the time necessary for an enemy to take a first line, the defending army can construct a second..." He had left two things out of consideration: First, that there might exist new means for attacking concrete forts; secondly, that a breach would permit the enemy to get behind the concrete line. In fact, that line at which our troops labored so painfully all through the winter in the cold and rain was never attacked from in front.

Most of the experts, moreover, did not believe, with General Gort, that there would be an attack against Belgium. "Why," they asked in their articles, "should Germany add to her enemies the Belgian army, which today is large and well-equipped?" Since, on the other hand, they maintained that the Maginot Line could not be forced, "there remain for Hitler," they added, "only two possible theaters of attack: Holland and Rumania, but it is highly improbable that he will choose either of these since Rotterdam is Germany's last lung and since Rumania is already delivering to the Reich all its surplus gasoline..." Their conclusion was that Germany would do nothing this summer, that the situation was very favorable because "You are perfectly right," he replied. "I asked about it on several occasions. But I was met with the response that tank maneuvers would ruin the crops and that the civil authorities were opposed."

No one behind the lines seemed to be thinking about the danger of an enemy attack; everyone talked only about the danger of boredom. At the beginning of the war the men had lacked blankets, jerseys and shoes, and agencies to supply them had been established: Bundles for the Army, Cigarettes for the Army. Soon the soldiers were receiving too many packages, too many presents.

"With the best will in the world," an English soldier solemnly assured me, "I cannot smoke two hundred cigarettes a day!"

AT THAT time prominent people in Paris and London had started a variety of new enterprises: Reading Matter for the Armies, Radios for the

"Look here, Kingston—stop introducing me as your 'fine-feathered friend!'"

RICHARD TAYLOR

"time works for us," that in 1941 "we shall have control of the air and, in 1942, enough heavy artillery and tanks to attack the Siegfried Line." These were sentiments that could be heard in those days in any mess at the front at dinner-time; and I admit that I often expressed them myself.

HITLER had said, referring to us, "I shall disintegrate their war," and in the course of this long winter of inaction he succeeded in doing it. The men got tired of digging trenches in the rain to defend themselves against an enemy they never saw. The divisions could and should have been taken out, one after another into the field, and given intensive training for an entirely new and terrifying kind of war. All the lessons of the Polish campaign should have been put to use. But we were so little war-minded that the generals allowed themselves to be stopped by scruples that would have been laudable in time of peace. I remember asking one of them why he did not accustom his men to the sight of flame-throwing tanks and dive bombers.

"If their first experience of this method of attack takes place on the field of battle," I said, "they will be terrified. If, on the contrary, they become accustomed to such sights the novelty of the impression will wear off."

Armies, Amusements for the Armies, Burlesque for the Armies, Sports for the Armies, Art for the Armies, Plays for the Armies. A chagrined woman, disturbed by this frivolity, said that she was going to found a new agency—War for the Armies. She was right; but such ideas were not popular.

At the British front "Concert Parties," composed of famous comedians and beautiful show girls, traveled about in military automobiles solemnly escorted by officers. Maurice Chevalier sang with great amiability for the troops of both countries. His arrival at Arras created more excitement than that of President Lebrun. He was acclaimed by the French and English soldiers. "Maurice, 'Valentine!'" cried the French. "Maurice, 'The Rain Drop!'" roared the English. When he left the stage he was besieged by autograph hunters: "Maurice, it's for my kids. I'm a papa, you know." At the door Chevalier turned around and said to the soldiers: "God bless you, boys."

It was all very pleasant, and harmless enough, but it was hardly an effective preparation for the German offensive. At the time when the country, at the gravest moment in its history, had only a few weeks at its disposal to make up for its past mistakes, to complete its fortifications and train its men, Frenchmen and Englishmen continued to live (except in certain sectors of the front) routine lives governed by the pettiness of a military bureaucracy.

In the city of Arras, where I was stationed, there were several thousand French territorials, old soldiers who had been mobilized—I never really knew why—and of whom the army made use whatever. Their officers employed them as best they could to plant gardens, start poultry yards and rabbits and pigs. These were worthy enterprises but it may, perhaps, have been more urgent to fortify the line of la Scarpe. A correspondent, one of my friends, dared much to his general. The suggestion was not well received.

"Fortify la Scarpe! But the enemy will never advance that far. You are defeatist! Wait for orders!"

After one or two experiences of this kind even the most zealous leaders went back to their routine. The soldiers were nourished and with little to do, the Tommies, as soon as night fell, went to work writing interminable letters to their wives and sweethearts; the officers were unable, except with great effort, to censor this monstrous correspondence. An unhappy captain would not see his table cleared of one pile of envelopes before another and larger one would descend upon him. The quarrels of everyday life, nursemaid brooded over, occupied the attention of men who should have borne in mind the future of liberty and the destiny of the world depended upon their ability as soldiers and their power of resistance to Hitler, as he had said he would, had integrated our war.

HE WAS not able, however, to disintegrate completely. There were zones of heroism raised high above the general level of mediocrity, and these never allowed themselves to be submerged in the pettiness of daily life. Toward the end of December, I spent several days in the Maginot Line and returned full of enthusiasm. No longer had this chain of magic mounds bristling with cannon and impervious to gas, given me (perhaps wrongly) a tremendous impression of solidity and, also, I admired the men who lived in the fortress.

Almost all of them were from London and had been recruited in the region where their fort was built. They allowed them, even in time of peace, to go there every Sunday. I met many lieutenants, lawyers and engineers; Metz, who for eight years had been every week end in the Maginot Line, calculating artillery ranges. These men, taking labors assured absolute proof of fire. The spotters in front of the fort had before them photographs of the country divided into numbered squares. Perceiving the enemy in square 248-B, all they would have had to do was dial "248-B" into the telephone and seconds later the suspected zone would have been deluged with shells and machine-gun fire.

The confidence of these young men in their armament and their devotion to the crew (for each fort thought of itself as a ship) seemed to me an indication of what all our armies should have. I do not regret the enthusiasm expressed at that time nor the praise bestowed on the garrisons of the fort. I still think the character and patriotism of these young men were worthy of admiration. When, later on, the Maginot Line was so rapidly taken it was through fault of these crews. I am taken because it was turned. The aster puts in question the wisdom men who paid out, in order to an incomplete and vulnerable line, of money that would have been to equip a formidable field out it detracts nothing from the and the honor of the fighting men. any other points in the line, es- among the motorized divisions avalry corps, I found admirable I member, for example, the of a regiment of motorized dra- What fine soldiers! Their step orous; their heads snapped to the instant before they came abreast general; their eyes, fixed on his, ous and ardent; their heels il on the ground at the moment ate. In truth, the Grenadier could not have done better.

some of the more thoughtful commanders told me disquieting One evening the general of a African division admitted to me hoped for a negotiated peace. "Germans," he said, "greatly out- us and they have incomparably equipment. The struggle will be equal. My men are as brave as ers but if they have no antitank ey won't be able to stop armored s with their bare hands." al Giraud himself, a brave man reputation for taking risks, be- hat we would not be in a posi- attack before 1941:

"Too bad," he said to me, "but we many things. Airplanes first of you know how many I, the com- of an army, have at my dis- Eight! Not one more. Of course, the Royal Air Force, which is el, but if I want it to make a issance flight for me, I have to General Georges who asks General h, who makes a request of Mar- Erratt, who transmits the request Marshal Blount who, finally, or- e flight, but by that time it is o late to be useful."

if the Germans take the initia- eral? If they invade Belgium?" we shall fight this year, but it hard with us."

was the eight-months respite Germany allowed us made use ar factories? Very badly. And ere several reasons for this.

First was the stupidity with which commissariat directed industrial tion. Skilled workmen, who dispensable for the manufacture anes or cannons, were sent to al barracks where they swept ertyards or peeled potatoes. It eeks or months to locate them d send them back to their ma- As a result, the Renault fac- which in peacetime employ more 000 workers and which should ed a place of immense impor- the manufacture of tanks and ere reduced, at the outbreak of , to a personnel of from six to ousand men. It was fantastic.

Second reason: Because the en- and financiers persisted in con- this war as though it had been e of 1914, all plans were made for aign of four or five years. As a ctories were built which would in their period of production un- or even 1942. Instead of making ate use, as best they could, of the plants in France, machine tools test design were ordered in the States, a country from which we ave ordered tanks and airplane For the same reason the dollars gold possessed by England and ere carefully rationed. This as divided into four or five ch one apportioned to one year. merican factories, which could oduced in time the equipment y for our armies, remained orders from the Allies. "Engines built in France cost us less," peo- ple said. They were destined to cost us the war.

The third reason: The programs were designed for a war which was never to take place. The General Staff deter- mined upon a long-term preparation for attack upon the Siegfried Line. It had calculated, with admirable precision, how many heavy guns would be neces- sary for this operation, and these guns were ordered at a time when all our ef- forts should have been devoted to ur- gent and immediate needs—antitank guns, antiaircraft guns and light arms, such as machine guns and submachine guns. Our patrols along the Saar begged their officers to give them submachine guns, such as were carried by all the German patrols. There were none to be had. When the Germans began to drop parachutists, all officers were ordered to carry revolvers. But there weren't any more revolvers in France. I myself went to gunsmiths in several cities, including Paris, without being able to buy one. Finally, at the beginning of June, they were ordered in Italy. That was a little late.

The fourth reason: Finally, failure of morale and political dissension impeded production. From the time that Russia aligned herself on the side of Germany, the numerous Communist workmen, without showing open opposition, worked languidly and with no enthusiasm. The almost complete suppression of profits discouraged the small employer. Dur- ing this war one never saw, as one had seen in 1914, small workshops and ga- rages busy turning out shells. For many months France worked at a peacetime tempo.

In October, 1939, Paul Reynaud, who was at that time minister of finance, decided one evening after dinner to make a tour of certain armament fac- tories in the region of Paris. He was astounded to find them closed. They did not work at night. Next day he went to see Daladier:

"Do you know," he said, "if we go on this way we are going to lose the war?"

The idea seemed incredible to him, as it did to all of us at that time. It was, alas, only too true.

EVERYTHING went much better in the field of armament as soon as this ministry was put in charge of Raoul Dautry, an excellent engineer who had reorganized the railways of France. But he was appointed too late. It was in 1936 that he should have been given the task of building a war machine. Dautry was, like me, a friend of Marshal Lyautey and I had a high regard for him: He was an energetic little man, firmly planted on his legs, and he had a habit of half closing his left eye in conversa- tion and shrewdly measuring his inter- locutor. He had always been consistently successful in many posts that had been entrusted to him and when he was asked his secret he would say: "I have a trick—work."

At the Ministry of Armament, which was installed in the Hotel Majestic, Dautry would be busy at dawn covering sheets of red paper with urgent orders for his departmental heads. When the latter arrived, they would find on their desks these notes from the boss, to which a reply had to be forthcoming the same day. Brief, brusque and sometimes brutal, these red notes of Dautry's were famous. Here are a few of them:

"To all directors: I observe that ar- rivals at the ministry are late and de- partures early. I shall institute a system for keeping check of this."

"To Monsieur A: I know that the weather is fine; I realize it is hot. But I know, too, that we are at war and I don't wish to have Commander X smoking his cigar at the window and enjoying the air."

"To Monsieur B: When men are

TROUBLE BEGINS WHEN CHILDREN GET KNIVES... AND CUTS RESULT.

FOR ANY LITTLE CUT THAT NEEDS A QUICK BANDAGE...

USE READY-MADE BAND-AID (AFTER TREATING CUT PROPERLY.) NO FUSSING AROUND WITH AWKWARD, HOME MADE BANDAGES.

BAND-AID IS NEAT AND PRACTICAL. JUST STICK ONE ON... IT STAYS ON... EVEN ON HARD-TO-BANDAGE PLACES. IDEAL FOR MINOR BURNS AND BLISTERS, TOO. BUY A BOX TO-DAY. ONLY 19¢ FOR 36 ASSORTED SIZES.

Johnson & Johnson
BAND-AID
Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.
ADHESIVE BANDAGES

WHICH of these women has learned the secret of Fifteen Minutes a Day?

TWO women live in neighboring homes. They are the same age. Their husbands' incomes are about equal. They seem to have the same chance of social success and happiness. And yet one of these is seldom invited to go out.

The other woman is always the center of a group. She is sought after as a guest.

MAKE HER SECRET YOUR OWN

Her secret is very simple. She has learned how to attract people. She has read many things. Her mind is keen and alert, and people feel instinctively that she is worth knowing.

Make her secret your own. It is possible to secure all at once and at very small expense the few great books that enable anyone to think clearly and talk well.

You will understand how this is possible when you have read "Fifteen Minutes a Day"—a wonderfully interesting Free book which tells you about the beautiful new Home Library Edition of The Harvard Classics—now easily available to the most modest home budget.

You need not decide now. Simply mail the coupon for the Free booklet "Fifteen Minutes a Day" which has brought new happiness to thousands who have sent for it. Also, for limited time only, we will send you "Men Behind the Classics" which contains dramatic biographies of men whose immortal writings appear in The Harvard Classics. A fine piece of literature. Both of these booklets will be sent you free, postpaid and without obligation. Simply fill out and mail the coupon.

THIS COUPON ENTITLES YOU TO FREE BOOKLETS

P. F. Collier & Son Corporation
250 Park Avenue, New York City

I am interested in receiving by mail, free and without obligation, your valuable booklet, "Fifteen Minutes a Day," describing the famous library, Dr. Eliot's Five-Foot Shelf of Books (The Harvard Classics) and the beautiful brochure, the "Men Behind the Classics."

441 HCS

Mr. _____
Name Mrs. _____
Miss _____

Address _____

available—which may happen at any time—they are to be employed in cleaning up, keeping order, picking up scrap iron, clearing out ditches or surfacing roads. No one is ever to be left without employment. It is a director's business to direct."

"To an industrialist: It is imperative that all French machines should run twenty-four hours a day. This is difficult but necessary. All the rest is a matter of detail, in which I am not concerned. I need everything and need it at once. The purpose: To achieve victory as quickly as possible. The means: Perform the impossible."

Such was the law of Raoul Dautry and it is certain that if there had been a human being capable of actually putting France to work, he was the man. But when I talked to him alone, I found this man who was ordinarily so full of energy and confidence disturbed and pessimistic.

"When will you be able to give the armies everything they need?" I asked him.

"Everything? Not before 1942," he replied. "We have begun too late."

He was one of those who worked courageously until the end but he could not perform miracles and Germany had several years' head start.

IN JANUARY I was sent to England to study the British war effort on the spot. My hosts took me aboard their men-of-war in the North Sea; they showed me their aviation schools, training camps for the Army, factories for making cannon and airplanes. Everything the Admiralty was doing seemed excellent. The air force, too, appeared admirable, though too small in numbers. As for the army, even the French Military Mission itself could not obtain any information about the number of soldiers in training. I said to the English general who received me at the War Office:

"You tell me, sir, that the active army, the reserves and the territorials comprise about 750,000 men and that an additional 600,000 recruits have been called.

"Good. But then how does it happen that you have not already thirty or forty divisions?"

"I know nothing about it," he replied.

"And the colonel who is in charge of effectives is not here today."

That evening in Parliament I met Hore-Belisha.

"What do you think of our new conscript army?" he asked me.

"It seems to me," I replied, "to be made up of excellent material. But I am like Oliver Twist: I asked for more."

As a matter of fact, aside from the Canadian Division, no one could show us a corps of troops larger than a battalion in training. The infantry was instructed by elderly sergeant majors, who taught them how to fence with a bayonet. This wasn't going to be of much value to them in the course of the campaign! At the tank school, the instruction was ingenious, but the tanks were superannuated and scarce. Everywhere I found good will, good humor, patience and an unbelievable certainty of victory.

WHEN I returned to Arras in February, 1940, the head of General Gort's staff gave us a brilliant lecture.

"I consider," he told us, "that in the course of these winter months we have won a definite victory. Just compare the situation as it was at the end of August, 1939, with what it is today. At the end of August, 1939, we believed we would have to fight not only Germany but Italy, Spain and Japan; we did not know whether America would lift its embargo on arms; whether the Dominions would be with us; whether the Arabs might not take the field against us. And now what do you see today? Italy, Spain and Japan are to all intents and purposes neutral; America has lifted the arms embargo; the Dominions are with us; even the Arabs are giving us their support. If you add to this the fact that French mobilization has taken place without disturbances and that, moreover, a blitzkrieg on the Western Front appears impossible, it seems to me no exaggeration to say that we have gained a great victory."

At that time these arguments seemed to me irrefutable. But such was not the opinion of those who could look into both camps. In the neutral countries people no longer believed in our success. It is certain, for example, that Italy, which at the outbreak of the war had observed operations with a certain impartiality (although Mussolini had an obvious preference for Germany), came to the conclusion in February that the Allies had made bad use of the winter months and that the disproportion between our forces and those of the Reich, far from growing less, was increasing. The woman who used to give soothing talks in French over the radio suddenly began to sneer at the Italians. Those of my friends who chanced to encounter Italian ported sinister predictions.

"I say goodbye to you," Coureaux remarked to Pierre Lyautey. "I have no idea of the torrent of steel that will descend upon you. You will be submerged!"

At this moment Italy's decision was made and she was only waiting for a favorable instant.

WHAT had taken place? I completely squandered the months of respite? To say yes, with no qualification, would be unjust to the troops along the Saar, who had fought to the best of their ability; to the French and English soldiers who had dug in so much earth and mixed so much concrete; to the members of the staffs who had prepared with such care the plans they had been asked to draw out. No, many Frenchmen and men, between September and May, had been hard at work, but a great part of their effort was wasted in useless tasks. Those who had directed them had been controlled by three false ideas:

1. That a line could be held, as it had been in 1914, and that the central thing was to build one and re-erect it.

2. That the experience of Poland was not applicable to France, and that consequently it was useless to retain the principles of our armies according to the principles.

3. That the war would be a long one and, consequently, it was necessary to make industrial and financial preparations for campaigns in 1941 and 1942.

If you add to this jumble of reasons a general lack of enthusiasm which was caused, in France, by the political divisions of the country and in England by too much confident optimism, the picture comes fairly easy to understand. France and England after eight months of war were in no position to resist the infernal machine which the Reich had, for seven years, been constructing with such terrifying persistence and unflinching attention to detail.

The third of this series of articles will appear next week.

"What kinda service is this? That's the third time yuh gave me a wrong number"

JAY IRVING

Fair and Warmer

Continued from page 41

bomb. . . . If we get sunburned, we cover up our shoulders; in Europe, they cover up—their soldiers. . . . In short, ladies and gentlemen, your newsboy feels that it is better to live in a free country and suffer from the heat, than to live in a dictatorship and suffer from—the hate. . . .

ANOTHER HOT ONE (In the Manner of Gen. Hugh Johnson)

Here's something that will "burn" you! The United Press quotes President Roosevelt as saying that he hopes "the country will have some relief from the heat very soon." Well, maybe we are all such prize suckers these days that we fall for anything, but when the New Deal politicians—allege samee Donald Duck Ickes and the rest of the whirling dervishes, tom-tom beaters and juramentados down in Washington—deliberately try to bribe us like the boob fat boy with the bag of candy, it gives me a pain right where Ferdinand sat down on the bee.

Now, nobody thinks any more of Franklin D. than I do, and the only reason I say this is because I love him like a buddy, bless his old heart; but when the President starts promising heat relief, he is working the New Deal patronage machine overtime. This is a political handout of the very worst sort. If all the hundred and twenty million heat sufferers in this country are to go on relief, the Republicans might just as well pick up their toys and go home.

You can't lick Santa Claus!

FAIR ENOUGH (In the Manner of Westbrook Pegler)

Aside from the weatherman's well-known rottenness as a prophet, his latest job—by which I refer to the heat wave that has been lousing up the summer lately—has blown off the lid at last from an arrogant, corrupt, hypocritical, parasitic racket. Even the hoodlums of the A. F. of L. would not have the gall to claim the right to tell this country whether it will be hot or cold tomorrow, a right which no government short of a dictatorship would dare to assert.

For years the weatherman has been intimidating defenseless vacation resorts, amusement parks and bathing beaches, and if anybody forgets to kick in he sends around a bolt of lightning just as a reminder. He will deliver a clear day for a Democratic clambake or a St. Patrick's Day parade, provided, of course, the politicians cut him in for a slice off the top; but just let the rest of us ask for the rain to hold off long enough to get in a couple of holes of golf on our one day off, and we'll be drenched to the skin before we get to the second tee.

As a prophet the weatherman is a confirmed bum, dishing out a lot of malarky about cumulo-nimbus clouds and low-pressure areas along the Middle-Atlantic seaboard, or thumbing through his barometric charts and computing the average mean precipitation for Tennessee last August, but when it comes to answering a simple question like whether to wear your white flannels, or would today be a good day to wash the car, you could tell about as much by the rheumatism in your right knee.

He gets away with every variety and all kinds of murder, including the temperature outside my window right now, and even the bosses down in Washington have to take orders from him and like it. You can't do anything about it, because there isn't a second bureau you can take your track to; you're not satisfied. When it comes to dictatorship, the weatherman could give a few hints to Mr. Big himself.

MY DAY (In the Manner of Eleanor Roosevelt)

Golden Beach, Fla., Tuesday. I was in Chicago when I boarded the plane for Seattle this morning all the time we were saying that this is the hottest summer we have had in Louisiana in fifty years, but I for one enjoy this San Francisco air so much, no wonder how warm the afternoon may be. I am always glad to be in West Virginia again, for there is such a nice blowing off Puget Sound right when we fly over the Alleghenies that we all do not mind the desert sun and, of course, even in Utah it sometimes gets so cold at night in May it seems good to be right back in Washington, in spite of the heat. All I think that if we all tried to during the hot spell, we would not like the weather half so much.

Shell Game

Continued from page 12

in the privacy of your home, you can really dig in and get the best bit of meat, here is a recipe for a delicious lobster that is so mouth-watering and delicious that you'd better have extras on hand for the second time your guests will surely call for more.

lobsters weighing anywhere from a pound and a quarter to a pound and a half from your fish dealer and see to it before having them split so you know they are fresh. This is the best for an individual portion and sometimes call these chicken lobsters.

Pre-heat your oven for about ten minutes, then spread the half lobsters on your broiling pan to keep them in. Put small pieces of butter on the flesh, being sure to leave in the tail, which is the liver, and the claws found in the female. They're ready to try. Try to force a little butter into the claws, which should be cracked open by boiling to make removal of the meat easier. Broil about eight minutes, then remove them to a heated broaster (the self-basting kind is best for turkey) and allow the lobster to steam for about twelve minutes. Lobsters are tender and juicy. If you have no double roaster leave the lobsters in the broiler for twenty or thirty minutes. Correct timing is the secret of successful lobster. Overcooking toughens it.

For the sauce, melt some butter in a pan and add two or three tablespoons of cream, a dash of Worcestershire and whatever drippings have fallen in the bottom of the broiling pan. One of this will be fat from the lobster which enhances the flavor of the sauce. Stir and pour into a pitcher. Serve two half lobsters and two large glasses of sauce, equipping each with a fork for digging the meat out of the shell. Pour the sauce directly over the lobster and eat it out of the shell if you prefer put some of the sauce in a cup and dip your pieces of lobster into it.

For a clam juice cocktail, corn salad, a mixed green salad, fruit and watermelon go very well with lobster served this way.

You Can Do It at Home

For Thermidor, usually considered a chef's dish, can also be prepared at home. Take three small lobsters and boil them in vigorously boiling water for ten minutes and then simmer for ten or twenty minutes. Then lay the lobsters out to drain, and when they're drained, cut them in two, remove everything from the shell, but use only the meat from the shell and claws. Fill the shell with the following mixture: a quarter of a cup of butter add a dash of cream, salt, pepper, a quarter of a teaspoon of paprika, a half teaspoon of onion juice and a dash of sherry. You can add a little parsley or a few mushrooms if you have been simmered in butter and cut into small pieces. Stir until smooth and place the sliced lobster meat. Place the mixture in the shell and sprinkle with a few teaspoons of Parmesan cheese. Bake in a hot oven for five or ten minutes until the cheese is brown. A half lobster is enough to serve for each person.

For Newburg recalls the era of the Nineties, Diamond Jim Brady and Van Russell. It is high in calories, very delicious. Put into a double boiler two tablespoons of butter and add slowly about three tablespoons of flour, stirring constantly. To this add a pinch of salt, a cup of milk, a cup of cream, and the yolks of two eggs. (If you want the Newburg even richer, use a pint of cream and omit the cup of milk and the flour). Add a jigger of sherry and finally the meat from several boiled lobsters cut into small pieces—two or three cups of lobster altogether, and serve on toast. This makes at least five generous portions.

Some fish stores sell lobster tails already cooked, which are all right for Lobster Newburg or salad, and canned lobster can be used too. There is the sealed variety as well as the unsealed. The latter comes from Nova Scotia and Canada, where lobsters as small as 3 1/16 inches are frequently caught. Sometimes there are four to seven of these tiny lobsters in a fourteen-ounce, unsealed tin, which is packed on ice and shipped to your fish dealer ready for use.

The Law Steps In

While it is true that the total poundage in the New England lobster fishery has declined from an approximate high of 30,500,000 pounds in 1889 to 11,496,000 pounds in 1935, the value in 1935 was more than two and a half million dollars as compared with the $860,000 value in 1889.

The effects of overfishing are noticeable in the size of the lobsters taken rather than in the decrease of their number. Lobsters probably can live for several decades if they manage to escape other fish and the traps that are laid for them.

All the New England states have legal gauge or lower length limits, but the size at which lobsters may be taken legally from the water varies in different states.

Maine, however, has a double-gauge law, protecting both the large and small lobsters, because the large lobsters are the great egg producers. A ten-inch lobster, for example, produces five thousand eggs, a twelve-inch lobster produces four times as many and a sixteen-inch lobster produces twenty times as many.

The Bureau of Fisheries is working on the rearing and planting of young lobsters, but it isn't possible yet to estimate the results of artificial propagation.

The lobster's shell doesn't increase in size as the animal grows, so periodically it casts off its old shell and acquires a new shell, which takes six weeks to three months to harden.

The lobster's home is the ocean's floor, and he usually leaves the shallower waters during the winter months seeking a more comfortable temperature and suitable food in deeper water, returning toward shore in April or May. He can shoot backwards, when alarmed, at the rate of twenty-five feet a second.

When facing danger the lobster also has the amazing ability to amputate his claw and in due time grow another in its place.

The next time you examine a lobster notice that his two great claws are not alike. One is a crushing type, the other a seizing type.

Usually the price of lobster per pound remains fairly constant, but since the war in Europe began, Canada has been sending us the lobster that would normally be shipped to England. That floods our market and makes the price go down.

Lobster's no longer in the luxury class. So gather 'round, you lobster lovers, here's your chance.

The WHYness of DRYness...

WHY—To be truly enjoyable, a drink shouldn't be cloying to the taste...

DRY—A dry whiskey isn't! For a dry whiskey like Paul Jones hasn't a trace of sweetness to dull the rich brilliance of its flavor...to disguise its zestful tang!

WHY—Because much of your drinking is done before dinner, the whiskey you use should have an appetizing flavor...

DRY—Paul Jones has! Its delicate dryness sharpens the flavor of your pre-dinner cocktails to an appetizing keenness!

WHY—Above all, a drink should taste refreshing...

DRY—Highballs made with Paul Jones embody a sparkling briskness...a fresh, clean taste that only a dry whiskey can give!

You'll pay a lot less for Paul Jones now than you used to! Yet the high quality hasn't changed a bit! Ask for this smooth, full-bodied whiskey at your bar or package store today!

Frankfort Distilleries, Inc., Louisville & Baltimore

Paul Jones

IT'S DRY... AND WHAT A BUY!

All whiskey. A blend of straight whiskies—90 proof.

"Dinner will be ready by the time you wash!"

KAY KARAFFA

er was now fit to be tied and his ings were not helped when Lavao's smash over the left field wall was ed foul ("you big bum, you're blind; as fair by a foot"). Lavagetto finally d out, Phelps going to third. At this ture, Mr. Durocher turned toward end of the bench and yelled: Gamback! Get on up there!"
ut as he looked and as the players
ed, they saw a most amazing thing.
Gamback was snoozing! Mr. Gam-was most definitely asleep! In the st of the tightest pennant race in ers, Mr. Gamback had selected this nent for his thirty winks!
his was too much for Mr. Durocher.
eaped so high in his rage that he al-beaned himself on the roof of the out. He let out a maniacal screech.
grabbed a bat and began to hammer
the bench with all his might, howl-at the top of his lungs as he ham-
ed.
r. Gamback opened his eyes wearily looked about him in a daze. Mr.
gerkurth, the umpire, thinking that yelling and bat thumping were a her reflection upon his judgment and grity, issued a bellow of his own and ted for the bench at a lope, waving arms as he came.

ET out!" he was howling. "Get out! You're out of the game!
re out of the park! Get out!"
r. Durocher, busy hammering the ch with the bat, never even knew
Mr. Magerkurth was approaching.
he wanted to do was bean Mr. Gam-back with the bat while life still reained within him. Accordingly, Mr.
rocher was concerned about Mr.
mback; Mr. Magerkurth was concerned about Mr. Durocher; Mr.
mback, the cause of it all, wasn't cerned at all.

a sport known for its ludicrous ations, this was the little daisy of n all. At this juncture somebody the Dodgers bench began to laugh.
started with a small and somewhat startled laugh, much as if he were laughing against his will, and then suddenly he reared with a mighty guffaw. Haw!

Haw! Haw!

It was the laugh of a man who has not laughed for weeks, has not breathed freely for weeks. It fitted the mood of his teammates, who had also been existing in a state of misery. By the time he reached his second group of haw-haws, he had the whole team with him.
They howled, they screamed, they went weak with laughter.

This really complicated matters. Mr.
Durocher thought they were laughing at him and his rage mounted to a frenzy.
He banged the bat even more lustily, he screamed in fury. To Mr. Magerkurth, approaching with blood in his eye, the demonstration could only be aimed at the majesty of the law. If he had been red with anger before, he now became apoplectic.

"Get out!" he yelled. "All of you!
Every damned hyena on that bench!
You're out of the game; all of you!"

This was absolutely too much for the players. They banged each other in sheer ecstasy; they rolled around on the ground locked in happy embrace; they screamed with laughter.

It ended with Magerkurth throwing everybody out of the game but nine men.

In the excitement, Mr. Gamback was left as one of the nine. They tried to warn Dr. Durocher about that.

"Listen," they cried. "He'll hit all right but then he'll have to go out and field. He'll ruin us."

"My only hope about Mr. Gamback," said Mr. Durocher, "is that he will get hit on the head and killed." He walked away bitterly. The others departed in lockstep formation, still so shaken by mirth that they could only keep upright by clinging to one another hysterically.

After the excitement died down sufficiently, Mr. Gamback strode up to the plate and smacked a single into left, driving in the run that put Brooklyn ahead. Then he took a glove and went out into right field and stood there expectantly.

Nothing came his way till the ninth when Augie Galan popped a high fly into right with the bases empty and two out. Mr. Gamback stood still and looked at it. When he was certain where it was going to land, he backed carefully away from it until there was no possible chance he might catch it. Galan was streaking around the bases like a mad man.

Mr. Gamback cautiously picked up the ball, gazed toward the diamond reflectively and then let fly with a tremendous heave to third base. Lavagetto got the ball and was waiting patiently with it when Galan slid in.
He was out by ten feet.

The team met Mr. Gamback when he was halfway in to the dugout and started to pummel him with joy.

"That's how I did with lots of fellows in Wink," explained Mr. Gamback modestly.

Mr. MacPhail had to clear up the mystery of Mr. Gamback's disappearance, although he didn't much care.
Anybody with half an eye could see that the Brooklyn team had been changed from a group of hypochondriacs into the happiest, most confident ball team ever known.

"WHAT I should do," said Mr. Mac-Phail to Mr. Gamback, "is fine you a thousand bucks for deserting the team in the thick of the pennant race, but instead of that I'm giving you the two hundred and fifty for that hit just as usual. Now tell me what you were doing when you disappeared."

"We were after a paintin'," said Mr.
Gamback. "We heard a feller had a Picasso paintin' for a hundred dollars and we went after it. . . ."

"Listen," said Mr. MacPhail. "Every art dealer in the world has a Picasso you can buy. You don't have to hunt down alleys for them."

"Yes, sir," said Mr. Gamback, "we found that out."

"And you couldn't get it for a hundred bucks if you found it."

"Yes, sir; we found that out."

"And if you could get it for a hundred bucks, it would be a fake."

"Yes, sir; we found that out."

"So you were gypped?"

"No, sir; we wasn't gypped. We didn't buy the paintin'. It wasn't no Picasso."
"How would you ever know!" demanded Mr. MacPhail.

"I looked at it through my microscope," said Mr. Gamback simply. "It wasn't no Picasso at all. It was an old brewery calendar, all framed up nice."

Mr. MacPhail just stood agape and looked at him.

"Do you know what, Gamback?" he said finally. "Sometimes I think you're a damned fool and then sometimes I'm not so sure."

"America . . ." began Mr. Gamback.

"Oh, I agree with you entirely," cried
Mr. MacPhail. "America is a great country and it is also a free country. Just to prove to you how free it is, I'm going to take the liberty of being a damned fool myself. In addition to that two hundred and fifty, I'm going to give you five hundred more for getting the team out of the dumps. You didn't do it from any reasons of good sense, but you did it."

Mr. MacPhail was now pumping Mr.
Gamback's hand furiously.

"And do you remember that time
when you asked Durocher the question.
. . . Is Brooklyn America? and you implied that Brooklyn was America. . . ?"

"Yes, sir," said Mr. Gamback.

"Well, I can't give you any money for that," said Mr. MacPhail, "but I cherish that sentiment. I most heartily cherish that sentiment."

"Yes, sir," said Mr. Gamback.

"WE KNOW OUR PENCILS!"

"No more wasteful,
inferior pencils
for our office.
Our Purchasing Department has discovered Dixon
Ticonderoga
Pencils. By scientific tests, they're *44% easier to write with."

The Tested Labor-Saving Pencil

DIXON
TICONDEROGA

An extraordinary 5¢ pencil — get quantity quotations from your dealer.

JOSEPH DIXON CRUCIBLE CO., Dept. 52-JB, Jersey City, N. J.
*PROVEN BY INDEPENDENT SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH. Copyright Joseph Dixon Crucible Co., 1940

SINGLE EDGE BLADES

15 FOR 25¢

FREE: Week's supply, double or single edge blades.
Write MARLIN, 164 Willow St., New Haven, Conn.

Britain's Labor Boss

Continued from page 15

is making up for past sins so vigorously. It was he who contributed to the inertia and complacency of the nation by crying loudly, "There will be no war." But when it came he rolled up his sleeves, and now his great personal courage, his tenacity and his mental capacities are devoted heartily to the nation's welfare. The man in the street admires the idealism and enthusiasm of Anthony Eden, secretary of state for war. And then there is Bevin. Bevin, of them all, speaks with the voice of the man in the street. Bevin is their advocate. He too wants to make this ■ people's war.

Ernest Bevin was born in the Somersetshire village of Winsford fifty-nine years ago. He quit school at the age of eleven to work on a farm. His first salary was six pence (ten cents) a week. Work on the farm gave him a magnificent physique but little else. He was still in his teens when he went to Bristol to drive ■ streetcar. Then he switched to driving a truck. At twenty his salary was ten shillings a week (two dollars) plus commissions, an average of three dollars more. His job was to sell mineral water and soft drinks to the Bristol pubs. The pub in England is the poor man's club to ■ far greater extent than it is in America. The man in the street goes to his pub every night for a glass or two of beer and a game of darts, and he goes to air his political views and to hear the views of his neighbor. Pub people liked young Ernie Bevin and they liked the vigorous way he expressed himself on political questions. There was a vacancy on the city council and Dan Hillman and other pals persuaded him to stand for the office. His opponent was a huge longshoreman. One night Bevin was driving his truck, delivering his cases of mineral water to a water-front pub. He heard his opponent making a speech on a dock and he drove his horse-drawn wagon closer.

He Hates Politics

"Who is Bevin?" the longshoreman sneered. "An outsider from the country. He is no good, he is a . . ."

Bevin listened. He had never before heard invective directed against himself. A slow rage filled his big frame. He got down from the wagon. He forced his way through the crowd. Without ■ word he reached for the big longshoreman. Then he hit him. When the man got up Bevin knocked him down again. Then Bevin picked him up and threw him into the river. Bevin looked around to see if any wished to take up the man's cause. There was no one who did. Luckily there was a scow tied to the dock and the men on it managed to drag the miserable longshoreman out of the water before he drowned. Luckily, because had he drowned Bevin would not now be minister of labor.

That method of direct approach, of solving problems the direct way, has always characterized Bevin. He hates red tape and silly regulations, he hates insincerity and pompousness. As a matter of fact he hates politics.

His fight with the longshoreman had a rather unhappy sequence. Running on the Labor Party ticket, which in 1908 was considered ■ radical, crackpot movement, he was beaten. He was beaten, but his fine showing thoroughly scared the gang in power. They decided to get rid of him. They passed the word around to the Bristol pubs that Ernest Bevin should be blacklisted. For weeks he could not sell one bottle of mineral water. He went to his boss and tried to quit his job.

"I'm not making any money for you," he said. "You've been paying me ten bob a week for nothing."

"I'll be the judge of that," his boss growled. "Don't let them lick you, Ernie. Keep at it."

Shifting Thousands of Workers

Bevin has always had the knack of attracting people to him. It wasn't long before he became interested in labor unions, always called trade unions in England. He became a minor official in the dockers' union and soon attracted the attention of Ben Tillett, who was to English labor what Sam Gompers was to American labor. It wasn't long before he became Tillett's right-hand man, his "trouble shooter."

But it wasn't until 1920 that the name of Bevin meant anything. Then he made a speech. The transport workers' union men came out of these skirmishes with mutual respect and admiration. But it was still a shock to the old gang when Churchill made Bevin minister of labor in his cabinet. Bevin didn't know the rules, they wailed. He was . . . he was just an outsider.

Bevin is big, burly, and he has the thick neck of a bull. And yet when you sit in his office at Montagu House, the ex-ducal mansion that is now the ministry of labor, his voice is curiously soft and occasionally his eyes twinkle behind his heavy horn-rimmed glasses. He is too busy to grant interviews. He'll let you sit in his office and he'll chat with you and discuss the problems that face him but it is all "off the record." He thinks that this is no time for speeches or interviews. There is too much work to be done.

Bevin has a terrific capacity for work. He seldom leaves the ministry before

He could go into a fashionable End bar, find out what every man did for a living and then immediately send them to more useful jobs. He decide on working hours for every in England and it is he who settles wages. There is no appeal. And y date there has not been one comp Bevin has shifted thousands of wo from less useful jobs into munition factories and other essential industries. He has told employers that there can cutting of wages. And employers such confidence in his fairness tha one has written a letter to the Time

I might add that I learn about land by spending my time at a F Air Force mess, spending my tim the beach at Dover with the army spending my time with local de volunteers in places like Seven Oa Kent or a dozen places like it, spe mv time in the pubs of rural Enga In these places you hear England ing. Twice a week I go to the Hou Commons but that is like going to the United States Senate. For the most you hear politicians talk in these ac rosanct halls. But you don't hear ag land talk. I hear England talk er day.

The Voice of England

I know the men Bevin has wo with all his life. I can't quote Bevin cause he has made an iron-clad rule he won't be quoted. But I spend re nings with his best friends. I play rt with them and have my pint of beer them. I hear them talk about Bev

"There will be no defeatism in cabinet while Ernie is there," or them chuckles. "You know Ernie i he only man in England who can call a neral strike. I know if Ernie said the nine millions of us would quit work tomorrow. That's a weapon Erniea over the lads in the cabinet. There be no Petain in our cabinet. If one up Ernie will say, 'Well, gents, the neral strike starts tomorrow. How do like that?' Well, they wouldn't like so there won't be any of that Fr stuff in our cabinet."

That's what Ernie Bevin's friends av about 9,000,000 of them. They lo that Ernie will never use this te fi power that he has unless he feels it is for England's benefit. He will p bably never use it, but the weak si in the cabinet are afraid of this po They respect Ernie Bevin even v they don't like him. Only a hal would not respect Ernie Bevin. And comforting to know if you are intere in the English cause, as I am for that he is in Churchill's cabinet. F a very tough man, a very tough ma deed and very patriotic too. He hap to love this country called Englan

You can live in the fashionable End of London and never live in land. To know England you mus into the local pubs of London and L pool and Manchester. You must into the country pubs of Kent and rey and play darts and have your pi bitters and keep your ears open. T you hear the voice of England. T you hear praise of Churchill, the lea but always there is the undercurre whole-hearted admiration for Bevin

Today Bevin is minister of la Tomorrow I am sure that he will vice-premier and thus be in name he is in fact, the second most impo man in England. And the day afte morrow? The voice of England v pers, "How can they keep Ernie d Mark ye well, he'll be our next p minister."

"Look, 'Wedgies'!"

FRITZ WILKINSON

was miserably paid and worked miserable hours. A court of inquiry to discuss their pleas was held and Bevin made an eleven-hour speech on the men's claims for more pay and better working conditions. The case he put was masterly and unanswerable. The men won every point and the name of Bevin went all around England. The man in the street finally had a real advocate. Since then Bevin has devoted his life to the cause of labor. Eventually he became the leader of the transport and general workers' union, the largest union in the world.

A dozen times during the past decades he crossed swords with Winston Churchill. He opposed some of Churchill's policies when the latter was in the war office. Again when Churchill was chancellor of the exchequer Bevin fought against him. Honors were about even and both midnight. Recently his wife wailed consolately, "If Ernie sleeps until after 5:30 in the morning he thinks he has wasted half his day."

A month ago Bevin was given powers never before held by any man in any democratic government. He was given complete power over the jobs held by civilian workers in England. It is up to him and him alone to decide what industries are essential and what ones are superfluous. Actually Bevin could go to Waterloo station tonight, enter a train and say to the first man he met: "What is your job, what are you doing?"

The man might say, "I am a tea taster," or "I am an interior decorator."

Bevin could say, "That isn't helping to win the war. Report tomorrow at Hyde Park with ■ pick and shovel. We need you to dig trenches."

Tough On and Off

Continued from page 24

do this . . . you go home and boy of yours that I said I'm sure grow up to have better manners than old man has."

turned and walked to the far counter, still seething, but had no more trouble.

"Big chump," he thought. "Why didn't he get away? I could have led him. If only I wasn't working picture. He might have had a would have jumped me and my kisser, and I've got a law-suit for two hundred thousand. And the picture: 'Cagney in Early Morning Administers Brutal Beating to' Yes, I guess it's just as well I to work on him. . . ."

When Jimmy felt another tap on the shoulder. The big guy was standing with tear-filled eyes.

"Mr. Cagney," he said, "I'm is the Cagney method of handling himself, the bloodless victory. viewpoint on this is: 'Why even there's no gate?'"

ing man from Leonia, New Jersey, looks so much like Jimmy that he's constantly getting bumps in the local counters. A new high in let's-evil-villain was reached after Cagney's Angels with Dirty Faces. That was that of a very tough guy whose sock curve rose sharply after the picture was released, and even the young man felt the effects of the picture and Jimmy correspond freely about their mutual concern.

Raft Really Means It

Three New York boys playing parts in Hollywood, George Raft was by far the toughest of the lot. A disarming gentleness in Raft's personality, his speech is soft to the point of being almost inaudible, and he is almost always in a good mood. But Raft aroused is really in the San Juan Hill district of New York, George grew up the hard way on the city pavements. With little schooling because he had to get to work at an early age, Raft took to the ring. He fought several preliminary boys but never far.

Through the ring that Raft made his first acquaintance with racketeering. At that time most fighters were controlled by a mob and George was no exception. Owney Madden, Dutch Legs Diamond—Raft knew them all. But let it be said here and there so, Raft never was a gangster. He did he ever do a kinky thing in his life. He is strictly a right guy. Raft allow himself to be cast in a picture in which he is asked to play a heavy. It is so stated in his contract in Each Dawn I Die, the picture with Raft on his way up the river for a hundred years. That was all with George because, as he said, "I don't know what I was going to do. But if the script had called for me to be serving time because he was an underhanded thing, George would have thrown out the part."

Stole a Million, George was a lawbreaker from the law, but it was only a series of circumstances that led him into a life of crime that he took it on the lam. On the lot the picture was being made, Director Frank Tuttle called George over through the next scene. "Here's what you do, George," said Tuttle. "You go to the post office here and make believe you're going to buy stamps. Then you pull out a gun and stick the place up."

Raft went into conference with his pal, the ever-present Mack Gray, who was standing by. When they came out of the huddle, both men were shaking their heads slowly.

"No," said George. "No post office." "What do you mean, no post office?" Tuttle asked.

"I stick up no post office. It's a federal rap."

Raft knew. The expensive post-office set had to be altered to look like a travel bureau before Raft would step through the door with his gun.

Like the other movie tough guys, George gets his share of abuse in public places but he is loath to fight.

One night, Raft was sitting in a Hollywood night club with Mack Gray and a girl. An attractive-looking young woman passed by Raft's table and dropped a note on it. When Gray opened it, it read:

"Dear Mr. Raft: I think you're wonderful. Call me. Crestview —. Lillian."

"Just a little fan mail, boss," said Gray as he crumpled the note in his hand and threw it under the table. It was not long before a large surly-looking guy was standing in front of Raft.

"Gimme that note, Raft," he commanded.

"I have no note," Raft told him.

"Listen, Raft. You may be a lover on the screen but you're just another heel to me. You keep away from my girl or I'll . . ."

That's as far as he got. People who saw it say Raft proved that night that it's possible for a man sitting in a chair to knock out a man standing on his feet before him. What probably happened was that Raft got up and sat down again so quickly that no one saw him move. To be accused of trying to muscle in on another guy's girl had transformed Raft into a demon and given him speed and punching accuracy he never knew in the ring. That is what Raft is like.

The leading routine for an actor to show how tough he is in pictures is to prod two fingers, forklike, in the other guy's eyes. Next on the list is the old cigar trick. In this one you take a cigar out of your man's mouth, reverse it, and let him have it again with the torch end first. One or both of these routines is used almost every time a gangster picture is made.

One night in Chicago, Bogart was entering a night club when a man standing under the awning blocked his path.

"We don't want no gangsters in here, Bogart," he said.

Bad Man's Reward

Humphrey looked into a face he had never seen before and saw a lighted cigar in the middle of it. He had just finished The King of the Underworld and it worked very well there. Why not here? Bogart snatched the cigar, gave it a twist and shoved it back in again. To his astonishment it really worked. Leaving his man sputtering like a defective Roman candle Bogart swaggered into the club as if he were the head of a mob in real life.

"Give me a table for four. In front," said Bogart, who was alone. The son of a doctor and graduate of Andover, Humphrey was playing tough for the first time in his life and liking it. As he sat there glowering like a gangster chief the door swung open and in walked the cigar smoker. Humphrey saw him coming toward his table and knew he meant business. What does a mob guy in the movies do in a spot like that? He stands up and swings before he gets it himself. That's just what Bogart did and, miracle of miracles, it was a bull's eye. Down went the cigar smoker like a felled Sequoia tree. He lay inert between two tables. With a magnificent sweep of his hand Humphrey addressed his imaginary henchmen. "Take dis rat outta here," he ordered.

It was not long before Bogart's table was crowded with openmouthed admirers. But there were two guys at the table now who were not so impressed by Humphrey's performance. Tough guys who couldn't have understood if things had happened otherwise.

"You staying for the go tomorrow night?" one asked.

"Yeah," said Bogart.

"Who you like?"

"The colored boy."

"You bettin'?"

"Yeah."

"How much you bettin'?"

"Ten grand," said Bogart, who never bet more than fifteen dollars on a fight in his life.

"Well, here it is," the McCoy tough guy explained. "We're from New York and you're from New York and we seen you're okay. So we're out here for the fight. On business. The fix is in and the white boy wins. Bail yourself out and make a switch to the white boy. It's in the satchel. The colored boy goes in the tank in the seventh and, just in case, we've taken care of one judge and the ref."

Bogart had never heard such talk before but he was glowing. He was being adopted by a real mob.

The next day Humphrey called Hollywood and told Mayo to bet $500 on the white boy. He called a few of his friends and let them in, too. The excited Bogart ran up telephone bills to the amount of $100. That night he was on the train and unable to get the result, but early next morning on the station platform, in Kansas City, Bogart unfolded a newspaper. The colored boy won by a knockout in the first round. Yes, sometimes it's tough to be tough.

His owner uses the "minute-a-week" Pulvex Method that quickly kills a dog's fleas and then absolutely protects him against reinfestation

FLEAS AND LICE can transmit tapeworms and sarcoptic mange to a dog. That is the warning of the U. S. Department of Agriculture Circular No. 338.

One flea and one second—that's all that may be necessary to infest your dog with tapeworms or infect him with loathsome sarcoptic mange. If your dog is scratching for fleas now, you should act now!

To insure complete eradication, be sure to use a powder, preferably Pulvex, which is so incredibly quick in killing fleas. None revive to reinfest. Also kills any lice, ticks, sticktites on the dog. Kills fleas when put on single spot!

Borated; makes a dog more comfortable; soothes itching from scratching. And by using Pulvex according to the remarkable "minute-a-week" control method, your pet will be protected against further flea infestations. Read about it in folder on can. If your dog is scratching, get a can of Pulvex at once! At all drug, pet, department stores, 50c.

PULVEX
FLEA POWDER

ASK DEALER
TO SHOW YOU
THIS FOLDER

PULVEX FLEA SOAP oils and grooms the coat, deodorizes, cleans and destroys the fleas, only 25c!

She Makes . . .

. . . A Good Living!

IN 1933 Anne Levy of Texas (pictured above) sold her first subscription to COLLIERS. Since that time she has sold many hundreds of them. Miss Levy loves her work and the freedom it gives her from routine. SHE HAS MADE GOOD IN A BIG WAY!

Are you interested in the plan that was sent to her seven years ago? If so, mail this coupon at once—

Independent Agency Division, C-36
The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company
250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

I want full details on your easy plan for immediate cash profits.

Name . . . . .

Address . . . . .

Town, State . . . . .

TRAITOR'S PURSE—

a diabolical plot against a nation fighting for its life

TRAITOR'S PURSE—

a story of astonishing intrigue in the war from within

TRAITOR'S PURSE—

a romance as modern and as dramatic as lightning war

TRAITOR'S PURSE—

By Margery Allingham begins in next week's Collier's

Civilian Conservation Corps boys turn out fast when the forest fire alarm sounds

U. S. FOREST SERVICE

Sparks Out, Please

BARRING wide, heavy and unexpected rains, the worst forest-fire situation in years is looked for this summer and fall in our great Western timber states of California, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Utah and Washington.

Terrific damage has been done already, especially in Idaho and Montana, and several tragedies have occurred. Record contingents of fire fighters have been detailed from the CCC, the Bureau of Reclamation and various state services, and they've done excellent work.

But forest fires go on eating into our timber reserves.

The big causes of these calamities are the same as they always were. Lightning starts but few of them; the animals who inhabit the woods start none at all. The great majority of them come from cigarette or cigar butts tossed away instead of carefully ground out under heel; from pipe coals knocked out into dry grass or brush; from campfires left smoldering, though ever so slightly, by hikers or picnickers in a hurry.

We want to plead with all our readers, as earnestly as we know how, to use extreme care in this matter, on camping, hunting or fishing trips anywhere and everywhere.

You can't do anything more useful, anywhere in timbered country, than to make certain—sure that every spark in your immediate vicinity is out, and 100% out, before you move away from there.

And sometimes die as one did, or are burned as several were, in this Idaho fire

Forget the Class Stuff

AS THE 1940 Democratic platform plank, Collier's nominates:

We denounce and will do all in our power to destroy the treasonable activities of disguised democratic and un-American agencies which sap our strength, paralyze our will to do for ourselves and destroy our unity by inciting against race, class against class, religion against religion and the people against their own institutions.

Europe's latest war is, among other things, class war. Dr. Robert Ley, Hitler's Front lieutenant, says the big issue is the common man worker against the English gentleman meaning class war spilling across national boundaries as dreamed of by Karl Marx.

But whoever wins, Europe promises to be ruined for a generation.

The class war is poison. There is danger for any nation that patronizes peddlers of class hate. The Democrats are wise in their platform to condemn class-hate peddlers in their platform.

So, of course, it cannot be by any other Democratic High Command permission a lot of New Deal enthusiasts are raising a class issue against Mr. Willkie—strengthening power holding company connections with friends, his social position, and so on.

The Republicans by and large know the folly of class hatred as well as do the Democrats. So it can't be by any Republican mastermind sanction that some Republicans are trying to raise class issues against Roosevelt—calling him a traitor to the people, a rich radical, a dilettante lover of the people and so on.

Prize Boner—1940

BEING a presidential election year, is sure to be replete with boners, blunders, etc., committed by public persons. We believe, though, that the prize for the worst of these can be awarded—right now.

We think the national boner prize must go on all accounts to Mr. Lewis Allen, vice president and general manager of the Don Lee radio network operating 30 Pacific Coast stations in cahoots with Mutual.

Mr. Weiss, the day Adolf Hitler gave his "last appeal to reason" to England, suddenly cut off the broadcast from his network's stations, with the declaration that "it is not in the public interest to permit the continuation of this broadcast in harmony with the attitude of this government . . . Mr. Hitler should not be permitted to use our American facilities to justify his attack against civilization itself."

If most Americans felt that way, we would deserve to be taken over by some dictator.

Of course Hitler has committed himself against what we call civilization. Obviously he is not in harmony with our government.

But the point is that we need to know something we can about Hitler—his thoughts, his ideas of how the world should be run, his plans for the future, his past, his weaknesses, etc., etc. Only if we know this we can prepare fully to cancel out his threat.

Mr. Weiss performed a public disservice as well as an epic boner. If such a thing is broadcast again on any network in the land of the free, there ought to be some sort of censure by the listening public.

September 7, 1940

5¢ A COPY

Collier's

THE NATION

Traitor's Purse

A New Novel by
Margery Allingham

Detroit's Defense Headache By Walter D.

© THE CROWELL-COLLIER PUBLISHING COMPANY—PUBLISHERS OF COLLIER'S—THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE—

PUB LIDR
BURLINGAME
CALIF

1/20
82641
A

The story of the home... and the life insurance policy

YEARS AGO, a man bought a house. Naturally, he furnished his home in the style of the day.

At the same time, he bought a Metropolitan Life Insurance Policy. Today, he still owns that policy, and he still lives in that same home.

Over the years, his taste in furnishings has changed, too. For example, the parlor has been completely modernized. In other rooms, old-fashioned furniture has been replaced by up-to-date pieces. Electric lights, telephones, and an improved heating plant have been installed in the house.

However, the physical appearance of his life insurance policy probably has not changed a bit. It looks exactly as it did the day he bought it. Yet it, too, may have been modernized to the great advantage of the policyholder. For, as experience showed it to be possible, the Company was enabled to give more in many cases, than was called for in the original policy.

And, unlike the improvements to his house, which represent an outlay of cash, any additional benefits to which he is now entitled under his policy have been made available although no change in the premium rate was or could have been made.

► For example, a policy issued before 1915 did not provide for participation in the surplus earnings of the Company. Today, the holder of such a policy receives his share of the divisible surplus in the form of a dividend on his policy.

Many policyholders, who have found it impossible to continue the payment of the required premiums on their policies, have been delighted to find that the non-forfeiture values available under such circumstances are, in some cases, now much larger than those specified in their policies.

As conditions warranted, Metropolitan has also found it possible to increase substantially the amount of insurance payable under many of the earlier Industrial policies over the amount called for in such policies.

An important provision included in many current Ordinary policies is the right to have the insurance payable in the form of an income. This right was not included in early Ordinary policies, but has since been extended to them.

Provisions for additional benefits in case of death by accidental means, and benefits for loss of eyesight or limbs, have been added to Industrial policies issued before these benefits were regularly included in such policies.

► The changes cited above illustrate the progress that has been made in liberalizing the terms of Metropolitan life insurance policies, and in providing more benefits. Each change has brought the policyholder some real advantage which the original contract did not obligate Metropolitan to provide.

These improvements in old policies have been made voluntarily by Metropolitan as part of its effort to provide the policyholder with the utmost possible protection and service.

► If you are in doubt as to whether your old policies have become more advantageous since you bought them years ago, your Metropolitan Agent will gladly examine them and ascertain whether there are any additional benefits to which you may now be entitled.

COPYRIGHT 1940—METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

is Number 29 in a series of advertisements designed to give the public a clearer understanding of how a life insurance company operates. Copies of preceding advertisements in this series will be mailed upon request.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

Frederick H. Ecker, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD • Leroy A. Lincoln, PRESIDENT

1 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Plan to visit the Metropolitan's exhibits at the New York World's Fair and at the Golden Gate International Exposition in San Francisco.

WILLIAM L. CHENERY Editor
CHARLES COLEBAUGH Managing Editor
THOMAS H. BECK Editorial Director

WALTER DAVENPORT
AIMEE LARKIN
QUENTIN REYNOLDS
KYLE CRICHTON Screen and Theater
KENNETH LITTAUER
JAMES N. YOUNG
MAX WILKINSON
Politics
Drama
Sports
Fiction
Fiction

WM. O. CHESSMAN
HENRY L. JACKSON
GURNEY WILLIAMS
DENVER LINDLEY
FRANK D. MORRIS
IFOR THOMAS
CLARENCE H. ROY
Art
Fine Feathers
Humor
Articles
Articles
Photographs
Syntax

W. B. COURTNEY
FRANK GERVASI
MARTHA GELLHORN
JIM MARSHALL
WM. HILLMAN
ROBERT McCORMICK
JOHN T. FLYNN
European Asso

THIS WEEK

SEPTEMBER 7, 1940

SHORT STORIES

DONALD HOUGH

Hade is in Jail. Our wandering cowboy settles down. Page 14

WILLIAM MacHARG

Killer's Luck. O'Malley proves it's mostly bad. Page 17

FRANK CONDON

Quick Decision. Why Peggy Knight is not a great radio star. Page 21

THE SHORT SHORT STORY

Peace at a Price, by Ken W. Purdy. Page 16

SERIAL STORIES

MARGERY ALLINGHAM

Traitor's Purse. The first of ten parts. Beginning a new and exciting novel. Page 9

AGATHA CHRISTIE

The Patriotic Murders. The sixth of nine parts. A threat for M. Poirot. Page 18

ARTICLES

WALTER DAVENPORT

Detroit's Defense Headache. Armaments—if and when. Page 7

ANDRÉ MAUROIS

What Happened to France. The third of five parts. How the Allies wasted their first eight months. Page 11

J. BRYAN III

Cut-Rate Showman. Why Mike Todd packs 'em in. Page 12

HERBERT RAVENEL SASS

Sauts the Bat. An unsung hero of the Indian wars. Page 13

ARTHUR MANN

Tennis Cinderella. Helen Bernhard, who came up the hard way. Page 19

FRELING FOSTER

Keep Up with the World. Page 5

EDITORIALS

Lily-Gilder MacLeish.

How About the Philippines?

Tsk, Tsk, Mr. Arnold. Page 54

COVER

EL GILCHRIST

ANY WEEK

ONE OF the most reliable of our scouts reports that Mr. Willkie's management is about resigned to fight on without the aid, moral or active, of the Honorable James A. Farley. And yet it took them several weeks to arrive at this comfortless decision. At Colorado Springs where Mr. Willkie rested like a one-man rodeo after that Philadelphia snatch, no hour passed which did not bear rumor that Mr. Farley was about to join the procession of propertied Democrats who were deserting Mr. Roosevelt more in sorrow than in anger. Each incoming mail was opened feverishly. Telegrams were read hot off the wires. When the telephone rang there were stampedes. Before visitors from the East had their hands shaken they were asked, "Whad-deyahhearaboutfarley." Airplanes were scanned from afar through powerful binoculars. Motorcars were inspected, ostensibly for such things as Japanese beetles, but our scout was not so easily fooled. One of these cars was driven by a Mr. James A. Farley but not the right one. He said that he was voting for Roosevelt, that if he had any Japanese beetles or the like they'd vote for Mr. Roosevelt too or get out of his car. In fact, he wanted to give odds that ninety per cent of this country's Farleys would vote for the President. And that's about all we have from the Farley front at the moment although our scout reports that considerable pressure has been exerted on Jim by big business which he hopes to become associated with in the interests of a badly depleted personal treasury. At the moment we are assured that Jim will not pull an Al Smith.

NOT THAT we don't realize the chances one takes these days in making predictions. Moreover, we are warned by Mr. Jerry Shoupe of St. Louis, Missouri, against deceiving ourselves. Mr. Shoupe drives a bakery truck, a rather advantageous position for one seeking public opinion. The rye bread and doughnut trade is favorable to Mr. Roosevelt, says Mr. Shoupe, "but the cake eaters are all Willkie." However, Mr. Shoupe adds that this comes from just one section of St. Louis and is not to be taken as an index of the nation. "Besides," says he, "I'm having trouble with my wife. She's now calling me her Willkie-pie."

WE LEARNED with some regret that the Honorable Jerry Saddler came out very badly in the Texas gubernatorial primaries, emerging rather far down the list of the numerous aspirants defeated by the Honorable Pappy O'Daniel. Mr. Saddler had just as much imagination as Mr. O'Daniel but not, apparently, the right kind. It was Mr. Saddler who produced what we think one of the truly brilliant ideas of defending our country against invasion from Mexico. He advocated piping oil—of which Texas has ample—into the Rio Grande's gulch and, as the enemy began to cross, touch it off. The idea, like Mr. Saddler, still lives—for which we are grateful. But from Mr. John Boley Ascholt, of McAllen, Texas, we receive word that this fiery south wall will not be necessary, Texas being what it is. "Let them come," writes Mr. Ascholt, "bringing with them their big tanks and all the rest of their road hogs. Let them come. While we're going on about our business, they'll be rolling northward. A week after they arrive they'll still be in Texas. Two weeks after they get here they'll find they're still in Texas. It's going to break their spirit. Even us natives can stand just so much of it. After they've spent a few weeks rolling around Texas, getting lost with sand in their gears and alkali dust in their beer, they'll listen to reason."

THIS department, sternly enjoined by nonsmiling editors to be neutral or else, is trying to bear up under salvos of letters from both sides of the military-conscription controversy. From patriotic organizations, many of which have been invincible in peace and invisible in war, are demands that every phrase of ours shall be a clarion call to arms, every word a drumbeat. Thus, says Colonel H. Dale Proddorp of Santa Clara, California, we would be squaring ourselves in "the eyes of many true Americans who have become convinced that you are a pro-Nazi pacifist." The colonel, admittedly a Republican who has "never deviated a fraction of an inch from inherited principles," is nevertheless a little fearful that his party of 1940 is somewhat less militant than Mr. Roosevelt. "And yet," he adds on a note of despair, "as the Blum government of France softened that country into collapse, so, I fear, has the New Deal reduced us to a mere pulp of the America that was Washington's, John Paul Jones', Old Hickory's, Farragut's, Grant's, Teddy Roosevelt's and Pershing's." From the other side we get more realism. For example, here's Miss Jeanne Rosen of New York City, to tell us that the advance tidings of conscription have worked wonders for engagement-ring vendors. "They say that married men won't be drafted," says Miss Rosen. "Anyway, I've had three proposals in two weeks. What do you hear from other girls?"

IN AN investigating mood Saul P. Banchion of Little Rock, Arkansas. Mrs. Banchion without enthusiasm that "evatlantic plane and liner more absconding politicians alty from Europe—ex-n ex-dukes, ex-archdukes, pri cesses, duchesses and simi duck lammers, as my husb them." Mrs. Banchion f "contributed nothing but d their own people and hav else to offer us. Are these pe to be eligible for WPA jobs government relief or did t their country's treasury wit

AND IT was in Minneapolis, Minnesota, as we get it, that Mrs. MacAughtey of Chicago, Illinois, covered that a Parent-Teacher association became pretty deeply with what should be done at raphy examinations. With what European boundaries be tomorrow it was agreed fair to the kids to expect tell what was what. Presen the mothers hit upon a p the children answer in the p she said. One of the teachers saying that it did the cause tion no good to be correct o terday but wrong today. We mother killed further disci adding: "In that case, why geography in American sch mind our own business?"

BUT IT'S not so easy in these to mind one's own bus got to talking about John articles about the politica that has for many years Chicago as government. We other fellow, a Chicago why Mr. Roosevelt's Depa Justice had investigated th machines in Republican D rebellious New Orleans an nored politically friendly Chicago and Jersey City. "It President Roosevelt has en without meddling in the affa cities like Chicago. The peo cago are a hundred per ce Collier's. Our advice to yo like the President does and own business or lose a lo sscribers."

PAID-UP ones?

Vol. 106, No. 10. Entered as second-class matter at Post Office, Springfield, Ohio, U. S. A., under Act of March 3, 1879, and at Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, Springfield, Ohio, Publishers of Woman's Home Companion, The American Magazine, Collier's. Copyright, 1940, The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, in the United States, Canada and Great Britain. Executive and Editorial Offices: 250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.; 6 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London. Published weekly at Springfield, Ohio. U. S. A. Joseph P. Knapp, Chairman of the Board; Thomas H. Beck, President; Albert E. Winzer, Executive Vice President and Treasurer; Gertrude B. Lane, Vice President; John S. Brehm, Vice President; William P. Larkin, Vice President; J. A. Welch, Vice President; Denis O'Sullivan, Secretary. Manuscripts or art submitted to Collier's, The National Weekly, should be accompanied by addressed envelopes and sufficient postage for their return. The Publisher assumes no for return of unsolicited manuscripts or art. Price, 5 cents a copy in the $2.00 a year, $3.50 for two years, in the United States and the Posses Argentina, Balearic Islands, Bolivia, Brazil, Canary Islands, Chile, C Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, duras, Labrador, Mexico, Newfoundland, Nicaragua, Panama, Paragu and Colonies, Uruguay and Venezuela. Price in Canada, 7 cents a year; two years, $12.00. Foreign subscriptions include postage. Price in U. S. A. $2.00 a year, $3.50 for two years. Remit by postal or express m check in United States funds to The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, Ohio. To avoid mistakes in delivery, subscribers should notify u address five weeks in advance. Give both old and new addresses.

KEEP UP WITH THE WORLD

Freling Foster

When a labor union calls a strike the signs carried by its pickets brand a company as unfair to organized labor, the action is legal and the union may be sued for damages.

"Massive Challenge" is believed to be the only set of hands in existence that experts, wearing them, cannot pick or lock with the key.

Nearly 1,400 large American loaves, producing more than a loaf of bread a year, now contain an ingredient that delays the development of normal mold and until the bread it contains has gone stale.

Farmers, or those engaged primarily in farming, and wage earners do not earn more than $1,500 a year are the only persons in the United States who cannot be forced into involuntary bankruptcy.—By Alan Ashby, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma.

Among some tribes in India, a man who takes a girl in marriage must compensate her family by the death of his own sister. Among some tribes in Africa, the death of a married woman obligates her younger brother to marry the surviving husband, even though she has to leave her own husband and children.

Incendiary fires destroy about as much property as accidents, fires and kill half of the firemen who die in action, investigators are relentless in tracking and convicting arsonists. In a recent case in New York, forty-six principals of their staffs had to audit 10,000 pages of seventeen companies in the states, and then defeat sixteen eminent defense lawyers, before they were able to send five arsonists to prison.

A soldier who has never been hit by a mile of a bursting shell may be cured from "shell shock" as this is not only applied to actual shell shock, but also to a number of other conditions that appear in soldiers engaged in modern warfare. —Donald Shoemaker, Pasadena, California.

Scientific studies reveal that the majority of people work more efficiently immediately after a change in weather, not only on a clear day following a storm, but also during a storm following several days of sunshine.

During the Pareshnath Procession, staged yearly by the Jains in India, all telephone, telegraph and trolley wires crossing the line of march are temporarily removed so that the Great Indradwaja, a fifty-foot banner, can pass without being lowered.

More than two thirds of the billion dollars' worth of harvested crops grown in the United States annually is fed to livestock.

The average motion picture, when released, contains only eight per cent of the film that was "shot" during production. Although the 92 per cent that goes into the editor's wastebasket is not entirely wasted from a technical standpoint, it does sometimes contain songs, small parts in their entirety and even whole scenes that have been taken on expensive sets.

Astronomical observations made with a sextant to determine geographic locations vary in accuracy on land, sea and in the air. A man on solid ground can ascertain his latitude and longitude within a few yards, a mariner can obtain his ship's position within a mile or two, but a pilot, in determining his airplane's location, usually makes an error of about ten miles.—By G. E. Webster, Lansing, Michigan.

The longest baths on record are those taken by the patrons of the mineral spring resort at Shirahone, Japan. Many of the bathers will lie in the large, shallow tanks for three weeks at a time, packing smooth stones on and about themselves at night to prevent turning over and drowning in their sleep.

Five dollars will be paid for each interesting or unusual fact accepted for this column. Contributions must be accompanied by satisfactory proof. Address Keep Up with the World, Collier's, 250 Park Avenue, New York City. This column is copyrighted by Collier's, The National Weekly. None of the items may be reproduced without express permission of the publisher.

Discouraged?

Are your coat shoulders and collar "snowed under" with stubborn, distressing dandruff flakes and scales?

Annoyed?

Are you distracted by itching and even inflammation? They certainly can make a fellow miserable.

Is it infectious?

Those scales and flakes and that troublesome itchiness are so persistent. They may be symptoms of infectious dandruff!

Your treatment!

Use Listerine Antiseptic and massage twice a day! Clinical tests on men and women who did this showed impressive results! In one series of tests, 76% of the dandruff sufferers showed either complete disappearance of or marked improvement in the symptoms within 30 days!

Ah-h-h!

A cooling, welcome blessing, this Listerine massage! Feel your scalp tingle and glow! You know Listerine is killing germs by millions, because it is antiseptic.

It's wonderful!

It's wonderful how helpful Listerine is . . . and it's wonderful, too, to have a healthier scalp.

Get after infectious dandruff now— with LISTERINE!

Clinic and everyday use prove Listerine Antiseptic's value against this scalp condition which affects so many.

Don't fool around with what may be a troublesome condition! If you are irritated, disturbed by the distressing, uncomfortable symptoms of infectious dandruff, start your home Listerine Treatment today . . . the medical treatment thousands use.

Just apply full strength Listerine to your scalp morning and night—all over! Massage the scalp and hair vigorously, persistently. It's as easy as it is delightful.

Cooling, soothing Listerine Antiseptic—the same Listerine which has been famous for over 50 years as an antiseptic mouth wash and gargle—kills millions of germs associated with the infectious type of dandruff . . . including the queer "bottle bacillus" called Pityrosporum Ovale, which outstanding specialists recognize as a causative agent of infectious dandruff.

Remember, Listerine Antiseptic is the medical treatment which, within 30 days, brought complete disappearance of or marked improvement in the symptoms of dandruff to 76% of the men and women who used it in a clinical test. Start today to see what it does for you!

LAMBERT PHARMACAL CO., St. Louis, Mo.

Just Back from Havana

EDWARD F. ROOSEVELT discovers a true Havana Flavor in NEW WHITE OWLS

OWL: Welcome back, Mr. Roosevelt! Is the foreign participation all set for the 1940 World's Fair?

ROOSEVELT: Right—it will be better than ever!

OWL: As a cigar smoker just back from Cuba, you're something of an expert on the taste of Havana tobacco.

ROOSEVELT: I ought to be—I've smoked enough Havana cigars!

NOW BLENDED WITH HAVANA!

Try a

NEW WHITE OWL—Today

New White Owls made in America—see how at New York World's Fair, 1940

Copyright, 1940, by General C

OWL: Try this NEW WHITE OWL, will you? Tell us if it's really got the taste of Havana!

ROOSEVELT (after several puffs): Yes—this has an authentic Havana taste . . . miles from the all-Havana Cuban cigars—but real Havana flavor!

MR. EDWARD F. ROOSEVELT— Director of Foreign Government Participation at New York World's Fair . . . cousin of the late Teddy Roosevelt . . . recently flew back from one of his many visits to Cuba.

On his arrival in New York, we asked him to try our new White Owl. As a cigar smoker just back from Cuba, he could readily tell whether or not it had a true Havana flavor.

Note that Mr. Roosevelt said the new White Owl does have a Havana flavor. And all over the U.S. thousands of smokers will go along with Mr. Roosevelt on that!

The fact that you can now get this wonderful Havana flavor in a 5¢ cigar accounts for the big sales increase in the new White Owl. From coast to coast, more men are enjoying a fine cigar every day.

THE trouble with this tale is that we arrived in Detroit too soon—about sixteen or twenty months too soon. Not even in Washington, that ever-garden of truth, we heard the alarming story. We heard it first in a town where great comfort was derived from it because Boston was sure he'd be one of Mr. Hitler's first American objectives. Then in Philadelphia while a political phenomenon was being before our disbelieving eyes. And in from the midlands while the Democrats were pledging their lives and sacred honor to something we did not quite catch. And the South (Alabama) and the Far West (you betcha) rejoicing in it. The story had its variations but fundamentally it clung, to its guns.

And this was the story: That silently, in mystery lest Mr. Hitler be aware, airplanes, tanks, armored huge cannon, antiaircraft and machine guns, bombs and all the rest of arms that win wars were rolling out of Detroit in a flood that daily grew wider and deeper.

A few months, at the latest not more than January, the United States must be prepared to defend herself under the Monroe Doctrine and, if need be, restore democracy to her violated European throne. Mr. Roosevelt's call for 10,000 airplanes was being heeded in the corner of Detroit's vast foundries, and factories. Mr. Ford was well on his way to producing a thousand a day. The Chrysler plant was turning out tanks beside which the Germans' fighting fortresses would be toys. General Motors was shoveling forth armoured cars and trucks, to say nothing of liquid-cooled airplane engines that they consign England's Rolls-Royce to a bargain basement. Packard was equipping our Navy with marine engines which could, with a few twists and a bit of gadgeting there, become motors for bombers. But doubtless you've heard it too. Well, the truth hurt you more than it hurt us.

Detroit Discovers the Bottleneck

The story bears the same relation to facts as a fan magazine's biography of a movie star. Perhaps by the time you read this a serious order or two may have been given to the mass-production wizards of Detroit—admittedly the most massive of all industrial huddles, the citadel of assembly-line magic. Many weeks had passed since Mr. Roosevelt had sounded his ringing alarms and, save for a Rolls-Royce order which had been skittering around like a hockey puck, not a war order except for trucks and a few shell casings, nor a command to get set, had reached Detroit. Had they come, as military orders must, Detroit would have been able to begin to fill them for six months to a year. After that period, in a pinch at first and then in salvation quantities, we'd see something of what the country believes is happening now. The delay is blamed on bottlenecks, the one with which Detroit seethes and in which you become violently ill because you've been there a day. We'll get upon that in its turn. But to prepare you for the details we shall deal with generalities. The chief of these, according to the most active if not the best industrial minds in Detroit, is that it takes anywhere from three to five months at our present hookworm speed to Connecting rods for the Packard marine motor under inspection for precision. A superb motor, easily adapted for airplane use, Packard at the time this photo was made was producing one a day

Detroit's Defense Headache

By Walter Davenport

PHOTOGRAPHS FOR COLLIER'S BY VALENTINO SARRA

This intricate machine tool, a $12,000 precision grinder, handles a single one of the hundreds of operations necessary to build the marine motor. Its job is to finish-grind connecting-rod holes

Machine tools in quantity must be built by other machine tools. Even in normal times, it takes six months to make the one above, which is boring out valve guides for the liquid-cooled Allison plane motor. Left, precision-profiling a cylinder top troit, where you'd think they'd know better, you're asked how soon Mr. Ford will be producing a thousand planes a day and how many he's turning out at the moment.

The whole story's a little incredible but that's not our fault. Even in Detroit the average citizen believes that the United States is well around the first lap of the defense relay and breaking track records. And the reason for all this misconception is, fundamentally, that the starter fired the gun before the boys were on their marks—or even finished their training. The noise you've been hearing is the hoopla and wahoo of the Administration cheering section. Virtually none has arisen from Detroit's factories.

Good Motors but Not Enough

General Motors is making one of the world's best aviation engines—the Allison. And yet after two or three years of designing and experimenting and months of manufacturing, Allison is turning out a grand total of two or three a day. Of course, no national emergency existed during those years of experimentation, accounting for General Motors' lack of headlong speed. In the meantime the Army is praying for motors to power 400-mile-per-hour pursuit ships and morale-busting dive bombers.

General Motors is producing Diesel engines, as light, as compact and more powerful than the Germans'. She can turn them out with the celerity and flourish that we like to think of as pure Yankee. But neither Detroit nor any other industrial circus can be ready within eight months to build the tanks to house these oil-burning monsters.

And unless Washington stops cheering itself and starts working up an honest sweat it may be several more months—perhaps a year—before the tank builders produce their wares as fast as General Motors can power them. At the present malarial rate we can produce tanks at a speed of one every now and then. We are not referring to puddle-jumper whippets, but to solid bruisers that won't die at the first stone fence.

Packard is producing a marine engine that has no superior. Packard is turning out these beautiful creatures at the stupefying rate of almost one a day. They told us that it wouldn't be a miracle-maker's job to convert it into an airplane engine. However, they're crawling out of the Packard plant now for use in those so-called Suicide Boats—the swift, torpedo putt-putts designed to dash forth upon unsuspecting battleships and cruisers and slip them a torpedo or two where it will do them the least good. To raise the rate of production of these beauties to two a day would cost Packard about $800,000.

In Packard's engineering laboratories, the great Jesse Vincent, co-designer of the famous Liberty engine, one of the exceedingly few worth-while triumphs of the first World War, is plotting an airplane engine. But that's still on paper and the only paper Congress seems interested in is the Congressional Record. You've probably read that Packard, having accepted that Rolls-Royce contract for 9,000 Merlin engines (6,000 for England and the rest for us), is rushing production. Packard doesn't say that. Packard frankly says that at least ten months will pass before it will produce one engine a day. In fifteen months, if all goes well, forty-two engines will be rolling off Packard's assembly line daily. If all goes well. That means that Packard will hold to this schedule if they get speedy delivery of machinery and tools to be set up in a building yet to be constructed. To build the contract's 9,000 engines will consume quite a while at that rate. And if England should collapse beneath Hitler's bombers before her two thirds are made, will the United States take them? The United States will have to—in spite of the Army's opinion that the Allison is preferable and that American engine designs and designers are superior to the British.

Chrysler, too, has an airplane motor on paper—a 2,000-horsepower blazer that had visiting Army engineers shaking hands with one another. It would take Chrysler a year or two to produce it and no one's quite sure how long it would be before it could be made in serious numbers. But among the first things we heard upon arriving in Detroit was that Chrysler was making the heaven-scraping dreadnaught in the Kriegelots. At the Chrysler plant they're making Army trucks by the thousand on the assembly line, but there's no time to that. They're just trucks. No time at all in Detroit.

We could go on like this at a snail's rate. But that gives you the idea. What do we wish to have you think of this national emergency (better than getting sick of that term too) and the armament putsch, we are producing nothing material. That would be wrong of us. We are busily making every known variety of bottleneck and daily inventing more. Before you've poked around Detroit a day or two you're in danger of being hopelessly lost in a labyrinth of bottlenecks, each of which is equipped with 2,000-horsepower pains. Let's set down a few on the list being Detroit's, not ours: The War House, Congress, the War Department, the Treasury Department, the War Department, the steel industry, the machinery makers, the machine-tool manufacturers and, naturally, politics, tradition, the New Deal and Mr. L. Lewis. Don't think us flippant. We are being so realistic that it's almost wringing.

We're Starting from Scratch

If you're complaining of our country's slow stagger toward a supreme land force and a two-ocean Navy, remember, please, that the United States is being forced to man, gun and wing its way within an inch of the bankruptcy. And she's stumbling to arms without the aid of any of those Hell's European branches—Skoda, Bofors, Schneider, Vickers and Krupp. In this, the most mechanized of all countries, there is one of such population-reducing potential. Moreover, unlike 1914-1918, the United States hasn't had time to convert its peaceful arts into a murder machine. Nor have the hapless Allies of 1939-1940 had the time or money to convert us into a nation-wide Skoda. Look at Mr. Hitler seven years and, say, Detroit, ten billion dollars, to produce a nonstop meat grinder. We're rich and perched, geared to the ear and screwy enough to try anything, but we're not going to match Mr. Hitler in seven months with fifteen billion dollars. Or twenty billion. Every time the ballyhoo boys are exhorting us to patriotic fury but not being any too specific. If you really want to do something worth while you'll grab the nearest leg or baseball bat and smash the necks and turpentine Congress into immediate red-tape-burning brambles.

Not that even such practical measures will arm us overnight. But we're doing something we haven't done around to yet—getting started. It's taken Detroit forty years to learn to roll off three to four million cars a year. The process is now as natural as sweating, as automatic as cursing government—bless its heart. But the minute you demand that the machine maker produce something new in trouble. When Henry Ford came from his sainted Model T to his Model A, his factories were closed for a year. It took months and $2,000,000 worth of new tools and dies and shiny gadgets to change Chrysler's mouth from a four-cylinder whizzer to a six. Next-year models mean months of engineering design and machine changes in any factory. The point is that all Detroit needs

(Continued on page 43)

Traitor's Purse

By Margery Allingham

ILLUSTRATED BY ELMORE BROWN

Swift romance and desperate intrigue in a new novel as modern as mechanized war

HE muttering was indistinct. It crept down the dark ward, forcing itself upon the man who lay in the pool of light at the far end of the vast room. The man tried to concentrate on the muttering. Mercifully it was recognizable. There were two distinct voices when he could catch them the words meant something. That was good. That was hopeful. A little while the words might start directing and then, please God, he would learn something and this appalling gear would recede. From where he lay he could just see a gleam of polished floor, a section of a bare, empty bed, and a tall, shrouded figure, fading into complete darkness at the top where the shaded light over his own head was too faint to reach it. These were entirely unfamiliar. He was not even sure that he was in a hospital. That was part of the whole situation. He knew what a hospital was; that was comforting. His mind was clear enough as far as it went . . . as far as it went. He concentrated on the muttering. It was a long way away. They must be outside the farther door up there in the darkness. The woman was a nurse, of course. The discovery delighted him foolishly. He was getting on. At any moment now other obvious things must occur to him. He had no idea who the man was but the rumble was human and friendly. He settled himself to listen. He shan't question him myself, you know." He heard the man's words with mild interest.

"I dare say not." She sounded acid. "It's very serious indeed. I wonder they left him alone with only us here. It's not very nice."

"There's no need to worry about that, Miss." The rumble was aggrieved. "I'd like a quid for every one I've handled. He'll be quiet enough, you'll see. Probably he won't even remember what's happened—or he'll say he doesn't until he's seen a lawyer. They're like that nowadays, up to anything."

The man in bed listened avidly.

"THEY'LL hang him, I suppose," said the nurse.

"Bound to, Miss." The man was both apologetic and definite. "It was one of us, you see, so there's no way of getting out of it. Once a man slugs an officer of police he's in for it. It's a necessary precaution for the safety of the public," he added, not without satisfaction. "This chap had all the money on 'im, too. That'll take a bit of explaining on its own."

Slugging a policeman. He knew what that meant, whatever condition his mind was in. That was pretty serious. It was so serious that it made him sweat. Moved by the odd singleness of purpose symptomatic of his condition, he got out of bed.

He moved very quickly and naturally, still partly wrapped in the shrouding comfort of semiconsciousness, and therefore made no noise at all.

He chose the nearest door, since even he recognized the prudence of avoiding the mutterers, and his bare feet were silent on the tiles of the passage. It was a wide corridor, clean and yet ill lit because the bulbs were shaded heavily and cast separate circles of light on the gleaming floor.

It was in one of these circles that he saw the hairpin. He stooped to pick it up mechanically and the wave of dull pain that swept over him as he bent down frightened him.

The tiles, striking cold on his bare soles, pulled him together a little and he became aware for the first time that he was undressed and the coarse hospital pajamas were his only covering. It was obvious that some sort of clothes were imperative.

HE GLANCED around him anxiously. The walls were as bare as an empty plate save for the fire buckets, and the alcove beneath that crimson row escaped him until he was upon it and then the glimpse of the red-rimmed glass case within jerked him to a standstill. He stood before the cupboard transfixed. There was the usual paraphernalia inside. A black oilskin coat hung at the back and the toes of a pair of thigh-boots showed just beneath it, while the hose was draped around the ensemble in neat heraldic festoons.

The man in pajamas ignored the invitation printed on the enameled plate requiring him to break the glass. Instead, he concentrated on the keyhole in the smooth red wood. When he lifted his hand to touch it, he rediscovered the hairpin and a warmth of satisfaction spread over him. So it was one of those merciful dreams in which things came out all right—if it worked.

He had no time to speculate on his own somewhat peculiar accomplishments. The bent wire flicked over the lock easily, as if he had done it a hundred times. The absence of oilskin trousers bothered him, but the boots were tremendous. They came well up over his thighs and the coat had a belt that came off and could be slipped through the boot loops. The sou'wester cap, which fell out of the ensemble, struck him as amusing but he put it on and buttoned the coat high across his chest with deep relief.

The door of the case, imperfectly closed, swung open again and startled him as it touched him. That was no good. That would give him away at

"Rather a depressing assembly," Lee murmured diffidently, "but it simply couldn't be helped. This is municipal intelligentsia, my dear chap"

once. If that crackling nurse put her head out of the ward that would be the first thing her pince-nez would light on. He thrust it back into its place, using far more force than he had intended. The thin glass splintered easily. The gentle clatter it made on the tiles was almost musical but the automatic bell, which he had failed to notice above the case, was a different matter.

It screamed at him, sending every nerve in his body tingling to the roots of his hair; and from every side, above him and beneath him, other bells echoed it in a monstrous cacophony of alarm.

Doors swung open, rushing feet swept down on him, cries, sharp demands for information, raised anxious voices, they whirled around his head like bees from an overturned hive.

He ran, with his oilskin coat flapping and scraping around his hampered limbs. He passed the elevator cages and sped on to the staircase. As he reached the second landing he collided with an elderly man in a white coat, who caught his sleeve.

"Can't wait, sir." The words escaped him as he wrenched free. "Look after your patients," he shouted as an afterthought as he took to the next flight.

He had almost reached the threshold of the emergency doors when a girl slipped in front of him. As he dodged around her she spoke quietly. "Is it by the gate?" she inquired idiotically.

He glanced at her over his shoulder and received a momentary impression of a heart-shaped face and disconcertingly intelligent eyes.

"The fire's at the back, Miss. Nothing serious," he said briefly, and dived out into the darkness eagerly.

"The fire's at the back, Miss. Nothing serious," he said briefly and dived out into darkness

It was not a pitch-black night. There was a moon behind the thin cover of clouds and, as soon as his eyes became accustomed to the change, the show of grayness of the darkened town became fairly negotiable.

THE scene meant nothing to him. He was in a large semicircular driveway in which a dozen cars were parked. He took the nearest car. It seemed the wisest thing to do at the time, although he had some difficulty in managing the controls, hampered as he was by his mighty boots. Still, the little run started and he took her gently down the slope to the open gates. He turned when he reached the high road, not because it seemed more likely to be lucky than the other direction, but treading hard on the accelerator, rattled on down the dim ribbon of asphalt.

He had traveled half a mile when he became aware of a car behind him. He pulled in a little to allow it to pass but the driver behind made no attempt to overtake but appeared content to keep at a distance of twenty-five yards or so.

Whenever a convenient turning presented itself he took it, but always his companion followed him. If he slowed the car for a moment or so by some adroit piece of driving, invariably he was on speed and caught up with him.

A sudden dip in the road was his undoing. He hit the water splash at the bottom without seeing it and a white spray rose up over him, rushing through the radiator and obscuring the windshield. The engine coughed and died.

He sat where he was and waited. Nothing happened. He turned his head cautiously and peered through the window. The other car was in its familiar place, a few yards behind. It too was stationary and there was no telling who sat behind that

(Continued on page 24)

What Happened to France

By André Maurois

TRANSLATED BY DENVER LINDLEY

"Paul Reynaud's air of always being right on financial questions was designed to exasperate many politicians"

In a war cabinet torn by personal hatred and France's hopes for victory were submerged in the political ambitions and aims of her leaders

HOW THE CLASH OF PERSONALITIES IMPEDED THE CONDUCT OF THE WAR

VERY often in history the conflicts of rival leaders have interfered with the conduct of wars and with the government of nations. In 1918 France had the good fortune to find a man energetic enough to restrain all who might have tried to hinder his policies: that was Clemenceau. In 1933 on the contrary, during the whole campaign, Edouard Daladier and Paul Reynaud, though they were both good men, never ceased to contend with each other for political power, and the incurable animosity was one of the causes of our misfortunes.

On the day when King George VI was crowned in Westminster Abbey, a British officer who was sitting beside me told me as Paul Reynaud made his entrance, and asked: "Who is that little fellow with the Japanese face?"

I replied: "That little man is the premier of France."

From the time when he married Marie Henri-Robert, daughter of a distinguished lawyer and childhood friend of my wife, I had followed with interest the career of Paul Reynaud. I considered him one of the most intelligent of our politicians and also one of the bravest. On many occasions I have seen him, against his own interests, defend ideas that were anathema to his constituents. He alone had the courage, at the time when the pound declined, to advise the devaluation of the franc, a measure that events rendered inevitable later on. He alone among our statesmen made a careful study of the ideas of Colonel de Gaulle on the subject of motorized armies and carried on a campaign for the creation of powerful armored divisions. He alone at a time when the youth of France was abandoned to its own devices gave as a title to a political book: "Youth, What Sort of France Do You Want?"

A short time before the war he accepted the ministry of finance in circumstances that had led his predecessors to despair of France's credit, and he succeeded in a few weeks in bringing billions of francs in gold into the treasury. I liked to see him, when a subject fired his imagination, get to his feet, put his hands in his pockets, throw back his head to raise his short figure to its full height and hold forth in picturesque and biting phrases in a voice like hammer blows. "A little fighting cock," we'd say, and hoped he'd fight for the right causes.

(Continued on page 47)

The irritation between Reynaud (left) and Daladier (right) grew to hatred when aggravated by the schemes of women. Here the two rivals are seen with Georges Bonnet, minister of justice in Daladier's cabinet

INTERNATIONAL

Mike Todd, producer and his own ballyhoo artist, gives Fair visitors a preview of Gay New Orleans

Cut-Rate Showman

By J. Bryan III

TOMORROW night is momentous. At precisely 8:17, some visitor to the World's Fair will buy a ticket to The Streets of Paris, or Gay New Orleans, or the Dancing Campus, or the Op'ry House—no matter which—and thereby will make the total number of people who have seen Michael Todd productions greater than the total audience of any other producer. Mr. Todd himself is the sole authority for this debatable estimate, and freely admits that he arrived at it with the help of a ouija board and a clairvoyant cockatoo.

There is no doubt that these four attractions of Mr. Todd's are among the most popular in the Fair's Amusement Area. Nor is there doubt that his Hot Mikado was a vast success at last year's Fair. But there is still the implication that his first production must have been The Black Crook or Ben Hur, and that he is something of a Broadway patriarch, fondling his memories of Duse, Bernhardt and Booth.

Mike Todd, the new boy wonder of show business, sums up his success in six words, "Nobody ever went broke handling crowds"

PHOTOGRAPH FOR COLLIER'S BY IFOR THOMAS

Mr. Todd was thirty-three this past June. He is a short, burly, broad-shouldered young man, with a bear-trap jaw that has locked on a huge cigar for want of a bear. He is addicted to bright green raiment. ("Clothes" would be a pallid word.) He has a felonious contempt for the laws of grammar. He is also, and primarily, a showman.

Todd's shows are coining money at admission prices far below what was previously accepted as the starvation minimum. A single twenty-five-cent ticket to his Gay New Orleans, for instance, entitles the customer to three full-length shows and a series of side shows.

"I can't figure why they didn't offer me one of the nominations," Todd complains. "Roosevelt fixed a buck to worth fifty-nine cents. I fixed two bits to worth two bucks."

What the boys want to know is how he did it. Todd is happy to tell them. Maxim Number One is "How much of a show can you give 'em for how many seats?" Number Two is "It costs just the same to run a show whether it's to eight people or eight thousand. Number Three is "Keep your price low and set one price for the whole show. We're all show-offs. We don't care sitting in the balcony if the doll knows it costs just the same as the orchestra. And they add up to 'Nobody ever went broke handling crowds.'"

One night last year Todd took the box office at The Hot Mikado. Forty-cent seats had already been sold out; thirty-two 99-cent seats were left. Before he had sold them too, he took away 300 people looking for the cheap seats.

"Figure it out," says Todd. "Two times ninety-nine cents is $198. Three hundred times forty cents is $120. Nobody had to rub my nose in it like that."

"And another thing: eighty per cent of all tickets is sold in pairs, so you can price 'em so that the guy'll have some change left over. Let him show it."

(Continued on page 39)

Sauts the Bat

By Herbert Ravenel Sass

ILLUSTRATED BY HERBERT MORTON STOOPS

Saluting an Indian brave your school history book ignored. He was killed by his greatest admirer

SAUTS THE BAT rose. He was so tall that Ellsinger thought he would never stop rising. Yet when he was his feet, standing there at the lower end of the big army tent, he didn't look tall. That was because he was so magnificently made. "By gravy," said Ellsinger to himself, "he's the jimmeliest-lookin' chief I ever seen anywhere."

Sauts the Bat had another name. The Texas settlers called him Roman Nose, and this name, Ellsinger thought, was a better.

He had a Roman nose, all right—a nose like an eagle's beak. He stood six feet four, Ellsinger figured; he looked to be thirty years old; there wasn't a pound of soft flesh on him.

Ellsinger couldn't tear his eyes away from this living bronze statue. Through a small slit that he had found in the canvas wall he could see the whole interior of the long hospital tent in which a council was being held: General Palmer and the other officers of the post stood in full uniform at one end of the tent, the Cheyenne chiefs and their wild warriors at the other end. But from the center that Sauts the Bat, or Roman Nose, rose from his place among the Cheyennes, Ellsinger never saw any of the others.

He was a queer creature, this little up-shouldered Sigmund Ellsinger. A dozen years earlier, had come straight from the immigrant dock in New York to the Kansas prairies, who had been five years a plainsman, six years an Indian, and now was a white man again. There was something in him you'd never have suspected.

He crouched, his eyes close to the slit in the tent wall, staring at Roman Nose standing in front of the other chiefs. Two of the latter he recognized, but in his years with the Cheyennes he hadn't happened to meet the young warrior who was known as Sauts the Bat, and who had since become the most influential leader of the tribe. Ellsinger watched, completely fascinated, as the tall Indian began to move forward toward the middle of the tent—toward the white men.

Roman Nose moved slowly, yet Ellsinger had an impression of catlike quickness as well as enormous strength.

This man moved exactly like that tiger—the same smooth-flowing motion, but with a terrible power in it that scared you even through the bars of the cage.

It scared Ellsinger now. He had a panicky feeling that this beautiful, terrible tiger of a man, advancing silently toward the table behind which the officers were seated, was going to leap upon General Palmer and tear out his throat.

Ellsinger saw that General Palmer's hands were clasped upon the table in front of him but that the hands of the officers on either side were hidden below the table; and he knew that those officers had their hands on their revolvers.

If Roman Nose didn't halt . . .

Midway of the long tent Roman Nose stopped. He flung back his white buffalo robe, beautifully tanned and soft as cashmere, exposing his powerful shoulders and broad, arched chest.

He stood there in silence for almost half a minute, his fierce black eyes roving from one to another of the officers seated at the table. Perhaps he knew the electric power of his presence and staged this dramatic pause deliberately; to Ellsinger the magnificent arrogance of his bearing seemed the perfect and wholly natural complement of his flawless and terrific beauty.

Suddenly Roman Nose spoke.

"I am Sauts the Bat," he said in the Cheyenne tongue. "I am the war chief of the Cheyennes. I have come here to the white man's fort to speak for my people. It is the first time that I have taken the white man's hand in friendship. It is for the white chief to say whether it shall be the last."

"I do not need many words. This land is my people's land, the land of the Cheyennes. It has always been our land, not the white man's. We wish to live on it as we have always lived. When the white men first came to our land, we treated them kindly, but they have not repaid our kindness. At Sand Creek they killed and scalped more Cheyenne women and children in one day than all the white women ever killed by the Cheyennes. They have killed our people and driven away our game until we do not know whether we can live on our own land much longer."

(Continued on page 45)

A great bronze man burst through the smoke. He was about to leap his horse upon the island

Hade is in Jail

By Donald Hough

ILLUSTRATED BY EARL OLIVER HURST

Hade Crosby can blame nobody but himself for his plight. He wouldn't have it any other way

I HAVE got this job here with the Flying B, and I am sitting on my bunk thinking her over, and I am mighty happy. It is not like I am used to, in the way of a ranch or a job either. It is the beginning of a new time of my life.

The way I got it is: I came up here to Montana to catch on with a roundup someplace, I have got my saddle and bedroll with me, and I figured if I could get on a roundup, then when the roundup is over I would try to get a job for the winter right where I am at.

So I am looking around, and I get the idea to try the Flying B. This is the biggest outfit in the state, and the hands they have got are all steady hands and every cowboy in the north would like to work for this outfit. They told me in Bozeman it is no use trying, but I think maybe they might need an extra hand for the roundup and besides I have never saw the time it did any harm to ask, so I walk out here, and I ask.

Darn' if I don't get on for the roundup.

Well, when the roundup is part way over, this is about a week ago, I saw Joe Parks, he is the foreman, "Joe, what about staying on after the roundup for a steady job, or anyway for the winter?"

Joe says, "Steve, you are mighty lucky, you have hit it just when I am going to take a new hand on. Now there must be a hundred fellows want a job here, but the thing of it is, Steve, I have saw you ride and I have saw you cut and you and the boys have got a fine together and I have a good mind to make you a Flying B hand."

"For the winter," I ask him, "steady?"

"Steady," he says.

So I get the job, steady. Which is more than I figured.

So I am sitting here on my bunk, thinking her over. I have bought the Flying B brand on my bedroll and saddle and chaps, and I am all set to have got a steady job, but the best part of it is, I have got a home. I am mighty tired of not having a home, going over the country, and this is the beginning of a new time of my life, and I am mighty happy.

There is only one thing could make me better. With me, whenever I have some good luck or find a good place or something, I want my friends to

Well, somebody has sense enough to start a phonograph record and stand up and we go ahead and dance.

Hurst

"Steve," he says, "just take a look at this. It gives you a good idea of what it means to have a woman around" too, and now I am sure wishing Crosby was here. Him and Nancy. I and Nancy have got an understanding, not engaged but just an understanding, and the last time I saw she was working in a lunch counter in Wyoming. She is a mighty fine waitress, but I have lost track of her and she has lost track of me, and if I only find her or where she is I will try to get her to come on up here and we can get a job in Bozeman and, well, go on with our understanding.

I cannot figure it, about Hade. The time I saw Hade was in Nevada, and we went together, and Hade did it there and he pulled out and he would see me in Montana in the fall of the year. In Bozeman, he said, when I got up here I looked around and Hade and all over, and I cannot find Hade. At the time I get the steady Joe Parks tells me he is going to give me one more extra hand for the roundup, and I tell him about Hade and Hade always work fine together, and he says if Hade shows up, soon he will take him on. And where in the hell is Hade? I sure wish I and Hade could work together again. That old devil of a Hade. Hade does not show up, and Joe Parks is another fellow, that worked here a couple years ago. He comes in to take a late one afternoon when we are back from the roundup and laying on our bunks before supper, and he throws a bedroll on a bunk and sits down. The other fellows all know him and he has been in Arizona a year but also he stopped off for a while down in the Hole, down there in Wyoming.

Hade always stops off in the Hole, so I ask him if he has saw Hade.

He looks at me and says, "Hell, yes." I am sitting up straight on my bunk. He says, "I saw Hade Crosby in the Hole not two weeks ago."

"What is he doing down there?" I ask. He says, "Hade is in jail."

"I guess you got the wrong one," I tell him. "Hade would never get in no jail."

THE fellow kind of laughs, and so do the others. I have been telling them about Hade, and now here is Hade in jail. The fellow says:

"Hade is in jail, all right. He threw a spittoon through a window at the Teton Bar, and he broke down a fence around the square, and he poked Jim Bassett, the town marshal, a good one on the beeper. I think he is in jail for life."

I cannot understand this. "Hade is not a drinking fellow," I say.

"He was cold sober," he says. "Nobody in the Hole can figure it."

All I can do is kind of sit there, thinking. So Hade is in trouble, my old friend Hade. So that is why I have not met Hade in Bozeman in the fall of the year. Well, the supper bell rings, and we all go up, and it is a fine supper, like always. And boy, tonight I am eating plenty, because I do not know where I am eating next, or for that matter when. I am going down to the Hole.

I have got nearly forty dollars left over from my first pay after buying some winter clothes and things, and after supper I ask Joe Parks what he figures my saddle is worth to the outfit, cash.

"You mean you are pulling out, Steve?" he says.

"Yes, Joe," I tell him. And I tell him about Hade. He says, "You better think her over, boy. You don't get a job like this every day."

"I know it," I say, "but the thing of it is, Hade is in jail and I and him are friends. If I was the one in jail, and somebody would come along and get me out, I wouldn't even have to ask the name of who it is that is getting me out, because I would know it would be Hade."

"I see how it is," Joe says. "Well, Steve, I would like to keep the job open, but I don't see how I could do her."

"I wouldn't expect you to," I tell him. "I am selling my outfit, I got to pay up the various bills for what Hade has done, and I might not have enough and I would have to work a while down there to get the rest."

So I and Joe go down to the bunkhouse and make a deal for twenty-five dollars cash for the saddle and rope, and one of the fellows is looking for a good bedroll and he gives me six bucks for mine, and I sell my chaps, and a K-Bar knife I just paid three dollars for, and when I am through I have got eighty-three dollars and four bits, in all.

They ask me when I am leaving and I say in the morning, and Joe Parks says, "Steve, I'll drive you to Bozeman tonight, and you can sleep in the back room at the Cowboy Bar there and get a good early start in the morning."

Then the fellow that bought my bedroll says I can take it along to the Cowboy and sleep in it tonight, and he will pick it up when he is in.

SO I say goodbye to the fellows and Joe takes me to town and drops me off at the Cowboy, and I go in and spend a dime of my money for a beer and sit there drinking it, and I am looking out the window and I see Joe going past on his way back to the ranch and Slim Powers is with him, going out to take my job.

After while I ask about sleeping in the back room, and the fellow says go to her, so I go back and spread out the bedroll and roll up in her, and the floor is hard and I am hungry already and I am not starting on a new time of my life after all, I am only waiting for morning. Like always.

I am late getting down to the Hole. I had hard luck getting rides and I am two days later than I thought, and it is Saturday night and Jim Bassett and Ed Jones, who runs the Teton Bar, have

(Continued on page 51)

Peace at a Price

By Ken W. Purdy

ILLUSTRATED BY HARDIE GRAMATRY

A SHORT SHORT STORY COMPLETE ON THIS PAGE

TWO hundred and forty-seven steps to the top of the tower! Pieter Halvelde knew them well, as one knows old friends. Three times a week, on Wednesdays, Fridays and Sundays, for twenty years exactly, he had climbed these worn stairs to the bell chamber high over the city, that the good people of Souvain might have their music. In those two decades he had not missed a day. For that was his duty, that was his place in life. And it was a proud place. You had to be a Belgian to know how proud a place. Pieter Halvelde did not propose to sully it now, bombs or no bombs, Germans or no Germans.

At the hundredth step, Pieter Halvelde stopped to rest. He sat down, puffing a little, dropping his hands beside him. They were the firm, incredibly strong hands of the carillonneur, hands that could make a ten-ton bell thunder and shout, and they caressed the stone of the step as if it were soft and living stuff. The idea moved him. There was much of Belgium, he thought, in that patient block of granite, more of Belgium than could be contained in any dead thing. There was the life of the men who had trod it, Belgians and musicians all: his father, Hans Jules Halvelde, and before him the Van den Ghens, father and son; before them the master Doorslaer, and before him . . . it was a long line. It ran back through the centuries, without a break, to the very building of the church, in 1658.

Pieter Halvelde could not believe it would end now, in the monstrous year 1940. The bells of Sint-Nicolas were mellow with the years when Napoleon stormed across Europe. They had pealed Wilhelm's downfall. They would peal another's.

He rose heavily and turned again to the stairs, climbing steadily, slowly. At the two-hundred-and-fifth step he stopped, made the sign of the cross and whispered a Credo. It was on the two-hundred-and-fifth step that Theo Van Aasche had died, on Easter Sunday, 1712. He had risen from his deathbed to go to the keyboard, and so far did he climb, alone and unaided, before life left him.

Pieter Halvelde went on. It was nearly noon, and at twelve o'clock precisely, he must begin to play. Finally at the top, he shouldered the trap door aside and climbed into the playing cabin, a square, small room, bare except for the mellow oaken keyboard with its long bench, and the old music chest. There was a small bronze plaque on one wall. "In This Room," it read, "On the 27th Day of October, 1914, Hans Jules Halvelde, Carillonneur, Saved the Bells of Sint-Nicolas from the Invader." Beneath, yellowed in its frame, was the letter from the old king.

PIETER stood for a moment reading the well-remembered words of the citation. That had been a brave day. His father had been playing and he had been watching, learning, as later his own son was to learn, when the Germans—a sergeant and three men—had burst in.

"You will stop instantly," the sergeant had shouted. "It is forbidden to play patriotic music! Furthermore, the bells are to be taken down and sent to the Fatherland for scrap metal. At once!"

Hans Jules had stared at the man with a mounting fury in his eyes. "I shall play upon this carillon," he had told the German, "for as long as I live and am able, and I shall play what I please, if you kill me for it."

Other men might kill and destroy, but they could not touch what he had now. Pieter Halvelde had made his own peace

The German had sneered. "That can be arranged. By the time the bells come down, they will be of better use for bronze."

Pieter Halvelde still shuddered when he thought of it. The forty-three bells of Sint-Nicolas were cast by Pieter Hemony himself. Since the nineteenth century, no man had made such bells. If the secret was lost, it could not be recovered. These bells were almost beyond repair. "You great lout!" old Hans Jules had shouted at the German, "do you think these are school bells? You idiot, would you smash a Stradivarius violin to make kindling wood?"

Ah, the old one had been a brave and determined man. In the end, he had swayed even the commandant of the district. The bells of Sint-Nicolas stayed in their tower. Pieter Halvelde hoped he could do as well, when the Germans came again.

HE SHOOK his head sadly at the thought. He open one of the four great doors. In the distance, he could hear the low murmur of the city. Now, the obscene mutter of the guns. Below him the city lay outspread. The market place was a shambles of ruins. The bombers had passed only a few days ago, and they had done their worst. To the west an entire block lay smoldering. Pieter Halvelde knew the house in that block. But he did not count carefully from the corner to the particular heap of rubble that had been his. The men were still working at the tangle of beams and steel. Evidently they had found nothing to do.

Pieter Halvelde seated himself at the keyboard, his feet resting on the leather-covered pedals, his hands on the long, fingerlike oaken keys. An hour tolled he took up the couplet—eleven, twelve—and before the poignant hum of the huge bell he struck it again, twice, and launched into an impromptu improvisation. Beneath the melody the bass marched and countermarched the tread of a conquering army.

In the thunderous cacophony of the bells a few feet over his head Pieter Halvelde lost himself. The war was out of his mind, the bombers were more, and even the horror that had come to him that morning was eased. The men might kill and burn and destroy, but they could not touch what he had. In this there was solace to lift a man above the obscenity of war. Long before he had finished his program, Pieter Halvelde had made his own peace.

They were waiting for him at the top of the tower when he came down. He had known they would be: Vander Pirsoul and the others. It was Vander Pirsoul who came forward. His message was written on his face, but Pieter Halvelde let him speak it.

"Pieter," he said, "I must tell you it was as we all feared. Your son is in the house. He had gone to the city as you told him he must, and he was where we found him."

Someone else broke in: "You are a brave lad, M'sieu' Halvelde, for you were so young. He died a soldier's death."

Pieter Halvelde turned away. "Thank you, messieurs," he said. "I accept my gratitude. You are true friends. He left them and walked slowly to the ruined market place to Franz Pirsoul's little tobacco shop. Franz had opened the door. Obviously, he had and he would have spoken, but he cut him short.

"Franz," he said. "I am not any more. I cannot play forever. Now I must begin all over again. I need someone to take my place. I understand that your Martin has shown promise on the organ. It would be a pleasure if you sent him to me, tomorrow or the next day."

Killer's Truck

William Mac Harg

STATED BY HARRY L. TIMMINS body had the wrong

ver to explain the
in the truck—even alley was confused

ADY got found dead in her unk in the Town Central Hotel," Malley said. "That's all I know, been told to go there."

along with him. It was a side-hotel, small and rather dingy. The as 302. There were some cops round a square, old-fashioned
The dead girl was quite young, must have been pretty, and she had angled.

Who's the lady?" O'Malley asked the cops.

The hotel register says her name's and she registered from Buffalo.
seen dead since night before last.
elay morning a hotel maid came in up the room. The girl was in the kitchen, but the maid didn't notice big wrong. This morning the same found the room hadn't been used, reported it. They got suspicious opened the trunk."

As line on who done it?"

There's letters here from some fel-named Newden."

examined the letters. They warned not to come to New York. We at the girl's things. There were hundred dollars in her handbag.
re was a railroad timetable in it,
on the timetable someone had
"Town Central Hotel."

Whose handwriting?" O'Malley asked cops.

He didn't know.

Let's look at that register."

He looked at it. The handwriting on register was the same as on the timetable. "Well," O'Malley remarked, "they give me anything to do here, and there's no need of it."

Do you think Newden killed her?" I asked. "Them cops will find out."

The case was in the evening papers.
Miss Dalling had made only one phone call and the police had traced it to Newden. They had discovered a motive.
Newden had lived in Buffalo and had been acquainted with Miss Dalling.
They had expected they'd be married. Then Newden had got a job in New York. In New York he had become acquainted with a girl named Miss Hargis, the daughter of the man for whom he worked. They were engaged to be married. Newden denied having been in the hotel.

There was more the next morning.
The police were continuing to question employees and guests of the hotel. They had police in other cities question who had checked out from the hotel in that way they had found witnesses. A guest named Hardis had seen Miss Dalling admit Newden to her hotel about seven-thirty in the evening.
Another named Valley had seen him

(Continued on page 31)

The bellboy opened it.
I was startled because I thought at first the body was in it. Then I saw that the figure was a lay figure

The Patriotic Murders

By Agatha Christie

ILLUSTRATED BY MARIO COOPER

The Story Thus Far:

HERCULE POIROT, noted Belgian detective, leaves the office of Henry Morley, a London dentist, and goes to his flat. An hour or so later, Inspector Japp, of Scotland Yard, telephones him and tells him that Morley has committed suicide.

A skeptical person, Poirot does not accept Japp's verdict. He believes that the dentist—healthy, prosperous, happy—had been shot to death. And he starts an investigation. Suspect No. 1 is Mr. Amberiotis, a wealthy Greek, who had been Morley's last patient. But before the Belgian can interview him, he dies of an overdose of dental drugs!

The inference is obvious: Having killed the Greek accidentally, Morley, in a fit of remorse, had shot himself. Nevertheless, Poirot does not accept the suicide theory. Nor does Mr. Reginald Barnes, an ex-secret service agent to whom the Belgian goes for advice. Mr. Barnes feels certain that a band of conspirators, who are trying to undermine the existent order in England, had planned to kill one of Morley's last patients: the wealthy Alistair Blunt. He is convinced that when they failed to get Blunt they had murdered the dentist, because, having failed in their attempt to bribe him to kill Blunt, they had felt he knew too much.

The mysterious disappearance of a woman—Miss Mabelle Sainsbury Seale, who had been in Morley's office shortly before his death—adds another curious angle to the case. And Poirot, busy interrogating various persons—Howard Raikes, a young radical from America, who had been in Morley's office at about the time Miss Sainsbury Seale had been there; Frank Carter, the fiancé of Morley's secretary; Mr. Blunt; Jane Olivera, Mr. Blunt's niece (who is in love with Raikes); and others—has no idea what has become of her.

He soon learns—the body of Miss Sainsbury Seale (the face so beaten that it is unrecognizable) is found in the flat of a middle-aged married couple: Mr. and Mrs. Albert Chapman. Unfortunately, the Chapmans cannot be questioned—they have disappeared. But, following an inspection of the murdered woman's corpse, Poirot believes that, at last, he has a key to the mystery.

Mr. Barnes calls on the Belgian. He informs Poirot that Albert Chapman had once been in the secret service. "What," Poirot says, "do you think has happened to his wife?" Mr. Barnes sighs. "I can't imagine," he replies. Then: "Anything worrying you in particular?" Poirot stares at his guest. "Yes," he says slowly. "The evidence of my own eyes."

VI

JAPP came into Poirot's sitting room and slammed down his bowler hat with such force that the table rocked.

"What the devil made you think of it?" he asked.

"My good Japp, I do not know what you are talking about."

Japp said, slowly and forcefully, "What gave you the idea that that body wasn't Miss Sainsbury Seale's body?"

Poirot looked worried. He said, "It was the face that worried me. Why smash up a dead woman's face?"

Japp said, "My word, I hope old Morley's somewhere where he can know about it. It's just possible, you know, that he was put out of the way on purpose—so that he couldn't give evidence."

"It would certainly be better if he could have given evidence himself."

"Leatheran will be all right. Morley's successor. He's a thoroughly capable man with a good manner and the evidence is unmistakable."

The evening papers came out with a sensation the next day. The body found in the Battersea flat, believed to be that of Miss Sainsbury Seale, was positively identified as that of Mrs. Albert Chapman.

Mr. Leatheran, of 58 Queen Charlotte Street, unhesitatingly pronounced it to be Mrs. Chapman on the evidence of the teeth and jaw, full particulars of which were recorded in the late Mr. Morley's professional chart.

Miss Sainsbury Seale's clothes had been found on the body and Miss Sainsbury Seale's handbag with the body—but where was Miss Sainsbury Seale herself?

As they came away from the inquest

Japp said jubilantly to Poirot, "A piece of work that. Gave 'em a sensation!"

Poirot nodded.

"You tumbled to it first," said Japp, "but, you know, I wasn't happy about that body myself. After all, you go smashing a dead person's face about for nothing. It's messy pleasant work, and it was pretty sure there must be some reason for it. There's only one reason there could be to confuse the identity." He added seriously: "But I shouldn't have turned so quickly to the fact that the woman we discovered actually was the woman."

Poirot said, with a smile, "And my friend, the actual descriptions of women were not unlike as regards fundamentals. Mrs. Chapman was a strong good-looking woman, well made up, fashionably turned out. Miss Sainsbury Seale was dowdy and innocent of stick or rouge. But the essentials were the same. Both were women of fair height and build. Both had hair turned gray which they touched up to make appear golden."

"Yes, of course, when you put it that. One thing we've got to admit—fair Mabelle put it over on both of us."

(Continued on page 34)

Her voice was imperious: "You're coming down to Exsham? Why?" "It is a kind thought of your uncle's," Poirot said

Tennis Cinderella

By Arthur Mann

BURNING
PUBLIC LIBRARY

PHOTOGRAPH FOR COLLIER'S BY EUGENE SMITH

Helen Bernhard is a nineteen-year-old with very little money in her purse and a powerful wallop in her tennis arm. Her climb to tennis fame has been a tough one, but Helen is reaching for the top now

WHEN Mamma Bernhard drove her prodigious little daughter to Boston two years ago for the Longwood competition, she packed only one tennis dress and the two rackets. Helen was but seventeen, and this was to be her first tournament among the grownups. She wouldn't survive the first round, but it would be priceless experience for one whose play had been, up till now, limited to the pigtail set.

Since they weren't invited to stop at any of the swank homes of Chestnut Hill, Mamma Bernhard hired a room for a day in a Brookline boardinghouse. After the defeat, they would return to New York and rest for the Seabright tournament the following week. That would be real fun, with swimming and dancing and meeting all the great players, thanks to a genuine invitation from the Seabright Club.

But luck was against Mamma Bernhard. First the rain upset things. Helen had to practice indoors and did so in the single tennis dress, which Mamma washed and ironed for the next day. After three days of rain, Mamma Bernhard had washed the dress three times, borrowing the landlady's electric iron for the finishing touches. Actually, she was looking forward to that first-round elimination.

Then the blue-eyed little girl with the corn-colored braids confounded all concerned by handing a royal pasting to her first-round opponent, and Mamma Bernhard's problem mounted. She had to have more money—always a source of trouble when you play the amateur tennis circuit without benefit of official or social subsidy. But she produced her remaining cash—gasoline money for the trip home—and rented the room for another day, much to the chagrin of the landlady, who had promised it to a talkative tourist.

Mamma Bernhard then tackled the other part of the problem, but with soap and water. The single tennis dress dried while the athletic prodigy slumbered. Once again Mamma borrowed the electric iron and pressed the garment.

"Now don't loiter after the match," Mamma warned, "because Papa doesn't want us driving that old car after dark."

Helen obeyed, rushing off the court in a surge of delight, for she had reached the quarter-finals of her first big tournament.

Torn between maternal pride and economic hysteria, Mamma Bernhard hurried back to rehire the room before the tourist showed up again. Then she telephoned Papa Bernhard for more money, and set to work rinsing out the dress for next day. Helen would be eliminated from the tournament tomorrow.

Well, she wasn't eliminated tomorrow, nor the next day. Sunday arrived and Mamma had washed and ironed the dress for the sixth time. During the deciding set the one racket which she had used from the start of the tournament gave way to her masculine stroking, and she paused to examine the broken string. Mrs. George Wightman, guiding light in women's tennis, called from the umpire's chair:

"You'd better get your other racket, Helen."

"Oh, no," Helen replied quickly,

"that's my good racket. I'm saving that for Seabright."

She found a matchstick, bit off the end, twisted the broken string about it and jammed it into a hole of the frame. Then she went on to win the set and the Longwood Bowl, one of the most prized trophies in tennis.

It was very exciting for one so young, but it was also difficult, because the Seabright tournament would begin the next morning. They had to drive to New York in the six-year-old car, sleep, pack and reach the shore resort in time for first-round play in the forenoon. In the morning Mamma Bernhard telephoned Seabright for permission to appear in the afternoon, and explained matters. The committee didn't know. If Helen arrived late, it would be at her own risk.

Mamma Bernhard took the chance, and let the little girl sleep late. They drove down the Jersey shore and reached Seabright in the afternoon, only to learn that the committee had defaulted the youthful winner of the Longwood Bowl for failing to arrive on time!

The way of the transgressor is a path of thornless roses compared with the trail that the modern miss, minus bank roll and social prestige, must travel to reach the pinnacle of American tennis. For men it's a cinch. Itinerant male players can sleep anywhere, eat anywhere and dress or travel as they please. They can slip into the category of Tennis Bum, a significant phrase coined by Vincent Richards, by breezing from one tournament to the next, chiseling transportation, haggling for racket strings, personal equipment and even razor blades.

But the poor girl player is denied such a shiftless existence, even if she could stomach it. She must present an immaculate appearance. She must be well-mannered, quiet and a veritable Caesar's wife in the home or private boardinghouse to which she is assigned by the tournament subsidizing her appearance.

She Plays the Hard Way

All of which makes little Helen Bernhard heroine of the net season now ending, because she has played tournament tennis the hard way—without bank roll or social sponsor. Her father is probably the best-educated parent in American tennis, being Dr. Eric Bernhard, M.A. and B.S. at St. Petersburg (Leningrad), student at Berlin, Leipzig and Heidelberg, and Ph.D. at Erlanger University, Bavaria. Mamma Bernhard, Polish-born, studied at Springfield International College and graduated from Oberlin College.

The Bernhards live in a tiny Greenwich Village apartment to devote the maximum of money to their only child's education, and avocation. This isn't much, because current civilization wastes little money on philosophers. Dr. Bernhard works in the foreign department of a New York bank because of his command of languages, and you know what's happened to the foreign banking business.

And so Helen offers nothing to the swank tennis tournaments but courage and a sound stroking technique. She went to Seabright this year, not only as defending champion, having won in 1939, but as the nation's fourth-ranking woman player, recent conqueror of Helen Jacobs in straight sets for the Middle States title, and almost conqueror of Alice Marble, American and Wimbledon champion, in Cincinnati. She had Sweet Alice at 5-1 in the third set, and was at match point six times, but simply couldn't put it over.

Yet, she was seeded far below her rank at Seabright, which is important in tournament play. The art of seeding protects star players from meeting each other in early rounds, but the Bernhard girl ran smack into Mary Hardwick, English champion, early in the week at Seabright. Helen took the first set, 6-4, and was at 3-2 in the second when Miss Hardwick demanded and received a new set of line officials. The change required ten minutes, during which time the Bernhard girl, hot and at the top of her speedy game, cooled off, and took only one game in the next twelve.

Score: Miss Hardwick wins by 4-6, 6-3, 6-1!

Reaching her boardinghouse, the Bernhard girl was given to understand that she was no longer a guest of the Seabright Club by the fact that her bag was in the lobby, and an announcement that her dinner would cost $2.50.

This is not uncommon at tennis tourneys slows the ball and so, for the past few years, players have been taught to flat-racket their shots and rarely, if ever, to use any top spin. Top spin, imparted by turning the head of the racket during the follow-through, causes the ball to curve earthward after passing the net, and paves the way for the speedy game with which Bill Tilden became the greatest of all.

It Runs in the Family

Now, little Helen Bernhard has never been able to afford a professional coach. She began playing eight years ago with a racket as big as herself. The next year, at age eleven (her birthday is in July), she was finalist for the New Jersey State title.

At thirteen she defeated the late Anne Cummings for that title. Be-of Helen Jacobs, or the flat-racket swatting of Palfry, Wolfenden and throp, the contrast in style becomes terrific.

That is why little Helen Bernhard figures to be the most unpopular player with the tennis fathers. Already her backhand shot is the most vicious of any woman player. Buttressed by speed and top spin, which keeps an opponent at the base line, she can keep an opponent from charging the net. A year ago she went to California and there developed an American twist service which has further distressed theponents of pat-ball tennis. She perfected her forehand drive and at Palm Springs in January, she won a tournament by beating Betty Nuthall in the semifinals and Dorothy Bundy in the final.

Her trip to the coast was not for tennis primarily, but for the course in culture offered at the University of Southern California. The girl is interested about farming and its significance in this world of changing values. She has a genuine talent for drawing and painting, and especially for composition. Last winter she lived in a little room bungalow, did her own housekeeping and her cooking, painted and grew flowers and managed to play and practice her tennis religiously and keep up with her classes.

A Champ Flunks Gymnastics

This winter she will matriculate in her native New York City, probably at Barnard. She graduated from Washington High School in 1939 with a set of remarkable marks that would make any parent proud—English history 94, English geometry 88, intermediate algebra 88, American history 84. She flunked gymnastics, probably, she says, because she failed to hold her toes at the proper angle when standing at attention in line-up.

While growing up into a pretty girl she was learning tennis the hardest way. Dr. Bernhard bought her a membership in the University Heights Club, an ancient but honorable set of courts reached by a gigantic steel gas tank at 2nd Street and the Harlem River. The way to reach this club is by jumping on the Twentieth Century Limited on the way to Chicago, but little Helen, backed by only ten cents in carfare, would walk to Washington Heights. Then she would walk to and cross Highbridge and cross to the club.

This was a chore indeed on hot summer days. After the workout came the return trip by foot across the bridge and to the subway, then a late dinner and bath and sweet dreams of becoming Queen Helen III. For the past few years she has enjoyed a membership in the West Side Club, Forest Hills, thanks to one more sacrifice on the part of her doting parents.

This method of reaching the tennis pinnacle leaves no room for illusion of grandeur, no misconception of tennis truths. And today the little Bernhard girl can take a shellacking with amazing grace and composure. She is still thrilled at being able to play in swank tournaments that a bag on a porch or a snub by an opponent find a reaction in her make-up. To her outstanding moment of her coast-to-coast peregrinations this year came the close of her victory over Helen Jacobs at Philadelphia.

The former champion, and only conqueror of Helen Wills, rushed to the net with a shower of praise for new twist service and the top-spin forehand.

"It's the first time," said the little Bernhard girl solemnly, "that anyone has ever praised my game!"

naments where hotels and boardinghouses are stuck when an eliminated player sneaks in a surreptitious meal. Most amazing, however, is the speed with which results of the day's matches are flashed to hotels and hostesses. Once Helen rushed back after being put out of a Long Island tournament to find that her gracious hostess had not only packed her things but had put the bag out on the porch.

Arriving at East Hampton, Long Island, for the recent Maidstone tournament, Helen Bernhard was still the nation's fourth-ranking woman player, but not according to the seeding. Sarah Palfry, Number Three, was seeded first, and Pauline Betz, ranked seventh, was seeded second.

But the Bernhard girl's game is too strong to be upset by the vicissitudes of tournament seeding, and this fact comes as a hard blow to the tennis fathers. For three years now they have worked at the task of softening the game to a point where it resembles that of thirty years ago.

They have accomplished this by draping the ball with a set of whiskers or a coating of fuzz that resembles the pile of a Turkish rug. This high nap fore reaching her eighteenth birthday, she had won five indoor doubles championships with Dorothy Wightman, two national indoor singles titles and the national girls' singles crown for 1938 and 1939.

All this was to the utmost delight of Dr. Bernhard, who took up tennis in Russia after his father had picked up some rackets and balls during the World's Fair of 1893. Young Eric not only took to the game, but became an expert and won countless tournaments in the countless universities he attended. He won tournaments all one summer in Berlin and was good enough to take a few sets from the German Davis Cup stars who were interned in Pittsburgh when we entered the World War.

Well, Dr. Bernhard knows only one type of tennis, and that happens to involve speed and the top spin. He taught this theory to his little girl, and is still teaching her. As a result, the little Bernhard girl has the first top-spin forehand drive seen in women's tennis since Helen Wills Moody abandoned her racket.

It makes you recall the savage driving power of Molla Bjurstedt Mallory and, pitted against the chop stroke

Quick Decision

By Frank Condon

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN CROSMAN

heart-warming chron-a man who told his barefaced lie which
with her full approval

is the way they happened to get together. . . . First of all, they approached each other on trains, he on one train, she on another. They actually meet that morning, but they had entered the zone of semi-confinement. The two trains halted just below the Harlem River Bridge, which the railway travel enters New York and one waited politely for the other. As two trains cannot cross the bridge on the same track at the same time.

As on Train One, coming down from Maine, and she sat anxiously in the Pullman Express, looking at the skyscraper buildings and men in coats leaning from windows. His name was Henry Knight—one of the Knights—and she was Peggy from Katonah, Kansas; and, in the act of putting it, they were arriving in New York City to seek their fortunes, and perhaps get into some telephone book.

They rolled into Grand Central about fifteen minutes apart, went their separate ways, and at that instant the chances were even million to one they would meet. He hastened on down to his afternoon newspaper, where a job was waiting for him, so he was all right.
But around to the radio stations, where he was a singer, a young and eager one who had come to New York to make the big time.

Radio people told her to come Monday, so she rented a tiny room and waited for Monday and thus the two wanderers began their metropolitan careers. That was as it would be the first day of June. On the tenth of the month, one of the radio concerns gave a cocktail party in a large hotel room with red wallpaper, in honor of a polar explorer, and Henry Knight was present to report. The young radio singer was likewise present.

They stood still a while and looked each other over, as young people do in the miracle moment that comes but once in a lifetime. They were introduced by a genial oaf who didn't know either of them, and they sat on a piano bench and talked, the conversation being limited to "who are you and what are you doing here?"

After a while, they walked out of the place together, arm in arm, forgetting the cocktail party, the explorer and the world, and they must have fallen in love in that first half-hour. It might have been the first ten seconds. Anyhow, they were married two weeks later in the Little Church, and life began in a small walk-up flat on Sixth Avenue just south of Eighth Street, forty dollars a month.

It was exciting and they talked constantly, as he was 26 and she was 22 and naturally they had to go over all those years in detail.

First of all, they had to discuss why they were there. He was a Knight from Lincoln, Maine, down in New York to enter and study the newspaper business as a reporter, watch the smart ones, learn what he could and go back home to take over and run the Lincoln Recorder. She had come to make a name and a living for herself, singing on the radio, and she had sung her way into

New York in four jumps—Katonah, Garden City, Kansas City and Chicago.

He had wavy red hair and a sunny manner and was easy to live with. Almost the first thing the bride learned about her husband was that he lost his hat.

He was a natural and confirmed hat-loser, as some men are, and Peggy tried to cure him. Women never lose their hats and cannot understand such a weakness in man. In the two years preceding his marriage, Henry had lost fifteen hats and six sweaters and Peggy was aghast. Having a bride made no difference—he went right along losing his headgear.

His job on the afternoon paper paid him a fair salary and his employers understood clearly that he was in New York for experience and would presently sail back to Maine and run his own paper. Peggy tapped tentatively at her career, which seemed to advance slowly, as New York is a town of radio singers and every time a bus stops two of them get off and hurry into a building. Some weeks, she made as much as thirty dol-

Henry opened his mouth and stared at his wife. He stopped chewing and gulped. His genial countenance shone with amazement and perplexity and finally Peggy hung up lars from obscure stations, singing Little Gray Home in the West and Roll Out the Barrel. When they let her sing, it was generally for some modest station at the bottom of the dial and her mounting ambition was to work up and get in with the solid people of the air.

Peggy had a good Kansas voice and television would have helped her along. Henry often grinned across the table at her and gave advice.

"Enjoy it while you can, darling, because this is our honeymoon in the great city. It's fun living in New York. But don't forget that pretty soon we are going home to Lincoln, where every prospect pleases."

"Maybe and maybe not," she replied lightly. "We might be city people and some day we may be referred to as those old-time New Yorkers, Henry and Peggy."

He grinned. "Just a couple of rural visitors."

SO THEY lived along merrily in the flat on Sixth Avenue and on occasions the radio people telephoned Peggy about jobs or the agent took her to lunch to discuss business matters and assure her in jovial tones that one day she would be another Kate Smith. The agent was an explosive man named C. B. Feller. He was deeply interested in young radio singers and often in his moments of intense earnestness he would lean across the table and place his hand over Peggy's.

You don't have to be pretty to sing on the radio, but it doesn't hurt when you're looking for a job, and anybody who couldn't see that Peggy Knight was pretty might as well quit looking. Out in Katonah, she was the town belle, which is nice, but carries no income. Katonah is fifteen miles from the nearest railroad and is avoided by everything including tornadoes, and from childhood it was Peggy's iron determination to escape.

Henry was altogether different about small towns. He came from Lincoln, which he loved and adored above all towns on earth.

"You can't help but love it," he told her, his eyes sparkling. "There's the little house waiting for us, furnished to the last rug. You can have a garden and keep a canary and sit on the porch and be happy. The townfolks are all grand people and you'll like my father and mother."

"Yes and will they like me?" she asked dubiously. "Maybe I'll be lonely, sitting up there with my canary and you gone all day at the paper."

"The folks will love you and so will everybody and you'll be the wife of that brilliant editor, Henry Knight of the Lincoln Recorder. It's about the same as being wife of the president of Brazil."

"Well, you know me, Henry," she assured him. "I worked for years to get away from Katonah and here I am. I love New York. I could be happy here forever, but you are the boss and it's what you say. I'd even go back to Katonah with you."

"I'll make many a cruel demand," he laughed, "but you will never go back to Katonah. This is the greatest city in the world, but a person mustn't stay here too long. New York is full of pathetic spectacles who have stayed too long."

"All right. We'll pack the bags any day you name," she said. "Only let's not be in a great hurry. You must remember we're pretty happy."

Henry could afford to wait and there was no hurry. His presence in New York was part of a plan worked out by himself and his father. He was the only son of the Knights and the Knights have always been in Lincoln. The elder Knight was still on the job, carrying along the family tradition, waiting for young Henry to round out his education in metropolitan journalism and then come home, take over the paper and carry on.

Old Man Knight was ready at any time to retire to his garden and let Henry do it.

That's the way it was with the young couple down on Sixth Avenue, hard by Eighth Street and its rusty shops. With regard to his habit of losing hats and sweaters, Henry was inclined to admit weakness, but there was nothing to be done about it. Peggy tried everything, except tacks. He played golf on occasion with the newspaper reporters, and whenever they tried out a new course Henry was certain to lose a hat, a sweater or both. It caused Peggy wifely distress and she scolded him vehemently, led him to solemn promises and accomplished nothing, for you might as well scold a hat-loser for snoring or having large ears.

He could lose his sweaters only at golf courses but he could lose hats anywhere and did.

After some six months of happy married life on Sixth Avenue and some occasional singing chores for Peggy,

"Pull over t' th' curb! Who d'yuh think you are?! Where's th' fire?! Wot'sa big idea?! Gimme yuh operator's license!!!"

JAY IRVING

Henry's afternoon paper ordered him up Portland, Maine, to sit around and cover a convention of medical specialists and ordinary doctors and try to learn if they could keep people from growing old. Henry knew the doctors couldn't and so did the paper, but readers love sunny news items, right or wrong.

Henry walked into his flat to inform the bride that the sunshine would be removed from her life for three days, maybe four. He said it looked like a four-day job, as doctors love to string out their conventions, drink highballs and otherwise impair their health. As usual, Henry had no hat whatever, having left his most recent in a poolroom near Brooklyn Bridge.

"Portland," Peggy remarked, giving him a thoughtful glance. "That's near Lincoln, isn't it?"

"Thirty miles away."

"I suppose you'll go home, won't you?"

"I've been thinking it over and I don't know. Maybe not."

"You ought to go home, Henry. What kind of a son would that be?"

"Yes? Well, I want to go home and see them all, naturally. But here's the rub. If I do go, I'll want to stay right there and not leave. I love that town. I long to open up my desk at the Recorder, call the men together and begin running the job. I've been ready some time."

"Well," she repeated, "you certainly ought to trot over and see your parents."

"They'll only want me to stay, as their letters indicate. They'll argue that my New York stretch is about over, and it is. Dad wants to quit and I want him to quit. So you see."

"But we're so happy here in New York and we adore this flat and it's thrilling every instant."

"I know that. Never been so happy and may never be again. That's why I'll just go up to Portland, look at the doctors and stay firmly away from home. I'll be back here in four days. Lincoln and the Recorder can wait until the dim future."

"THAT being the case," she said more cheerfully, "we'll prepare you for travel on trains. You have no hat, to start."

So they went over at once to Fifth Avenue and walked along until they came to one of those elegant hat stores with a famous name and four famous hats in the window, and while Henry purchased a new lid Peggy supervised. They came out proudly. It was a hand-reporters in New York or a blithering half-wit?" he demanded.

Twenty minutes later, they were in Grand Central and, as the hour was at hand and the Maine Express ready to depart, he kissed her fervently and she went through the gate. Peggy went home to the flat on Sixth Avenue, where she found a letter in the box from C. B. Feller. It informed her that they were taking a turn for the better in her singing affairs were looking up at that he would like to have a business conference immediately.

"Give me a ring when you get home," he suggested, "as we may have to make a quick decision. Looks very good."

The next day, she lunched with friends and they discussed prospects and the fact that Radio had finally come around to the point of admitting Peggy could sing radio songs and they were willing to give her a real chance.

"There's nothing to get excited about just yet," Mr. Feller remarked. "You're to start in modestly enough and I think you ought to earn sixty or seventy dollars a week. Later on, it's a cinch. You are a young lady heading for big things if you have a little patience, for you have a true radio voice and I always knew it."

"You've been very kind, Mr. Feller," she said. "It's business with me, Peggy. You may have to sign a contract. Is that all right?"

"Of course it's all right—except."

"Except what?"

"Well, Henry is out of town. He won't be home till Thursday."

"What's he got to do with it? You're the singer."

"Well, you see, Mr. Feller, our agent is a trifle unsettled and Henry has been talking of going back to Lincoln, Maine, which is his home town. He wants to run the paper there. If he says so, I can't sign a contract to stay here singing."

"Yes, but this is your chance and this is what you've been working for. You can make more than he can, running a small-town paper. I thought you were wild about New York."

"I am," she said earnestly, "and I love singing and I hope I can sign up and stay here. But I wouldn't want to take a step until I talk to Henry. If we are in New York, I'll sign your contract."

"So what do we do now?"

"Wait till Henry gets back."

UP IN Portland, young Henry looked over the assembled medicos and discovered they could do nothing for people growing old and would themselves try anything down to extra lizards. Having covered the convention for his paper, his mind turned to Lincoln, thirty miles away, and he knew once that he should go home. He arrived unannounced, but in time for supper and the folks were overjoyed.

"Time you got here," they told him. "Where's your wife? Are you all ready to start work and let us have a vacation?"

"Just a minute," Henry said. "He'll be here in a minute."

He told them about the beautiful Peggy and her singing for radio and deep love for New York, she being a small-town girl and newly escaped. They listened sympathetically. So Henry announced he was wishing to tire, go on a hunting trip, visit South America and breed dogs. Sitting at supper, they went over the situation. Henry perceived that his New York career had come abruptly to an end. It was the new Recorder editor and time had come.

The little bungalow was ready. Henry ate a thoughtful meal, nodding as he thought of the situation.

(Continued on page 42)

AXIOM: PALL MALL IS A SMOOTHER CIGARETTE

EXPLANATION:

Good old-fashioned Bulking mellows the smoke

● It is an axiom that Pall Mall smokers enjoy a noticeably smoother smoke.

The explanation is to be found in the revival of BULKING... a slower, more painstaking process of working tobaccos, which mellows the smoke.

In BULKING, the magnificent Pall Mall tobaccos are rested in fragrant heaps until slowly they generate a warmth of their own. As they do, harsh qualities become mild... and time (careful, conscientious workmanship does take time) releases subtle flavors and aromas which permeate every shred of tobacco. The result: a mellower... a really smoother cigarette.

It is a significant fact that with Pall Mall there is noticeably less cigarette stain, or none at all. The fingers of your friends who smoke Pall Mall regularly offer visible proof of this important advantage.

And because the additional length of this distinguished cigarette travels the smoke further, it is impressively cooler.

Yourselves, try Pall Mall critically!

"WHEREVER PARTICULAR PEOPLE CONGREGATE"

Traitor's Purse

Continued from page 10

downcast head lamp. Then, as he watched it, the car began to move. Very slowly it crawled down the road behind him, turned its long, sleek body gently to one side, and, entering the water so quietly that there was hardly a ripple, it came up close to him so that the driving seat was on a level with his own.

The side windows of the two cars slid down simultaneously and the man in the fireman's coat braced himself to meet whatever was coming.

"Would you care for a lift by any chance?"

The question, put with a certain grave politeness, came quietly out of the darkness on a clear, young voice that might have belonged to some nice child:

"Do you know where we are? We're relying on you. I hope you realize that."

The second voice, which was elderly and querulous besides being practically in his ear, startled half the life out of him it was so close.

"Driving at night is difficult at the best of times," it rambled on hollowly, "and night comes so early this time of year. I must have hunted over this country as a young man but that's many years ago. Many. I don't know what road we're on at all."

After a moment's incredulous silence the explanation of this apparent hallucination occurred to the fugitive with a second shock. Whoever these good people were, they either knew him or his car very well indeed. He replied cautiously, relying on his voice to identify him or not as the case might be.

"I'm afraid this car has died," he said clearly, and waited for their reaction.

"With a beautiful smile on its bonnet, no doubt," The young voice sounded gently reproachful. "Do you mind getting in the back? Mr. Anscombe is in the front with me. We shall all be rather late for dinner, I'm afraid, and I've phoned Lee once. Leave George's car where it is."

The man who could not remember pricked up his ears. There had been definitely a warning emphasis on the Christian name.

"Our George has a depraved taste in machinery," he remarked tentatively as he clambered out of the farther door and came around to the back of the second car.

When he entered the warm darkness of the limousine the girl gave him the hint for which he had asked.

"It's not George's taste, poor child. It's his pocket," she said firmly. "Er—all undergraduates are a little trusting when confronted by a secondhand-car salesman, aren't they? Still, it was very nice of him to lend it to you. I'm so sorry I missed you. I was waiting in the vestibule and only caught a glimpse of you as you shot through, and you'd started off in George's car before I could catch you."

She let in the clutch as she spoke and they moved away into the darkness.

"I'm sorry, too. Very silly of me," murmured the man in the oilskins. He was feeling his way very cautiously. Clearly they were on dangerous ground and now was not the time for explanations. Whoever this blessed girl was she was certainly helpful and appeared to rely on him to play up to her.

He leaned back among the cushions and strained his eyes in the darkness. Gradually he made out the two silhouettes against the windshield. The girl was small but erect and the line of her shoulders was square, like a boy's. Of course! She was the young woman with the heart-shaped face and the disconcerningly intelligent light brown eyes who had spoken to him in the hospital vestibule. She must have been trying to tell him that this car was by the gate. No wonder she was treating him now as if he were mentally deficient. So he was, God help him. So he was.

The man who sat beside her was less definite in outline. He appeared to be a spreading bundle with a large head adorned by a flat cap which sat upon it like a lid. He turned presently and leaned over the back.

"Rather a disturbing adventure," he remarked conversationally. His windy voice was old and foolish but it was also dangerously inquisitive.

The man in the back of the car hesitated.

"It was, in a way," he said at last.

"I know. I know." The old man was determined to talk, whatever the effort. "Still, you did your duty. There's a great comfort in that. Probably the only thanks you'll get out of it. A good Samaritan . . ."

"Is his own reward," supplied the girl without moving her head. "All the same," she went on carefully, "I don't see what else you could have done. After all, if a stranger is polite enough to talk to one in a railway carriage and nutty enough to fall over one's bag and stun himself in getting out the least one can do is to take him to a hospital."

"I can think of less," said the old man, grunting into his muffler. "Can't you, Campion?"

"Yes, yes, I can." The man in the back of the car was not thinking what he was saying. Campion. He seized on the name eagerly and tried to think that it was familiar. At first he was convinced that it was and relief rushed over him. But the next moment he was not sure again and despair returned. It was an unnerving experience and he felt for a cigarette.

Finding that he had no pockets he leaned forward automatically and discovered in the dark a packet and a lighter tucked into the case at the back of the front seat. He was actually smoking before he realized the significance of his behavior. He must have known the cigarettes were there. He had taken one as naturally as if he had done it a hundred times before. The explanation was obvious. He had. He was in his own car.

He lay back to think it over. The one clear conclusion to be drawn from present developments, he decided, was that he and the girl were up to something—or at least she certainly was. She was protecting him the whole time, feeding him with story after story and doing it very well, almost as though she were used to it. Perhaps she was.

The conviction that she was his wife came slowly. The more he thought of it the more likely it became. Here she was, driving his car, looking after him like a mother, lying for him like a heroine. George's car indeed! For the first time since he had recovered consciousness in the hospital ward he saw a ray of comfort in his prospect. The abysmal loneliness of his position was spanned. Apart from his tremendous relief he was also suddenly delighted and he peered at her again in the darkness.

She drove very well, with confidence and an unusual sympathy for the machine. The big car was brushing aside the miles and he had half persuaded himself that the police-slugging episode was part of some past delirium when the elderly man stirred himself.

"I see where we are now," he said contentedly. "We must have come fifteen miles out of our way." He broke off abruptly and laughed, the silly, little high-pitched giggle of a foolish old man. "I mean five miles, of course," he added clumsily. "I don't know what made me say fifteen."

The man who had been told that his name was Campion glanced up sharply in the darkness and the shadowy tide of anxiety rolled up into his mind once more.

"It's not far now, anyway." The girl's cool voice was comiortingly matter-of-fact. "If you don't mind, Mr. Anscombe, we'll put you down at your house and rush on to change. Aubrey has put the meal back to eight-thirty and we can't in all decency be late. We'll see you there, shan't we?"

"Yes, yes, I shall be there." The old man sounded enthusiastic. "I never miss an opportunity to dine at the Institute now that Aubrey is the skipper. I remember his predecessor, the great Doctor Hale. He was an able fellow but nothing like Aubrey. Lee Aubrey is one of the big men of our time."

"Yes," said the girl thoughtfully. "Yes, I think he may be. He's not afraid to surround himself with brains."

Anscombe grunted. "A particularly brilliant man on his own account," he announced didactically. "We were more than lucky to get him here at Bridge. I remember the famous session when his appointment was announced to the Secret Conclave. As Hereditary Secretary to the Society I was very much congratulated, but I said, 'Don't thank me. Masters of Bridge'—that's the customary address, you know—'Don't thank me. Thank the man himself for coming to us.'"

Anscombe? The name meant nothing to Campion. But Bridge, and the Institute, struck a vaguely familiar note. He fancied that they were well-known terms, something he had heard about all his life.

Presently the old man spoke again.

"Aubrey is a wealthy man, too, you know," he said. "It's not generally known, but he donates the whole of his two-thousand-pound salary to some scholarship fund in the north. His private income must be considerable. Still, it suits him, you know. He has a unique position that no money in the world could buy, and a house that is virtually a museum piece, also not for purchase. You're comfortable there, aren't you?"

"Very. It's a glorious house, isn't it, Albert?"

It took Campion some seconds to realize that she was talking to him, but his response, when it did come, was manfully enthusiastic.

Mr. Anscombe turned in his seat.

"You're tired," he said. "That experience of yours took it out of you. That sort of thing often does. London is exhausting, too. What are you wearing? A mackintosh? I can hear something rustling but I can't see you. It's very warm in here. Why don't you take it off?"

"No. I don't think I will, thanks." To his horror he heard himself beginning to laugh, but again the girl came to his rescue.

"Leave him alone," she said. "He's in disgrace. He's taken the wrong car, led us miles out of our way and now he dozes off smelling like a bicycle shop. You'll have to give up oilskins, Albert, at any rate for wear in a confined space. Still, we're practically there. This is your gate, isn't it, Mr. Anscombe? You wouldn't think it awfully rude of us if we didn't take the car into the drive, would you?"

"Oh, of course not, of course not. I'll take care of myself. Thank you very much for all your kindness. I feel I forced myself on you this afternoon, but you've been so very good, so very good."

He was hoisting himself out of the seat with difficulty as he spoke and his hollow, foolish voice squeaked trailed away as he landed himself safely on the pavement and closed the door. Through the window the remaining passenger caught a glimpse of him disappearing between high, stucco pillars toward a steep, dark house beyond.

"Silly little man," said the girl suddenly. "He's left his parcel. I shall be a moment. I'll take it to him."

"That's all right, I'll do that," Campion said hastily, fumbling for the handle.

"You can't in those clothes."

"Yes, I can. He won't see me. Or he does he'll have to realize I'm an eccentric. Where's his baggage?"

She turned toward him in the darkness.

"It's books, I think," she said. "He's a bookworm."

He took the square parcel and stepped out after the departing figure. It was brighter than he had thought and he did not call to the man but came the small drive quietly. The front door was already closed when he found it, and, rather than knock, he laid the package on the step and hurried down the drive to the waiting car again.

With the departure of Anscombe the very car seemed more comfortable. The girl let in the clutch softly and they were away. The man, who was still trying to remember if his name really was Albert Campion, leaned forward. Now that he was alone with this delightful if recognizable wife of his he felt unexpectedly embarrassed.

"This is all very difficult," he began awkwardly.

"I know." Her agreement was heartfelt that it silenced him. "It's frightful, and there's absolutely no time to talk and get it straight. We're here already and we daren't be late, it'll be so fishy."

She swung the car up a steep incline and through a columned gateway as she spoke.

"I only found out where you were a miracle. I'd been waiting down at the station as we arranged. I got rid of Anscombe until four o'clock, but after that I had to carry him around with me, telling him one dubious tale after another, had to bring him because he insisted. He said he had to see his dentist and asked Lee Aubrey if I'd give him a lift. Lee made a personal request of it and couldn't refuse without sounding suspicious. So there he was."

The car had not yet stopped. As Campion could see they were rolling through some sort of park. The girl was still talking. She was nervous and little breathless.

"He's a terrifying old boy, isn't he she demanded. "Flat mental deficiency for ninety-nine per cent of the time, a single flashes of acuteness. You don't know whether it's silver showing through the disguising tarnish or the last flecks of plate on the old tin spoon. Only hope is to get down to the meal and behave normally. Have you got something under that decontamination outfit? Can we leave it in the car?"

"It all depends where we're going," said. "I'm in pajamas . . . awful grubby flannel things."

"What?" She stopped the car in the # Pepsodent with Irium Removes Surface-Stains from Your Teeth ...Reveals How Beautifully Bright they Really Are!

"PROMISE YOU'LL ALWAYS KEEP THAT BEAUTIFUL SMILE!"

Official spokesmen for 47,000 American Dentists say Pepsodent is Safe, Effective, Truthfully Advertised. This means you can fully trust it to remove ugly Surface-Stains that make teeth look dull, dingy.

● When a friend tells you that the sparkling teeth and lovely smile you admire result from daily brushings with Pepsodent, you can believe it!

When you hear a radio announcer say that Pepsodent with Irium will remove unsightly Surface-Stains, make teeth that look dull, discolored shine again with their natural brilliance, he knows what he's talking about! Believe him!

When you flip the pages of your favorite magazine and see Pepsodent advertisements you can believe every word written about Pepsodent's efficiency in keeping teeth lustrous, bright.

For, the Council on Dental Therapeutics, official spokesmen for 47,000 dentists, say Pepsodent is Safe, Effective, Truthfully Advertised. And as Proof, they have awarded Pepsodent the prized Seal of Acceptance of the American Dental Association.

So, take a tip from the men whose business it is to know about dentifrices. Switch to Pepsodent with Irium. Of all tooth pastes and tooth powders, Pepsodent alone contains Irium (known professionally as Purified Alkyl Sulfate). No more efficient, safe cleansing ingredient is known to dental science. It is Irium in Pepsodent that gives you the "Plus" that will help make the wonderful difference in the brightness of your teeth, your smile.

Try Pepsodent with Irium today. The sooner you start, the sooner you can flash the bright smile others will admire.

This Seal is Proof PEPSODENT is ✓ Safe ✓ Effective ✓ Truthfully Advertised

Awarded by the Council on Dental Therapeutics of the American Dental Association.

Strike up the band for new COLA LIFE SAVERS. They bring you, for the first time in candy form, the refreshing, tingly taste of cola.

Nobody loves an onion except the man who eats it. Wise folks tame onion-breath (or other unpleasant breath) with WINT-O-GREENS.

If you're on the look for a tasty mouthful, try COLA LIFE SAVERS. They're full of cola at its delicious, most refreshing best.

Everybody's breath offends sometimes after eating, drinking, or smoking. Let LIFE SAVERS save yours. 14 delicious mint and fruit flavors. Sold everywhere. 5¢.

• When you visit the New York World's Fair, don't miss the Life Savers Parachute Jump. It's a real thrill!

astonishment and turned to him. "What happened? You're not hurt?"

"Oh, lord no," he said, warmed by her anxiety. "I'm all right really. I only got knocked out."

"Oh, that was it, was it?" she said, much more relieved than he had expected her to be and far less surprised. "The man in the paper shop simply whispered 'hospital'. I didn't get an opportunity to talk to him at all. The place was full of people and there wasn't time. It was nearly five then and I had the wretched Anscombe inside. That old man knows something, I swear it."

"More than I do," said Campion grimly.

TO HIS surprise she caught him up. "Yes," she said. "That's what I thought. We'll bear him in mind. I say, I am glad you're all right. It never went through my head that you might have gone to the hospital as a patient. When I saw you charging out in the deep-sea-diver costume I thought some kind friend had lent it to you to hide the tramp's garb. I've got your change in the luggage compartment. That's what was worrying me so as you didn't turn up before Anscombe returned. I didn't see how I was going to get it to you before he saw you. Well, it's silly to change now, isn't it? You'll have to smuggle yourself in."

The man laughed. She was charming and he was very tired.

"Anything you say, lady," he said. "Where do we go?"

"I think that side door," she said.

He sat watching her silhouette as she maneuvered the big car skillfully into a narrow entrance by the side of a large, dim building. She was an astonishing young person, as practical and energetic as a child.

She parked her car and he climbed out, stiff and unsteady, into a neat, old-fashioned stable yard with cobbles under his feet and the low, graceful lines of Georgian outbuildings just visible in the faint light. By the time he emerged she was tugging at a suitcase within.

He took it from her and would have put his free arm around her shoulders, but she did not notice his gesture and it occurred to him that he did not usually exhibit such open affection. He was wondering a little at himself when she called him from the house:

"Come on, Albert. It's awfully late."

He found her waiting for him in a dark arched doorway.

"Two steps up," she said. "Come on. It's got a black-out gadget that turns off the light when you open the door."

AS THE wood closed softly behind him the small passage in which they stood lit up and in a soft yellow glow the comfortable flagged and paneled interior of a perfect Georgian house emerged. A baize door opposite them clearly cut off the reception half of the establishment and a narrow flight of oak stairs on their left led to a similar door on the first floor. The girl made for this upper door and as she ran up the staircase he suddenly saw her and recognized her, the first real and familiar thing to emerge in the terrifying darkness of his mind. Her thin young back under the perfectly cut brown tweed of her suit, her long curls and her small brown hand on the banister were all suddenly well known and inexpressibly dear to him.

"Amanda!" he said.

"Yes?" She swung around on the top of the stairs and stood looking down at him, a picture of arrested movement.

He laughed and came hurrying up the stairs after her.

"I only wanted to hear you answer to your name."

The smile faded from her face and he thought she looked a trifle embarrassed.

"I'm not really rattled," she murmured unexpectedly and as if he had proached her, "it's only that so horribly important and imminent. You've come back all carefree. Something good happen?"

"No, I'm rather afraid it didn't. This is lightheadedness," he said, and followed her through the second baize door into a small world of past elegance.

Amanda crossed the upper hall, her stripped pine paneling, Chinese arched and sage-green drapery made a Georgian setting without either the sturdiness or the full-blooded ostentation of the great period of nouveaux riches. She opened a door under an archway.

"Yes, they've put your things out to thank goodness," she said, and crossed another expanse of carpet. You get dressed and so will I. I'll give you ten minutes. I must see you before we go down. Bless you."

She was gone before he could stop, whisking into a room on the other side of the hall while her vivid, friendly personality still warmed and comforted him like the glow of a coal fire.

Albert Campion went into the room that presumably was his own and looked at the dinner jacket laid out near his bed. The tailor's tab inside his breast pocket assured him that it was his and that he had bought it in the preceding spring. He began to dress carefully, moving slowly and with a certain amount of difficulty. After a minute so he gave up trying to fathom any further deeper mysteries than those concerning the whereabouts of his underclothes and toilet things. He hurried. Amanda was coming back in minutes and that was time enough to get all the serious questions settled. He clung to the thought of Amanda. His wife she was the one satisfaction, friendly truth in a world of villa and fantasy.

MEANWHILE, the obvious thing to do was to get himself safely changed.

He accepted his reflection in the dressing mirror discovered in the adjoining bathroom without seeing it, as do men every morning of their lives. His self-searching mood had disappeared and his sole anxiety was to get his hair smooth. The cool comfort of well-fitting clothes soothed him and he had tied his tie and was getting into his jacket when a knock sounded on the door. He stopped to open it. It was not Amanda. It was a dinner-jacketed stranger who smiled at him familiarly and wandered into the room.

"My dear chap, I'm so glad you've got back," he said, revealing a voice softer and deeper than the average, and flexible that its charm was instantaneous. "Trouble all cleared up."

Campion nodded without speaking. Even if some flicker of memory had struggled to help him, he would not have known the newcomer was his host soon as he set eyes on him. The big-boned figure, with its suggestive elegant negligence, was impressive. He went with the house. He recognized the type, or rather the variety of individuality immediately.

Lee Aubrey was a personality; to say he exuded a force and a spirit as actual as if it had been water or a small electric current. His big face was extravagantly molded, the features fine but large and overdrawn, and smiling eyes were kindly rather friendly. The most striking thing about him was that he could not, apparently much to his regret, provide any sort of common ground on which to stand with normal men. There was no suggestion of equality in his bearing, rather an exaggerated humility, as were in the habit of going down on their mental all-fours to conduct any serious conversation.

"I was rather glad to put food of

If an hour," he said. "Fyshe from the War House has been down all day. Extraordinarily inferior mind. A decent chap. Quite sound, of course, but underlingly dull. It took Butcher all day to tell him what he wanted to know." He laughed again, half apologetically, making the criticism.

"Absurd," said Campion.

It was coming back to him, or some of was. This was the Principal's House the Bridge Institute of General Research, that remarkable and ancient institution that, from being a provincial curiosity, part charity and part museum for a hundred and fifty years, had blossomed forth in the early part of the century into one of the most valuable centers in the country. The recollection of the name as Amanda's name had come; not a raising of the curtain of darkness at hung between the front and the back of his mind, but as a sudden rent in it that flashed a whole scene from the brightness within, only to close again a moment later as the folds resettled. It was all very confusing and alarming. Lee Aubrey was looking at him intently.

"You're most frightfully tired," he said gently. "Or is something wrong?" "No, no, I'm all right." Campion was surprised at his own vehemence, but it seemed desperately important to keep his secret.

"Oh, that—that's fine." The other man was as hurt as a child. "Won't you come down? By the way, did you get our letters? There were two or three for you this morning. I'll get them for you myself. Shall we go?"

"No, I can't for a moment. I'm waiting for Amanda. We've got to talk to each other."

Even in his confused state the words appeared a little bald to Mr. Campion. Aubrey swung around and his eyes were suddenly sharp and frighteningly intelligent.

"Oh, I see," he said, and immediately he became deeply if consciously kind again. "I see. I'll go down and hold the fort until you come."

He went out gently, and, it seemed to Mr. Campion, with compassion.

LEFT alone, the man in the bedroom returned to his earlier problems. He thrust the fire-fighting kit into the bottom of a wardrobe and was about to close the door on it when a sound behind him made him turn. It was Amanda. She was there just as he had expected her, in a long, smooth white dress that seemed right and familiar and made her look about sixteen. She was wonderfully easy to look at.

"Oh, that's grand," she said, nodding at him approvingly. "What are you doing? Admiring yourself?"

"No," he said, and paused abruptly. He had seen himself in a mirror with her standing beside him. He was older than he had thought. He saw a horrified man of thirty-five or so, tall and remarkably thin, with a lean, wooden face on which there were far more lines than he had expected. She, on the other hand, might have been still at school.

"You look much more intelligent than you used," she remarked. "Don't you think so?"

"God help me, do I?" he said involuntarily. "I am rather shocked, as a matter of fact."

He saw the amusement die out of her face.

"That's not fair," she said softly.

"What isn't?" he said, turning to her and catching her hands.

To his surprise her embarrassment increased and she released herself slowly and stood before him, a steady, determined young person, serious and annihilatingly frank.

"Albert," she said. "I know this isn't the time, and that all this business going on is far more serious at the moment, but I've got this on my mind and I want to clear it up. You know you were going to marry me next month?"

THE information, coupled with the ominous form in which it was offered appalled him. His disappointment and loneliness were so acute that they produced a physical chill and he stood looking at her without realizing that his face was a complete blank.

"Was I?" he said flatly.

She drew back from him and for a moment he felt panic-stricken that she was going to walk out and leave him.

"Don't," he said wildly. "I didn't mean that, Amanda. I'm completely at sea. I don't know where I am or who I am or what I'm doing."

"Oh, I know." She was herself again, impulsive and warm and friendly. "I know and I'll see you through this. You can rely on me absolutely all the time. That is true. You do know that?"

She thrust her arm through his and he felt the urgent, nervous strength of her young body against his side.

"I'll do anything, Albert. This is desperate, the most important, the most serious business you've ever come up against, and I'm with you. I wouldn't be here if I wasn't. It's disgusting of me to talk about the marriage when you're nearly off your head with worry about the other thing, but you know how hopeless I am about hiding anything and I can't bear to behave like a hussy even for ten minutes. You see, we've never had a love affair, have we? I've just been going to marry you ever since I was seventeen. We've known each other so long, and quite frankly it was I who suggested getting married at all. You'd almost forgotten about it in the strain of this other business, hadn't you? My good ape, don't be polite about it. It's silly when we're so used to each other. Well, now, I want to call all that off. I don't have to explain any more than that, do I?"

"How old are you now?" he asked.

"Twenty-five."

"As old as that? And you've been going to marry me for eight years."

"Well, yes. Don't be silly, you know I have, more or less." She glanced up at him and her eyes were level and truthful. "Come on, we must go down. Lee's waiting."

When Campion followed Amanda in five people were sipping sherry from beautiful old apple-green glasses, and

Clever, These Americans!

1. HIS LORDSHIP: Dash it all, Higgins, you didn't pack my cathartics! The trip will be ruined. I've half a mind to give you the sack.

2. HIS LORDSHIP: Blast it, we'll have to cable. The dashed Americans simply don't stock our good old British pills!

HIGGINS: The Americans have something a bit superior, m'lud. A topping ready-to-eat breakfast food called KELLOGG'S ALL-BRAN. They say as how it's crisp and crunchy, and keeps many people "regular" as reveille.

3. HIS LORDSHIP: (next morning) Oh, I say, Higgins, this is good! How does it work and all that?

HIGGINS: You see, m'lud, it adds to your diet a bit of a special kind of food called "bulk." It's the lack of this "bulk" that so often causes constipation. Just eat ALL-BRAN regularly, and drink plenty of water!

4. HIS LORDSHIP: (sometime later) What a country, Higgins, what a country! They even use a delicious food instead of medicine.

HIGGINS: ALL-BRAN certainly made a change in you, m'lud.

Join the "Regulars" with
KELLOGG'S ALL-BRAN

Sheep

CROCKETT JOHNSON

"Look at the hand me

"Right! It's in the

 How to be a smart dummy!

1. "Bridge is a cinch when you get supplied with this from your partner! Looks like the 'dummy' has the best hand of all. Here's one to stump her. Why is this beer can like a 'powerhouse' hand?"

4. "No worry about discards, either. Any player should appreciate that! When you're through with these beer cans, you're all through—no 'return' to carry back, no deposits to worry about."

CONTINENTAL

Partner's holding!"

ale the way we like it . . .
y-to-open CAP-SEALED CANS!"

Easy to open! You can't fool a bridge about these Cap-Sealed cans. See that top? It opens with any opener. And you drink from a clean, cap-protected surface. But that's not all: look . . ."

3. "Beer is always trumps in our house, because in these cans it chills in a jiffy. You can get all you need in your ice box, too. Just put them on their sides, like this. We buy them by the 12-can carton."

Three smart plays for September

1. Serve beer—it's a cool and wholesome summer drink for you and your guests. No need to spend time in the kitchen "mixing 'em up." Beer is always ready, always welcome.

2. Serve beer in cans—you'll find it chills faster in cans. When unexpected guests drop in, just put a few extra cans in the ice box. They'll chill in a jiffy.

3. Serve beer in CAP-SEALED cans—because that's the can that requires no special opener. It opens with any ordinary opener. And you drink from a clean, cap-protected surface.

Cap-Sealed
TRADE MARK REG.

Here's how to double your enjoyment of ale in the Cap-Sealed can. Order the big Cap-Sealed can. It holds more than double the regular size; a real economy for parties!"

AN COMPANY New York • Chicago • San Francisco

TWO CONVENIENT SIZES: Regular 12-oz. can and a big quart can (32-oz.)

You can feel quick refreshment

any time you brush your teeth

Brushing your teeth can be the quickest, pleasantest of daily routines. Morning and night or any time you choose . . . brush your teeth and gums with cool, minty-flavored Squibb Dental Cream. You can taste its tangy difference on your tongue . . . actually feel its exhilarating action . . . as it cleans and refreshes.

And how it cleans! Under the brush you feel the cool, minty cream spreading through your mouth . . . around the gum line . . . as you brush away stale deposits. And the concentrated acid-neutralizing Squibb Milk of Magnesia* helps to freshen and sweeten your mouth.

The more often you use Squibb Dental Cream the more good it does you . . . Squibb Dental Cream was developed by the Squibb Laboratories in cooperation with members of the dental and medical professions to produce the best possible home aid in the preservation of your teeth and prevention of decay. . . . Get a tube—today.

*Squibb Dental Cream contains concentrated Squibb Milk of Magnesia. An utterly safe cleanser. A valuable anti-acid.

SQUIBB DENTAL CREAM

Taste and feel the refreshing difference!

the soft light of candles in silver sticks flickered on determinedly unfashionable clothes and proud, clever, conservative faces.

Lee Aubrey came over to them at once, excusing himself briefly to the middle-aged woman with whom he had been talking. He smiled briefly at Amanda and turned to peer at her companion with one of his typical glances, as if he were humbly taking a little look at the soul and finding much to sympathize with there.

"This is fine," he said. "Now it's just Anscombe to come. I don't think you've met everyone, have you?"

He performed the introductions with casual efficiency and four faces, one male and three female, peered up into Mr. Campion's own in dreamlike succession. A pair of round, dark eyes under untidy gray brows registered on him as he bowed to the third masculine member of the party, and he received a blurred impression of a wedge of a man with a great chest and dwindling legs. But the women meant nothing to him. One was elderly, with an untidy white haircut and black eyes, but she barely spoke to him, fixing her attention entirely on Amanda.

LEE carried him over to the other side of the room, ostensibly to find some sherry.

"Rather a depressing assembly, I'm afraid," he murmured diffidently, "but it simply couldn't be helped. This is municipal intelligentsia, my dear chap. The Bridge Institute may do work of national importance but it's still the so-called philanthropic little plaything of the Masters of Bridge. There's something frightful about hereditary possession."

"I wonder the State doesn't take it over," said Campion, and realized that the observation was idiotic as soon as he had made it.

Aubrey looked at him with bewildered incredulity.

"Naturally they'd like to," he said, "but it belongs to the town and it's pretty much of a financial asset, isn't it?"

"Yes, of course. I'd forgotten." In spite of his care the final word carried more emphasis than Campion had intended and again the other man peered at him with concern.

"My dear good man, you're exhausted," he said. "For heaven's sake have a drink. Would you rather have something other than this? I don't want to be an infernal nuisance, but isn't there anything I can do?"

"Very kind of you," he said, "but I'm all right. A little tired, nothing else."

"I see," he said very gently. "I see. Do forgive me. Oh, yes, wait a minute, here are your letters. I brought them along."

He took a handful of mail out of the coat pocket of his loose dinner jacket as he spoke and withdrew at once, with his odd, self-conscious diffidence.

Campion glanced at the letters with a slowly growing sense of satisfaction. All but one were readdressed to him from 17A Bottle Street, Piccadilly, and the sight of his name on several envelopes appeared to lend him, however unreasonably, a certain faith in his own identity.

He opened the letter that had not been readdressed but had come to him direct to the Bridge Institute and stood looking at a clumsily typed sheet that no one but an executive who normally employed a secretary would have dared to send out. It was headed baldly: "My office. The Yard. Tuesday," and ran on: "Dear A. C. Interesting conversation this afternoon with Pugh, whom T. brought in. Fancy a man called Anscombe is your best bet. He is Secretary to the Masters. Oldish, I think, and with sister. For God's sake get busy. Keep your eyes on the calendar. The figures 15 give me the jitters whenever I see them. Nothing else this end. I shall hear the Minister again. Hardly recognize him. Enjoyed seeing fellow of that exhibiting the weaknesses and humors of the common bloke, but put the matter up me all the same.

"Forced to rely on you only now. Every other line has gone slack and time is so short. If you fail, for my part I shall wait until the balloon act does go up and then swim quietly across the sea. This is a tripey way of putting it but can't bring myself to put down I really feel. If this thing happens the end and I mean that. I'm not a religious chap, as you know, but I'm praying now literally and if any bobby on the beat wants to see me, it, he's welcome to come in here and at his Assist. Commish on his knees. Damn you, succeed. S."

Mr. Albert Campion read the letter through twice. The words themselves were convincing enough but there was something else. Something about the note was more than ordinarily startling. Suddenly he recognized what it was. Stanislaus did not write like that in his ordinary way. He accepted the message without realizing that it had not been written in full and concentrated on the really alarming peculiarity.

Stanislaus Oates was an old man, prim, elderly policeman of the old school, and he was hysterical. He was horrible, as dreadful as seeing a quarter of the Nelson Column sticking up raggedly against a lowering sky. He crumpled the paper into a ball and thrust it into his pocket until he should get near the fire to destroy it. There were cold waves playing up and down his spine. This was truly frightful. So terrible responsibility rested upon him and not only had he no recollection of what it was but he was helpless.

Amanda's laugh on the other side of the room cut into his thoughts. He looked across and saw her. She was talking to Lee Aubrey, who was leaning toward her, his big-featured face young and revealing, and a belated puppyishness apparent in his attitude. A servant was at his elbow trying to attract his attention and Campion saw him coming of his mood and turn with a startled expression to follow the man out of the room.

AMANDA glanced after him. She was radiant and excited, the entire battle equipment of her magnificent common sense and reliability set aside for the sweet, foolish fandango that any woman can dance when she is so much in love. Campion was walking over to her when Lee Aubrey came hurrying in and costed him.

He listened to the murmured words with the sudden chill which the vision of delay presents when an extra minute arises at a time of crisis.

"The police?" he repeated. "I must see the police now."

"But my dear chap . . ." Aubrey's voice was urgent. ". . . please, not here."

Campion followed him out into the wide hall and saw through an open door across an expanse of black-and-white flags the familiar gleam of silver and blue.

"The whole thing was some innocent mistake and I can't spare the time," said savagely.

Aubrey stared at him, his eyes surprised but shrewd.

"I don't know what you're talking about, Campion," he said patiently. "They've come about Anscombe. That poor old boy has just been found in his garden and you and Amanda appear to have been the last people to see him alive."

(To be continued next week)

Killer's Luck

Continued from page 17

ing the room some three quarters of an hour later. A bellboy and a guest named Winnet had seen him leaving the hotel. The time of the murder appeared to be fixed because Winnet, when he was in his room about a quarter to eight, had heard the girl scream.

"You were right, O'Malley," I remarked, the next time I saw him. "There was no need to work on it. Miss Dalling went to New York to try to break up Newden's engagement to Miss Hanney. She had threatened her, in case she came, but she came anyway. There's no doubt of Newden's guilt."

"Well, Miss Hanney doubts it. She's at headquarters and they told me to talk to her."

"I talked with Miss Hanney. She was young and sweet-seeming and was much distressed."

"Newden ever tell you anything about Miss Dalling?" O'Malley asked her. "No, he didn't."

"What reason you got to think your didn't kill the lady?"

"Because I know he wouldn't do it." "Sister, I seen a lot of ladies that felt that way about somebody. Their guys love it, though. You go on home and keep on looking at this business." When she had left, he remarked to me, "That's a swell girl. We'll talk with that Newden."

"I went and saw Newden. They had her locked up. He was twenty-one years old."

"How come you said first you hadn't been to that hotel?" O'Malley asked

"I didn't want Miss Hanney to know that Edith Dalling."

"Sure. Then you found out we had goods on you and you had to tell me it had been there. What did you say to Miss Dalling when you seen her?"

"The same thing I'd written her before: That there couldn't be anything between us. Then I came away. I don't know who killed her."

"Yeah? She know anybody but you in New York?"

"I'm sure she didn't."

"Did you give her the name of that hotel?"

"No; I'd never even heard of the place until she phoned me."

"WE SAW the witness Hardis."

"How come you was at that hotel?" O'Malley asked him.

"A friend of mine told me the charges were reasonable. I live in Indianapolis. I was on my way to my room, and a very pretty young girl was admitting a young man into Room 302. Of course I didn't think anything of it at the time or know either of their names. Later, I identified him for the police."

"We went and saw Winnet. His home was in Rhode Island. 'You didn't do anything when you heard that lady scream?'" O'Malley inquired of him.

"Yes; I opened my room door and stepped out into the hall. I didn't see anything or hear anything more. I didn't think much about it at the time. A half-hour after that, I was in the lobby talking with one of the bellboys, when I saw a young man come down the stairs. I noticed him because he seemed agitated."

"This the first time you was at that hotel?"

"No; I always stop there when I am in New York overnight. I had been on a business trip to Pittsburgh and also on business in New York. I was there overnight, and next morning transacted my business and went home. Later, I received a request from the police to return to New York, because the bellboy had told them I had seen the young man at the same time he did."

The third witness was Valley. He had seen Newden in the hall outside Miss Dalling's room. Valley had been waiting for the elevator. He had noticed the young man because Newden had not waited for the elevator but went down the stairs.

"We went back to headquarters."

"What do you think of it, O'Malley?" I inquired.

"I changed my mind. I think the same as Miss Hanney. It's my idea Newden didn't do it."

"I was astonished."

"We've heard nothing at all to warrant such a conclusion," I told him heatedly. "The girl's scream indicates she was killed while Newden was in her room. There was nobody else there."

"WE DON'T know it was her that screamed."

"Who else could it have been, O'Malley? No one but Newden had any motive. Miss Dalling knew no one else in New York. She wouldn't have admitted a stranger to her room. There was no sign of any other mode of entry. The money in her handbag shows there had been no robbery."

"Yeah? We don't know what the girl had."

"You're silly!" I said with irritation.

"Yeah? What for did he put her in the trunk?"

"So she wouldn't be found immediately," I replied. "He hoped to make it uncertain just when the murder occurred."

"That's the first smart thing you said!"

"I saw him next day."

"Well?" I inquired.

"Why, I been working. I talked with them hotel guests and the employees. I had the maids and others account for all the passkeys. There couldn't none of the passkeys been used to get into the room. I wired Buffalo cops for all they could get me about this Miss Dalling. The girl had no relatives. She had a good job. They can't learn she had any bank account. She had a couple of rooms and she owned her own furniture, but she gave up her job and sold all her stuff before she came to New York."

"Does that mean," I asked, "that she meant to stay here?"

"You're good. I figure the hundred dollars she had maybe come from the furniture. I'll tell you another thing. That Hardis had a room nearer to the girl's room than the one Winnet was in, but he claims he didn't hear nobody scream."

"Do you suspect Hardis?" I asked.

"Since I seen Miss Hanney, I go around suspecting everybody except Newden. I guess I and her are the only ones that feel that way. Them cops are putting on a shenanigan to make Newden confess."

"What kind of shenanigan?"

"At the hotel."

"We went to the hotel. The police had Newden there, and in another room they had the witnesses. They took Newden into Room 302. The room had been arranged as it was when the girl's body was found. The square trunk had been brought back and set at the foot of the bed, Miss Dalling's dresses were hanging in the closet, her other things had been put in the dresser drawers, and the room key was on the writing table where it had been found. Then they brought Hardis in."

"Is the fellow here that you saw come

PAY their Way

You save money three ways when you equip your car or truck with an AC Kleeer-Kleen Oil Filter. Gasoline mileage is increased. Oil lasts longer. Engine wear and carbon formation are retarded. All three savings are the direct result of the better lubrication job which clean oil does.

As a result, an AC Kleeer-Kleen Oil Filter actually saves its cost—in a few thousand miles of driving.

Why AC Filters are Better

An AC Kleeer-Kleen Oil Filter stands at the top in economy because it is second to none in efficiency. The Igneonite filtering element,—patented, and made only by AC,—removes discoloration, dust, dirt, metal particles, and water from engine oil. Its rigid, molded, one-piece construction makes it non-channeling. And it is immune to attack by water and engine oil acids. In fact, Igneonite does its work so well that you need not replace an element until the oil on your gauge stick shows so dark that the gauge marks can no longer be seen easily.

Here's Why AC Kleeer-Kleen Filters Cut Expense

Dirt and sludge will clog oil lines and piston rings. Clogged rings cause loss of engine compression. This increases both oil and gas consumption. (Photo at left shows sludge and dirt trapped by an AC Kleeer-Kleen Filter in 5,000 miles.)

Install an AC Oil Filter Today SAVE OIL—SAVE GAS—SAVE MONEY

Look for the black-and-yellow official AC Oil Filter Service Station sign when you need oil filter service.

AC OIL FILTER EQUIPMENT (Standard or optional)

GMC Trucks; Greyhound and Flxible buses; Allis-Chalmers, Eagle, Graveley and Ready Power tractors; Buick, Cadillac V-16, Oldsmobile*, and Pontiac* motor cars; Atlas Imperial and GM diesels; Continental and Gray Marine motors; Marion Shovels; Koehring road machinery; Brown and Sharpe machinery,—these are some of the vehicles, power plants, and machines on which AC Oil Filters are used for equipment.

AC OIL FILTERS SAVE YOU MONEY EVERY MILE *Optional

NOTE: Many kinds and grades of oil are in use today. You will be sure of the best results if you have your oil checked periodically, and follow the recommendation of your service man as to when oil should be changed.

DIRTY OIL COSTS YOU MONEY!

Manufactured by
AC SPARK PLUG DIVISION • General Motors Corporation • FLINT, MICH.

HOW TO HAVE YOUR HOME THE WAY YOU WANT IT..

This 84-page book shows you how to add rooms, fix shabby walls and ceilings, have greater home comfort

● Do you want more room for living—or better use of the rooms you have? Are you tired of shabby walls and ceilings? Would you enjoy a modern, convenient kitchen, an extra bedroom, another bathroom in your house?

Have you hesitated to do what your family wants, and perhaps needs badly, because you aren't sure how to start?

If you can answer "yes" to any of those questions, here's some valuable help for you! "How to Modernize and Make It Pay," an 84-page book of ideas for home remodeling, gives you proof that many of the modern improvements you want actually can pay for themselves!

"How to Modernize and Make It Pay" USG has published this book on home remodeling to help you plan your home improvements intelligently. This book gives you opinions of real estate experts to show how the value of your house can be increased in 3 ways by remodeling—gives you many ideas and experiences to guide you. It explains USG materials, developed by research in home construction, to help you get better value for your money.

● Ask your USG Dealer for a copy or mail the coupon for this valuable book. It costs only 10c to cover mailing and handling. It may save you money and help you avoid mistakes.

UNITED STATES GYPSUM COMPANY
Dept. 50, 300 W. Adams Street, Chicago, Illinois
Please send me "How to Modernize and Make It Pay." I enclose 10c (coin or stamps). C-9-7

Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____

to this room?" one of the cops asked him.

"Yes."

"Which one? Go put your hand on him."

Hardis went and put his hand on Newden's arm. Then they brought Valley in, and he did the same thing; and then Winnet, and last the bellboy named Adley, who had seen Newden in the lobby.

"What's all this for?" Newden demanded. "I admit I came here."

"All right, fellow. Somebody open the trunk."

The bellboy opened it. I was startled because I thought at first the girl's body was in the trunk.

Then I saw that the figure in the trunk was a lay figure.

"That was a silly business, O'Malley!" I asserted, when we were in the hall outside.

"Sure. It was old stuff. Cops got no imagination."

"It didn't force Newden to confess, and if the guilty man is Hardis it had no effect on him either."

"I didn't notice. Come on, I got things to do!"

We went down in the elevator, but we didn't go out the front door of the hotel; we went out the employees' entrance. A laundry van was standing in the street and we hopped into it. O'Malley flashed his shield.

"Get going!" he told the driver. "Police business. A guy just come out the door of that hotel and I want to follow him, and we're using your wagon so he won't see us."

I sat on the bundles of laundry and couldn't see anything, and O'Malley, sitting in front of me, directed the driver. We stopped finally and waited about fifteen minutes.

"Okay," O'Malley said.

I got out and we went into what turned out to be a broker's office.

"A guy just come in here and done some business and went out," O'Malley told the first man we saw. "What business?"

"He left some bonds here to be sold. We hadn't sold them and he reclaimed the bonds."

"What kind of bonds?"

"They're bonds of a power company near Buffalo."

"O'Malley," I said, "that fellow is going to get away!"

"I ain't that dumb. I got a cop following him."

We went to headquarters. Police were questioning somebody in the detectives' room and O'Malley went in. I saw, while the door was open, that the man they had in there was Winnet. After a long while O'Malley came out.

"Was it Winnet killed her?" I asked. "Right."

"He was the one we followed, then?"

"Right. This Winnet had a job in Providence and he was going with a married lady there and he took money from the company where he worked to spend on her. He is one of them guys from a good family that they call black sheep. Well, he found if he couldn't put the money back he was going to get caught. He went to Pittsburgh because he had relatives there that he hoped to get money from, but they wouldn't give him none."

"He was coming back to New York, figuring he'd probably get put in jail, and at Buffalo Miss Dalling got onto the train and got into the same car where Winnet was. It happened, when they went into the diner, that they sat at the same table and they got to talking. Miss Dalling didn't know anything about New York and she asked Winnet did he know a hotel where they didn't charge too much, so he gave her the name of that hotel where he always stopped."

"I see."

"Miss Dalling was planning to stay in New York because of Newden, so she was bringing with her all she had. What she had was six thousand dollars in bonds that her father had given her before he died. They were in her traveling bag. When she and Winnet went back to their car, for some reason she opened the bag and Winnet seen the bonds."

"An unfortunate piece of carelessness!" I commented.

"You said it! That night, when they got to New York, Miss Dalling took a cab to the hotel, and Winnet was going to take a train to Rhode Island. Well, he didn't take the train. He says he sat in the station and walked around the streets all night, thinking about them bonds. He figured they probably was unregistered bonds, so there wasn't no evidence to who they belonged."

"In the morning he went to the hotel and found out Miss Dalling was there and found where her room was. Winnet was well known to everybody at the hotel and they didn't think nothing when he didn't like what room they suggested for him till they mentioned one on the third floor. They got master keys in that hotel that open the doors on all the floors, and one master key is kept in the hotel office. Winnet had been around the place so much he knew where it was kept. When there wasn't anybody in the office, Winnet went in and got the master key, and it didn't take him no more than a few minutes to go out and get a key made like it and put the master key back."

"Clever!"

"That night, he waited till he was sure the girl was asleep, then he went in there. He claims he didn't have no thought of murder; he just wanted the bonds. Well, Miss Dalling was asleep all right. She'd been a lot troubled by her talk with Newden, and she'd laid down on the bed without getting undressed. Winnet had opened the traveling bag and got out the bonds when Miss Dalling woke up. He grabbed her before she could scream, and he seen she'd recognized him, so there was nothing to do, he claims, but knock her off."

"After he'd done it, he figured to fix it so the murder wouldn't be known till he'd left the hotel. He took her things out of the trunk and put 'em in the dresser drawers, and he locked the girl up in the trunk. In the morning he left the bonds at that broker's to be sold, giving a phony name, and he took a train for Rhode Island, and when he got in the country he threw away the master key he'd had made and the key to the trunk. Except he'd had killer's luck, he'd never have been suspected."

"Killer's luck?" I inquired.

"Sure. They have bad luck. When Newden come down the hotel stairs Winnet was talking with that bellboy. Bad luck! Cops questioned the bellboy and he said Winnet had seen the girl too. So then Winnet had to come back to New York to be a witness. He figured if he claimed he'd heard the scream, nobody would doubt but what Newden was the killer."

"Was it the scream," I asked, "that put you on the right track?"

"The first thing was the timetable. Somebody had given Miss Dalling the name of the hotel. If the timetable was the thing she found most handy to write it on, it looked like the name was given her on the train."

"A sound deduction, O'Malley."

"THE next thing was the trunk. A lay figure at a hotel don't usually take everything out of her trunk. She takes out dresses. Some guy had taken time to take everything out of the trunk and put the girl into it, so he could get away before the murder was discovered. Would Newden do that? I and you seen the boy, and I figured he wouldn't. So then I begun to think about the scream. I couldn't find nobody but Winnet that had heard the girl scream, and other people were nearer Miss Dalling's room than he was. So maybe she had screamed. Then why was Winnet seen in it?"

"Did the lay figure in the trunk have anything to do with solving the case?"

"Plenty. That old gag don't bother innocent guy, but a guilty guy can stand it. I told them cops to be sure have the witnesses there. When everybody was watching Newden, I was making it as plain as I could to Winnet that it was him I was watching. When he found the surprise of the figure in the trunk he couldn't hide his feelings, and he seen I knew he was guilty. From then on, my one idea was to get away. By when they found the bonds on him at headquarters, it broke the guy down."

"Good work, O'Malley! I'd like to work with you when you tell Miss Hanne-

"What for? She's in love with Newden. All she'll be thinking is with dumb guys we all are that we ever suspected him."

"If it leaks now, what are we supposed to do on the lake?"

DOUGLAS BORGSTEDT

When the day is one you really want to remember, there's just one way to be sure. Millions of people nail down their memories for life—they take the Kodak along, and use it.

When a snapshot is "one for the book"... chances are it was made on Kodak Film

"HIT-OR-MISS" RESULTS ARE OUT, for the great majority of snapshotters. They're through experimenting.

They load their cameras with Kodak Film for consistent success—they expect swell snapshots every time they take the camera out, and they get them.

This Labor Day week end is going to bring you some big snapshot opportunities. Use Kodak Film, and you're not guessing your pictures will "turn out." You can count on the performance of your film with every click of the shutter.

If you're using an average camera, Kodak VERICHROME Film will give you best results, day in and day out. It takes care of reasonable exposure errors—performs brilliantly even when the weather isn't just right. Call for "Verichrome" by name—use it always.

NEW—An Important Safety Margin: An exclusive "skiving" process provides, in all popular Kodak Film sizes, a safeguard against light leak along the edges of the film—an extra assurance of better pictures with Kodak Film . . . Eastman Kodak Company, Rochester, N. Y.

KODAK'S NEW COLOR SHOW—AGAIN THE HIT OF THE NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR

Millions of people have marveled at the beauty and drama of Kodachrome full-color pictures projected on a 187-foot screen, longest in the world. Also at the Kodak Building—expert advice on picture taking at the Fair. Don't forget your Kodak.

The great snapshots are made on KODAK FILM

Accept nothing but the film in the familiar yellow box—Kodak Film—which only Eastman makes.

The Patriotic Murders

Continued from page 18

A Cool Tip from the Hot Tropics
COMPLETES YOUR PICTURE OF COMFORT!

From burning Burma to sultry Suez, seasoned tropic travelers have a custom in common. It's common sense in the heat of the day, they say, to take time for a cool, iced Johnnie Walker and soda.

So take the tropics' tip for a summer sip . . . Johnnie Walker and soda in a tall glass, tinkling with ice. There's no finer whisky than Scotch and Johnnie Walker is Scotch at its smooth, mellow best.

Black Label 12 Years Old
 Red Label 11 Years Old
 Both 86.8 Proof

IT'S SENSIBLE TO STICK WITH JOHNNIE WALKER

BLENDING SCOTCH WHISKY

Canada Dry Ginger Ale, Inc., New York, N. Y., Sole Importer

good and proper. I'd have sworn she was the genuine article."

"But, my friend, she was the genuine article. We know all about her past life."

"We didn't know she was capable of murder—and that's what it looks like now. Sylvia didn't murder Mabelle. Mabelle murdered Sylvia."

Hercule Poirot shook his head in a worried fashion. He still found it difficult to reconcile Mabelle Sainsbury Seale with murder. Yet in his ears he heard the small, ironic voice of Mr. Barnes:

"Look among the respectable people. . . ."

Mabelle Sainsbury Seale had been eminently respectable.

Japp said, with emphasis, "I'm going to get to the bottom of this case, Poirot. That woman isn't going to put it over on me."

THE following day, Japp rang up. His voice held a curious note.

"Poirot," he said, "do you want to hear a piece of news? It's napoo, my lad. Napoo!"

"Pardon?—the line is perhaps not very clear. I did not quite catch—"

"It's off, my boy. OFF. Call it a day! Sit down and twiddle our thumbs!"

There was no mistaking the bitterness now. Poirot was startled.

"What is off?"

"The whole ruddy, blinking thing! The hue and cry! The publicity! The whole bag of tricks!"

"But I still do not understand."

"Well, listen. Listen carefully, because I can't mention names very well. You know our inquiry? You know we're combing the country for a performing fish?"

"Yes, yes, perfectly. I comprehend now."

"Well, that's been called off. Hushed up—kept mum. Now do you understand?"

"Yes, yes. But why?"

"Orders from the ruddy Foreign Office."

"Is not that very extraordinary?"

"Well, it does happen now and again, especially in wartime."

"Why should they be so forbearing to Miss—to the performing fish?"

"They're not. They don't care tuppence about her. It's the publicity—if she's brought to trial too much might come out about Mrs. A. C. The corpse. That's the hush-hush side! I can only suppose that the ruddy husband—Mr. A. C.—Get me?"

"Yes, yes."

"That he's somewhere abroad in a ticklish spot and they don't want to queer his pitch."

"Tchah!"

"What did you say?"

"I made, mon ami, an exclamation of annoyance!"

"Oh! that was it. I thought you'd caught cold. Annoyance is right! I could use a stronger word. Letting that dame get away with it makes me see red."

Poirot said, very softly, "She will not get away with it."

"Our hands are tied, I tell you!"

"Yours may be—mine are not!"

"Good old Poirot! Then you are going on with it?"

"Mais oui—to the death."

"Well, don't let it be your death, old boy! If this business goes on as it has begun someone will probably send you a poisoned tarantula by post!"

As he replaced the receiver, Poirot said to himself, "Now why did I use that melodramatic phrase—to the death! It is absurd!"

The letter came by the evening post. It was typewritten except for the signature.

Dear M. Poirot:

I should be greatly obliged if you would call upon me some time tomorrow. I may have a commission for you. I suggest twelve-thirty, at my house in Chelsea. If this is inconvenient to you, perhaps you would telephone and arrange some other time with my secretary? I apologize for giving you such short notice.

Yours sincerely,
 ALISTAIR BLUNT

Poirot smoothed out the letter and read it a second time. At that moment the telephone rang.

Hercule Poirot occasionally indulged in the fancy that he knew by the ring of his telephone bell what kind of message was impending.

On this occasion he was at once quite sure that the call was significant. It was not a wrong number—not one of his friends.

He got up and took down the receiver. He said in his polite voice, "Hello?"

An impersonal voice said: "What number are you, please?"

"This is Whitehall 7272."

There was a pause, a click, and then a voice spoke. It was a woman's voice.

"M. Poirot?"

"Yes."

"M. Hercule Poirot?"

"Yes."

"M. Poirot, you have either already received—or will shortly receive—a letter."

"Who is speaking?"

"It is not necessary that you should know."

"Very well. I have received, Madame, eight letters and three bills by the evening post."

"Then you know which letter I mean. You will be wise, M. Poirot, to refer the commission you have been offered."

"That, Madame, is a matter I shall decide myself."

The voice said coldly, "I am warning you, M. Poirot. Your interference will no longer be tolerated. Keep out of this business."

"And if I do not keep out of it?"

"THEN we shall take steps to see to it that your interference is no longer tolerated."

"That is a threat, Madame!"

"We are only asking you to be sensible. . . . It is for your own good."

"You are very magnanimous!"

"You cannot alter the course of events and what has been arranged. So keep out of what doesn't concern you! Do you understand?"

"Oh, yes, I understand. But I consider that Mr. Morley's death is my concern."

The woman's voice said sharply, "Morley's death was only an incident. He interfered with our plans."

"He was a human being, Madame, and he died before his time."

"He was of no importance."

Poirot's voice was dangerous as he said very quietly, "There you are wrong. . . ."

"It was his own fault. He refused to be sensible."

"I, too, refuse to be sensible."

"Then you are a fool."

There was a click at the other end of the receiver was replaced.

Poirot said "Hello?" then put down his receiver in turn. He did not trouble

You may worry about the younger generation

but here is one worry you can avoid

You may worry about Sally's young man and wonder what is best to do about him. But there's one worry you can avoid if you'll drive around and see us.

We take over your worry on chassis lubrication. We can't miss a point because we follow the Texaco "Lubrication Guide" of your car. No worry about the lubricants for they are developed in Texaco's great laboratories.

Just remember one word:

"MARFAK." That word means 40-point Chassis Lubrication Service. Marfak lubricants last twice as long as ordinary grease, make your car run smoother, last longer.

Just say, "Marfak my car" and you have eliminated one worry for 1,000 miles.

TEXACO DEALERS INVITE YOU TO tune in the TEXACO STAR THEATRE—Starring Kenny Baker and Frances Langford—Every Wednesday Night—Columbia Network—9:00 E.D.T., 8:00 E.S.T., 8:00 C.D.T., 7:00 C.S.T., 6:00 M.S.T., 5:00 P.S.T.

TEXACO'S
40-POINT
CHASSIS
LUBRICATION
SERVICE

AT ALL TEXACO AND OTHER GOOD DEALERS

Copyright 1940, The Texas Company

ask the exchange to trace the number. He was fairly sure that the call had been put through from a public telephone box.

What intrigued and puzzled him was the fact that he thought he had heard the voice somewhere before. He racked his brains, trying to bring the elusive memory back. Could it be the voice of Miss Sainsbury Seale?

As he remembered it, Mabelle Sainsbury Seale's voice had been high-pitched and somewhat affected, with rather overemphasized diction. This voice was not at all like that, and yet—perhaps it might be Miss Sainsbury Seale with her voice disguised. After all, she had been an actress in her time. She could alter her voice, probably, easily enough. In actual timbre the voice was not unlike what he remembered.

But he was not satisfied with that explanation. No, it was some other person that the voice brought back to him. It was not a voice he knew well—but he was still quite sure that he had heard it once, if not twice before.

Why, he wondered, bother to ring up and threaten him? Could these people actually believe that threats would deter him? Apparently they did. It was poor psychology!

THERE was some sensational news in the morning papers. The prime minister had been shot at when leaving 10 Downing Street with a friend yesterday evening. Fortunately the bullet had done one wide. The man, an Indian, had been taken into custody.

After reading this, Poirot took a taxi to Scotland Yard where he was shown up to Japp's room. The latter greeted him heartily.

"Ah, so the news has brought you long. Have any of the papers mentioned who 'the friend' was with the P. M.?"

"No, who was it?"

"Alistair Blunt."

"Really?"

"And," went on Japp, "we've every reason to believe that the bullet was meant for Blunt and not for the P. M. That is, unless the man was an even more thundering bad shot than he is already!"

"Who did it?"

"Some crazy Hindu student. Half naked, as usual. But he was put up to it. It wasn't all his own idea."

Japp added: "Quite a sound bit of work getting him. There's usually a small group of people, you know, watching No. 10. When the shot was fired, a young American grabbed hold of a little man with a beard. Held on to him like grim death and yelled to the police that he'd got the man. Meanwhile, the Indian was quietly hooking it—but one of our people nabbed him all right."

"Who was the American?" asked Poirot curiously.

"Young fellow of the name of Raikes. Why—" He stopped short, staring at Poirot. "What's the matter?"

Poirot said, "Howard Raikes, staying at the Holborn Palace Hotel?"

"That's right. Who—why, of course! I thought the name seemed familiar. He's the patient who ran away that morning when Morley shot himself. . . ."

He paused. He said, slowly, "Rum—how that old business keeps cropping up. You've still got your ideas about it, haven't you, Poirot?"

Hercule Poirot replied gravely, "Yes. I still have my ideas. . . ."

AT THE Gothic House, Poirot was received by a secretary, a tall, limp young man with an accomplished social manner. He was pleasantly apologetic.

"I am so sorry, M. Poirot—and so is Mr. Blunt. He has been called to Downing Street. The result of this—er—incident last night. I rang your flat, but unfortunately you had already left."

The young man went on rapidly:

"Mr. Blunt commissioned me to ask you if it would be possible for you to spend the week end with him at his house in Kent. Exsham, you know. If so, he would call for you in the car tomorrow evening."

Poirot hesitated.

The young man said, persuasively, "Mr. Blunt is really most anxious to see you."

Hercule Poirot bowed his head. "Thank you," he said. "I accept."

"Oh, that's splendid. Mr. Blunt will be delighted. If he calls for you about a quarter to six, will that— Oh, good morning, Mrs. Olivera—"

Jane Olivera's mother had just entered. She was very smartly dressed, with a hat clinging to an eyebrow in the midst of a very soignée coiffure.

"Oh! Mr. Selby, did Mr. Blunt give you any instructions about those garden chairs? I meant to talk to him about them last night, because I knew we'd be going down this week end and—"

Mrs. Olivera took in Poirot and paused.

"Do you know Mrs. Olivera, M. Poirot?"

"I have already had the pleasure of meeting Madame."

Poirot bowed.

Mrs. Olivera said vaguely, "Oh? How do you do. Of course, Mr. Selby, I know that Alistair is a very busy man and that these small domestic matters mayn't seem to him important—"

"It's quite all right, Mrs. Olivera," said the efficient Mr. Selby. "He told me about it and I rang up Messrs. Deever about them."

"Well, now, that's a real load off my mind. Now, Mr. Selby, can you tell me . . ."

Mrs. Olivera clacked on. She was, thought Poirot, rather like a hen. A big, fat hen! Mrs. Olivera, still clacking, moved majestically toward the door.

" . . . and if you're quite sure that there will only be ourselves this week end—"

Mr. Selby coughed.

"Er—M. Poirot is also coming down for the week end."

Mrs. Olivera stopped. She turned around and surveyed Poirot with visible distaste.

"Is that really so?"

"Mr. Blunt has been kind enough to invite me," said Poirot.

"Well, I wonder—why, if that isn't queer of Alistair. You'll excuse me, M. Poirot, but Mr. Blunt particularly told me that he wanted a quiet, family week end!"

Selby said, firmly, "Mr. Blunt is par-

"Foolhardy optimists" drilled this historic oil-well . . . and made their fortunes. Following Drake's first well, all oil-wells were drilled in valleys. Hillsides and high-spots were neglected. "Oil is only under low lands" said the "experts."

But the King of the Hills, shown above, drilled 250 feet above the elevation of Oil Creek, became a big producer and the whole oil picture changed with amazing speed. That was in 1867. Today on hill-tops, hill-sides and in valleys throughout the Pennsylvania region, oil-wells are steadily producing Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil—and no crude oil has ever been discovered anywhere, to match the excellence of this crude for the making of fine motor oils for your automobile.

PENNSYLVANIA GRADE CRUDE OIL ASSOCIATION
OIL CITY, PENNSYLVANIA

Copyright 1940, Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil Association

How to find a needle in a haystack . . . call in these technological "key-hole peepers" at State College, Pennsylvania. Here they are using the interferometer to determine the tiniest change in liquid composition. This device is so acute, for instance, that it will reveal one part of salt in 500,000 parts of water. It's all done with light-waves and color-bands, and is highly technical, of course. This laboratory research plays an important part in recovery of Pennsylvania Crude Oil, and in maintaining the super-quality for which Pennsylvania Motor Oils are noted.

This advertisement is published in the interests of producers, refiners, wholesalers, retailers, exporters and users of 100% Pure Pennsylvania Motor Oils protected by our emblem. Watch for new announcements in this series.

This is the official emblem of the Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil Association. It is registered in the U. S. Patent Office and protected under federal copyright laws. This emblem is not the mark of a brand. It is a guarantee to you that a motor oil is made entirely from Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil and that the oil is up to this association's rigid standard in every respect.

All maple syrup isn't Vermont maple syrup—and all eastern oil very definitely is not Pennsylvania. Such terms as "eastern," "paraffin-base" and so on do not mean Pennsylvania—although sometimes used in the hope that you will think they do. Be assured that when an oil is genuine Pennsylvania, the refiner, marketer and dealer will use the name Pennsylvania in selling it.

MURDER — THAT'S WHAT IT WAS!

"I was a good motor once. My owner gave me plenty of oil . . . but he wasn't particular what kind of oil I got. I came to a tragic end. Here I am rusting on a junk heap. Brother motors of mine, whose owners buy nothing but Pennsylvania Motor Oil, are still going strong. Murder . . . that's what it was! And the crime was committed by a man who should have been my friend."

BETTER OILS from the GROUND UP!

ticularly anxious that M. Poirot should come."

"Oh, really? He didn't mention it to me."

The door opened. Jane stood there. She said impatiently: "Mother, aren't you coming? Our lunch appointment is at 1:15!"

"I'm coming, Jane. Don't be impatient."

"Well, get a move on, for goodness' sake—Hullo, M. Poirot."

She was suddenly very still—her petulance frozen. Her eyes more wary.

Mrs. Olivera said in a cold voice, "M. Poirot is coming down to Exsham for the week end."

"Oh—I see."

Jane Olivera stood back to let her mother pass her. On the point of following her, she whirled back again.

"M. Poirot!"

Her voice was imperious. Poirot crossed the room to her. She said in a low voice, "You're coming down to Exsham? Why?"

Poirot shrugged his shoulders. He said, "It is a kind thought of your uncle's."

Jane said: "But he can't know . . . He can't . . . When did he ask you? Oh, there's no need—"

"Jane!"

Her mother was calling from the hall.

Jane said in a low, urgent tone, "Stay away. Please don't come."

She went out. Poirot heard the sounds of altercation, heard Mrs. Olivera's high, complaining, clucking voice. "I really will not tolerate your rudeness, Jane. . . . I shall take steps to see that you do not interfere—"

The secretary said, "Then at a little before six tomorrow, M. Poirot?"

Poirot nodded assent mechanically. He was standing like a man who has seen a ghost.

But it was his ears, not his eyes, that had given him the shock.

Two of the sentences that had drifted in through the open door were almost identical with those he had heard last night through the telephone, and he knew why the voice had been faintly familiar.

As he walked out into the sunshine he shook his head blankly.

Mrs. Olivera?

But it was impossible! It could not have been Mrs. Olivera who had spoken over the phone!

That empty-headed society woman—selfish, brainless, grasping, self-centered? What had he called her to himself just now?

"That good fat hen? C'est ridicule!" said Hercule Poirot.

His ears, he decided, must have deceived him. And yet—

The car called punctually for Poirot at a little before six.

Alistair Blunt and his secretary were the only occupants. Mrs. Olivera and Jane had gone down by train earlier, it seemed.

THE drive was uneventful. Blunt talked a little, mostly of his garden and of a recent horticultural show. He did not mention the war.

Poirot congratulated him on his escape from death, at which Blunt demurred.

"Oh, that! Don't think the fellow was shooting at me particularly. Anyway, the poor chap hadn't the first idea of how to aim! Just one of these half-crazed students. There's no harm in them really. They just get worked up and fancy that a pot shot at the P. M. will alter the course of history. It's pathetic, really."

"There have been other attempts on your life, have there not?"

"Sounds quite melodramatic," said Blunt, with a slight twinkle. "Someone sent me an I.R.A. bomb by post not long ago. It wasn't a very efficient bomb. You know, these fellows who want to take on the management of the world—what sort of an efficient business do they think they could make of it, when they can't even devise an effectual bomb?"

He shook his head.

"It's always the same thing—long-haired, woolly idealists—without a practical bit of knowledge in their heads. I'm not a clever chap—never have been—but I can just read and write and do arithmetic. D'you understand what I mean by that?"

"I think so, but explain to me further."

"Well, if I read something that is written down in English I can understand what it means—I am not talking of abstruse stuff, formulae or philosophy—just plain businesslike English—most people can't! If I want to write down something I can write down what I mean—I've discovered that quite a lot of people can't do that either! And, as I say, I can do plain arithmetic. If Jones has eight bananas and Brown takes ten away

FUNNY-BUSINESS MEN

Self-Portraits of Collier's Cartoonists

No. 2

Hoosierite Frank Beaven knows how to plow corn, but doesn't understand how he contrived to get through Wabash College, where he edited the humor magazine. A columnist's glowing description of New York finally egged him eastward, where he has learned to keep his hat on in elevators, lie about his golf score, draw gags like the one across the page.

from him, how many will Jones have left? That's the kind of sum people like to pretend has a simple answer. They won't admit, first, that Brown can't do it, and, second, that there won't be an answer in plus bananas!"

"They prefer the answer to be a con juring trick?"

"Exactly. Politicians are just as bad. But I've always held out for plain common sense. You can't beat it, you know in the end."

He added, with a slightly self-conscious laugh: "But I mustn't talk shop. Bad habit. Besides, I like to leave business matters behind when I get away from London. I've been looking forward, M. Poirot, to hearing a few of your adventures. I read a lot of thriller and detective stories, you know. Do you think any of them are true to life?"

The conversation dwelt for the rest of the journey on the more spectacular cases of Hercule Poirot. Alistair Blunt displayed himself as avid as any school boy for details.

This pleasant atmosphere sustained a chill on arrival at Exsham where behind her massive bust Mrs. Olivera radiated freezing disapproval. She ignored Poirot as far as possible, addressing herself exclusively to her host and to Mr. Blunt.

The latter showed Poirot to his room. The house was a charming one, not very big, and furnished with the same good taste that Poirot had noticed in London. Everything was costly but simple. The vast wealth that owned it was only indicated by the smoothness with which this apparent simplicity was produced. The service was admirable—the cooking, English, not Continental—the wines at dinner stirred Poirot to a passion of appreciation. They had a perfect, clear soup, a grilled sole, saddle of lamb with tiny, young garden peas and strawberries and cream.

POIROT was so enjoying these creature comforts that the continued rigid demeanor of Mrs. Olivera and the brusque rudeness of her daughter hardly attracted his attention. Jane, for some reason, was regarding him with definite hostility. Hazily, toward the end of dinner, Poirot wondered why.

Looking down the table with mild curiosity, Blunt asked, "Helen not dining with us tonight?" Julia Olivera's lips drew themselves with a taut line.

"Dear Helen has been overtiring herself, I think, in the garden," she said. "I suggested it would be far better for her to go to bed and rest than to bother to dress herself up and come here. She quite saw my point."

"Oh, I see." Blunt looked vague and a little puzzled. "I thought it made a bit of a change for her at week ends."

"Helen is such a simple soul. She likes turning in early," said Mrs. Olivera firmly.

When Poirot joined the ladies in the drawing room, Blunt having remained behind for a few minutes' conversation with his secretary, he heard Jane Olivera say to her mother:

"Uncle Alistair didn't quite like the old way you'd shelled Helen Montresor, Mother."

"Nonsense," said Mrs. Olivera roostily. "Alistair is too good-natured. Our relations are all very well—very kind of him to let her have the cottage rent free, but to think he has to have her up to the house every week end for dinner is absurd! She's only a second cousin or something. I don't think Alistair ought to be imposed upon!"

"I think she's proud in her way," said Jane. "She does an awful lot in the garden."

"That shows a proper spirit," said Mrs. Olivera comfortably. "She's very dependent and one respects her for it."

She settled herself comfortably on the sofa and, still not taking any notice of Poirot, added:

"Just bring me the Low Down Review, dear. There's something about Lois Van Schuyler in it and that Moroccan guide of hers."

Alistair Blunt appeared in the doorway.

"Now, M. Poirot, come into my room," he said.

Alistair Blunt's own sanctum was a low, long room at the back of the house, with windows opening upon the garden. It was comfortable, with deep armchairs and settees and just enough pleasant untidiness to make it livable.

(Needless to say, Hercule Poirot would have preferred a greater symmetry.)

After offering his guest a cigarette and lighting his own pipe, Alistair Blunt came to the point quite simply and directly:

"There's a good deal that I'm not satisfied about. I'm referring, of course, to this Sainsbury Seale woman. For reasons of their own—reasons no doubt which are perfectly justified—the authorities have called off the hunt. I don't know exactly who Albert Chapman is or what he's doing—but whatever it is, it's something pretty vital and it's the sort of business that might land him in a tight spot if he is, as I suspect, in an enemy country. I don't know the ins and outs of it, but the P. M. did just mention that they can't afford any publicity whatever about this case and that the sooner it fades out of the public's memory the better."

"That's quite okay. That's the official view, and they know what's necessary and what the Admiralty and the War Office want."

He leaned forward in his chair.

"But I want to know the truth, M. Poirot. And you're the man to find it out for me."

"What do you want me to do, M. Blunt?"

"I want you to find this woman—Sainsbury Seale."

"Alive or dead?"

Alistair Blunt's eyebrows rose.

"You think it possible that she is dead?"

Hercule Poirot was silent for a minute or two, then he said, speaking slowly and with weight:

"If you want my opinion—but it is only an opinion, remember—then, yes, I think she is dead."

"Why do you think so?"

Hercule Poirot smiled slightly.

"It would not make sense to you if I said it was because of a pair of unworn stockings in a drawer."

Alistair Blunt stared at him curiously.

"You're an odd man, M. Poirot."

"I am very odd. That is to say, I am methodical, orderly and logical—and I do not like distorting facts to support a theory—that, I find, is unusual!"

"I've been turning the whole thing

Old-Time Saturday Night Baked-Bean Suppers—

all ready to eat and cheer for!

RIGHT now—in a few minutes—you can set on your table a crock of beans—steamy, tempting beans like the kind that came out of the old bake oven years ago. Heinz Oven-Baked Beans are baked in hot, dry ovens till tender, digestible. And they're drenched in a spicy molasses sauce flavored with rich young pork. These are Heinz Boston-style Baked Beans! There are three other kinds—Heinz Oven-Baked Beans with Tomato Sauce and Pork; Vegetarian-style; and Oven-Baked Red Kidney Beans. All are ready to heat on top the stove, or set in the oven till the heavy, fragrant sauce whispers—Let's Eat.

57

Heinz OVEN-BAKED Beans

TASTE JUST LIKE THE HOME-MADE KIND

WHEN YOU ATTEND the New York World's Fair, H. J. Heinz Co. invites you to visit the Heinz Dome with its beautiful display walls and sampling booths.

"Aw, Ma, it makes a swell chest protector!"

FRANK BEAVEN

highly placed, respected, rich, prosperous, satisfied. You will say—such a man is no reason to commit murder. But I say—yes, for such a man has much to lose. And easy living sometimes saps moral strength. You will take then a poor man, humble, obscure. And to that I say, such a man might have great temptations, for he might have much to gain. Or, to leave material views, you will instance a man of kindly nature—a man who hates to kill a fly.

"Such a man, you will say, could not kill a human being. But that is not true. Men of gentle and kindly ways in private life will order the destruction of masses without turning a hair. Lenin is a gentle man in his family life, Adolf Hitler is kind and gentle to children. And there are other men, benevolent and kindly in public life, who have strange streaks of cruelty and sadism which they hide from the general gaze. I'd remember this, when you say 'so good so could never kill'—that it is possible for almost everyone to play a part. There was a woman once in France who used to hurry to nurse sick children. The mothers loved her, she was so gentle and full of sympathy—so sad when the objects of her ministrations died—they all did die. That woman, M. Blunt, murdered as many, I believe, as thirteen children."

Blunt said, "She was mad."
"The individual who kills is mad—not beforehand, perhaps, but certainly afterward. To take a life is to put oneself on an equality with the good God, and a human brain can stand that terrific strain. Anyone who has murdered once will murder again. He (or she) will come to believe that he has the right to kill. He will brush aside a human life as he would brush aside an insect."

Alistair Blunt said slowly, "You paint a frightening picture, M. Poirot."

"Believe me, it is a true one."

"I have one more argument. Take a stupid person. A thoroughly stupid woman, for instance, would not have the brains to plan a murder."

Poirot smiled.

"The stupid murderers, M. Blunt, are the ones that get caught."

"I used the wrong word, perhaps. 'Silly' explains my meaning better. There is a type of silly empty-headed woman—whom surely it would be ridiculous to suspect of violence of any kind."

"There are strange compensations in nature. Silliness is often accompanied by a good deal of cunning. A lot of what you call 'silliness' is often deliberately put on—it is a defensive reaction to life. Behind it there is often a very shrewd brain. I knew a particularly vapid and empty-headed woman who committed one of the cleverest murders I have ever investigated."

Blunt laughed.

"Very well, then, we are all potential murderers!" He added slyly, "Even M. Hercule Poirot?"

Poirot did not smile. He said gravely:

"I will answer in the words of one of your famous men. There, but for the Grace of God, goes Hercule Poirot. . . ."

(To be continued next week)

Cut-Rate Showman

Continued from page 12

quarter under the wicket, and give him a nickel back with his two ducats. Or give him a dime back from his half. He likes that. He thinks he's getting a bargain. That's the principle the big department stores work on. But never price a ticket at fifteen cents. It means a quarter plus a nickel for two seats, so it sells expensive."

Todd can be chromium-hard. The only concession he'll make to a wheedler is to ask, "How do you want your 'No'—fast or slow?" But hardness is not natural to him. Like his huge cigars, it is a disguise adopted to belie his youth and essential affability. Otherwise, he thinks there would be no end to his being imposed upon.

How to Gyp a Gyp

Young in years, Todd is a veteran showman. His first job was in show business, in Minneapolis, his native city. He was seven, and his employer was a technician who demonstrated the versatility of his line of potato-peelers by coming to stick one of them through Mike's neck. He was receiving a quarter a day for this pleasant work when his elder brother spied him and packed him back to school. Soon afterward the family moved to Bloomington, Minnesota, and then to Chicago. Mike was twelve before he met his first love again. The scene was Division Street, where a small carnival was playing. One of the booths was a ball-and-bucket game. Throw three balls into the bucket, and if they stay you win a duck. Mike was watching the neighbors pay their quarters to miss, when the proprietor beckoned to him. "You look like a smart kid," he said. "Can you keep your trap shut?" "Don't worry about that," said Mike. "Well, come inside here. . . . See that bucket? See that spring in the bottom? It's pulled tight, the balls will hit it and bounce out. All you've got to do is crawl under this platform, and when you hear me holler 'Don't miss it!' you pull the spring. I'll give you two bits a night. Okay?"

This criminal partnership operated faultlessly for a couple of nights, until Mike decided that it would take at least four bits to gag his conscience. The proprietor—"The Duke," he called himself—turned him down flat. Even then Todd was a dangerous man to cross. He conferred with a friend, one Legs Kaplan, and explained the gaff. "Now, get this," he said. "When the Duke yells, 'Don't miss it!' you yell right back, 'I won't!' That way, I'll know it's you and I'll forget about the spring."

Mike crawled under the platform and waited. Presently, after the Duke's usual "Don't miss it!" he heard Legs' confident "I won't!" Legs didn't.

"The little gentleman wins a fine, fat duck," said the Duke grudgingly. "And now who's next?"

"I am," said Legs. "Here's another quarter. Gimme three more shots."

"Don't miss it!" said the Duke, with a rousing kick at Mike's exposed rear.

"I won't!" Legs promised cheerily. He was right again.

Telling the story now, Todd says. "We moved the joint out. We took the Duke for every duck in his stable, right then and there."

Todd's steady job was popping soda at Ritzlin's drugstore. Between drinks he studied the pharmacopoeia so diligently that he passed the Illinois examination and became, at thirteen, the youngest apprentice pharmacist in the state. That led to a better job—at the Michael Reese Hospital. And that led to a still better one—in the Chicago branch of a national shoe retailer. It came through one of the patients, a shoe salesman, who was impressed by the youngster's drive.

He had drive aplenty. In fact, he

Sue Read, famous as the "Most Televised Girl in America," is shown . . .

. . . at the wheel of a fast speed boat. It's a thrilling sport, but mighty tough on engine lubricant. That's why, for safe lubrication, so many . . .

. . . motor boat and yacht owners depend on Sinclair Motor Oils. These are the same quality oils sold by . . .

. . . your nearby Sinclair Dealer for your car. Ask him for Sinclair Opaline or Sinclair Pennsylvania Motor Oil. You'll find they last so long they save you money.

BACK TO SCHOOL...

WITH EVEN HIS
UNDERWOOD
STANDING ON ITS OWN FEET

Liberal Terms

The only Portable with the Built-in Typing Stand

No typewriter but the Underwood offers this complete typing unit. You not only get the exclusive Underwood Built-in Typing Stand . . . you get the famous Champion Keyboard plus Touch Tuning plus the Sealed Action Frame and many other time-tried Underwood features.

Now you can set up your Underwood anywhere indoors or out and with three adjustments for height you can always type in comfort.

See the Underwood Universal Portable with Built-in Typing Stand at our Dealer's . . . ask him about liberal terms . . . or mail the coupon for a free trial.

Portable Typewriter Division

MAIL COUPON FOR FREE TRIAL

UNDERWOOD
ELLIOTT FISHER CO.
One Park Avenue
New York

Please let me know how I can get—an Underwood Universal Portable with Built-in Typing Stand for free trial and with no obligation to buy. Also tell me about Liberal Terms.

Name _____

Address _____

C-9-7-40

City _____ State _____

Copyright 1940, Underwood Elliott Fisher Company

drove himself right out of the job. The boss had supplied the staff with blanks headed "Employees' Suggestions for Improving Business," and Todd had been at work hardly a week before he was turning in thirty to forty suggestions a day. The boss replied with a suggestion of his own.

Todd's next field was high-pressure merchandising. He and an elder partner, eighteen years old, set out to teach small shopkeepers how to conduct sales of the Sacrifice—Forced-to-Vacate—Building-Coming-Down sort. Their first client was a shopkeeper on Milwaukee Avenue. The partners put their souls and their entire capital of eighty dollars into a series of heart-rending window displays for him. The displays were so heart-rending, it turned out, that the shopkeeper himself believed them and went into bankruptcy.

A week later the merchandising expert was a college president. Bricklayers were making around fifteen dollars a day then, so Todd figured it was a trade that a lot of men would like to learn. The result was the Robey Street College of Bricklaying of America. The campus was a rented storeroom. The faculty was one bricklayer, an Assyrian named Mr. Stevens. And the laboratory equipment was a pile of bricks and a hod of mortar. The college failed because its graduates found that the union wouldn't accept their diplomas, but notice the Todd touch: he put no cement into his mortar, so it wouldn't harden, and he could use it over and over again.

Big Business at Seventeen

Single bricks led to bricks in bulk. He scraped together a new stake by taking "Modernize Your Home" ads in Chicago's foreign-language newspapers and subletting the contracts. Soon he was ready for his big step. It was on the face of the suburbs, and it left bruises in the form of billboards shouting "Happy Home Builders!—See the Michael Todd Construction Company!" and "Let the Michael Todd Construction Company Make You Happy Too!" and "Another One Made Happy by the Michael Todd Construction Co.!"

The company did well, but it would do even better, the president discovered, if so many potential clients didn't mistrust his seventeen-year-old abilities. Abruptly he changed its name to the Atlantic Construction Company and disguised himself on his business cards as "Estimator," "Supervisor" or "Salesman."

"Of course," he admits, "I had some printed that billed me as 'President,' but that was strictly to impress the girls."

One girl, Miss Bertha Freshman, was sufficiently impressed to marry him. He was seventeen and she was sixteen. In fact, they were married twice to be sure about it, and they have been married ever since. Michael junior is now eleven.

Todd was doing a gross business of $2,000,000 a year when the bond house that financed him went broke and carried him down with it. Chicago seemed to be a jinx city for his talents, so, early in 1928, he took them to California. The talkies were then in their infancy. Naturally, they required soundproofed stages. Naturally, Todd introduced himself as a soundproofing expert. The usual side lines were developed: a lumber business, a tramp-steamship business, a street-paving business. Once again he was riding high. Once again he was tripped. This time it was providential. It brought him back to Chicago and to show business.

A single job has never been enough to contain Todd's energy. The workaday world now knew him merely as a gag-writer for Olsen and Johnson, Senator Murphy and Rae Samuels, but all the while—like the young George Washington and the young Tom Edison—he was dreaming dreams of glory. They flowered in an airy, faery conception called The Flame Dance, in which a girl costumed as a moth whirls around a huge candle, closer and closer, until her clothes catch fire and burn off, leaving her nude.

Dainty? Poetic? The Ineffable Entrepreneur brushed aside the plaudits of the haut monde and commented only, "I burnt up four dolls before I got it."

The Hot Mikado is Born

However, he tucked the act into The Streets of Paris at the Chicago Century of Progress and later made it, with Pete the Personality Penguin, the basis of a girl show, Bring on the Dames, which he took on a 56-week tour.

And now the sad, familiar pattern repeats itself. Todd took the $10,000 that Bring on the Dames brought him and parlayed it on a production of The Mikado, featuring Mary McCormic and other singers from the Chicago Civic Opera. Ever since, age eleven, he had stage-managed a production of The Mikado for his fellow students at the Bloomington Consolidated Grade School, he had been a Gilbert and Sullivan fan. The new production stag-adults. Miniature, alive—naturally, kids. You can hardly sell kids on a pe act, though, unless they were Dead E kids, and there isn't enough of th around, I don't think. So I took the ic and I figured. Kids: what's the na ral thing with kids? Why, Santa Clau

And that's how the Kute Kris Kring as it came to be known, was born. N observe again the workings of the Gy scopic Gazi's genius: Mirrors were pensive and cumbersome; couldn't same effect be achieved more simp more cheaply? The answer was a ducing lens. Todd bought a supply them from the U. S. Army, set a cou of refugees to turning out "Santa Cl workshops" in a factory in Brookl and started canvassing departm stores all over the country.

His sales talk invited the store ecutives to visualize a child look through a peephole and seeing a t Santa Claus pegging away at his wo bench, surrounded by a lot of toy dolls, electric trains, footballs. There a telephone right by the peephole, t other on the bench. The child asks operator to ring Santa Claus and s Santa Claus pick up the phone.

"Santa? This is Johnny Doe."

"Hello, Johnny! What do you w for Christmas and where do you liv

Next day, Mr. Doe receives a let from the store saying that his gered as far as South Bend and then blew up. The dust it raised is reported to have colored sunsets in Chile for the next eight months.

Still, there was some salvage. Todd took over the costumes and scenery, hired a less austere cast and a dance line, "rocked" a couple of the songs, and tramped his company through vaudeville and movie houses as The Hot Mikado. He did not come East to put his "swingcopated" version to the supreme test, but he knew that he had something good. It would keep.

Meanwhile, back in Chicago, he undertook still another branch of show business. He became an author. With a friend named Danny Goldberg, he holed up for a week end in Wisconsin and emerged with the script of a three-act play, Call Me Ziggie. It ran three days in New York.

Whatever his other talents, the Nizam of Necromantic Nudity was evidently no Ibsen. His next production, The Man From Cairo, succeeded in staving disaster for only six weeks.

His break was past due. It came the following winter. Ever since the Century of Progress, he had been brooding over a novelty he saw there—the Girl in the Goldfish Bowl. This was a semi-nude houri behind an arrangement of mirrors that made her seem three inches high. Here, in his own words, is how he developed her:

"It occurred to me that there is an attraction that might appeal, or rather it should appeal, to kids more so than

Johnny had been in and had told Sa Claus that he wanted an Ajax footb a Bulldog bicycle and a pair of Silr Streak skates, all of which the store is in stock.

Some 480 stores, and theaters ev ordered Kute Kris Kringles on the sp. Each of them paid $600 to rent the stallation from Thanksgiving to N Year's. Each installation cost T around $100. So over 200 G's stood Gravy.

All or Nothing

Then he shot the works on the production of the Hot Mikado. Part of it w into a forty-foot waterfall of soap bles; part into a volcano that reay erupted; part into a bakelite floor r Bill Robinson's tap dancing. On oping night, Todd had one fifty-cent pie in his pocket. Lee Shubert came ba stage after the curtain.

"Mike," he said, "I'll pay the wh cost of the production for half the p its."

Todd pondered. Here was a safe t and a comfortable return. He finger his fifty-cent piece. "Listen," he t Shubert. "Heads, I keep it. Tai you're in."

Heads came up. Todd threw away e coin, borrowed a dollar for taxi fare, and went home.

Burns Mantle's review in next mo ing's News was representative: "Ty have dressed it beautifully, cast it perty, and staged it with such per timing and in such excellent taste the ands absolutely unrivaled so far as my paygoing experience is concerned."

The Hot Mikado was a hit, a bull's-
e. It grossed $20,000 in its second week. Cole Porter saw it seven times.
Bill Robinson said, "I ain't been so happy since I been colored." One member of the all-Negro cast, though, stood apart from the general jubilation. He complained, "What Ah cain't unnerstan' why them boys what wrote this show ain't even stop by to say 'Hi!'"

And then with one of the season's outstanding successes on his hands, a success that could run at the Broadhurst Theater (immediately rechristened Under Todd's Cabin) well into the next fall, what does the Rhomboid Rhetorician suddenly do? He closes the show after only seven weeks, and announces that it will soon reopen it in the Hall of Music at the World's Fair! Broadway's dict was "Todd's clanky. That's all, other: clanky."

Word of the threatened invasion reached Billy Rose, Archon of the Aquacade and thitherto unchallenged as the king of the Fair's Amusement Area.
Rose met Todd in Lindy's Restaurant on Broadway.

"We suppose you have been informed,
est-ce pas, that our contract forbids the presence of any other new and original musical show in the Amusement Area, to the contrary notwithstanding whereas?" Idly, almost inattentively, his Majesty knighted a waiter.

"The Hot Mikado is a musical, but ain't new," retorted Todd, "so it's coming in, and you'll know about it after it's been there a while. What's more, I'm thinking of putting a box office out back, facing your Aquacade. And I'm dread, pal, I'm mighty afraid that that's going to mean loud-speakers right in your pretty ear."

A cracker fell to powder in Rose's outraged fingers. "But that wouldn't be good business!"

"It would for me," observed the Bold shaw of the Beauty Bazaars. "I've got a closed house and yours is open.
But if, now, you'd like to co-operate by giving me a plug from time to time—"

The Treaty That Wasn't

The upshot of this historic encounter was a pact known to Broadway as the Treaty of Lindy's, and presently audiences leaving the Aquacade were hearing the loud-speakers purr, "Billy Rose thanks you for coming and suggests that you visit The Hot Mikado." In return when one of the Aquacade's loud-speaker hookups went sour, Todd invited the seller to come across the street and use the "Mikado" hookup.

Once again Todd had 'em hanging from the rafters. On the week end of July Fourth, his show played to 24,000 people. A number of papers ranked it ahead of the Aquacade on visitors' trust" lists.

Perhaps the chief absurdity was Todd's reconciliation with Billy Rose to the extent of an agreement to put on a joint show in the Hall of Music. It fell rough when Rose discovered that Todd also intended taking over last year's Little Old New York village and placing it with Gay New Orleans.
Todd protested that the prime reason for their joint deal on the Hall of Music was that they wouldn't be fighting each other, and therefore each would be free to devote his surplus talents to other ventures. Rose didn't see it that way, Todd offered to release him from the deal.

"Okay," said Rose. "So long. Remember, when you're broke, there'll always be a job for you with me."

No daisy chain links the rival producers this year. In fact, Todd has enforced what he calls his "traffic control plan," which seems to consist wholly of closing up the exit that opened toward the Aquacade. The Treaty of Lindy's was just a scrap of sturgeon after all.

The Streets of Paris does a huge business, but Gay New Orleans' business is huger. The whole conception is Todd's own. He wanted something to suggest Parisian naughtiness and yet to Americans something with distinctive architecture, colorful costumes and carnival overtones. Credit for his selection of a New Orleans background he generously gave to O. Henry's story, A Municipal Report, and to a chance-heard recording of Beale Street Blues, until someone pointed out that A Municipal Report concerned Nashville and that Beale Street was in Memphis.

The Low-down on the Theater

"I never been to New Orleans," the Verbal Vandal admitted. "That's why I'm just the guy to put on a New Orleans show. Same with my Dancing Campus, because I never been to college either.
This way, I've got the popular idea of 'em and not too much realism. In show business, if you are too realistic, unless you are doing a powerful domestic drama of stark realism, which is not my kind of show business, you have got to take—for instance, look at The Hot Mikado. That's Harlem's conception of Japanese. Pooh-Bah wearing a thousand medals. Broad. No scenery-chewing actors. You know those hams who show great emotion by lifting an eyebrow? You keep 'em. They make a show reek from plain turkey. I don't want 'em. Maybe the carriage trade does, but the carriage trade is good for only six weeks' business. Look at Hell-zapoppin'! That's the clincher. The public wants broad theater, meat and potatoes, at a low top, and that's what I've been giving 'em."

When his plans for a fall production are mentioned, he admits that something of Michael Todd's will be on Broadway again. "I'll go out on a limb this far, though: the public is going to see some swell casts this fall. The movies have lost the foreign markets that used to bring 'em about forty per cent of their profit. They can't pay stars those tremendous salaries any more, and the stars will be migrating back to Broadway. I see it in my mail every day. I'm submitted people that a year ago you couldn't touch with a ten-foot pole.

"Broadway is in for a boom, and I'm scared. I'll make money and I'm scared it'll go to my head. Look: a few years ago I was busted, and now I've got an air line flying a special shipment of pompano to my Gay New Orleans restaurant every day. Me, a kid out of Minneapolis! But I'm taking care. I'm being careful. See this cigar? It cost me fifty-five cents, and I enjoy it. I enjoy it so much that tomorrow I'm going to switch back to nickel cigars for a while, so I won't miss these high-class ropes when I go broke again.

"The quickest way to go broke is to lose interest in your business, get sloppy.
So what do I do? I go over to a certain club one or two nights a week and play rummy. Maybe I win a couple bucks, maybe I lose a couple. But somebody always bites me for a sawbuck, and it's always somebody who was sitting on top of the world a couple of years ago, until he lost interest and got sloppy. I know I'm going to get a bite when I go there, but I go anyhow.

"It's worth it to me. It's a warning.
It's an investment.

"But right now I'm making scratch.
They're going to put me in Who's Who next year, too. O' course, that ain't so terrific, but"—a puff of smoke from the fifty-five-cent cigar sank to the floor with the rich rustle of a Bokhara carpet
—"but it ain't tin."

Here's a deliciously different NEW FORM OF BRAN

New DOUBLE-MILLING process refines texture of NATIONAL BISCUIT 100% BRAN

PEOPLE the country over are talking about this delicious-tasting, gentle-acting new form of bran!

For National Biscuit 100% Bran is delightfully different—in both flavor and texture. It is made by a new, improved process of Double-Milling—which further breaks down the bran fiber making it less likely to be irritating.

You'll find National Biscuit 100%
Bran a helpful aid in relieving that common form of constipation due to lack of sufficient bulk in the diet. This highly absorbent bran frequently helps in forming a large, soft mass in the intestines and aids elimination.

Get a package of National Biscuit 100% Bran today. Eat it regularly as a cereal, and try the recipe for delicious bran muffins on the package. If your constipation is not helped in this simple manner, consult a competent physician.

Check its Advantages

- ✓ accepted by the Council on Foods of the American Medical Association
- ✓ helps relieve constipation caused by too little bulk
- ✓ double-milled—made by an improved process
- ✓ a deliciously different New Form of Bran
- ✓ 100% Whole Bran
- ✓ furnishes significant amounts of Phosphorus and Iron and is a good source of Vitamin B<sub>1</sub>

NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

Quick Decision

Continued from page 22

ATHLETE'S FOOT
THRIVESon hot, perspiring feet—CRACKS between your toes WARN YOU

The fungi that cause painful Athlete's Foot thrive in hot summer weather. If your feet soak and steam in socks wet with perspiration you may be headed for trouble! That excessive perspiration irritates the tender skin between your toes. Then, when cracks appear, raw flesh is exposed, making it easy for painful Athlete's Foot to infect your feet.

DRENCH those cracks
at once!

Look for cracks between your toes tonight. Drench them with Absorbine Jr. full strength, night and morning.

1. Absorbine Jr. is a powerful fungicide. It kills the Athlete's Foot fungi on contact.
2. It dissolves the perspiration products on which Athlete's Foot fungi thrive.

3. It dries the skin between the toes.
4. It soothes and helps heal the broken tissues.
5. It relieves the itching and pain of Athlete's Foot.

Guard against reinfection. Boil socks 15 minutes. Disinfect shoes. In advanced cases consult your doctor in addition to using Absorbine Jr. $1.25 a bottle at all druggists.

ABSORBINE JR.

Kills ATHLETE'S FOOT fungi on contact

Also QUICK RELIEF for:

Sore, aching muscles • Tired, burning feet • Sunburn • Bites of mosquitoes and other small insects.

Sample Bottle FREE

W. F. YOUNG, INC., 201 T Lyman St., Springfield, Mass. Send me sample bottle of Absorbine Jr. FREE.

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

and at the conclusion he said: "I'll go down to New York, resign my job, get Peggy and bring her home. You'll love her. And I am honing to get in there and see what I can do with the paper."

He promised to be back in ten days and took the New York train.

Promptly at three o'clock on Thursday afternoon, Henry stepped from the express in Grand Central and there stood an excited Peggy, waiting to greet him behind the rope. She had arrived straight from another enthusiastic telephone talk with Mr. Feller.

She saw him first and in that brief glance, she made sure of one vital matter. He hadn't lost his hat, for there it sat on his head and Peggy broke into a smile. Until that instant, she would have bet anything on a hatless Henry. They greeted each other happily and she pointed to the lid.

"You didn't lose it," she cried, and people stared at her. "You're a hero. For the first time in your life, you went somewhere and didn't lose your hat. Here's a reward."

She kissed him again and he said: "I am a man who never loses hats and it's all a canard."

"Smarter and smarter every day that passes," she said. "Wait till I spread the news around New York that Henry went all the way to Maine and back and never lost his fedora. Black headlines everywhere."

They clattered out and into a taxicab, both talking at once, and as Peggy could easily talk faster she informed him of great changes in her radio status. Radio was warming up. Money offers were in sight. Mr. Feller stood on tiptoe, holding forth a contract, and soon the name of Peggy Knight would go bouncing forth on the air waves and fame would follow wealth. Henry listened in beaming admiration, smiled at her enthusiasm, slapped her heartily on the shoulder.

"You're coming along," he said warmly, "and I always knew you had a grand voice for radio. This looks like the start you've been waiting for. When did it happen?"

"Since you went to Portland. Feller says he's been working for months to get me in and now they're ready. What do you say?"

"I say grab it while the grabbing is good. Any young singer who wouldn't—"

"Yes, but what about Lincoln and the paper? Did you go home? Did you see them?"

HENRY made a gesture of vast impatience. "You know," he said, "I didn't. I went to Portland for the convention and stayed in Portland. I kept away from home, because, as I told you before, if I went there, I'd never want to leave. . . . Lincoln can wait till we get ready and so can the Recorder. Let dad run it a while longer."

Peggy grabbed him for another kiss. "You're a darling," she said.

"They can run things up there without me," he continued loftily, "and after all, New York is the place to be, that is if you're young and ambitious and have a real talent. If you're just a mutt, it doesn't make much difference, but when anybody has a gift you have—"

Henry looked his bride in the eye during his statement and carried it off serenely. She was so obviously happy that it made him feel good all over. They piled out of the cab on Sixth Avenue, trotted up the stairs together and into the little flat and Peggy's sole desire was to phone C. B. Feller and tell him the gate was open. She could stay in New York and sing. She could begin any time. Her eyes were bright and while she dashed for the bedroom, where the telephone stood, Henry followed an old custom and went out to the icebox.

She flung herself on the bed and picked up the phone. Henry was making vague kitchen noises, slamming doors, shouting questions and presently he appeared in the bedroom doorway, holding a glass of milk and a slab of gingerbread. The operator was trying to rouse Mr. Feller to speech and while she waited Peggy admiringly patted Henry's hat, which he had tossed on the bed with his coat. . . . Henry ate and drank, the proud husband, and Mr. Feller spoke.

"Hello," he said. "This is Feller."

"Yes and this is Peggy Knight. Henry just got home this minute and you won't like the news. We are going up to Lincoln to live and I'm going to be an editor's wife and have a dog. The radio deal is all off, canceled and cold."

"WHAT'S that?" asked the pained Mr. Feller. "You don't mean it."

"Have to go to Maine to live, so, of course, I can't stay here and sing on the radio. Henry belongs up there and I'm his wife, so where he goes, I go. Thank you, Mr. Feller. You've been very kind."

There was some more to the conversation, with Mr. Feller inclined to argue and while it went on Henry leaned against the woodwork, spilled his milk, opened his mouth and stared at his wife. He stopped chewing and gulped. His genial countenance shone with amazement and finally Peggy hung up.

"What's the idea?" he shouted.

Peggy slowly lifted herself from the bed, holding his hat in her hand. She moved over to him and bumped his forehead with hers, bumped it several times, while he blinked.

"You outrageous lie-teller," she said calmly. "You with your honest, blue eyes. . . . You come home on a train to your innocent wife and you look her in the eye and tell her barefaced lies."

"Who?" Henry asked.

"You know who! You know darned well you were in Lincoln and you know you saw your father and mother and no doubt you looked over the bungalow on the hill and the newspaper and then you come back to New York and you conceal all this, because you want me to have my way and be a radio singer."

"Wait a minute," said Henry, backing off slightly.

"And that isn't the worst of it all. Oh, no! There's more deception. You fool your loving wife. You put something over on a simple woman from Kansas, doggone you. You lost your hat."

"I did not."

"You did, you wretch. You lost your hat again and you were ashamed of yourself. Look."

Here she waved his hat in front of his eyes, so that he could look inside and see the lining and see that it wasn't any fedora from Fifth Avenue at all, but a fedora just like the Fifth Avenue hat, only purchased obviously in Lincoln, Maine, as revealed plainly by the label of the Lincoln Hat Shop. Henry put down his milk and smiled.

"You got me, kid," he said weakly, "but it's too bad about the radio."

"When do we start for Lincoln?" she asked, "and the canary?"

"Just as soon as Heaven will let you pack our few belongings. The chairs are out on the porch and there's a light burning in the window of the bungalow on the hill."

EVER TAKE A DARE
Just For The Fun of It?

When you were a kid, you'd take a dare from most anybody.

Remember when Joe dared you to hang by your knees from the apple tree? You may have been scared stiff, but you did it!

Here's Cigarette Mildness
With Rich Pipe Flavor!

How about taking a dare to try Crosby Square? Smokers have discovered that this blend has what they've been looking for—the mildness of a cigarette with the full flavor of a real pipe tobacco. So come on—you take the dare; we'll stand the risk. If you don't find Crosby Square fills your "pipe-bill," you can get all your money back.

AT YOU DEAL

15

"Take-a-Dare"
Offer

Send us 6¢ in stamps to pay part of packing and mailing and you'll get a generous sample. Write Crosby Square Div., 102 Delmar, St. Louis, Mo.

CHRISTIAN
PEPER

Tobacco Co. Since 1852

NEURITIS Relieve Pain in Minutes

To relieve the torturing pain of Neuritis, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, or Lumbago in few minutes, get NURITO, the fine formula, used by thousands. No opiates. Does the work quickly—must relieve your pain to your satisfaction in a few minutes or your money back. Don't suffer. Ask your druggist today for trustworthy NURITO on this guarantee.

GET This Useful Travel Clock!

An attractive travel clock with tan ostrich grain genuine leather slide-fastened case. 24-hour movement. Size 4½" x 4" when closed. Ideal for travel, home and office use.

EARN yours by selling only to 1-year COLLIER'S subscribers at $2.00 each to persons living outside your home. Offer good in U.S. only. Simply pin subscribers' names and addresses to this ad with check or money order for $4.00.

Independent Agency Division, Desk C
The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company
Springfield, Ohio

Detroit's Defense Headache

Continued from page 8

to give us a different-shaped hood or a fender-looking fender is a yank here and kick yonder. Actually it's a matter of months and a truckload of money to put new bulge on a car's backside.

When Detroit begins to arm us as well as take us for rides (and she hasn't even spit on her hands yet) she'll have many months and many millions of new buildings, new machinery, new tools and dies. She'll have added a hundred thousand men and women to her payroll and trained them. Her engineers will have consumed months of planning, modelmaking, testing and building. There'll be endless palaverings with government experts whose eyes are ever focused beyond the horizon. And somehow, sometime, they'll manage to convince Washington that, given a chance, Detroit can make engines, bodies, gears, castings, bolts and nuts as well as if not a mite better than any political appointee or even West Point graduate. You've got to understand this: Those miraculous assemblies in Detroit were designed for automobile production, not armament stuff. Detroit merely knows how to turn out things in a hurry. All she has today to offer the arms-hungry government is her quantity-production experience.

Someone Has to Shell Out

Understandably, Detroit would like to know who or what is going to protect the hundreds of millions it will cost the automotive industry to add munitions to the rest of the local excitement. These motorcar manufacturers are not in business simply because they don't know what to do with their time. At the moment the city is overstocked with red-eyed orators who'll tell you the automobile mandarins are pirates and that the cost of armaments will be paid with the peculiarly precious blood of the downtrodden worker. It sounds great, particularly for a few beers, but it's also a trifle deceived. Of course, we shall be accused of having been bribed into saying so, but the truth is that, as a result of efforts to induce these motor manufacturers to come clean with the facts we set out here, our arches are giving us hell and we've worn out the seat of our pants.

It costs Detroit almost as much to produce output as it does to set up the original machinery. To achieve mass production a plant must have a number of identical machines and tool sets so that identical operations may be carried on simultaneously. And simple machines can cost a hundred thousand dollars. We don't aim at boring you; we hope merely to show you that setting up munitions mills eats into the national roll.

Government engineers have just been in Detroit to find out how much of the existing motorcar machinery out at the Chrysler plant could be used to manufacture an armored car garnished with machine and machine guns. They found eight per cent to be the answer. But they decided, too, that it would be cheaper to ignore that ten per cent and set up a completely new assembly line in a brand-new building. But before they're done, the machinery will have to be designed and manufactured and shipped, set up and co-ordinated. Months.

But we're off the track. What we're missing at is Detroit's perfectly reasonable demand to know whether the government is willing to pay enough to take care of the cost of equipment plus the cost of manufacture plus a profit. When Ford, General Motors, Chrysler, Packard and the rest of them stop manufacturing arms they'll have a lovely mess of otherwise useless machinery to remember it by and it will be as useful in the art of making automobiles as a palm-leaf fan in Antarctica. The government yearns to induce Detroit to accept orders on a cost plus eight per cent basis. And Detroit wants to know whether the cost is to include the overhead—the new buildings, the new machinery, tools and so forth—or whether the setup expenses are to be wanded out of the eight per cent profit. Detroit is willing to concede that the new buildings may not have to be written off; some of the industrialists are even willing to give some of the buildings and the machinery which is never very far from obsolescence back to the government when it's all over. Just what the government would do with them is not clear, although it might sell the machinery to the Japs for junk to throw back at us some day as shot and shell.

At Ford's they told us that they were not concerned with war profits, that they didn't care whether they made a cent just so that they didn't lose one. For example, Mr. Ford didn't bother quoting the American government in cost-plus terms on those Rolls-Royce engines. He just set a flat rate. We didn't learn what that flat rate was but his representatives told us that it was lower than anyone else could hope to manufacture on a cost-plus basis. But he wouldn't make engines for England on any basis at Dearborn, saying that that was a job for his English and Canadian factories.

Eight Per Cent is Plenty—if—

But Mr. Ford has no board of directors to appease and no stockholders to belabor his door for dividends. His rivals enjoy no such freedom. They've got to make a profit or quit, leaving large numbers of wage earners to seek their meat and potatoes elsewhere—WPA, for example. The motor manufacturers assure you that a profit of eight per cent is quite satisfactory—provided it's all profit. But if they have to borrow money for buildings, machinery and tools and if the interest they have to pay on this borrowed credit eats deeply into that eight per cent, they don't sleep well. Too many unforeseen accidents can happen to the remaining margin of profit. The more you poke around, the more you become convinced that it's very foolish for a democracy to embark upon an armament program and elect a President all in the same year. In such circumstances, the demagogues are the only ones armed. In Detroit and Washington it is generally admitted that either the government will have to grant industry a fair profit or take over the industrial plants and go into munitions making on a fine, holy, patronage scale.

In the meantime Detroit, always bothered with high blood pressure, is breaking fingernail-biting records. As the country's stratosphere of industrial efficiency and the world's unchallenged champ at mass production, it is scarcely likely that it will be ignored when, at long last, the big contracts are parceled out by a prodigally red-taped government. In its extremity the government can't get along without Detroit's assembly lines any more comfortably than Detroit can get along without the government. But before war and after, Detroit thinks in automobiles and how

PUT A NEW FACE ON YOUR HOUSE — modern paint styling works wonders with old houses. creates new attractiveness by skilful use of color to bring out best lines. For long life and economy use pure white lead paint.

YES SIR, down here in the mines we dig out something that plays a mighty important part in making good paint.

I'm speaking about lead. It's one of the toughest metals there is in resisting weather—and that's a quality everybody wants in paint.

So to make paint last better it's mixed with lead. Not lead as it comes from the mines, but white lead that's made from the refined metal.

White lead is right tough, too. It puts real backbone into paint—armors it to fight off weather without cracking and scaling—makes it go on smooth, cling tight and wear like all get-out.

THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE FOR EXPERIENCE.

Anyone can smear on paint, but careful painting around fixtures and trim is just one of the many tricks of the trade that make a painting contractor a good investment.

PAINTING FACTS WORTH KNOWING

—pages full of valuable information concerning all phases of painting—colors, costs, mixing methods—are found in booklet every homeowner should have: "WHAT TO EXPECT FROM WHITE LEAD PAINT." Send postcard for free copy.

In fact, white lead paint wears down so evenly and gradually that you don't have to burn and scrape it off when you finally repaint. New paint goes over it as slick as a whistle.

So it's just plain horse sense in buying paint to find out how much white lead it contains. It's a pretty safe rule to follow: the higher the lead content, the better the paint! You can't, for example, get a more durable paint than one containing one hundred per cent white lead. This is the kind good painters mix from lead-in-oil. It's also being sold now in many places in prepared ready-to-use form, in white and colors.

If you want to check up on me, just ask any good painter. He'll tell you using white lead paint is one case where the best is cheapest!

LEAD INDUSTRIES ASSOCIATION
420 Lexington Avenue, New York, N. Y.

You're money ahead when you paint with White Lead

NOTICE!

THE ONLY WAY TO MAKE A BACARDI
COCKTAIL IS TO USE BACARDI RUM *

★ Ruling of the N. Y.
Supreme Court,
April 28, 1936

The Famous Recipe in Rhyme:

- A LITTLE SOUR,
(Juice of half a lime)
A LITTLE SWEET,
(½ teaspoonful of sugar)
THE TROPIC SUN,
(A jigger of BACARDI RUM)
(White or Silver Label)
WITHOUT THE HEAT!
(Ice and shake well)

When grenadine is used instead of sugar, it's a Bacardi Grenadine Cocktail, and it comes out pink!

Use BACARDI White Label, from Cuba, world's finest rum... or BACARDI Silver Label, Puerto Rico's finest, at a popular price.

For other mixed drinks—the Highball, Collins, Old-Fashioned, Cuba Libre, etc.—use BACARDI Gold Label, from Cuba, world's finest rum... or BACARDI Amber Label, Puerto Rico's finest, at a popular price.

THERE'S A DIFFERENCE, WORTH KNOWING!

RUM 89 PROOF—Schenley Import Corp., N. Y. Copr. 1940

to go about getting us to buy them.

In Washington, as an agent of the New Deal, sits Mr. Knudsen as head man of the National Defense Commission. Mr. Knudsen was president of General Motors and, for all we know, will be again. At his side sit Mr. Stettinius, Mr. Budd, Mr. Batt and others who could not normally be regarded as damp-eyed New Dealers. They are more representative of industry as opposed to most New Deal policies. Behind them two Republicans who are not New Dealers sit in the War and Navy posts of Mr. Roosevelt's Cabinet. And Detroit is scared stiff lest the average car buyer say: "With Knudsens, Stettiniuses, Knoxes and Stimsons, your friends, working for Mr. Roosevelt for nothing or for relatively low salaries, why can't you motorcar makers get busy? If they, your friends, are willing to make sacrifices along with us ordinary guys, why aren't you? Just wait until you try to sell us new cars."

The function of the National Defense Commission is simple in theory. These gentlemen, having devoted themselves to making machines that run on oil, steam and money, have lacked the time to learn about the kind that run on votes, patronage and preference. Their chore is to learn as quickly as possible what the Army and Navy need, who can supply these needs best and quickest and, the contracts awarded, clear the way to production. And if you think that's week-end stuff, you ought to see a doctor. Neither the Army, the Navy nor their air forces have been quite sure what they need. Too busy watching for cues from Hitler. Industry surveys made by the Army, hopeful of finding who could make what with the least delay, have had to be largely rewritten.

The old surveys were based upon battle standards of 1918. And as for clearing the way to production—well, there are just so many machine tool-makers, machinery manufacturers and other supply outfits. And nobody is yet quite sure which requirement of our armaments program is so important that the makers of these arms may have preference in the machine, machine tool and other manufacturing accessory foundries. Thus the trials and tribulations of the National Defense Commission.

The Labor Angle

Behind these earnestly striving gentlemen hangs a high, wide and light-proof curtain of labor politics. Let's be explicit. The Army and Navy are not political organizations although forever gripped by internal log-rolling and apple-polishing. It should be said, incidentally, to the credit of our soldiers and sailors that they're rotten politicians at best. However, they do their best, which is to say they keep themselves in a perpetual tremble lest they antagonize the White House or Congress or both. Therefore, the Army and the Navy departments are never completely unconscious of what the politicians would prefer—particularly with an election in the offing.

In Detroit they told us that one of the reasons why Henry Ford's plane-building offer was scoffed off was his refusal to play ball with the National Labor Relations Board and his defiance of the board's labor union ideal, the C.I.O. Washington prefers to say that the conditions Mr. Ford named as his price of going to work were impossible. Mr. Ford asked merely that the government tell him what it wanted and then get out of his way.

Perhaps no person or agency of government is quite bird-brained enough to command our military to ignore industrialists who have been poison to the National Labor Relations Board or have got into John L. Lewis' eyebrows. Nevertheless, our politically acuter Army and Navy officials do no unnecessary bundling with those who have been more than academic enemies of the New Deal. Not if they can get their orders filled by less offensive manufacturers. Perhaps Mr. Stimson, Secretary of War, and his new advisory committee, will be able to fight out of the corner. But Mr. Lewis wants the government to have no truck whatsoever with tough guys like Mr. Ford. And if you think that the Administration, facing a bruising campaign, is going to ignore the belly-roars of Mr. Lewis—well, you'd better go see that doctor again. Neither political party is going to high-hat anybody this year.

Mass Production of Rumors

All this is pure bottleneck to Detroit, where, the magnates insist, patriotism blooms as lustily and even more fragrantly than it does in Washington. The city is crowded to its eaves with sweating salesmen, engineers, Army officers, inventors, G-men, job hunters, contact men, labor agitators, spies, variously hued journalists and economists, survey groups, publicity men, political hitchhikers, patriotism torches, efficiency counselors, ad-lib orators who'll bellow for anything for wages, fellow travelers, and brief-case slippers who know parties who can fix anything for a cut of the take. Government, state and local cops are on the prowl. The hotels are full, the tourist camps stuffed and boarding-houses eaten out of hash and home.

Before you've been in town a couple of days on information bent, you learn that it's no use trying to hide from the foregoing gentlemen. At the various automobile plants you are received cordially and your questions are answered with complete candor. The motorcar makers will tell you that they're ready to set up as armament makers, that they have representatives in Washington to say what Detroit can do and that Washington has agents in Detroit eager to outline what the government wants—when the government finds out. It's all quite simple, that part. But the wise guys, soft-shoe lads, low-down boys, tipsters, touts and inside-dope peddlers who fill the hotel lobbies and know quiet places where you and they can talk won't have it that way.

"Lissen, fella, how much for a file of letters from a certain Cabinet member to one of the auto big shots. They're hot—both ways. A hundred bucks and I talk. Five hundred and you get copies. Make it a grand and—"

"My dear sir, this town is rotten with traitors, Trojan horses, fifth columnists.

As a patriotic duty I am willing to tell you the facts. I will personally take you to their headquarters. All I ask is the expenses I have incurred in uncovering this mass of un-American names but a friend of yours tipped me off you're in town. Said he sure would contact you. Said you were in the ket for something that's been going at —"

These are just samples. We even got a call from a barfly who said he was an ex-G-man who was ready to spill the beans. But there was only one mystery—they knew what you were doing.

In the meantime, Detroit would like to know whether she should be the center of armaments or only of next year's automobile models. She would like to know whether she should be the center of the crowded labor market for able-bodied men or write her budgets on the theory that nothing is happening and no change is going to happen. In her waiting rooms are hundreds of representatives of machine, machine-tool and raw-material firms wilting in the heat but not daring to leave lest word come that the war has broken. Quite frankly, Detroit would like a lot to know whether it is an armament program or just another political campaign.

Mr. Hitler Would Laugh

We can't begin to tell you how much regret that we can't tell you what happened on at three or four conferences between individual automobile manufacturers and sundry members of the Administration.

We'd like to tell you of the spontaneous we read. But we can't. It's our turn to be mysterious. These remarkable meetings actually took place and these Washington letters happily exist. They'd be screams to Mr. Hitler, but to those who'd like to see the United States equipped to talk a well-meaning opponent's language, they'd be moans.

One of the motor makers almost as he told us what had happened to him he was asked on what terms he would accept an airplane engine contract. During this session with one of the administration's swiftest political operators, the manufacturer's differences with the United Automobile Workers were mentioned mournfully. Like several somewhat tart phrases used by the Detroiters in setting forth his opinion of the New Deal were recalled.

"When I think of some of the things that haven't been done to get this armament program started," he sighed, "there are moments when next to being an American I'd rather be a German."

But we got a mild surprise from another, the survivor of a somewhat similar experience.

"Do you think a change of administration would speed things up?" he asked. "You're for Willkie, of course?" "I'm a Republican," he replied. "I suppose I'll vote for Willkie. I don't know. With an armaments program under way—and it'll have to be under way sooner or later—I'd like to see a politician in the White House, a businessman. To handle Congress takes a politician."

We quoted this to a third magnate, so Republican that he always expected Herbert Hoover of radical leanings. He too supposed he'd vote for Willkie. He said that he deplored national debt and had at least cheered heartily for budget-balancing.

"But I don't know," said he. "It is probably no time to talk about government economy."

All of which doesn't give wings to an armaments program. But it does swell bottlenecks.

Most for your Money
in finest

10¢
FOR FULL-SIZE
TWO-OUNCE CUBE

These grand, deep-toned inks flow instantly, write smoothly, dry quickly. In "Cubes," wide mouthed for easy filling and dipping. Permanent and washable—and "Sunset" Inks in colors.

Carter's Cube-Well
A fountain reservoir inkstand with self-starting pen—"writes" pages at one dipping."

Carter's INK

Best for Fountain Pens. Also Adhesives, Carbon Paper, Typewriter Ribbons, Cube-Well's

Sauts the Bat

Continued from page 13

"We have thought much about this unjust thing. It is the white man's railroad that is driving away our game. It is cutting the Cheyennes' land in two. If it goes on, soon there will be no buffalo left and the Cheyennes must starve. So we have decided that the railroad must stop. It must not be built on past the place where it now ends. I ask the white chief to ask the Father in Washington to stop the railroad now. If the Father will not do this, the Cheyennes have decided that there will be war. It will be better to be killed fighting for our land than to see our women and children starve.

"I have no more words. Sauts the Bat has spoken for his people."

Little Ellsinger turned suddenly away from the slit in the tent wall.

"The fool!" he whispered hoarsely. "The damned loony fool! Why, there ain't a chance o' stoppin' the railroad—the Kansas-Pacific railroad! Why, they're goin' to build right through to Denver an' then California!"

Man with a Mission

The railroad moved on, inevitably as civilization itself. The Cheyennes swept across western Kansas like a prairie fire. Sigmund Ellsinger was afraid—not of anything tangible but of something in his mind. In his mind he found himself riding with Roman Nose, fighting to keep the white men from destroying that marvelous bronze body, fighting to stop the railroad that would spoil the land of the Cheyennes forever.

The thing worried him; he knew that he couldn't afford to feel like that. He'd "gone white" and, by gravy, he'd stay white! He'd been Injun for six years, but now he was a white man again. Some people said that was impossible, that once you'd gone Injun you stayed Injun inside. But that wasn't true. He'd prove it; by gravy, he'd prove it!

One September day word came of an attack on a train eighty miles beyond Fort Wallace. Within two hours Colonel George Forsyth's special detachment of fifty mounted scouts—not soldiers but veteran plainsmen—were in the saddle and Ellsinger rode with them. They were glad to have him; small and bent though he was he was a dead shot, a good plainsman, hard as a nail. They picked up the Indians' tracks and, on the eighth day from Fort Wallace, they made camp in a bowl-shaped valley beside the dry bed of the Arikaree River.

Ellsinger knew the Cheyennes. All that last day he had known that they were riding into a trap, but Forsyth wouldn't believe him.

Maybe, Ellsinger figured, Colonel Forsyth didn't believe he had really gone white. Probably that was why Forsyth wouldn't listen to him when he begged the colonel to turn back. Probably Forsyth thought he was trying to flimflam so his friends, the Cheyennes, could get away.

Well, he'd show Forsyth. In the morning, he'd show him. There'd be a fight before they were wiped out. If he could draw a bead on Roman Nose himself. In the gray of dawn he woke sweating and trembling, and three minutes later he was standing beside his saddled horse, close to Colonel Forsyth and Sharp Grover, the head scout.

Except a few who were handing out coffee under Lieutenant Beecher's direction, the whole detachment was in line, each man standing at his horse's head, bridle rein through his left arm, rifle in his right hand—ready.

So Forsyth expected it too—thought it was coming. Ellsinger didn't think; he knew.

He heard Sharp Grover rip out an oath. Ellsinger knew what he was going to see. Yet what he saw surprised him. He had known that the attack was coming and that there would be plenty of Cheyennes. But he hadn't realized how many there would be.

They were racing down from the low hills that enclosed the valley like the rim of a bowl. There were hundreds of them—maybe a thousand, Ellsinger figured—and they had the detachment surrounded; wherever he looked he saw them, topping the sky line, galloping their mustangs down the long, bare slopes.

Colonel Forsyth's voice broke in upon his consciousness. Forsyth was pointing with his big army revolver over the wide, dry bed of the Arikaree.

"Boys," he said, his tone vibrant with controlled excitement, yet quiet and cool, "we'll get over to that island and stand 'em off there."

Ellsinger looked where the pistol pointed. In the middle of the hard, sandy

"It was the last car off the line when they were switching to low-cost bombers"

DAVE GERARD

WILDROOT BARGAIN

50¢ Pro-phy-lac-tic Brush
$1.00 WILDROOT WITH OIL
$1.50 VALUE

79¢

Don't miss this big bargain in better looking hair. Genuine 50¢ Pro-Phy-Lac-Tic Brush given away with purchase of three-action Wildroot-with-Oil. Cleans as it grooms, removes loose scaly dandruff, relieves dryness. Stocks limited. Get yours today at your favorite drug counter.

SAME OFFER available with Wildroot Regular formula... favorite of millions who prefer a non-oily hair preparation. WILDROOT COMPANY, INC., BUFFALO, N. Y.

Fairbanks-Morse Stokers

WITH

STOK-O-LITE

ONLY F-M DEALERS HAVE IT

● Certainly—you want the more economical, steady, ceiling-to-floor comfort of stoker heating. But compare values and features and you will find Fairbanks-Morse the buy.

See this stoker and you will understand why its sales are mounting at a rate faster than almost all others. Then compare the price! With this stoker you get top quality at a price that will amaze you.

Quality built in every detail—more features—and STOK-O-LITE! Stok-o-Lite is the biggest feature of the year. If for any reason an overload condition occurs and the stoker is prevented from giving you heat, Stok-o-lite, on the thermostat, gives you red-light warning instantly, before the temperature drops.

NO DOWN PAYMENT

As long as 36 months to pay

GET THE FACTS

Learn how much this stoker can save you in lower fuel costs. Why it maintains such steady, even heat. How it frees you from fire tending. Send for this free booklet, "Live in Comfort."

Fairbanks, Morse & Co.
Stoker Division, Dept. 49
600 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Please send, without obligation on my part,
FREE booklet on automatic coal burner heat
for my home.

Name .....

Address .....

City .....

State .....

In Canada, address The Canadian Fairbanks-Morse Company, Ltd., Montreal.

FAIRBANKS MORSE
Automatic Coal Burners

river bed, which was about 400 feet wide, was a small gravelly island dotted with stunted willows and alders. A mere trickle of water surrounded it. It stood in the midst of the flat, dry expanse of the river bed like a little fort.

They splashed through the shallow strip of water surrounding the island and tied the horses to the willows just as the first bullets zinged over them. Standing behind the horses, they replied to the Indians' fire. The Cheyennes didn't charge at once. Taking cover in a fringe of wild plums along the riverbanks, they poured a hail of bullets and arrows upon the island.

The horses, exposed and helpless, went down one by one. Crouching behind the carcasses, the men dug pits with their bowie knives in the soft gravel and sand. Before these pits were completed, two scouts were killed and five others wounded. Surgeon Mooers was mortally hit in the head, Colonel Forsyth was crippled by a ball through the thigh and another in the lower leg.

To Ellsinger all this first part of the fight was like tedious pantomime. It wasn't what he was waiting for. The idea that had taken root in his mind had become an obsession; he must find Roman Nose, prove what he had to prove. Purposely he had stuck to Forsyth.

South of the island the dry bed of the Arikaree curved to the right. Around this curve came some five hundred Cheyenne horsemen, trotting slowly in eight ranks of about sixty front. At their head on a superb chestnut mustang rode Roman Nose—Sauts the Bat.

Men Against Bullets

Ellsinger peered with rapidly blinking eyes over the gravel mound in front of his pit. He knew the Cheyennes and he had thought they would try this, yet now he could scarcely believe it. The pity of it seemed too great. These people, fighting for their land, fighting to keep their home . . . they were going to charge the rifle pits . . . they were going to ride straight into the bullets.

The film cleared from Ellsinger's eyes. He stole a quick glance at Forsyth, propped in the next pit, his big Colt's in his hand. He heard Forsyth's voice, steady and strong in spite of his pain, telling the men to see that the magazines of their rifles were full—they were Spencer repeaters, good for seven shots without reloading—and to hold their fire until he gave the word.

Sharp Grover was as cool as Forsyth and there was a quiver of exultation in his voice. "Boys," he said, "we can ruin 'em if they try it. We can pump seven volleys into 'em with these here Spencers. We can blast 'em to Kingdom Come."

The Cheyenne horsemen were trotting in open order down the dry, level river bed straight toward the island. They were splendidly mounted.

Ellsinger was aware of them as one is aware of the backdrop in a play. What he really saw was Roman Nose, riding in front on his big chestnut stallion. On his head were two buffalo horns; his war bonnet of eagle feathers streamed behind him in the wind; around his waist he had bound a brilliant scarlet sash. Except for this he was entirely naked. In the strong sunlight his perfectly proportioned body gleamed a rich golden bronze.

Again as great music and great poetry exalt souls attuned to them, so the magnificent body of this bronze Achilles exalted little crooked Sigmund Ellsinger in whose small, ugly body dwelt a soul attuned to the beauty and rhythm of form—a soul that might have made him a great sculptor. Yet even now he didn't forget the thing he was going to do.

Suddenly the Indian sharpshooters hidden along the riverbanks quickened their fire; and almost at the same moment Roman Nose flung his right hand above his head, brandishing his heavy rifle as though it were a switch. The chestnut stallion leaped forward, and behind their leader the whole Cheyenne array broke into a gallop.

It was one of the grandest cavalry charges ever made in the West. The cool, steady men in the rifle pits, veteran plainsmen and good shots, heavily outnumbered but well entrenched, and with deadly repeating rifles in their hands, quietly awaited Forsyth's order to fire.

The plainsmen rose to their knees in the pits, resting their rifles on the gravel mounds in front. Suddenly Forsyth shouted, "Now!"

Ellsinger Proves It

A sheet of flame burst from the rifle pits. It was followed almost at once by another. Gaps were blasted in the oncoming wave of horsemen, but the gaps closed at once; the wave surged on. A third time the rifle pits spat their flames. Again the great gaps blown in the shattered ranks were closed; still the wild war songs pealed out above the drumming of hoofs, and the galloping horsemen raced onward.

One man in the rifle pits hadn't fired—Ellsinger. He was sick with the pity of it. His people, his Cheyennes . . . human like white men . . . fighting for their homes . . . riding naked into the bullets. He hadn't fired into them. But from the beginning his rifle had covered Roman Nose. It had never left him except when the smoke hid him. It was covering him now.

They were close at hand now. They had ridden through hell as bravely as ever men rode, and now they had nearly reached their goal. But the men in the rifle pits were brave men too. Annihilation stared them in the face, but no panic wave swept them at this crucial instant. At pistol-shot range they pumped a fifth volley, then a sixth, into the mass of the horsemen.

Only a few yards away Ellsinger saw a great bronze man burst through the smoke—a magnificent, naked, golden-bronze man riding a big bronze stallion. He was about to leap his horse upon the island. Another moment and he would be in the rifle pits.

Roman Nose hadn't been touched. He was still in front, still leading the charge. The chestnut stallion had been hit; it seemed to Ellsinger that Roman Nose was giving his own strength to the horse, lifting it onward at each stride with his great bronze thighs.

Ellsinger turned cold. Nausea boiled up in his throat. He stared with wild eyes along the barrel of his rifle. A whimpering cry broke from him as he pulled the trigger. Roman Nose—Sauts the Bat—crumpled forward as though his whole chest had been caved in. Bronze man and bronze horse crashed down together.

Ellsinger jumped to his feet. In a bound he reached Forsyth's pit next to his own. "You saw it, Colonel," he screamed. "I did it. . . I killed him. . . Me. Ellsinger!"

Standing on the rim of the pit, he was above the thickest smoke. He saw that the last two volleys had broken the Cheyenne charge. Under cover of the smoke, the survivors were carrying off their dead, riding in couples, dragging the bodies between the horses. Ellsinger jumped down into his pit again and sat there trembling. By gravity, it was awful, awful! They'd been mowed down. . . They'd only been fightin' for their lands. . . He was the jim-dandiest-lookin' chief and now he was only dead meat. But Forsyth knew now; he'd had it proved to him, by gravity!

DOWN COMES THE PRICE!

KOOLS NOW COST NO MORE
THAN OTHER
POPULAR BRANDS

And you get valuable gold coupons with KOOLS—America's finest mentholated cigarette.

YOURS TO ENJOY

What is your home like? Does it contain war books that give you and your family stimulating with great minds, or does the sum total of your reading consist of current novels or the daily paper—interesting today but of no value as mental stimulation or information tomorrow?

We all want our homes to be real homes, with hearty, a place where our friends will want to return again and again. To make our homes attract and to draw about us interesting and entertaining we too, must be interesting and entertaining.

Dr. Eliot, America's greatest educator, and for President of Harvard University, chose for his Classics, the texts that are the backbone of college. Enlightenment, stimulation, a release from explore new worlds of interest and experience new of enjoyment are in store for those who own

DR. ELIOT'S
FIVE-FOOT SHELF OF BOOKS

P. F. Collier & Son Corp.

250 Park Avenue

New York

By mail, free, send me the booklet that tells all about the most famous library in the world, describing Dr. Eliot's Five-Foot Shelf of Books, (The Harvard Classics), a containing Dr. Eliot's own story of how he came to select the greatest library of all time.

Name { Mr. _____
Mrs. _____
Miss _____

Address .....

What Happened to France

Continued from page 11

It that combative intelligence, that slightly arrogant assurance, that harsh brilliant logic and that air of always being right on financial and economic questions about which the person to whom he was talking knew little were destined to exasperate many politicians, and in particular Daladier.

The latter was no less eloquent than Reynaud, but his style was not the triumphant, aggressive and technical one of his rival; his was a familiar style, tinged with sorrowful emotion. When Daladier talked to the French people about the war, small tradesmen, workmen, peasants, everyone, felt that this was a man of their own tone, these grave accents and this heartfelt love of peace made the Frenchman a fellow to all Frenchmen.

Paul Reynaud had been a professor of history and he had found in the history of France, as well as in his own heart, reasons for a passionate devotion to his country. All this was admirable, but these qualities were offset by two grave faults: a distrustfulness that made him suspicious of his colleagues and a lack of will that became at times almost pathological. He was subject at moments to periodic fits of rage during which he would pound on the council table. His colleagues asserted that his fist sounded like a hammer. "A hand of velvet in a glove of iron," they used to say. But Daladier's character was unknown to the general public who saw only his vigorous, almost set exterior, called him "the little man of La Camargue," and expected no action from him.

Who would be the ideal man to replace Daladier?" I asked Reynaud one day.

Daladier as the French people imagined him to be," he replied.

Paul Reynaud's irascible distrustfulness had already embroiled him with Daladier, and the Radical party had been torn by the war of the two leaders. In one of Tristan Bernard's comedies there is a character who is loved by his friends Triplepaw and who is uncertain about his own desires on the day of his marriage he hesitates to go to the church. "Daladier is Triplepaw," Paul Reynaud used to say, "this Triplepaw side of his character explains, perhaps, why this radical minister became successively the creator of the popular front and the hope of the conservative bourgeoisie. Daladier, for his part, used to say of Paul Reynaud: "As soon as he starts to talk, he has such an air of self-satisfaction that, in order to stand him at all, I have to picture him strutting about with a peacock's tail."

Such were the two men whose duty it should have been to work as a team and to co-operate in governing France, then engaged in the most terrible of wars. In actuality, each irritated the other, and this mutual exasperation grew to hatred when the schemes of women further poisoned their relations.

I should have preferred not to talk about this aspect, at first glance so trivial, of the frightful tragedy of which France was the victim. But, on the one hand, the essential facts today are known to all, and, on the other, it is certain that the private lives of some of our statesmen impaired their public usefulness.

It would be wrong, very wrong, to say that the French way of life in 1939 was corrupt; millions of good families in France led simple and united lives. But this was not true of the three thousand persons in Paris who, as Byron said, "because they go to bed late believe they are the leaders of the world." Most of these attached no great importance to their sentimental or sensual intrigues; but events were destined to prove that these intrigues could nevertheless place nations in jeopardy and that "the man who would be king" must first of all discipline himself and be the master of his own passions.

Daladier, after the death of his wife, had for his Egeria the Marquise de C. This gracious and beautiful woman, blond and youthful in appearance, had a taste for power and an unfortunate passion for economic and political doctrines. But she knew how to keep herself in the background, she never tried to show off her great man to the world and her discreet influence was not, on the whole, very harmful.

On the other hand, Paul Reynaud's friend, the Countess de P., was slightly mad, excitable, meddlesome and, as the course of events was to show, dangerous.

One day, as I had criticized in Reynaud's presence a particularly unsuitable political appointment made by Daladier:

"It was not his choice," said Reynaud, "it was hers."

"That is no excuse," I said.

He sighed.

"Ah," said he, "you do not know what a man who has been hard at work all day would put up with to make sure of an evening's peace."

I thought that Balzac would have made a note of that sentence.

FROM the very start of the war her dominant characteristic seemed to be ambition. It was not enough for her that Paul Reynaud was minister of finance: she was determined at all costs to make him premier. She filled all the salons of Paris with accounts of Daladier's lack of energy, his laziness, his inertia and gave everyone to understand that it was urgent that Reynaud should succeed him. Naturally these remarks were repeated the same evening to Daladier and the latter's detestation of Paul Reynaud constantly increased. There was a time when these two men, both members of the war cabinet, were on such bad terms that they no longer spoke to each other. This because it's tops in seat comfort, smooth-riding, perfected air-conditioning!"

"Now I know why Greyhound named it Super-Coach.."

"Take a slant at this, Anne! These seats tip back to five different positions. I can really relax when I drop my head back into these sponge-rubber cushions and sniff this cool, fresh air... Greyhound has surely solved the air-conditioning problem."

"Listen, Bill—If you only knew how smug you look, you'd straighten up! What I especially like about these Super-Coaches are the rubber foot-rests you can adjust to any position—the pull-down shades that cut out the bright sun but let in plenty of light. And the cute step that slides out for easy boarding at street level... that's new too, isn't it?"

"Plenty new about this coach, Anne. I guess that's why they call it 'Super'. Isn't it a swell surprise when you find the most comfort, the most sightseeing, and a lot of other 'mosts'—all for the lowest fares!"

Send Coupon to Nearest of these Information offices—

NEW YORK CITY	245 West 50th St	SAN FRANCISCO, CAL	Pine & Battery Sts
CLEVELAND, O	East 9th & Superior	RICHMOND, VA	412 E Broad St
PHILADELPHIA, PA	Broad Street Station	FT WORTH, TEX	905 Commerce St
CHICAGO, ILL	12th & Wabash	MINNEAPOLIS, MINN	509 Sixth Ave. N
BOSTON, MASS	60 Park Square	MEMPHIS, TENN	527 N Main St
WASHINGTON, D C	1110 N York Ave. N.W.	NEW ORLEANS, LA	720 S Galvez St
DETROIT, MICH	Wash Blvd. at Grand River	LEXINGTON, KY	801 N Limestone
ST LOUIS, MO	Broadway & Delmar Blvd	WINDSOR, ONT	44 London St. E
CHARLESTON, W VA	155 Summers St	MONTREAL, CAN	Provincial
CINCINNATI, O	630 Walnut St	Transport Co	1188 Dorchester Street, West

Thousands of Super-Coaches serve all America
—photo below shows the newest (1940) type

THE AIR-CONDITIONING UNIT

RETRACTABLE STEP

ADJUSTABLE FOOT-RESTS

NEW-TYPE DIESEL ENGINE

—for Bright Pictorial Booklet All About Greyhound Travel

Paste this coupon on a penny postcard and mail it to nearest Greyhound information office (listed above) for good-humored booklet, "NEWEST GREYHOUND SUPER COACH," with pictures and jingles telling the story of highway travel. Put check mark in square if you want pictorial booklet about NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR ☐ or GOLDEN GATE EXPOSITION ☐.

Name _____

Address _____

COL-9

ALL AIRCRAFT RETURNED SAFELY"

Stand with Collier's reporter where no civilian has stood before: in the "Briefing Room" as British pilots get their instructions and start out to sow destruction in Germany.

By
Quentin Reynolds

IN NEXT WEEK'S COLLIER'S

You Can LOOK Less Stout

SEND FOR THIS STYLE BOOK IT'S Free

WHETHER your size is 38, 48 or even 58, you can LOOK LESS STOUT. Our new Style Book will show you how, and we'll send it to you FREE.

The latest fashions, in literally hundreds of styles... each designed to subdue your curves, to slim your waist and hips, and to make you look definitely smarter.

The plaid dress shown is of Spun Rayon and is but $2.98. Other dresses, $1.00 to $16.95. Coats, hats, hose, shoes, corsets and underwear... all at prices amazingly LOW.

For FREE Style Book mail coupon TODAY.

$2.98

Lane Bryant
Address Department 112
39th Street at Fifth Ave. NEW YORK

LANE BRYANT, Dept. 112, New York, N. Y.
Please mail me free Style Book for stout women.

Name.....
Address.....
Town..... State.....

If you wish to receive also our Infants' and Children's Style Book, please check here ☐

CHILDREN SCREAMED

It H-U-R-T... to remove the old-time taped bandage. But not Gauztex, the new popular bandage which STICKS ONLY TO ITSELF. Easy to bandage like a nurse, between toes, over knuckles and knees. Prevents new shoe blisters. Many other household and everyday uses. Medicated and sanitary. All widths. Handy package for handbag or travel only 10c. Any drug store TODAY.

GAUZTEX
THE SELF ADHERING GAUZE

Handy household package 25c

NEW BAND-AGE-QUICK
Ready to use Gauztex bandages in small envelope. 5c

Yours

FOR HAIR TO BE PROUD OF!

Any serious attempt to curb Dandruff, relieve Itching Scalp or check excessive Falling Hair calls for a serious-purpose MEDICINAL treatment—not something that's just slicked on the hair. Use Glover's Mange Medicine and massage and it will soon be apparent to you how really effective it is. Nobody knows better than your Barber—ask him! For the shampoo, use Glover's Medicated Soap—an important part of the treatment. FREE booklet on Glover's famous System. Write GLOVER'S, Dept. B, 460 Fourth Ave., New York.

GLOVER'S
MANGE MEDICINE

was an absurd and monstrous situation and fraught with danger for the country.

For my own part, living with the armies as I did, I liked nothing better than to see Paul Reynaud when I passed through Paris. He could inform me better than anyone else, in his brilliant and uncompromising fashion, about the political situation.

IT WAS thus that on the nineteenth of March between two meetings of the Chamber of Deputies he came to dine with me alone. The day had been a bad one for the Daladier cabinet. The defeat of Finland had exasperated Parliament, and Daladier was criticized for not having acted fast enough. Probably the criticism was unfair, for it would have been difficult, perhaps impossible, to organize an expedition of this sort, and it would likely have terminated in disaster.

But the deputies had demanded a secret meeting which had taken up the whole afternoon and was to reconvene the same evening at ten o'clock.

"That poor fellow Daladier has had a bad day," Reynaud told us when he arrived at eight o'clock. "I should not be surprised if he were overthrown tonight."

"And who will succeed him?" my wife asked. "You?"

"That depends," Reynaud said, "upon the president of the republic and also upon the elements that defeat Daladier."

"If you are chosen," I said, "you will have to secure Daladier's support. He still has great popularity in the country."

"That is because the country does not know him."

"Possibly so, but it is a fact. You have great talent, but you have no party. The Radicals will be faithful to Daladier, and the Right, to which you belong, also prefers Daladier because you despise the Right and take no trouble to conceal the fact."

He smiled and said he would try, if the president summoned him, to arrange matters so that Daladier would retain the ministry of war. At ten o'clock he left for the Palais-Bourbon. That night, as he had expected, Daladier was overthrown. President Lebrun called upon Reynaud, who agreed, without demur, to form a new cabinet. But in this difficult task this remarkably intelligent man gave evidence of amazing ignorance of public opinion and an equally amazing lack of intuition.

When he appeared before Parliament, Reynaud secured with the greatest difficulty a majority of one vote! Parliament did not like him and at bottom it was sorry for having overthrown Daladier. Feeling this air of hostility, Reynaud lost his customary self-assurance and made a miserable speech.

Next day I returned to my post in Arras where I found all my French comrades profoundly shocked at the composition of the Reynaud ministry. It seemed to them a deliberate challenge to public opinion. In time of war it was a serious thing to discover so complete a break between the government and a large part of the nation. I had not seen Paul Reynaud since he accepted the premiership. From Arras I sent him, in guise of congratulations, a sentence from Barrès: "In time of peace Parliament represents the nation; but in time of war it is the army." And I added: "Do not lose touch with it."

From the start of the war Paul Reynaud had shown his hostility to General Gamelin. He criticized him for his inaction and maintained that the army did not have confidence in him. These were questions upon which I found it hard to form an opinion. It was true that in September, 1939, the general had not made a vigorous attack on the Siegfried Line but had confined himself to cautious operations in the Saar. His adversaries maintained that this period, when a large part of the German forces was engaged in Poland, would have been the best possible one for a decisive To this the general replied that outset of the campaign we did not possess the material equipment for the offensive and, in particular, not have the necessary airplane heavy artillery. Without this equipment such an attack would have crushing losses.

"I shall not begin the war," the general had said, "by a Battle of Verdun."

And he amplified his statement: "France is a nation with a low birth rate which has already sustained heavy losses in the last war. It would not have the strength to survive another bloodbath. The war she has to fight now must be a scientific war in which even the smallest detail is so precisely foreseen that the only result will be almost nothing."

I ADMIT that at the time his attitude seemed to me a wise one. It would have been foolhardy for a layman to judge on the military ability of General Gamelin. He had been at the front during the Battle of the Marne and had been the first to conceive the new maneuver that brought us victory. He had been an exemplary officer of the general staff and later, on the field of battle, an admirable commander of a division.

When you met him for the first time you were surprised by his inscrutable face. His short, stiff mustache, his small, thin-lipped mouth gave him a somewhat decipherable aspect, which no spontaneous gesture served to clarify. In neither the sparkling vivacity of Joffre nor the massive geniality of Joffe, he spoke very seldom, and I have seldom seen him in peacetime sit through a whole day in absolute silence. But he was courteous and modest. The officers of the general staff felt a strong personal affection for him. For my own part I always found him very kind. The first time he came to the headquarters of General Gort and saw me in uniform he said: "What? Are you still a lieutenant at your age?"

General Gamelin (right), advocate of defense and temporization, with Britain's Major General Ironside (left) and Canada's Major General McNaughton

OR THE 1 MAN 7 WHO SHAVES EVERY DAY

Special Shave Cream—It's Not a Soap, Needs No Brush!

Shaving leaves many men's faces raw, irritative. This is especially true of the man because of his business and social life, must shave every day.

Meet this condition Williams, for years makers of fine shaving preparations has now developed GLIDER—a special cream for daily shavers. With no soap it's a complete departure from ordinary shave creams. No brush. No lather.
No sticky or greasy.

Superabundance of moisture in this cream softens each whisker, yet forms a protective layer over your face to keep it from scraping. Swiftly, gently your face glides over your skin. Like a cold cream, Glider helps smooth, soften your skin and prevent chapping and roughness.

FREE—tube of Glider. Send name, address today. The J. B. Williams Co., Dept.
25, Glastonbury, Conn.

Good in U. S. A. and Canada only

MAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE— WITHOUT CALOMEL

And You'll Jump Out of Bed
in the Morning
Marin' to Go

Liver should pour out pints of liquid
into the food you eat every day. If this bile is not flowing freely, food may not digest. You get constipated. You feel sick and the world looks punk.
Get these good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills. Get these 2 pints of bile flowing freely to feel "up and up." Get a package today.
Directed. Amazing in making bile flow freely for Carter's Little Liver Pills, 10¢ and 25¢.

Marlin
HIGH SPEED
BLADES

ZIP OFF WHISKERS LIKE MAGIC
TWENTY FOR 25¢
SINGLE EDGE
15 FOR 25¢

GUARANTEED BY
THE MARLIN FIREARMS CO.
NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Write MARLIN, 166 Willow St., New Haven, Conn.

LET HURT, BURN?

For tired, tender, sensitive feet, muscular soreness or burning sensations caused by exertion or fatigue, use this quick relief (vanishing liquid or ointment). Cost but a trifle. For Dr. Scholl's FREE FOOT BOOK,
write Dr. Scholl's,
Inc., Chicago, Ill.

Dr. Scholl's FOOT BALM

BECOME AN EXPERT ACCOUNTANT

Accountants and C. P. A.'s earn $2,000 to $10,000 a year.
Thousands of firms need them. About 20,000 Certified Public Accountants in the U. S. We train you thoroughly at home in spare time for examinations or executive accounting positions. Previous experience unnecessary. Personal training under supervision of staff of Extension University, Dept. 940-H, Chicago
A Correspondence Institution

"She's running around the seashore somewhere, and here I am slaving away like a dog"

PERRY BARLOW

"I have been a lieutenant since the end of the last war, General."

"Twenty years without promotion!"
he said, laughing. "That's too much. I shall have you made captain."

When he returned I was still a lieutenant. He was amazed.

"What has happened?" he asked Colonel Petibon. "I told you to telephone the war ministry that André Maurois was to be appointed captain."

"I did so, General," the colonel replied. "But there is an obstacle. The regulations require two periods of training. Mr. Maurois has had only one."

Whereupon General Gamelin turned to General Gort.

"Everything is difficult," he said, "but I should have thought, nevertheless, that a commander in chief would not have had this much trouble in bestowing a captaincy!"

WHEN I had been promoted, he wrote me a cordial note: "At last! But I hardly dare congratulate you at this late date..." and he invited me to come and see him at the Château de Vincennes where he had his general headquarters.
I retain a very clear memory of that luncheon, which took place in the vaulted hall of the fortress and at which were present, in addition to the general's own staff, General Noguès, who was in command of our troops in North Africa and Mr. Brugère, French minister to Belgrade.

Official business dominated the conversation; General Noguès discussed the needs of his army and then Mr.
Brugère talked of the orders for arms which Yugoslavia had placed in France and which had not been filled. To both men General Gamelin replied with precision, clarity and an exact knowledge of available resources which made the best possible impression. He questioned me about the Fifty-first British division which was leaving for the Saar. Then the conversation turned to the French Academy and its dictionary and he said to me: "What we need is a name for the soldiers in this war. Those of 1914 called themselves Poilus, but those of 1940 have not yet been christened."

Mr. Brugère asked whether he expected an attack soon.

"Yes," he said, "everything points to

it. Our fliers and our secret agents see all the preparatory signs: massed artillery, ammunition depots and the evacuation of civilians. Of course it may be a ruse, but Goering made a speech yesterday in which he foretold important developments, and his practice on such occasions has been to tell the truth. It seems probable that the great attack is imminent."

The calm with which he awaited this blow was reassuring. You said to yourself: "This is Joffre with his imperturbable good health." But Paul Reynaud did not share this opinion.

"Why have two commanders in chief?" he asked. "If General Georges is commanding our armies, let General Gamelin confine himself to the role of chief of the general staff and the national defense."

The antagonism between the premier and the generalissimo was not merely one between two personalities but rather between two theories of war. From the beginning of the campaign Gamelin had been an advocate of defense and tem-porization; Reynaud hoped to become known as the man of offense and action.

"A general who remains on the defensive loses all his battles," he said.

Since he had become premier by promising to conduct the war "with increasing vigor," he felt obliged to undertake large projects. The possibilities, however, were strictly limited. He commenced by insisting, from the time of his first trip to London, that the British government should lay mine fields in the territorial waters of Norway. A little later he resurrected from the portfolios of the ministry of foreign affairs a proposed agreement with England which exacted a promise on both sides that neither one would sign a separate peace, a plan to which Daladier had always refused to agree. Then he reopened the question of Belgium: Was it necessary to wait for an appeal from the Belgian government before entering Belgium? Reynaud tried to force their hand.

"Are you with us or against us?" he asked the Belgian ministers. "If you are with us, then let us hasten to cooperate in strengthening the defenses of our frontiers. If you are against us—"

General Gamelin was outspoken in

Take a peek at Pencil
Quality

HAVE YOU BEEN MISSING your full share of pencil value and writing pleasure? Then look into MIKADO. You'll be delighted with these extra service features.

Stronger Points

In "Chemi-Sealed"
MIKADO, lead and wood are super bonded into one inseparable unit that combines their strength against point breakage. This saves you many interruptions and time-wasting trips to the sharpener.

Smoother Writing

For faster work with less fatigue, every microscopic particle of MIKADO's lead glides on a film of lubricating waxes sealed in by the super bonding process.

Longer Wear

Formed under 60
tons pressure and tempered at white heat, MIKADO leads are so dense and durable that every lead will make a distinct black line over 35 miles long! MIKADO is miles ahead in writing economy.

5¢ each . . . less in quantities.

EAGLE "CHEMI-SEALED" MIKADO 174

"Chemi-Sealed"
SUPER BONDED

MIKADO

EAGLE PENCIL COMPANY • NEW YORK • LONDON • TORONTO

his opposition to this attitude which he believed might result in throwing the twenty-five Belgian divisions into the enemy's camp. A violent scene took place between the two men. Reynaud would have replaced General Gamelin with General Georges as early as April if Daladier, who was still minister of war, had not threatened to resign. This was a risk that Reynaud dared not run. His personal position, however, seemed to grow stronger. The naval victory at Narvik made a great impression on France, and Reynaud, sponsor of the Norwegian project, derived considerable prestige from it.

"The iron route has been definitely cut," he told Parliament on the twentieth of April. And the minister who a few days earlier had had only a single vote majority obtained the unanimous support of the chamber. This seemed reassuring to me, but a senator whom I saw that evening told me with diabolic glee that it meant nothing.

"You don't understand parliamentary byplay," he explained in a pitying tone. "There were adversaries of Reynaud who worked hard to make it unanimous because unanimity is impersonal, national, patriotic; whereas, a strong majority would have meant a personal success."

Next day I was received by Reynaud himself. Striding up and down his office at the Quai d'Orsay with his hands in his pockets, he revealed to me in ringing tones the situation he had found upon assuming power. It horrified me.

"THE tanks," he said, "existed only on paper. Disorder was so great that the cannon and machine guns that the army needed were lying idle in the storehouses. The Germans had two hundred divisions, possibly two hundred and forty; we had barely one hundred. Daladier, through his inertia, thwarted all reforms and rendered government impossible."

"Nevertheless," I said, "Daladier is certainly a man who loves his country. He speaks of it so eloquently over the radio and in a way that goes straight to the heart."

"Yes," Reynaud said, "I believe he desires the victory of France, but he desires my defeat even more."

A terrible judgment, sincerely spoken but probably unfair, it reveals the depth of the abyss that separated these two men.

I saw Paul Reynaud on the sixth of May and found him depressed and nervous. On his desk were three telephones, one of which was connected with the ministry, the second with the outside, the third with the room of Madame de P. This last instrument rang unceasingly. Reynaud would lift the receiver, listen for a second and then cry out in an exasperated tone:

"Yes . . . Yes, of course . . . But that's understood . . . But I implore you to let me do my work. . . ."

Finally he stopped answering.

The Norwegian affair went badly. It revealed for the first time the crushing superiority of the equipment at the disposal of the German army. It dampened the enthusiasm of even the most optimistic to observe the difference between minute preparation—an action rehearsed in advance down to its smallest details—and a hasty improvisation which exposed to the bombs and machine guns of the enemy air force soldiers who were courageous but ill-equipped, particularly in respect to anti-aircraft guns. Reynaud placed upon his enemies responsibility for this lack of preparation that led to disaster.

"They kept things from me," he told me. "particularly a letter from Admiral Darlan which described the difficulties of the enterprise and which probably would have stopped me. But I am going this afternoon before a committee of the senate and I shall tell them the whole truth."

This time the quarrel between Daladier and Reynaud was so violent that President Lebrun had to interfere to reconcile them.

AT NINE o'clock on the morning of May tenth I was planning to go to the country to spend my leave there. At eight-thirty I switched on the radio and learned of the invasion of Belgium and Holland. The great offensive had been launched. All the officers on leave were recalled, and I went to the Gare du Nord to return to Arras. The train was so crowded with British and French soldiers that several cars had to be added. Standing near me by an open window in the corridor, an infantry captain was giving directions to his wife.

"Listen, my dear. Take the money out of the left-hand drawer of my bureau and the change that is in the drawer of the bedside table. The keys to the car and to the garage are in the tray on the seventeenth of May, General Gamelin advised the government that a German motorized column was advancing on Laon and that he could not answer for Paris longer than that night. That was a day of panic in the ministries.

On the following morning the Parisians learned that the Germans had turned toward the sea and that they would have some days' respite. This time Reynaud, made bold by the gravity of the situation, took the action that he had so often postponed. In order to get rid of General Gamelin, whom he held responsible for the defeat and whom Daladier persisted in defending, he assumed himself the portfolio of war and handed that of foreign affairs to Daladier. Who was to be the generalissimo? For a long time Reynaud had had Georges in mind, but of all possible choices he would have been the most painful to Gamelin. For between these two men there existed a rivalry as persistent as that which divided Reynaud and Daladier.

"They are so busy making war on each

Marshal Pétain the vice-premier. In the eyes of most Frenchmen the marshal possessed incomparable prestige. His noble and regular features, tall stature, his somewhat cold and satirical air of authority gave those who met him the impression of a "presence." Of the six marshals of the Great War who had been the witnesses and actors of glory, he alone remained. Marshal Franchet d'Esperey. And the fact that he bore so easily his eight-four years and remained young inspired astonishment and respect.

In summoning Marshal Pétain to side Reynaud thought first of strengthening his position and of ening and solidifying public opinion through this brilliant prestige. But he made a strange miscalculation in seeing in his new colleague only a name and a reputation. He was providing for himself a successor and a judge.

The disastrous struggle of Reynaud against Daladier finally came to an end on the sixth of June by the complete elimination of the latter. Master of France a few months before and so powerful that he had seemed to be untouchable, he disappeared in a whirlwind that had struck his country without a single word of regret even of surprise being voiced.

Meanwhile, General Gamelin, whom Daladier had so long protected, was living between a courtyard and a garden in the ground floor of a quiet house on the Avenue Foch; dressed in civilian clothes, he was spending his time peeping out on his typewriter a memoir of self-justification.

A FRIEND of the Gamelins who had known them in their days of power and remained faithful to them in disgrace went to see Madame Gamelin before leaving Paris. She found her calm and resigned.

"The general," she said, "is with us. He is not thinking of himself but of France, of our soldiers. He has the highest regard for General Weygand and hopes that he may succeed in halting the enemy."

Then she pointed to the next room where we had on a former occasion admired a charming portrait of the general painted by his own mother when he was a child and showing the young Maurice Gamelin wearing a long dress and holding on a drum, and her face took on the tender look of a loving and devoted wife.

"Do you hear him?" she said with emotion. "That's the clicking of his little typewriter."

These were the most serious of personal conflicts that rendered the conduct of the war so difficult. It is easy to say that such antagonisms occur at times, that jealousy and ambition are ever-present passions, that in Clemenceau and Poincaré hated each other and that, nevertheless, we were victorious. This is true, but in 1914 a certain nobility of heart and undivided patriotism triumphed over these passions. Poincaré had no love for Clemenceau but he loyally collaborated with him. Pétain, with self-abnegation, served under the orders of Foch. In 1940 France was so divided, political hatreds were so violent and the decline of public morality so far advanced that no obstacle interposed to personal hatreds. The country was played by personalities was not the sentimental cause of the defeat. That as we have shown, was lack of preparation, military, diplomatic and industrial on the part of the Allies. But the quarrels of the ministers and the lack of a leader capable of imposing unity on a nation deprived the armies of their chance.

The fourth of this series of art will appear next week.

"Let's go someplace else—you bore me!"

JARO FABRY

the chest of drawers in my room. Tell Berthe to put the business suit I took off in camphor. Have Jean's bicycle greased; it squeaks. What did you say? That these two days have been very short? Certainly, but remember that we might not have had them at all. And if we stop those fellows, this may be the end of the war."

His little wife smiled bravely. It is not true to say that before the offensive the morale was bad. In the upper and better-informed circles it may have been, but not among the masses who were still filled with hope and to whom the radio administered eight times a day their doses of illusion.

The news of the German breakthrough at Sedan was a terrible and completely unforeseen blow to the inhabitants of Paris. They were prepared, if need be, for the idea of a retreat; they had had experience enough of that in 1914. But they believed that any enemy advance would be quickly checked. On other," an English general said one day, "that they have no time to make war on the Germans."

ANOTHER possible choice was Nogues, who had had great success in Morocco and in all North Africa. Among the younger generals Huntziger and Giraud both had partisans. Huntziger was considered a man of great intelligence and his army had stubbornly resisted the attack. Giraud was a wonderful leader but he terrified the timid by his audacity and, moreover, at the moment he was a prisoner. Reynaud decided upon General Weygand who was in command of the army of the Orient, and urgently recalled him to Paris. Weygand had been the second in command to Marshal Foch at that moment in 1918 when the latter had taken command of a battle already half lost and transformed it into a victory. It was natural to make use of his experience.

At the same time Reynaud offered

Hade is in Jail

Continued from page 15

wait duck hunting and will not be back until tomorrow afternoon.

So I am sitting on the fence across from the Teton, and I am wishing to the devil I would've had enough sense not to tell my bedroll. I only got six dollars of it, and it is not warm these nights in October down here in the Hole. I went on asking Ed if I could sleep in the back room at the Teton, but he is gone and I don't know the fellow at the bar, and if I would ask him he would think I am some kind of saddle bum, while Ed knows different, he knows my intentions are always of the best.

But anyway I got to eat, and I go over to the lunchroom and buy a ham-burger and coffee, and I am sure lonely for that Nancy Church. I don't know where she is, and if I would know where I would go there and she would slip me a piece of pie extra, or another cup of coffee on the side. I do get homesome for that old Nancy, especially when I am at a lunch counter.

AFTER supper I go out and walk around, and I have got an idea to go over and see Hade, but I think I better not, because for one thing I do not want to get Hade out of jail to look like what was all planned, and another thing if Hade knew I had sold my outfit he would never let me get him out. So I wander over to the Teton, and they have got a dance going. They have got one of those machines where you put in a nickel for a record, and a fellow tells me they have a dance every Saturday night.

All the fellows I know are out of town some roundup or the other, but there is a couple of fellows from Utah I have seen once before someplace and I dig into my money and we have a beer.

After while a girl walks in alone. It is between a dance, and they all look up at her when she comes in, and she sits in an empty chair near the door and smiles at the people that say hello to her, which includes every one of the men in the place, and it is no use of me trying to describe this girl.

I have saw a good many dude girls, but it is in the dude-girl season, and a few I have saw out of season, and this one is not exactly a dude girl and she is not exactly a local girl, but she is beautiful and she is nice and I am sure in love with her.

I am not quick when it comes to a thing like this, Hade is always making fun of me about it, but this time it is different, I take myself entirely by surprise and I step right up and say:

"Ma'am, would you want to dance with me? I am not a very good dancer."

She smiles at me and says yes she will be very glad to and she is not a very good dancer either.

So I stand there, I did not know it would be so long before the next record on the machine, and I do not know exactly what I should ought to say, but finally I say, "My name is Steve," and she says, "Mine is Doris Baxter. Do you live around here?"

"Yes," I tell her. "I mean, I live in the West. Do you?"

"My home is in Denver," she says. "I am visiting my uncle here."

"I see," I tell her. That is all I can think of for a while.

Well, somebody has sense enough to start a record and she stands up and we go ahead and dance. It is not easy with my high heels and besides it is very hot in Ed's place, but after a long time the dance is over and I ask her if maybe she would like a drink.

"Yes, I would," she says; "I would like a good big drink." And we go out to the bar and she orders a Tom Collins, fifty cents, and I order a beer, and while we are drinking it half a dozen fellows that have managed by this time to get away from their wives come around and are asking Doris for a dance, and she says she has got to get home early but she will have time for a few more, and they all get a dance and when the music starts she thanks me very much and I am alone and she has not even finished all of her Tom Collins.

Well, I go back to where the fellows from Utah are at, and we stand and watch them dance. After while I am getting sleepy and there is no use standing here and watching Doris dance with everybody. So I start out, and I see Doris leaving the fellow she has just danced with, and I go up to her and I say, "Well, I suppose you are going home now," and she says she is, and I say, "Maybe you could stay for one more dance."

"Maybe I could," she says, smiling very charming.

So while we are waiting for the dance I invite her to have another drink, a Tom Collins if she wants it, if she thinks she can drink another big drink like that. She does, and I make mine a beer. Then we dance, and we are going toward the door afterward and there is a lot of people around and I have it in my mind to take Doris home, but before I can figure it out, she says, "Steve, thanks a lot, and I hope to see you again, I really do," and she has went.

I am mighty sad about this and I go out and walk around, there is a fine moon out, and I think of Doris, and after while I decide to turn in for the night and maybe I will see Doris around tomorrow. So I wander out toward the rodeo grounds, where I figure I will find a place to sleep. I go across the field and around behind the grandstand, and the two fellows from Utah are there and some other fellow. I lay down on a couple loose planks I find, and stand a plank beside me to keep off the worst of the wind, but it is no use, it is too cold. One of the fellows from Utah has got a bedroll and the other one has got a blanket, but the third one is like me, nothing, and we build a little fire and take turns keeping it going.

When it is my turn to watch it, I am sitting there thinking about Doris.

WE BOTH of us get a little sleep, taking turns, and after while it is morning and the sun comes over the hills and we sleep a little longer in it, it is nice and warm. We are all hungry, and I find out nobody has any money but me, so I invite them to breakfast. The way it is with Hade, he would rather stay in jail a couple days extra than have me hold out on the fellows, so we go over and have some ham and eggs, and being in the lunchroom again makes me think of Nancy Church, and I am kind of ashamed of myself on account of Doris. I mean, I have this understanding with Nancy, and here I am in love with Doris.

After breakfast the fellows go on up the road, they are looking for a job for the winter, and I walk around town kind of looking for Doris but I do not see her. So I sit on the fence a while. I am wondering what Hade would say if I would use just half of my money for his bills instead of all of it, and use the rest for staying in town here for a few days and dance again with Doris and buy her another Tom Collins and maybe take her to the movies or supper or something. I am thinking, maybe it would be all right with Hade if I did not get him out of jail

The price of Top-Quality is the little more you pay for Generals

THE ONE AND ONLY
SQUEEGEE
TIRE

At a time when the appeal of price is being used generally, to tempt tire buyers, car owners are recording emphatically their confidence in General's Top-Quality. Sales of Squeegie-Generals show spectacular increases. New thousands are joining the millions who have learned that speculating on tire quality is risky business. For maximum mileage and safety, see your General Tire dealer.

STOPS like this
Flexible ribs wrinkle into squeegie-action... hold with super-soft grip... stop you quick and straight, every time.

RUNS like this
No wrinkle when running. Silent riding. Easy steering. No sway on sharp turns. Non-cupping. Slow, even wear.

The General Tire and Rubber Company • Akron, Ohio
In Canada—The General Tire & Rubber Co., Ltd., Toronto

COPYRIGHT 1940, THE GENERAL TIRE & RUBBER CO., AKRON, O.

The GENERAL TIRE

—goes a long way to make friends

PHOTOGRAPH TAKEN AT HARVARD OBSERVATORY

The sky's the limit

Some of the stars shown in this photograph of the Galaxy, or Milky Way, are hundreds of light years distant. A hundred light years, in miles, is 186,335 miles per second times 60 seconds times 60 minutes times 24 hours times 365 days times 100. And that barely begins to dent the depths of space. (Modern telescopes reveal nebulae that are 500,000,000 light years distant.)

Even that marvelous man-made instrument, the Comptometer, which adds, subtracts, multiplies and divides complex figures with amazing speed and accuracy, is hardly adequate to cope with figures when the infinite sky's the limit.

But for handling swiftly and economically the finite figures which are vital to Business and Industry, the Comptometer has proved its sterling worth during the past half-century. And (especially since the introduction of the new Model M Cushioned-Touch Comptometer) more and more alert executives are discovering the significance of the phrase "Comptometer Economy": that this bright particular star in the field of adding-calculating machines handles more figure work in less time at lower cost.

Felt & Tarrant Manufacturing Company, 1714 North Paulina Street, Chicago, Illinois.

COMPTOMETER

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

all at once. I could get him part out now, and get a job and get him the rest of the way out later on.

I walk around to where the jail is at. I stand there and look at her.

She is made of brick and is attached to a little log house, where Jim Bassett lives. I have been in her. Jim let me sleep in her a couple nights one winter when I was coming through here. Jim is a good enough fellow but he is dumfounded about keeping a place clean, and Jim's idea about cooking is to make up a stew and see how long it will last by putting in more water every few days. When I was there the stew was pretty good right at first, you did not have to hunt long for the meat, but a couple other fellows come in to spend the week end on a couple cots Jim set up, and when I left there was not any use hunting for the meat.

So I look at the jail, and I know what she is like, and Hade is there in her.

I'll have to get Hade all the way out.

"STEVE," Ed is saying, "I wouldn't've believed it myself if I wouldn't've seen it."

He is back from duck hunting and we are standing at his bar talking her over and drinking a beer. He points his glass of beer at the big window in front of his place and he says:

"Hade is standing here at the bar and I can see he has got something on his mind. I do not know what it is, but something. He has been around here two, three days, he is on his way up to Montana, he tells me he has promised to meet you up there in the fall of the year. But you wouldn't hardly know Hade. He is gloomy. He drinks his beer and when he gets through he puts the glass back on the bar, it is the only beer he has had, he is about out of money, and he leans down and picks up the spittoon and throws it through the window there."

Ed looks at me, very puzzled, and he says, "Steve, have another beer. On the house." He draws us each another beer and says:

"Hade just stood here, right where you're standing now, and he says, 'Ed, I am sure mighty sorry about that. It was just an idea I had, and I forgot to change my mind. You better call Jim Bassett and have it over with.' Well, take a nice fellow like Hade, always peaceable, you don't like to see him go to jail for a thing like that. I always liked Hade. So I said, 'Hade, anybody else I would sure have them thrown in the jug, but take it with a fellow like you, some day when you get a job just send me the money and we'll forget the whole thing.'"

"Well, Hade tries to get me to call Jim Bassett and I won't do it, so he walks out. In five minutes in comes Jim. He asks me for the bar cloth and I give it to him and then I see Jim has got a bloody nose. I ask him what the matter is, and he says, 'I just had an accident. I was walking along the street and here comes Hade Crosby, and before I can even say hello, he pokes me one in the nose. He tries to tell me he done it on purpose, but hell, I know Hade better than that. So I just laugh at him and tell him not to mistake me for somebody else again, and I come over here.'"

"So," Ed goes on, "I show Jim my window. We are standing here looking at the window and scratching our heads, wondering about Hade, and in comes Bill Alberts. Bill says, 'Fellows, you don't have to believe it, but Hade Crosby is over in the square knocking down all the fences.' So Jim goes out, and the next thing I know, Hade is in jail, charged up with my window and the fence and Jim's nose. I guess Jim just lost his patience. I'm sure sorry about Hade. Nobody around here can figure the thing out."

Me too.

"I would like to talk to Jim," I tell Ed. "That ought to be easy," Ed says. He goes to the phone and calls up the jail and asks Jim to come over, and a few minutes Jim comes in.

The first thing I do is buy a couple drinks all around. Then I ask Jim, "What would it take, in the way of money to get Hade out?"

"Well," Jim says, "the way it is with the books, Hade owes the town about thirteen, fourteen dollars for the job, and he owes Ed here seventy dollars, it, Ed, for the window."

"I put her down for seventy," Ed says, "but I tell you, that window cost eighty dollars, counting hauling it over the pass. I don't know how much putting her in. Lou Apple put her for me and he took it out in trade so I got it down to a matter of dollars and cents."

I take my money out of my pocket. "Well," I tell them, "I had a little lately, and as long as I'm here I might as well get Hade out of jail. If you fellows go along with me. Ed, suppose I give you sixty dollars even for the window, and some day I or Hade will make up the rest. The way it is now, Hade is serving time, and when his time is up he don't owe you anything. Then I'll give you fifteen dollars for the fence, Jim. I'll give it to you and you can pay the town when you get to it, and that leaves two dollars over of the money I've got here, and we could have us a couple more drinks."

Ed says that is all right with him. Jim says so far as he is concerned, it's all legal.

So Jim says first thing in the morning he'll make out the papers and I can take Hade, and we have a couple drinks. Jim says, "By the way," he says, "you got a place to sleep tonight?"

"I haven't thought of it," I tell him. He says, "Look, Steve, you might well see Hade tonight as in the morning, and you can stay right there in the jail just as well as not. The cot's tight and you'd be mighty comfortable. What to do her?"

"Sure," I tell him; "let's go over." "I ain't got the time right now," he says. "I got to make a couple rounds but you go on over and go right in. The door's unlocked, or if it ain't just knock and Hade'll let you in."

So I go over there and I am grinning, walking along, thinking what Hade will say when I tell him he is out of jail in the morning.

I OPEN the door and go in and there is Hade, sitting in a chair.

He looks up.

"Good evening, Mr. Crosby," I say, very polite.

"Steve!" he says. He jumps up. "We are calling each other the names we can think of, like always."

"Hade," I finally say, "in the morning you are out of jail."

"Oh, no," he says, "I'm in for forty days. Forty to go."

I can't help but laugh. "You are kidding, I tell him. 'I did her.'"

Hade stands there looking at me, and he sits down and puts his head in his hands. He is overcome.

While Hade is sitting there I have to look around the inside of the jail and it is my turn to be overcome. The first thing I see is that Hade's bed has sheets and pillows and pillow case clean, and a spread on it, instead of a couple old blankets like it used to have.

And there is a rug on the floor. Both windows is curtains. And the chair Hade is sitting in is one of the easy chairs, covered with red flower over it, and on a little table beside the chair is some magazines and bottles of beer.

Hade looks up. He says, "Steve, how do you get me out?"

Hade does not like to mention about the meey part of it. So I just say, "I talked to Ed and Jim. It was easy."

Hade takes a deep breath. "Steve," he says, "I sure do appreciate what you did. But—Steve, I'm going to serve out my time."

Now is where I tell him about the meey, about everything paid.

I am just going to tell him when the door between the jail and Jim's house opens and in comes a beautiful girl.

Hade does not have to tell you who it is.

He says, "Is everything all right, Hade? Is the beer good and cold?" Then she sees me. "Oh, hello, Steve," she says. She tells Hade: "I and Steve had a couple dances last night at Ed's. And we bought me two Tom Collinses, didn't you, Steve?"

"Yes," I say.

Hade says everything is fine, and she goes back.

"Goodby, Doris," I say when she is closing the door.

"Goodby, Steve," she says.

He is gone.

Hade opens a bottle of beer and hands it to me and I drink some and hand it back and he drinks some. He waves his hand around. "Steve," he says, "just take a look at this place. It gives you a good idea of what it means to have a woman around. Doris is Jim's niece, you know, she's visiting him from Denver and she sure knows how to make a place good and homelike. And the food, Steve, you wouldn't recognize it. Take it tonight, we had the biggest steak you ever saw. And this beer. Jim got hold of some money someplace and Doris fed us up a real feed. Here, have some more beer."

Hade takes some more beer.

Hade says, "Steve, I am thinking of getting married."

"You have said that before," I remind him.

"This time it is the real thing," he says. "I fell in love with Doris the first time I was in town, here. On my way up to Montana to meet you. Well, there is half the unmarried fellows in town in love with Doris already, and all the married ones, and here I am, my old clothes, and I am broke, and what chance have I got."

"So I hit on the idea. I am the only one in the whole town that thought of getting put in jail."

"That's the way it would be," I tell Hade.

Hade kind of laughs. He says, "Steve, maybe you think I didn't have a job of it getting put in jail." He laughs harder, and I feel like laughing too, so we both laugh.

Hade says, "Steve, what are you doing here in the Hole? I thought you went up to Montana."

"I am just passing through here," I tell Hade. "I decided to winter in the South this year. New Mexico."

"That reminds me," Hade says. "I have got a message for you. Nancy Church is down at Rock Springs. She's working at the Busy Bee. She said if I saw you, and if you are going south this winter, be sure and stop in. She's a swell kid, Steve. I guess I know how it is between her and you."

"We have got an understanding," I tell Hade.

We have some more of the beer.

Hade says, "You taking your saddle and bedroll for getting a job down South?"

"No," I tell him; "I sold out. I didn't want to be bothered on the way down."

"Listen," Hade says, "if you want a bedroll for on the way, I've got one over in that shed behind the hardware store where I and you slept that time. You can help yourself to it, Steve. I'll be here all winter, I'm not going anyplace, I won't need it. You take it along, Steve."

"I might do her, at that," I tell Hade. "I'm pulling out tonight. I can make her to Piney Draw by tomorrow night."

So I and Hade shake hands, and Hade says, "Stop in on your way back in the spring, Steve. Maybe we can get a job together, like old times."

So I say I sure will, and I start out.

"Wait a minute," Hade says. I stop. "Finish the beer," he says.

I finish the beer.

Then I go on over to the shed behind the hardware store and I find the bedroll, and I kind of circle around town and head on south.

It feels mighty fine, having a bedroll again; a fellow don't need to carry much when he can meet up with friends like Hade. I am on my way to see Nancy Church, and I am going to New Mexico, and I am whistling when I am walking down the road. And on my back, warm against my shoulders, is this good old bedroll that Hade has gave to me. It is not a home, but it is a mighty comfortable feeling.

No bet, George!

Who wouldn't enjoy reporting right back to the folks at home! So easy too. Calls can be made from any booth to anywhere. Adds loads of pleasure to any trip. Rates, of course, are extra low after 7 every evening and all day Sunday.

"Look, fella, yuh know what happens in th' movies, I' guys like you what won't talk?"

JAY IRVING

Lily-Gilder Mac Leish

ARCHIBALD MACLEISH, Librarian of Congress, is reported asking the United States Government to set up a propaganda department, similar to the propaganda departments maintained by many other governments, especially the dictator governments. The idea would be to push our government's doctrines in every possible way.

This suggestion, we'd say, stamps Mr. MacLeish as a champion lily-gilder. Our government now has some 200 ladies and gentlemen engaged in putting out propaganda of every description. It is mostly dressed-up as factual stuff about how the various Washington departments, bureaus and holes-in-the-wall are helping to make life rosier every day for every American. But it's propaganda nevertheless, because the government never gets a sour break in any of the stuff.

If there's one thing we do not need in this country, it is a regularly organized propaganda department. If Mr. MacLeish, now, would suggest a department for radically cutting down the propaganda put out by all the government agencies, he'd have something.

How About the Philippines?

AS REPORTED in Collier's recently by Jim Marshall, the Filipinos are biting their fingernails closer to the quick as 1946, the year for their complete liberation from the United States, draws nearer.

Their free-trade privileges with us look better every day to Filipino businessmen; the prospect of being fired out of pleasant jobs by the Japanese looks more appalling every day to Philippine politicians. So Manila hints ever more broadly to Washington about some kind of modified independence, which would let the Filipinos do all the running and most of the exploiting of their rich islands while we did all the protecting of them.

Couldn't a fairer arrangement be made, if we're going to think better of complete Philippine liberation, as apparently we are?

After all, Philippine defense is no child's play. The islands are far out of line with strategic U. S. Naval placements in the Pacific. Some of our Navy men regard them as indefensible against an all-out Japanese attempt to grab them.

Wouldn't it be fair to insist that, if we do consent not to free the Philippines, the islands build a reasonably good-sized navy of their own; and that they not weary of well-doing in the matter of building up the army that ex-Chief of Staff MacArthur got started for them?

The Philippines are a wealthy set of islands. We're going to tax ourselves almost blind for a big defense force. It seems little enough to ask of the Filipinos to hold up their end if we're to undertake to save them from the Japanese—for whose coming the Filipinos began asking the moment they asked us to turn them loose.

Tsk, Tsk, Mr. Arnold

HOW now, whither are we drifting, what the blazes, and all that? We refer to the Sherman Anti-Trust Act criminal charges brought by Thurman Arnold's anti-monopoly committee against the eight biggest tobacco companies operating in the United States—American Tobacco Co., British-American, Imperial, Liggett & Myers, P. Lorillard Co., Philip Morris & Co., R. J. Reynolds, Universal Leaf Tobacco Co.

Arnold charges these outfits with creating assorted tobacco trusts, then works around to this remarkable accusation:

By nation-wide advertising and sales promotion schemes the "Big Four" and Philip Morris & Co., Ltd., Inc., created such a perfect acceptance and demand for their major brands that—the offering of such products for sale being a necessary adjunct to the conduct of numerous wholesale, retail and service establishments—such establishments are forced to handle the products even on unreasonable and arbitrary terms and at such prices.

In plainer English, the "Big Four" and Philip Morris build more attractive mousetraps, so to speak, than anybody else in the tobacco game, and let the world know they do, so the world beats paths to the doors of Camels, Chesterfields, Lucky Strikes, Old Golds and Philip Morris—and Arnold calls these typically American successes crimes. There can be no quarrel with legitimate government efforts to stop actually unfair trade practices. But this particular squawk is absurd.

The tobacco companies don't force retailers to sell their cigarettes. The smoking is popular because it prefers these brands, forcing dealers to handle them. And the cigarette business, far from being monopolistic, is fiercely competitive. These brands have battled for years. When Camels nose out Luckies or Old Golds, or Philip Morris edges ahead of Old Golds, or Chesterfields outrun the field, a spell, it's News.

As for cigarettes' unreasonable prices, government certainly isn't doing anything to make them more reasonable. It now taxes popular-price cigarettes 6½¢ a pack, meaning the manufacturers have become so efficient that cigarettes could retail at anything under 9¢ per package of 20 with reasonable profits if it weren't for the taxes.

Sure, we take all kinds of reputable trade advertising, and are glad to have it, and Thurman Arnold is welcome to make what he can out of that. So what? So just the same, Arnold's committee has gone off the deep end on a one-eyed, fantastic prosecution, or else the Sherman Anti-Trust Act needs some amendments. Probably a bit of both.

"All Aircraft Returned Safely" RADIOED BY
QUENTIN REYNOLDS

September 14, 1940

5¢ A COPY

Collier's

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY

© THE CROWN COLLECTOR PUBLISHING COMPANY PUBLISHERS OF COLLECTOR'S THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE—WOMAN'S HOME COMPANION

PUBLISHED FOR BURLINGAME
CALIF
C 1/20
A 3254

you see a Girl in the 4th Grade?
 ! I see a Girl who is a Senior at Vassar.
 she a Beautiful Girl?
 ! Her Sparkling Smile lights her whole Face.
 Why is her Smile so Charming?
 Starting young with Ipana and Massage may well be one reason.

Protect your smile. Guard against "Pink Tooth Brush." Let Ipana and Massage help you to have firmer gums, brighter teeth.

TODAY, flaxen-haired Polly gets "Honors" in spelling. But wait till she grows up—chances are she'll take them in beauty—thanks to her radiant smile.

For, like thousands of children in our schools today, she has learned how important gum massage is to healthy gums and sparkling smiles. These youngsters know better than many adults that the soft, creamy foods we eat actually deny gums the exercise and stimulation they need for healthy firmness. That's why gums so often tend to feel tender, become sensitive . . . and signal their weakness with a warning tinge of "pink" upon your tooth brush.

Never Ignore "Pink Tooth Brush"!

When that tinge of "pink" appears . . . see your dentist! It may not mean serious trouble but "pink tooth brush" is a definite warning . . . one you should never ignore.

Chances are your dentist will give the verdict that your gums have grown lazy, need exercise and invigoration. And, like so many dentists, he may advise "the healthful stimulation of Ipana Tooth Paste and massage!"

For Ipana does more than clean teeth thoroughly. With massage, it is specially designed to aid your gums . . . help them to become stronger, healthier. Massage a little extra Ipana onto your gums every time you brush your teeth. That invigorating "tang"—exclusive with Ipana and massage—is evidence that circulation is roused in gum tissues, aiding gums to become firmer, healthier.

Get a tube of economical Ipana today. Begin now the daily, helpful habit of Ipana and massage . . . for healthier gums, brighter teeth, and a more radiant smile.

Ipana Tooth Paste

"High-Jumps" and Hair-Raising Stops Show How New Tire Saves Lives!

Punishing Performances by Jimmie Lynch's "Death Dodgers" at New York World's Fair, Show Why You'll Be Safer On Silvertowns

CARS hurtling into space! Tires smacking concrete! Dizzy turns and fast stops that leave the crowds gasping.

The fact of the matter is we've made the Goodrich Arena at the New York World's Fair a "torture" ground for tires—and invited millions to watch.

It's spectacular, of course, but what is most important, it's a living, thrilling demonstration that "You'll be safer on Silvertowns". Here the Life-Saver Tread shows how its "windshield-wiper" road-drying action will give you the quickest non-skid stops you've ever had.

You see the tougher, stronger Silvertown carcass take smashing blows from a car actually falling in the air. This same carcass, remember, has in every ply the heat-resisting construction pioneered in the famous Golden Ply that is noted for maximum resistance to high-speed blow-outs. These specially treated, heat-resisting "Life-Saver" plies give you greater safety every day you drive.

You'll never give your tires anywhere near this punishment. But wouldn't it give you peace-of-mind to know this safety is under your car?

Get your Silvertowns now. If it's not convenient to pay cash, you can take advantage of the liberal Budget Plan available at Goodrich Silvertown Stores and many Goodrich Dealers.

GOING OVER? Not by a long shot. Even though the whole weight of this speeding car is on only two of the Goodrich Silvertowns, these massive, husky sidewalls are able to "take it"—and come back for more.

ONLY 3 INCHES TO SPARE! That's all the space between running board and on bars of this paper hoop as Betty Middleton, one of America's youngest girl stunt drivers, rides saddle on the hood of a Jimmie Lynch car. That's precision driving!

HOLD EVERYTHING! A long, fast run up the jump—a leap into the air—and 3000 pounds of flying weight fall squarely on the tires! In a few minutes—another turn around the track—and these husky Silvertowns are ready to do it again!

THEY PUT THEIR FAITH IN SILVERTOWNS. Every day Jimmie Lynch's dare-devils put cars through death-defying paces. You may never ask as much from tires but you do need this safety. See your nearest Goodrich Dealer or Goodrich Silvertown Store today.

Goodrich SAFETY Silvertowns

OL' JUDGE ROBBINS

IN RECENT LABORATORY "SMOKING BOWL" TESTS, PRINCE ALBERT BURNED

86 DEGREES COOLER

THAN THE AVERAGE OF THE 30 OTHER OF THE LARGEST-SELLING BRANDS TESTED — COOLEST OF ALL!

DECLARE A TRUCE ON TONGUE-BITE!

PRINCE ALBERT'S CRIMP CUT AND NO-BITE PROCESS CLEAR THE WAY FOR SMOOTH, MILD PIPE PLEASURE

P.A.'S GOT THE RIGHT CUT FOR PERFECT PACKING, EASY DRAWING, AND EVEN BURNING

50

pipefuls of fragrant tobacco in every handy tin of Prince Albert

ROLLING'S A SIGHT FASTER WITH PRINCE ALBERT, TOO. NEATEST, FIRMEST 'MAKIN'S' SMOKES BY A LONG SHOT

PRINCE ALBERT
THE NATIONAL JOY SMOKE

KEEP UP WITH THE WORLD

By Freling Foster

Homing pigeons in the service of the United States Army Signal Corps have not only been trained to fly as far as sixty miles in darkness, but also to locate their "home," or loft, when it is mounted on a truck and moved many miles every twenty-four hours.

In the past five years, the motor scooter has grown from a plaything to a practical utility, at least 75,000 now being used, for example, by highway police, postmen, messenger boys and those who run about airports and large industrial plants. They cost from about $90 to $200, have three-quarters to two-and-a-half-horsepower motors, travel from 25 to 35 miles an hour and run from 60 to 120 miles on a gallon of gasoline.

Of the 285,000 privately owned freight cars in the United States today, 140,000 are tank cars of 65 different types, which are used to transport 110 kinds of liquids such as wine, milk, molasses, corn syrup, olive oil, turpentine and acetic acid.

Nearly every man in Melanesia has a magic word or phrase that he uses to cure disease, frighten evil spirits or injure his enemies. No one else can speak this personal "abracadabra" unless he buys or rents it for a special occasion. When such an oral charm is sold, the former owner can never utter it again.

According to Moslem faith, every Mohammedan who is a "true believer" on earth is rewarded, upon his entrance into Paradise, with a harem of seventy-two dark-eyed damsels, who are endowed with perpetual youth and beauty and will belong to him forever.

That intelligent men with the same education and experience differ widely in common judgment is illustrated by the 116 high-school teachers who graded 116 identical copies of the answers to an examination in plane geometry, an exact science. The scores ranged from 28 to 92 per cent.—By Mrs. Charlie Kniggee, Bronx, New York.

More than forty per cent of industrial and commercial companies whose buildings are destroyed by fire never survive the disaster and go out of business.

When a baby is born of a Turkish mother and a French father, aboard a British ship in American territorial waters, his parents claim for him any one of the nationalities.—By Lena B. F. Watertown, Massachusetts.

Many rural and small-town newspapers gladly publish all the poetry that is written and contributed by their readers, irrespective of rhyme or reason, at the smallest fee—to the poet—of only fifteen cents a line.—By Evelyn Wilma B. Walled Lake, Michigan.

The average-sized Atlantic oyster strains its food from a dozen eighteen gallons of water a day. A species of Mexican squash seed keeps enough moisture at one time to keep itself alive for fifteen years.

About three quarters of the cases that are appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States are refused hearings on the grounds that they do not merit further judicial consideration.—By Carl Forster, New York, New York.

Contrary to the impression created by our numerous Chinatown Chinese laundries and chop restaurants, America has only as many Chinese as Japanese students. Incidentally, twenty per cent of the Chinese and forty per cent of the Japanese are women.

In some clinical or fever thermometers the tube that holds the mercury has a diameter as small as 1/120th of a human hair. The mercury could not be seen without the aid of a powerful magnifying glass.—G. A. Caswell, Chicago, Illinois.

Five dollars will be paid for each interesting or unusual fact accepted for this column. Contributions must be accompanied by a factory proof. Address Keep Up With the World, Collier's, 250 Park Avenue, New York City. This column is copyrighted by The National Weekly. None of the material may be reproduced without express permission of the publisher.

You will soon hear the remarkable story of a new kind of car which is now in production at Nash Motors plants.

A car advanced so far beyond present-day standards that the bare facts about it make startling news.

Exhaustive road tests show economy of operation that overshadows anything yet achieved for a car of its size and performance.

Savings up to $100 a year can be had by the average family. This new-type automobile represents two years of intensive development, and an investment of many millions of dollars by the Nash Company.

It is available in three series, starting in America's lowest-priced field.

Get ready for a new idea of what a car can do, and how little a mile can cost.

The Nash Ambassadors are coming!

Nash Motors Div. of Nash-Kelvinator Corp., Detroit, Mich. (Advance information will be sent to those writing the address above.)

A NEW KIND OF CAR . . . TO SAVE YOU MONEY EVERY MILE

THE NEW
PHILCO
PHOTO-ELECTRIC
 RADIO-PHONOGRAPH PLAYS ANY RECORD ON A

Beam of Light!

No Needles
to Change!

Surface noise
reduced 10 to 1

Records last 10 times longer!

Tilt-Front
Cabinet

Make your own Records at Home

Glorious new Purity of Tone

The Philco PHOTO-ELECTRIC Repro...
 ... first basic improvement in record reproduction since the invention of the phonograph.

A NEW KIND of radio-phonograph is here, invented by Philco! Based on an entirely new principle, it brings you new delights in the enjoyment of recorded music and startling improvements in radio reception. Now, the ordinary phonograph that scrapes music from the record, that asks you to change needles, to put up with surface noise and record wear, to lift lids, remove decorations or fuss with clumsy compartments is obsolete.

In the amazing new Philco Photo-Electric Radio-Phonograph, a rounded jewel, that never needs changing, floats gently over the record grooves and reflects the music on a BEAM OF LIGHT from a tiny mirror to a Photo-Electric cell. Record wear and surface noise are reduced by 10 to 1. You can play your most valuable recordings 700 times without fear of wear... 10 times longer than before! And you hear the beauty of your records, rich mellow together with clear brilliant "high" marred by needle scratch.

New Tilt-Front Cabinet. No lid to need to remove decorations, no dark to-get-at compartments. As you tilt the grille, the record turntable appears in full view and easy to use. Only Philco

Make Your Own Records at Home. The Philco Recording Unit is optional equipment with every Philco Photo-Electric Radio-Phonograph. Record your own voices, radio programs; many fascinating uses.

See and hear the new 1941 Philco radio-phonographs and auto radios at your Philco dealer today. Liberal trade-in allowance.

PHILCO 608P. Nine tubes. American and Foreign reception. Automatic record-changer. Eight Electric Push Buttons. Yours for only $12.95 down.

NEW PHILCO RADIOS AND RADIO-PHONOGRAPHS... from $9.95 to $395

PHILCO 255T. The finest table model radio money can buy in tone, performance and beauty. Powerful 9-tube circuit gives amazing sensitivity and selectivity. New kind of Overseas Wave-Band. Eight Electric Push Buttons. Lovely Inclined Panel walnut cabinet. Only $5.95 down.

PHILCO 221C. Brings you Philco's latest features at a record low price. Brand new circuit with new kind of Overseas Wave-Band and new American and Overseas Aerial System. American and Foreign reception. Smart walnut cabinet. Just plug in and play. Only $2.35 down.

PHILCO TRANSITONE 87PT. A compact, powerful 5-tube portable radio that operates on self-contained long-life battery or plug-in to AC or DC house current. Smart, lightweight case, easy to carry. Only $19.95 complete.

PHILCO 280X. One of a wide selection of radio-phonograph designs. Powerful 8-tube circuit, new kind of Wave-Band that brings in Europe 5 times and clearer. Eight Electric Push Buttons. Inclined Panel of highly figured Walnut. No installation. Just plug in and play. Yours for only $6.95 down.

EVERY 1941 PHILCO IS BUILT TO RECEIVE TELEVISION SOUND AND FREQUENCY MODULATION... THE WIRELESS

All the Tricks

By Daniel Fuchs

ILLUSTRATED BY ELMORE BROWN

A young actress discovers that the difference between a clever woman and a really great woman is bridged by love

CHIEFLY it was a concern Jenny Field took with the lighting of any room she entered. An actress, she placed herself on stage and off. She understood that art in the case of a portrait photographer, for example, consisted in diffusion, in a soft lighting. In rooms she was careful to avoid shadows or, if the light was unfavorable, she put herself against its brightest rays so that the eyes seeking her were dazzled and saw those strange colored circles before the texture of her skin. And then, when she spent long hours in front of her mirror, she was almost impersonal in the sure, unerring skill with which she worked over her face. Her hair, back over her head, was a group of little curls. Her eyes, deepened and enlarged by cosmetics, bore long, heavy lashes, and she applied the rouge to her lips with a carefully pointed brush so that the shape of her mouth would certainly be perfect.

Everything with Jenny Field was calculated—each sigh, each liquid chuckle, each relaxed posture, each expression. She coached herself diligently, and when she was with some important producer or movie scout her whole manner became innocently and delightfully flat. It seemed as though she clung to every word the great man said to her. She watched his face with attention and respect, waiting with her lips apart ready at once to laugh, to applaud, to sympathize or to be rebuked.

Sometimes it happened that Eddie, her husband, forgot his absorption in the play he himself was writing. When he noticed her performance he couldn't keep from smiling wryly, but promptly told him not to be foolish. The actress had nothing to sell if it wasn't her appearance, her manner, herself. It meant nothing and it worked. It was how she had managed to get the part, small as it was, in Three Decades. That was how Bill Closswall, the most effective agent on Broadway, had come to take her in hand.

"Yes," Eddie always reminded his wife, laughing, "but Closswall himself said a girl like you never needed an agent to get ahead."

The funny thing was that when the stroke of good fortune came it happened, not to Jenny, but to Eddie in spite of all his naïve, direct ways. That night after the show she was waiting for him at Rocco's, sitting there along with a dozen other bit players and walk-ons in Three Decades. They came there almost every night, monopolizing a corner of the restaurant while they drank Scotch and soda or tall rum drinks and whispered and told one another little lies about themselves. Outwardly everyone here loved everybody else. They needed one another darling and honey and they were all gay and cordial, but lurking underneath with each of them was the secret assurance that he alone or she alone really had the talent and the necessary determination. It was as though each one knew in his heart that he alone would succeed but out of kindness, unwilling to disappoint the others, each one kept the secret to himself.

Eddie was late but Jenny didn't mind. The time passed easily enough as she listened to the talk:

"Oh, yes! Leila Lynn is very clever. She certainly played her cards right. She knew everyone who could help her and then she went off to Hollywood. She made them go all the way to the coast looking for her. That's how she got the part. Make yourself hard to get . . . of course . . ."

"Jed Harris wanted me for his new show; but Jed? He'd make a great actress of me. No question about it. The man's a genius but the way he drives you. He eats the heart out of you before he lets you go on. 'No, Mr. Harris,' I said firmly, 'no, this is one little heart you're not going to break. . . .'"

"Connelly begged me to do the part. He pleaded with me for hours. 'But Marc,' I said, 'Marc, the part is too much for me. It really is. I'm not ready. I'd ruin my whole career. . . .'"

Their careers, Jenny thought, and smiled to herself. She knew the stories they told were half true or untrue altogether. She understood that these kids had to talk so grandly because it brought them hope and comfort. It gave them courage, carrying them along as they waited for their big day. Jenny herself always kept silent. She didn't bother to invent lies. She could wait patiently. She needed no comfort, for deep within her she knew with a faith that never wavered that sooner or later, this season or the next or the one after that, she herself would become famous and great. She knew nothing could stop her.

SHE finally saw Eddie making his way past the tables to her. He walked slowly, not looking where he was going, and he kept bumping into chairs and a waiter or two.

"You're late," she said as he came up. "You've kept me waiting so long." And then she noticed the dreamy happiness in his eyes. The grin on his face was so simple and broad that he looked silly.

"I know I'm late," he said. "I know I am."

Again and again they made a point of saying to her: "Honey, don't you like Rocco's any more? You must be very busy"

Everyone was looking at him in wonder.

"What happened to you?" Jenny asked.

"The jack pot!" he said and held his arms helplessly outstretched. His voice was unsteady: "I've hit the jack pot at last. Jenny, Gordon Bartlett's bought my play!"

For a moment a hush settled over them and Jenny knew that during that moment every one of them was feeling sick and miserable. They were all trying to tell themselves that it wasn't true, that Eddie must be exaggerating, that Gordon Bartlett would never do the show even if he had bought an option on it; and each one was saying to himself, Jenny knew, "Why Eddie Wells, why not me, what has he got that I haven't?" One girl actually forgot herself long enough to pipe out: "But Bartlett's busy with a show already. He's getting Never Say Die ready."

"Yes," Eddie said, his boyish face still flushed with joy. "He's going to produce both shows at the same time. We're going into production in a month."

Suddenly they all found their voices and the affectionate racket arose. They left their chairs and grouped around him, congratulating him, saying how wonderful it was, kissing him while he grew embarrassed out of modesty with his great good luck. He turned to Jenny.

"It's your show," he told her. "I wrote it for you. You know that, Jenny. You're doing it."

"Oh, I couldn't carry a whole play," she protested. "You're precious to say it, Eddie, but it's impossible."

"No, I mean it," he said eagerly. "You do the lead or no one else does. I've told Bartlett about you. I'm bringing you up to see him."

They all looked at her now and their faces were revealing even if they said nothing. Jenny could almost hear them cry out in bitter disappointment within themselves: "Of course, of course! Jenny Field knew what she was doing when she married Eddie Wells. She's smart. She's so shrewd!" That was what they were thinking but Jenny didn't care. She touched her husband's sleeve.

"Eddie," she said quietly, "when does Bartlett want to see me?"

BILL CLOSWALL telephoned her hotel early the next afternoon. By that time he had learned about Bartlett, her husband's play and the leading role in it. Coswall had been on Broadway ever since his fifteenth year and nothing went by him for long.

"When are you seeing Bartlett?"

"Today," Jenny said. "For lunch."

"Right now?" He whistled. "Gee whiz, I don't know why I try to work for you, kid. I ought to leave you strictly to yourself. Listen," he said, his voice growing serious, "if Bartlett wants you for Eddie's play, don't sign anything without talking with me. Don't commit yourself."

"It's ridiculous," she said. "Bartlett's not signing me. I hadn't even given it a thought."

"Yes, you hadn't given it a thought. Honey, I'll believe you." His voice was blurry with sarcasm. "Just don't sign, that's all. I'm saying nothing against Bartlett, but we're all human and you might find yourself all tied up to a piece of paper that means nothing. And besides, I'm still working on that Hollywood job for you. Of course," he said,

"it's kind of pathetic for me to try to scare up a deal for you. I know I'm just wasting my time but what the hell, I like to kid around."

"Don't worry. I won't sign," she said, and hung up.

But when Eddie presented her with happy pride to Bartlett at luncheon, the producer smiled uncomfortably and looked down at the tablecloth. He put his hand on the boy's shoulder.

"No, sonny," he said kindly. "No. I'm sorry." He turned to Jenny. "You'll understand, dear, but the part's just not for you. The show needs a name, the bigger the better."

Whatever she felt, she didn't show it. She remained cool and self-possessed. "Oh, of course," she said, and shrugged her shoulders with cheerful indifference. "It was just Eddie talking. I knew that. I never dreamed of getting the part."

"Now wait a minute, Mr. Bartlett." Eddie was stumbling in dismay. "Last night you said—"

The producer patted his hand and made him stop. "Last night," he said. "The teletype's been busy since last night. Listen. Do you know what you're getting for the lead?" He paused dramatically. "Ina Wynne. Yes," he said, "I'll get Ina Wynne for you. She's tired of pictures. She wants to come east for a play and she's going to do your show."

Jenny was quick to lean over the table close to him. Her eyes shone. "Mr. Bartlett," she said, "that's so wonderful!" Her voice was a bit breathless with sincerity and with admiration too. "Imagine it! Ina Wynne for little Eddie's show. You're doing the biggest thing for him any producer could. Eddie," she said, "isn't it marvelous?"

Bartlett sat back in his chair, with satisfaction, but Eddie was downcast. "Gee, you're swell," he said to Jenny. He had trouble finding words. "I mean, the way you're taking the whole thing. You make me feel like a heel. You're a brick."

"Oh, not me," Jenny said. "It's Mr. Bartlett. He's the one who's doing big things for you." The words were addressed to Eddie but she looked at the producer and when she finished, she let her eyes rest on him with a timid look of awe. Bartlett roused himself and a little laugh.

"Well, I don't know," he said. "The best thing for myself as well as for Eddie. It's just show business."

"Yes," she said. "Of course."

The waiter came up with food, and even as she ate she listened intently. Bartlett allowed himself to grow expansive. In his leisurely, confident manner he told them that the part suited Ina Wynne perfectly, that she'd jump to contracts as soon as she saw the script, that her great personal following would guarantee the play twenty weeks. It was in the bag, he said carelessly. It was one, two, three. Eddie was silent, lost long ago in private dreams and had heard Bartlett talk of smash hits, of millions, of fame, the Pulitzer Prize and success. But Jenny never forgot to keep her eyes on the producer.

BARTLETT wiped his lips and put the napkin on the table. "In the meantime," he said, "there's a whack of work to do on the script. Eddie, you and I, we've got to go over every line, every word. I'm busy afternoons casting and

(Continued on page 31)

Suddenly they all found their voices and the affectionate racket arose. They grouped around him, congratulating him

"All Aircraft Returned Safely"

By Quentin Reynolds

BY RADIO FROM LONDON

Britain's bombers wing their way over thousands of miles each day to cut the arteries that feed the heart of Germany

BRITISH COMBINE

at raid. The big machines receive their bomb loads. Weather is clear the way. "Here are the targets, boys," and we're off and you wait for them to come back. A reporter's inside story of the men and planes who are bombing Hell to Hitler

IE big Whitley, one of England's largest bombing planes, looked harmless enough. She dozed there in the sun, her grotesque camouflage making her look like some weird but not particularly vicious prehistoric animal. Brownie and I walked under the tail of the bomber. In another three minutes Old Brownie was going to climb into the airplane, fly far into Germany and then drop 3,600 pounds of bombs. Old Brownie had very fair hair, very large, gentle, blue eyes and a wisp of a blond mustache, and he wore a slightly apologetic air. He was one of the veterans of this group. That's why they called him Old Brownie. Actually Brownie was just twenty-three.

It was shady and cool under the big monster. The ground crew had just finished "bombing up" the planes. The bombs were lying in two parallel rows. Some were 500-pound bombs, others were 250. They were freshly painted a bright yellow and they looked innocent enough. Brownie explained to me how they would be released. They could be dropped in "sticks" of six or individually. Brownie slapped one of the 500-pound bombs on its fat rump. "Want to send a message to any friends in Germany?" he asked.

I took out a soft pencil and wrote on the bright yellow side of the 500-pound bomb, "with love and kisses" and then under that I signed my name.

"That'll bring you luck, Brownie," I said, and Brownie laughed. We climbed up into the plane and Brownie showed me where he sat. It was a cozy little nest. Ahead of and below the pilot's cubbyhole was another little cubicle. The man who dropped the bombs made this his home. He would lie there on a sliding wooden panel and from there he could look ahead and below. He had a gun there and his bomb sights and a row of buttons to release the bombs. Sometimes he would release them and sometimes the pilot would.

4,000 Shots a Minute

Back of Brownie was a chair for his copilot and a small desk where he did his navigation. This bombing group flew only at night, and on dark nights proper navigation was pretty important. Behind the copilot there was a space for the wireless operator. Then we walked back through the long plane fuselage. There were flares and flare chutes and other paraphernalia of the bomber trade neatly arranged there.

In the very rear was the gun turret. This made the Whitley one of the best of all bombers. The Whitley had a real sting in its tail: four guns that shot 4,000 rounds a minute. The turret revolved so that you could sight a Messerschmitt above you or on either side of you.

We climbed down from the step and Brownie looked at his watch. It was time for getting final instructions. We walked past the other nine planes that were to take part in tonight's raid and went into a building on which there was a sign, "Operations."

Upstairs there was a large room with about sixty chairs and desks in it. There was a blackboard on the front wall and a large desk on a raised platform. It looked like any other schoolroom. It was called the "Briefing" room. Behind the desk, looking at maps, were two men: the squadron leader in charge of tonight's raid and the Intelligence officer.

The pilots and wireless operators and gunners and observers looked a bit astonished when we walked in. It was the first time a civilian had ever been permitted in the "Briefing" room.

The wing commander stood up and (Continued on page 57)

That Sort of Thing

By Margaret Lee Runbeck

FOR ten years there were three of us girls married to the four Rondenham boys. A few months ago, Carl, the youngest boy, got married, and we three sisters-in-law had to take a youngster into our little secret organization.

Mary and I are just toppling over into forty, and Beth says she's thirty-five, and we thought there'd be just we three girls forever. Then Carl married that youngster, Katie Marner, a nice scrubbed-faced looking girl. But frank and tactless.

Mary and I've always said the Rondenham boys were the best husbands we ever had, and that's supposed to be a joke, because of course we've never had any others. But Beth couldn't say as much for Adam, though she did do what she could to cover up the fact that marriage made a pretty sorrowful affair of her life.

Mary and I never talked too much about it. But we both understood that each other knew what Beth had had to put up with.

We both always looked after her, and sort of shielded her from having people in town find out that she wasn't happy, and once in a while we'd say something like this to each other: "Well, whatever else we put up with, at least we got good, considerate men. We ought to make plenty of allowance for poor Beth. . . . What if she is kind of extravagant and lazy. . . . I guess I'd be worse than that if I had to stand that sort of thing."

We never had to ask each other what we meant by "that sort of thing." We didn't even have to say the words out plain in our own minds, but we understood all right.

I remember the first time Beth ever spoke about it to me. We were sewing together, and Beth was saying she simply had to have a vacation by herself.

Beth said, "I'll just go out of my mind if I don't get away for a little while. Even a week." And then she leaned over her sewing and she said, "I guess you don't know what it's like, to be married to a man like Adam. . . ."

"Now, honey," I started saying, "we all get fed up with things sometimes. . . ."

"No," she said, kind of violently, "I knew six hours after I'd married Adam that I'd made a terrible mistake. I knew by nine o'clock that night I'd ruined my life. . . ."

"Why, Beth," I said, and I could feel my face getting scarlet. Of course I never said a word to anybody, but I did do everything I could to make life a little more cheerful for Beth. Then I began noticing that Mary was doing the same thing, and I knew Beth had told her something like she'd told me.

A COUPLE of years later, Beth said practically the same thing to me again, and I could see she didn't remember ever telling me before, and I figured that the only way that happens is when a woman tells a thing to a lot of people. Then I began noticing that a lot of people . . . women, of course . . . were awful nice to Beth, sort of doing little things for her and not expecting much from her, when there was any work to be done and things like that.

I used to look at Adam all those ten years, and I got so I could hardly bear him. I got so I didn't want Sam to spend much time with him. You know how a thing like that grows on you. I could see a lot of people in our town felt like that about Adam.

WELL, then this little Katie Marner married into our family. Beth took up with her right away. First six weeks or so they were thick as thieves, and then all of a sudden Katie didn't seem to have much to do with Beth. I knew something was wrong, because Beth said little slighting things about Katie.

Then one day I asked the girls over to lunch on my porch. We got to talking about one thing and another, and Beth kind of sighed the way she did, and she said, "Well, if I had my life to live over, I know what I'd do."

Mary and I just let that slide along, knowing perfectly well what she meant.

But the younger generation, as I guess they're still being called, isn't like that. Not Katie, anyway. Katie said, "I don't think you ought to say things like that, Beth. They give the wrong impression."

Mary started trying to head it off, and changing the subject. But Katie went right on. "It sounds as if you've got some complaint against Adam. That's what anybody would think."

Beth said, "Well, my dear . . ." and Katie interrupted.

"I know I certainly thought you had some legitimate complaint against Adam when you told me what you did. You said you found out the very first night that you'd made a terrible mistake marrying Adam. . . ."

"Please, Katharine," Beth said, her face getting red and angry. But she didn't seem to care.

"I know if I hadn't had to do as you right out what you meant, I'd certainly have thought it was something pretty bad. . . ."

"Well, it was," Beth said, "for a sensitive girl like me. I cried all night."

"That's because you were a spoiled, silly woman," Katie said. "You ask the girls . . . or maybe they don't know about it."

Mary said, "Never mind, never mind. We'll just talk about some pleasant subject."

"There's nothing the matter with the subject," Katie said. "Beth just has her feelings hurt because Adam thought it was all right for them to sit two hours in the railway station at St. Louis instead of hiring a hotel room while waiting for their train connection. That wasn't it, Beth?"

I guess Mary and I gasped right out. After all those years of thinking what we'd thought!

"That was what you've always meant wasn't it, Beth?" Katie insisted. "It wasn't anything worse than that was it?"

Beth's face was red as a beet. "No," she mumbled. "But that was enough."

I don't know . . . there's something about these youngsters I kind of like. My Sam says they're honestest things are, and I don't know but he's right.

"That's because you were a spoiled, silly woman," Katie said. "You ask the girls"

Big Girl

By Kyle Crichton

PHOTOGRAPH BY IFOR THOMAS

Ingrid Bergman, who is five feet eight inches of very stunning actress, has put all of Hollywood back on its heels

WHEN Ingrid Bergman arrived in New York from Sweden, en route to Hollywood, she decided to do a favor. She was going to "make a surprise"; she was going to land in California speaking such an English as would make old Bostonians livid with envy. So she stayed over in New York for two weeks to see the shows and brush up on such few little adjectives as would aid her.

The first Broadway play she saw was comedy. When the curtain went up, she sat forward eagerly, all prepared to snap up this bright chatter on the fly. At the end of fifteen minutes, she turned angrily to her American companion.

"Oh, you people!" she cried. "Always making jaws. This is Chinese show, is it?"

At the end of a week, she began to distinguish a few words as she sat in one theater after another. Then she tried Robinson's swing version of The Girl and came out crushed.

"You need not say that was English stage!" she cried.

However, they bolstered her up. They pointed out that in Intermezzo she would be sitting opposite Leslie Howard, who spoke an English of such clarity and that little deaf-mutes sat enraptured at his feet.

This may have been true enough, but she ran into other difficulties. She arrived at the Selznick studio just as they were finishing Gone With the Wind. To Ingrid Bergman the sweet sounds of the plantation came to her like the soothing words of a Tibetan brave moon to his mate. Quite content to call it a day at this point and retreat to Stockholm, she was restrained by the promise that everything would be adjusted when shooting on the picture began. She would be speaking only the lines of the part and the other actors would be the same.

She smiled gratefully and hurried in her first day and ran into a major disaster. The director was to be none other than Mr. Gregory Ratoff, the ex-Russian-minnesinger. Mr. Ratoff, as is well known, speaks in an English that can be described as a combination of Chaucer, Minsk, Pinsk and late Al Jolson, Oklahoma.

Among the first lines she had to say was "I am glad to meet you, Mr. Ratoff."

"Il Yi!" cried Mr. Ratoff. "Soch han excellent! Deez way, say heet . . . 'I am glad zu mit you, Meester Brunt.'" The ensuing turmoil was frightening. Leslie Howard tried to put in a gentle word of protest at this desecration of his native tongue. Mrs. Rooney, Ingrid's language teacher, came forward in a dead lope, waving her arms frantically. Mr. Ratoff, thus beleaguered, roared even louder: "Soch han hawk-Il Yi! Yi!"

(Continued on page 28)

Waikiki Mirage

By Hagar Wilde

A lively imagination does its best to create a romance. Then true love does a lot better

ILLUSTRATED BY EARL OLIVER HURST

ONE would never have suspected, to look at Virginia Howard, that she had led an unusually adventurous life. It is hard to picture a girl of eighteen being the heroine of countless sea, air and land disasters or of breaking the hearts of famous and distinguished men in all walks of life. Politicians had fallen beneath her spell, famous actors had pleaded with her on their knees and, failing, had given up their careers and taken to drink.

Virginia slipped into the skins of other people with the ease of a pickpocket extracting a wallet from the hip pocket. She had been Wallis Simpson at the time of the threatened abdication. Unlike Wallis, Virginia had nobly renounced her love for the good of England. So far as Virginia was concerned, Edward still reigned over Great Britain, hiding his tears beneath a busby.

It was being Nurse Cavell that finally got her in the soup. After six days of watching Virginia pad about radiating goodness, patience and resignation, her mother said to Virginia's father, "I cannot stand seeing the child mope any longer," and called the doctor.

Since it was impossible, with a stethoscope, to detect Nurse Cavell, and Virginia was not forthright enough to produce the lady, Dr. Burke diagnosed a run-down condition and recommended a sea voyage. Thus Nurse Edith Cavell was posthumously responsible for Virginia's being packed off to Honolulu to join John Hillary Crawford the Third and his mother. At the time, she was wearing John's fraternity pin. One of her minor visions dealt with the time when, wearing black and very pale, she would return it. Taking the pin off, she would say, "My dear, how sorry I am . . . but I have met my real love."

John never acted satisfactorily in this vision. He just took the pin and stood there looking at it. Sometimes he said, "Oh, you've just got the vapors." Skipping this part of the vision, Virginia pursued her own role. With a weary smile she said, "I was such an inexperienced child, John." The dream had to end there because nothing she could do in the way of concentration would make John say anything but "All right," and pocket the pin.

During her first evening in Honolulu, at the Royal Palms Hotel, four dusky young women entertained the assembled tourists with hula. Like a flash Virginia was back home at a party. A strange, handsome young man had been lounging in the doorway all evening, watching her. When the radio started playing Hawaiian music, Virginia, with a gay laugh, went into the most graceful of hulas. When she stopped, the young man came toward her impulsively, saying, "I have spent many years in Hawaii . . . I've traveled extensively, of course . . . and I must tell you. You dance like a native."

Here John leaned forward to tap her arm. "Want to wrestle?" With quiet scorn Virginia allowed him to pilot her body to the dance floor, but her mind was taking hula lessons.

ON THE day of the second lesson, her muscles were stiff but she was still determined. "Step, step, step, turn. Step, step, step, turn." Virginia faced Miss Lillian Dexter and they danced. That is, Miss Dexter writhed helpfully, hopefully and encouragingly while Virginia jerked her hips with a deplorable lack of grace. She ached all over. Her fond hope had been that after two lessons Miss Dexter would give in gracefully saying, "You don't need lessons, my dear. You seem to do the hula instinctively."

Now Virginia was moving gracefully and instinctively but not enough. Miss Dexter, her face a study in patient pain, intoned to the music, "Hips, hips, hips, Miss Howard. Throw them out!"

Virginia gave her hips more freedom—and became aware of an audience of one. In a clean but frayed shirt rolled down at the neck and up at the sleeves a dark, handsome young man leaned in the doorway regarding her with distinct disapproval. He had a gardenia behind one ear. Virginia's swaying halted abruptly. Her rapt gaze drew Miss Dexter's attention to Mike. She said, "Hello."

"I've come for the thingamajigs," he said.

"I'll get them." Miss Dexter disappeared and the victrola whined on, "It isn't Waikiki, not Kamehameha's Pali . . ."

The young man said: "That was awful. You're supposed to move in a rotary fashion, you know, not back and forth like a shuttle."

Miss Dexter returned with lots of flattened Japanese lanterns in gay colors with black rims. The young man took them and went away whistling.

Virginia said, "Who was that?"

"A boy I know," Miss Dexter said. "Why?"

"What does he do?"

"Swims, fishes and surfs mostly," said Miss Dexter. "Why?"

"A beachcomber!" Virginia breathed, and Miss Dexter laughed.

"Shall we go through it just once more?" she said.

Virginia reached for her shoes hastily. "I feel very tired," she said. A beachcomber. A derelict. She strained her eyes to see the last of the human flotsam and jetsam swinging happily down the street juggling Japanese lanterns and wearing one as a hat.

Leaving the studio, she walked down Kalakaua Avenue in a daze. A broken love affair had done this to him. A woman not worthy of the name had betrayed his trust and he had come to the islands to forget. He would have to be nursed back to faith in people very gently, to learn that all women were not false . . . that some women were . . . angels. The angels bore a remarkable resemblance to Virginia.

John, waiting for her in the lobby, didn't know she was an angel. He clutched at her as he would have at an earth maiden and said, "Let's eat."

Full of pity for John (who was going to get his fraternity pin back any minute now) Virginia gazed out of her window while she dreamily massaged soap into her hands. Her beachcomber was standing at the entrance to the Outrigger Club with a surfboard under his arm. While she watched he ran down to the water's edge, launched the board and started paddling out toward the breakers.

At luncheon, Virginia regarded John purposefully.

Presently she threw it right in his teeth. "After lunch we're going surfing."

John's inherent caution came to fore with an incautious rush: "I think you think we should take some lessons first?"

"It's very simple," Virginia said quietly. "You get a board and get out. You paddle out with your hands. Then you sit on the board and a wave comes along and carries you in." She added as an afterthought: "Then you stand up."

John's mother said doubtfully, "I seem to go awfully fast."

"Live dangerously," Virginia said. "If I were a man . . ."

John, politely helpful in his own instruction, said, "If you were a man, what?"

Virginia's voice was fierce: "I do just everything. I'd fight and I'd cross the ocean in little boats just to prove I could and I'd fly airplanes up and down."

By such unfair means Virginia had always prodded John into risking his limb and sanity. He agreed simply to get on a board, paddle out and wait for a wave to do the rest.

An hour and a half later the wave indeed did the rest. An exhausted John had swung the board around to face Waikiki. The wave approached from the other direction, rose under them like a volcanic eruption, the board took an unpleasant personality of its own, first whirling like a roulette wheel and then sulkily diving for the bottom. John and Virginia. Virginia foundered self struggling under masses of water. Her past life did not review itself. She was just mad. Kicking viciously but ineffectively, she dropped like a plummet. Then as suddenly as she had dropped some force from below came her shove and she shot up again taking fearfully of the number of boards on the surface and their accumulated weight. It was not a pleasant thought.

HER head popped up into a pea of sea, a long brown arm swooped over and lifted her bodily by the straps of her bathing suit and plumped her onto a surfboard, holding her steady while she coughed and spat up seawater. "Don't you do anything while I'm behind his ear." Mike Lester said. The gardenia was still behind his ear.

Virginia quavered, "How can I thank you for saving my life?"

"Nonsense. I just hauled you out."

"You're being modest. I owe you my life." Her eyes were red-rimmed and swollen. He laughed and said, "You oughtn't to come out in this surf. It's dangerous." Then he looked over where they were hauling John over the prow of an outrigger canoe. "The boy's all right. Willi got him. I'll take you in." He looked over his shoulder, watching the approaching swell and caught himself yelling, "Don't be afraid!" When they were underway he lifted her to her feet and, as though she were a doll, hoisted her to his shoulders.

From that point on, John Hillary Crawford the Third was a dead pilot.

When the speed of the board slowed down to a float her beachcomber lifted her gently into the water. "You wade from here. Don't come out without a beach boy."

Virginia said gravely, "I owe you a debt I can never repay. If you should ever need me . . ."

Me Lester swung his board around back. "I'll be sure to let you nov' he said, as gravely—and paddled wa.
Ti outrigger boy Willi unloaded Virginia's feet. She gazed at John reaily and said, "My poor John."
ohr was mad. He said, in a piping oice "You just sit on the board and the av does the rest," and started wading to shore.

Virginia sighed. Poor John, still a Still small, still petty. Some day they were both older she would him, "In that moment you lost ca would say, "I know . . . now when so late. I've never married be-nothing could ever mean anything after knowing you."

haps she would name her first John. After she married there always be an extra place for him table; the guest room would al-be waiting for him. A funny feel-ent down her back. An extra
What kind of a place, a banana
When a beachcomber's wife pre-the guest room did she just give est a piece of tapa cloth and dig oter hole in the sand? All at once she ck. She sat down to think it over.

ANWHILE John, who had gone way, was saying balefully to his ter, "Right flat on my belly.
osed the wind clean out of me. If lug-nutty dame . . ."

"Don't say that!" said Mrs. Crawford.
That not quite well-balanced dame
I'll put up with just everything slug-nutty," said John. "I want aternity pin back and I want to live
it."

"Little Virginia is only a child," said Mrs. Crawford.

le Virginia hove into view. Obvi-something was on her mind. Just curiously it was not John because she d him and went into the hotel with-en seeing him.

"John said indignantly. "First es to kill me and then stops speak-because I don't like it."

ould she have been struck on the Mrs. Crawford murmured. "I'd go up, I think." Ellen Crawford ot too old to have visions of her This one was of Virginia lying on d blind from the blow on the head surfboard. She imagined herself ning to Virginia's mother.

ested of her bathing suit, Virginia standing quite naked in the center room saying dramatically, "Your e shall be my people, whither thou ou . . . go I will . . ." when Mrs.
ord poked a neatly coiffed head in porway.

eciting?" Mrs. Crawford said.

ginia scrambled for her robe.
of." She pondered whether or o share this world-shaking probwith Mrs. Crawford. Mrs. Crawwas a woman of the world. She ed and drank cocktails. Perhaps ad been in love at one time. If she t she'd read about it. Naturally adn't felt what Virginia was feel-because that was a special kind of
To some extent, of course, it was nemy camp. Not that dear old could ever properly be called an y, but even a modern mother might at the prospect of conniving to her son's heart. The urge to talk, ver, was great.

rs. Crawford," Virginia said, "sup-you knew a man who had been
(Continued on page 59)

g brown arm swooped down and ped her onto a surfboard. "Don't do anything well?" Mike said

WHEN you turn on the lights in Collier's House of Ideas, you're aware of a pleasant glow and interesting shadows. There's plenty of general light and reading light. You can see in the closets, work at the kitchen counter, or spotlight a favorite picture. Yet you're not particularly aware of the sources of this light. It doesn't depend on a lamp on every table, with straggling cords to stumble over. Lighting fixtures are inconspicuous.

This is so because the lighting, like the furnishing, has been planned to be a part of the house, rather than stuck in afterward. Planning in the blueprint stage this way makes for economy as well as efficiency in lighting. So Edward Stone, architect for the house; Dan Cooper, designer of the interiors; and Kurt Versen, designer of the lighting, got together before construction started, and lighting ideas began to spark.

Take the many-purpose room. This is a room that is meant to be all things at different times. You want good illumination for games, special light at the dining end, good general and reading light for the guest-room part when that is shut off by itself. The old system of a chandelier over the table, a few wall brackets that look more or less like candles and give just as little light, and some lamps here and there, wouldn't do. They'd get all tangled up with your ping-pong backhand, and you'd have light in your eyes rather than where you want it.

So first Mr. Versen sank three small spotlights in the ceiling, entirely out of the way. These are simple, inexpensive versions of the pinhole light. Each is an asbestos-lined pocket in the ceiling, fitted with a 60-watt bulb and aluminum reflector and capped with a lens at the opening which can be adjusted by sliding up or down, to concentrate the light or fan it out as you wish. Two of these are placed right where they will do the most good when ping-pong is in session. The third lights the dining table.

More general illumination comes from a trough of light above the bookshelves. A four-inch panel extends down from the ceiling the length of the shelves, concealing tubes of fluorescent light that is projected toward the books and down, giving you plenty of light to read by.

Notice how this lighting has been built in. It's an architectural part of the house, put where it is needed and adaptable enough for various uses. Yet there's nothing complicated about it, nothing you couldn't do someplace else. You'll see all through Collier's House how light has been made a part of the house in this simple, easy-to-do way.

Above the serving table-bar-breakfast counter at the other end of the room, for instance, is fluorescent lighting, coming through a translucent glass panel which is supported by a grid of wood. Easy and inexpensive.

Fluorescent light has a cool look to it. Incandescent light is on the warmer, yellow side. Mr. Versen likes the effect of mixing the two in a room. Pleasant for your electric bills, too, since you get three times the light for each cent the fluorescent way.

In the living room, instead of ceiling light and lamps, a new breed of wall light, popular in Sweden, takes on the job of general illumination as well as local. It's a light with an opaque shade on a flexible arm. Twist it up, for indirect lighting from the ceiling when you like. Turn it down and around till it throws the best light on your book. You can adjust it for height so that you can take your reading sitting up straight, instead of crouching over as you so often have to under a table lamp.

There's one at the fireplace, with enough range to take care of reading on the sofa or lighting the plants on the trellis behind the sofa. A second one serves the other corner at that end of the room. The shades of these lights are enameled a brownish red, to tone in with the colors in the room, proving that Mr. Versen means it when he says lighting fixtures are intended to give light, not to call attention to themselves.

At either end of the built-in couch under the front windows is a neat, little built-in light with revolving cup shade, like the reading lights on an airplane. They are meant to be supplemented by some general illumination in the room as all reading light should be, so that your eye is not strained by too-sharp contrasts of light and shadow.

Patterns for Brightness

At the hall end of this couch is the coat closet, which is not built all the way to the ceiling. This provides a partition for privacy, yet gives you a greater sense of spaciousness by not boxing the hall off completely. It also gives you a chance for a bright lighting idea. The top of this free-standing closet is two translucent sheets of glass, with bulb between. There's light for your closet, and light diffused up to the ceiling for a soft entrance illumination.

More hall and stairway light comes from lumiline tubes on the stair wall, with adjustable metal reflector shades. Turn one up, the next down, for a pattern of light up the stairway.

At the entrance to the house the eaves overhang, giving shelter at the door. On the broad undersurface of the eaves, outside the living-room window, three lights are sunk flush, the openings covered with prismatic lenses that diffuse that light.

The same flush ceiling light is used in the kitchen. It gives a good, strong light, but diffuses it so that you aren't actually aware of its intensity. That means a good light to work by, and no

(Continued on page 30)

Below, left: Dining table lighted by a spotlight sunk in the ceiling, capped by a lens that can be adjusted up or down to concentrate out the light. Below, right: The bunks in the boy's room have reading lights. Small, tube-shaped bulbs silvered on one end, set into reflector pockets, fitted with spring contact clips, they can be twisted any way to direct light and still keep electric connection.

LIGHTS ON!

By Ruth Carson

In Collier's House of Ideas there are no cords to stumble over, no lamps to take up valuable floor and table space—the lights are where and how they should be. Switch them on and see

Left: Wall-bracket light in the living room, all set for reading. You can twist the flexible arm up when you want general light, reflected from the ceiling, or turn it back to give your plants a little night sun. Note warm color of shade, in place of cold metal. Left, below: Entrance to Collier's House on the terrace 630 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Prismatic glass, sunk flush in the overhanging eaves, diffuses light

Left, above: Two lights are enough for the girl's room, and they take up no floor or table space. Wall light swings between bed and chair. Ceiling light serves desk and dressing table. Both can be turned up for general lighting. Left: Similar ceiling light over boy's desk

AIR POWER

By Sherman H. Dryer

RADIO DIRECTOR
THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

VALENTINO SARRA

Here's what makes a good radio campaign speaker. See how much of it Roosevelt and Willkie have

THE best vote-getting machine of this 1940 election will not be run by the Kelly-Nash boys or the Wall Street moguls—it will, instead, be controlled by average citizens with good ears and an inclination to sit home nights. The machine, obviously, is the radio—and it will win votes for those candidates who can win attention.

Radio presence has replaced baby-kissing for politicians.

In Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Willkie, radio has found the personality politicians who will do for campaign broadcasts what the Fred Allen-Jack Benny feud has done for variety broadcast. Both Mr. Willkie and Mr. Roosevelt can wag a nice tongue, as the saying goes; they both sound as if they mean what they're saying.

Mr. Roosevelt's voice is like honey syrup oozing through the steel filter that jackets the microphone.

Mr. Willkie's voice, on the other hand, is more like Vermont maple. Not as sweet, perhaps, but about as rich. . . .

Yet there are further and fundamental differences between these two gentlemen as radio personalities than meet the ear at first impact. And these differences, whether you know it or not, will to no small extent affect your reactions to each man, and hence will affect your vote.

Mr. Roosevelt is the glamor boy of radio campaigning. The word has spread that a microphone to him is what a snake is to an Indian fakir—something to charm. But Mr. Roosevelt's reputation as a dulcet Democrat is based on more than the simple fact that his political opponents (to date) have been raucous Republicans.

Mr. Roosevelt, for one thing, is not a "punchy" speaker. His vocal tones caress the microphone, smoothly and tenderly. He hits no high "peaks" on the engineer's control board. He has what the control engineer calls "a good level."

A good level is very important to radio speakers. It means that the engineer does not have to control your volume as you speak, and thereby fade you in and out like a lost echo running up and down a canyon.

As you "punch" a mike, the engineer must cut down the volume. The speaker momentarily sounds as if he were way off in the distance. The intimacy between him and you is lost. He's no longer in your living room: he's across the street. In radio, this is called poor mike perspective.

Elmer Davis, the popular CBS news analyst, has a level as smooth as the wake of a drifting canoe. So has Raymond Gram Swing, the basso profundo of the Mutual network.

H. V. Kaltenborn, NBC's cacophonous commentator, on the other hand, throws his words at a microphone with the speed and impact of machine-gun bullets. However, you seldom hear his voice fading and swelling because—being the voice of an experienced radio speaker—its highest register (loudest volume) seldom approximates the danger level of 100; the engineer merely "flutters" the voice on a narrow but erratic range in the lower register.

Only an Expert Should "Punch"

As one who has produced many dramatized broadcasts, I must admit that a fluctuating voice may, in fact, be the most interesting kind of voice—one with shading, color and emotional quality. But—only when the punching is done deliberately by a person trained in radio technique, as an actor.

Most political campaigners, unlike these experienced radiators, have tongues and lungs that are punchy drunk. The misconception persists in political circles that a good holler demonstrates political leadership; ergo, hell-raising speech is a vote-raising speech.

Wendell Willkie's voice is high "peaks" on the control board and each time the engineer has to cut the volume.

Actually, a punchy speech makes listening because your eardrums feel as if Gene Krupa was doing a swing performance of Tiger Rag on them. Hence, a punchy speech may lose listeners—and a listener lost may vote lost. That is why a level voice is less than a level head is required of candidates today.

I have checked Mr. Willkie's and Mr. Roosevelt's voices on the control board through the network lines that run to my studio. Mr. Willkie punches the needle a little too much—registering between 35 and 100, the levels you probably would have—the levels of a not yet experienced radio speaker. This results in a sharply fluctuating level at which voice rises and falls for emphasis, the needle, for a moment, wavers back and forth like a metronome beating for a jam session.

Will Willkie Become a Smoothie?

Mr. Roosevelt, however, registers a pretty consistent 80 on the control board. This is the clue that Mr. Roosevelt is well trained in microphone technique, for his is the level of a radio professional.

Whether Mr. Willkie will become a smoothie on the air remains to be seen. I have had enough to do with training public figures on the air to make outdoor speeches and audiotape speeches to large groups of people that not help one's radio technique. The more studio speaking Mr. Willkie does, the better "professional" broadcast he will be—the better radio presence he will have.

Mr. Willkie's acceptance speech is a case in point. For Mr. Willkie was caught between the task of addressing tens of thousands of people at an outdoor rally, and the need of maintaining a good level for the radio. With the inevitable result: he tightened his throat, shouted from his throat instead of from his lungs. Eight times his voice cracked and even people wearing Willkie buttons, who sat with me at the Columbia Broadcasting System's New York studios, shook their heads sadly.

Take the case of Alf Landon: Peckinpah Jim Farley knows the major reason why Mr. Landon lost the 1936 election but the boys in my league know he played a big part.

Or the case of Herbert Hoover, whose radio "projection" does not lack a certain dignity and clarity, yet, in effect, like a muffled drum ominously and notatiously thumping out a beat for Salvation Army rally.

But Mr. Roosevelt has radio sense other than a good level. For example, he has developed a technique of speaking that permits him to project a distinctive kind of personality. This is the technique of pause and reiteration.

Let's see how it operates. Here's a paragraph from the Charlotte speech:

"Perception of danger to our institutions may come slowly or it may come with a rush and a shock as it has in the people of the United States in the few months. This perception of danger—danger in a world-wide arena—has come to us clearly and overwhelmingly. We perceive the peril in this world arena—an arena which may become so narrow that only the Americans

(Continued on page 51)

Belgian civilians greeted the entry of British soldiers with joy. A few days later these same people were crowding the roads in a desperate flight to escape the war

What Happened to France

By André Maurois

TRANSLATED BY DENVER LINDLEY

The Germans trick the Allies into revealing their plans to repulse invasion. . . . The author, close to both Allied general staffs, is dismayed by the defense weaknesses. He is sent to London to appeal for help

ACME

WHY THE GERMAN OFFENSIVE WAS SO QUICKLY SUCCESSFUL

AT THE beginning of May, 1940, I went to the French front to visit the Ninth Army, the one commanded by General Corap, which a few days later was to break under the battering-ram blows of the Panzer divisions. The general staff of that army was installed in the little village of Vervins, an old market town with sleepy streets and half-closed shutters, whose rough cobblestones resounded to the hurried tread of military men walking to their posts with the peaceful punctuality of civil servants. On the evening of my arrival I said in a letter to my wife: "I have found good men here, but they are rather old and moss-backed. . . ."

General Corap was a timid man, unmilitary in appearance and running to fat around the middle. He had trouble rolling his puttees and trouble getting into his uniform. His conversation was interesting, but one felt that his attention was directed wholly toward the past. He told me how, at the time of Fachoda, he had been mobilized against England as a young second lieutenant; and how in 1925 in Morocco he had captured the rebel Abd-el-Krim. This latter affair had been the peak of his career and, in the face of the task which now confronted the general, this peak seemed a molehill. I visited the troops outside Fourmies and Charleville and was struck by their lack of numbers. Returning to Vervins, I had the feeling of traversing an abandoned country. As the car rolled from one uninhabited village to another I could not keep from thinking of an invading army. How little trouble it would have had, once the frontier was crossed, in advancing as far as Vervins! And what would it have found at the entrance to the town? Wooden barriers that a child could have knocked down, a sentinel with a fixed bayonet and a police officer. That was not enough to stop an armored division.

The truth was that the general disposition of the Franco-English troops did not meet the requirements of the new war as they had been made clear in the Spanish campaign, nor even the eternal requirements of any war.

How were our troops actually arranged? The necessity of guarding a very long frontier had led the high command to establish a kind of thin ribbon from Dunkerque to Menton. This formation of troops in a line was a survival of the war of 1914. In that campaign it had been possible to maintain it for a long time because the enemy did not have at his disposal means sufficient to break our lines. But it had been condemned as extremely dangerous by all the great soldiers of history. They had been unanimous in advising an arrangement in depth, and above all the formation of a mass of mobile reserves, able, in case the enemy pierced the first line, to counterattack or to close the breach.

But in 1940 because our effectives were miserably inadequate we possessed practically no body of mobile reserves. Our best troops were along the frontier. If the enemy cracked that line the rest of the country would become scarcely more than a parade ground for him. No doubt he would encounter numerous towns on the way. But who would defend them? The idea of a frontal attack—advancing very slowly, a few kilometers a day at most, as in 1914, and quickly forming vulnerable salients—was so deeply embedded in everyone's mind that no one had even thought of worrying about the defense of Douai or Vervins or Abbeville or Amiens.

THE colonels and the generals in command of these places, close though they were to the front, were amiable old men who had long since been retired from active service and had been recalled at the outbreak of the war to be entrusted with posts that the army considered administrative sinecures. Never had these honest bureaucrats, submerged as they were under waves of papers, considered what they would do if enemy tanks or motorcyclists, armed with machine guns, should present themselves at the gates of their citadel.

This situation was all the more serious because these villages behind the front and the railways that connected them constituted the lines of communication of our armies. The British army could be supplied by the railway line Amiens-Arras-Douai-Lille or at need by the line Abbeville-Boulogne. But if these lines were severed that army would find itself completely cut off from its bases. Its storehouses of food, equipment and munitions had been established at Le Havre, Chartres and Nantes; its advanced depots were in the region of Abbeville, Saint-Pol and Arras. What would happen to it if the enemy broke through the front and disrupted the communications between these depots and the armies? Clearly the latter, within a very few days, would be without food and shells. But what had the high command done to ward off this danger? What steps had they taken to stop an attack that would come not from the front but from the side? Exactly none.

And even if it had been deliberately decided to stake the whole Allied cause on a single card, the front line, then this line should have been held at all costs. Although it was not very strong, it did exist. In March and April great excavating machines, brought over from England, had been in operation on the British front digging antitank ditches much more formidable than those whose inadequacy had alarmed me in October, 1939. But the action that seems the height of human folly, after spending eight months in building blockhouses, was to abandon, at the first move of the enemy, all these fortifications, constructed at such great pains and expense, in order to engage in open country in the most hazardous of pitched battles.

"In this war the first one who comes out of his shell will be in great danger. . . ." It was General Gamelin whom I once heard make this statement. And so it is probable that this fatal sortie was not according to his wishes but rather was forced upon him by political considerations. It had certainly been prepared for a long time. For months I had seen the general staffs studying in detail "The Advance into Belgium" and carefully rearranging their marching orders in order to gain five minutes in their timetables on that day when the king of the Belgians should summon us. It had been calculated that the resistance of the Belgian army would give us time to occupy a line from Antwerp to Namur. General Giraud was to rush ahead as far as Bréda. The Germans themselves knew exactly what our movements would be in the event they invaded Belgium, for we had been obliging enough to hold a rehearsal under their very eyes.

It happened this way. One day a German airplane landed in Belgium. This plane carried officers of the general staff and a complete plan for the invasion of Belgium on a specified date. The German officers made a pretense of trying to burn their documents but they were careful not to succeed. We were immediately informed, and the British army was put in state of readiness No. 3, then No. 2, then No. 1—this last meaning that it must be prepared to march within two hours. Immense troop movements then took place, all the reserves advanced to the frontier, and the Germans, from the height of their reconnaissance planes, observed and recorded them, probably both delighted and amazed at the success of a stratagem that was at once so old and so palpable.

Naturally no invasion took place at this time, the Belgians did not summon us, and our divisions returned to their points of (Continued on page 53)

Aubrey's deep, delightful voice was soft and packed with meaning. Campion got the impression that Amanda was a trifle flustered.

Traitor's Purse

By Margery Allingham

ILLUSTRATED BY ELMORE BROWN

The Story Thus Far:

WAKING in a hospital room, Albert Campion is bewildered—he has no idea of his own identity, or of why he is in the hospital! However, he overhears himself accused of seriously injuring a policeman and, in his confused state of mind, determines to flee until he can recollect the circumstances more fully. He starts down the hospital corridor, undetected, but has to resort to a fireman's costume, which he finds in a hall closet, to disguise himself. But in taking the costume, he sets off the fire-alarm system. In the resulting confusion, he flees from the building, but not before he is stopped momentarily by an attractive girl. He eludes her and escapes finally in a coupé parked before the building.

He speeds down the highway, only to discover that he is being followed by another car. When his car at last breaks down, the other car draws up. In it are two occupants—Mr. Anscombe, an old man who seems to know him, and the beautiful girl who spoke to him in the hospital corridor!

He learns, from the girl, (who seems to know him very well) that he is Albert Campion, and that they're on the way to a dinner engagement.

On the way, they drop Mr. Anscombe at his home. Discovering that the old man has left a package in the car, Campion follows the path after him, but on further consideration of his own eccentric fireman's costume decides to avoid being seen in the light. He merely leaves the package on the doorstep.

Later, when they arrive at the home of Aubrey, their host, Campion finds his clothes laid out on the bed in preparation for the evening. And during the evening, he has one clear recollection, in which he knows that he has met the girl, Amanda, and that she belongs to him.

A short time later, he receives a letter which has been saved for him, from a Scotland Yard official, in which he learns that he is commissioned with a highly important secret mission—which he cannot remember. But he has no time to ponder the matter, just before dinner is announced, they arrive to question him. They announce that Mr. Anscombe has been found dead—derided—in his garden!

Albert and Amanda are the last two people to have seen him alive!

ferent types and standards, a diplomat among rooms, gracious and superior, capable of stimulating as well as of subduing, but none of its charm cut much ice with the man who stood waiting for them as he warmed the backs of his legs before the open fire.

Campion knew he was a county C.I.D. superintendent the moment he set eyes on him. He knew that as surely and in the same inspirational way that he had known Amanda's name or where to find a cigarette in the car. There was no mistaking that tall, bright-eyed, smiling superiority combined with a meticulous physical neatness. This last was a muscular and sartorial spit-and-polish, almost naval in its perfection. The stranger was the country policeman at his highest, an impressive specimen anywhere.

Aubrey, whose gaucherie had given place to remarkable energy apparently engendered by the emergency, thrust his visitor forward.

"Superintendent Hutch," he said briefly. "This is Mr. Campion, Hutch. Here we are. What can we do?"

"That's a question, isn't it?" said the superintendent, revealing an unexpectedly soft country accent, and Campion, glancing up sharply, became aware of the brightest eyes he had ever met smiling into his own with a startling intensity of horse sense behind them.

THE remark was clearly not intended to be taken on its face value. For an appalling instant it occurred to Campion that he had been betrayed and that Aubrey had got him to come quietly by a pretext. His face became wooden and he waited, his hands in his pockets, for the next move.

When it came it surprised him. Superintendent Hutch laughed a little. He might almost have been embarrassed. Glancing down at a disreputable piece of paper in his hand he said formally, "You are Mr. Campion, are you, sir?"

"It's a hundred to one I am." Campion did not say the words aloud but they came into his mind involuntarily and he smiled, only to freeze a moment later. The superintendent, catching his expression, had echoed the grin, secretly, alarmingly. His manner then became uncomfortably informal and he spoke as important policemen are apt to speak to cornered delinquents, affably and as if they were part of the family.

"I just want a brief account of your last meeting with the deceased," he said cheerfully. "Where did you leave him and when?"

He had a jaunty manner which sat well on his slightly comical countryman's face, with the long duck's-bill nose. He was evidently a local character and was very sure of himself.

Campion took the plunge without a pause. Hesitation, he felt instinctively, was death.

"I last saw Anscombe at his own gate," he began glibly. "We'd come from—er—the town."

"What town?"

HE HAD not the least idea. The shaky hands spread out before him and he wavered.

"I think we ought to have Amanda here."

"Amanda, sir?"

"Yes, my fiancée, Miss . . ." The hopeless pitfall loomed too late.

Lee Aubrey was staring at him but his surprise was not at Campion's astounding ignorance.

"I had rather hoped to keep Lady Amanda out of this as long as possible," he said briefly. He showed his annoyance and there was a suggestion of color on his high cheekbones.

Lady Amanda? Lady Amanda who? The utter hopelessness of the situation might have defeated Campion at that moment, had it not been for Aubrey's irritation. Who was Lee Aubrey to spare Amanda? What was this blasted proprietary talk? Damn him and his chivalry.

"Ah, yes, of course, my mistake. That will be Lady A. Fitton, won't it?" murmured the superintendent, glancing down at the slip in his hand.

"No. It's Lady Amanda. As the sister of a peer she takes her Christian name." Aubrey gave the snippet of information casually and the touch of schoolmaster came oddly from him. "Lady Amanda was driving this afternoon. She gave Mr. Anscombe a lift into Coachingford when she went to meet Mr. Campion off the London express. They were delayed and didn't get back until just after eight. These are the brief facts. Mr. Campion can give you anything else you need, I think. You won't need to trouble her at all, will you?"

The last words were barely a question. He spoke with the complete assurance of authority.

The superintendent shifted his weight. He was not a young man and there was a deal of experience in his long head. Campion, who had been sidetracked momentarily by the two valuable names "Fitton" and "Coachingford" was not impressed by his hesitation and it dawned on him that as Principal of the Bridge Institute Aubrey was no ordinary power in the land.

"I think I ought to see her, sir, if you don't mind." Superintendent Hutch's soft voice was apologetic and he had a shy way of grinning, as if he knew a secret joke.

Campion, who was not at all sure that he had not, found the habit disconcerting.

Lee Aubrey clearly found his insistence astounding. He swung around on the policeman:

"Mr. Anscombe died naturally, surely?"

Hutch looked uncomfortable. "We're not absolutely certain, sir. He didn't do it himself, that's one sure thing. The chief constable is on his way over now. More I can't say, can I?"

"Good Lord!" Aubrey thrust his hands into the pockets of his loose dinner jacket. Then he whistled and stood for a moment irresolute, staring at the blank wall.

At length he turned abruptly. "I'll fetch her," he said. "Mr. Campion will tell you all he can. Apart from everything else this is rather unpleasant, the man lived on the Institute estate."

He went out, leaving Campion with the two policemen. Hutch said nothing. He stood studying his notes, his head bent earnestly over the small bundle of old envelopes and loose half-sheets of paper on which he appeared to have made them. His hesitation was unnerving. Campion was fully alive to the dangers of his position. Any question about the drive home from Coachingford must, if he stuck to the story Amanda had told Anscombe, introduce the suicidally dangerous subject of hospitals. It was the delay he dreaded most. He was getting a sufficiently clear angle on himself to realize that whatever he might or might not have done, it was no ordinary, straightforward crime of violence, and, meanwhile, there was clearly something of importance for him to do, and to do immediately, if he could get some sort of line on what it was.

What troubled him particularly was that he had a growing conviction that he had been nearing success when disaster had overtaken him. There was a sensation of discovery in the back of his consciousness, an impression that things were moving. Moreover, the curtain between this misery of ignorance and a very clear vision indeed was tantalizingly thin.

Hutch was looking at him with his now familiar half-smile. He was waiting as though he expected Campion to speak first. The man who could not remember took a deep breath.

"How did Anscombe die?" he inquired.

The policeman grinned. There was no other word for the terrifying secret leer which spread over his face.

"We were going to ask you about that, Mr. Campion," he said.

IN THE moment of paralyzed silence that followed, the step in the doorway behind them came as a merciful release to Campion, and the brisk new voice sounded comfortingly commonplace. "Hello, Super. Mr. Aubrey here? Oh, it's you, is it, Campion? What a bad business, eh?"

It was the greeting of a familiar, anyway, and Campion turned toward the newcomer anxiously. He saw a heavy, round man in early middle-age, with a distinctive ugly face and impudent eyes beneath brows as fierce and tufted as an Aberdeen's. He conveyed energy and efficiency and the sturdy decisiveness that goes with a simple point of view and no nerves. It occurred to Campion that he looked like a man who did not believe in ghosts, but for the rest he was as much a stranger as anyone else in this new and confusing world. At the moment he was very full of the story.

"I'm supposed to have dropped in for coffee," he said, "but the chap who let me in tells me you haven't started to eat yet. He told me this dreadful tale about Anscombe, too. Poor old boy! He couldn't face it, I suppose. Or am I letting cats out of bags?"

The superintendent eyed him.

"It wasn't suicide, Mr. Pyne."

"Wasn't suicide?" The newcomer seemed first astounded and then embarrassed. "Well, I'm glad to hear it," he said. "Lucky there were only you two to hear me. I'm always putting my foot in it like that. There's been a lot of gossip about, you know. You've heard it, haven't you, Super. About the secretaryship of the Masters."

"Seems to me I did hear something." Hutch was very cautious.

"You must have." Pyne's eyes were amused beneath his tremendous brows. "It's been told me in strictest confidence by everyone I've met in the last three months. I heard that the job, like all these hereditary offices, took a fine old packet to keep up, and that the old man was on the verge of a smash and had made up his mind to resign. Naturally, as soon as I heard he was dead, I thought he'd done it himself. One would. It breaks an old man's heart to give up a position carrying a bit of easy money like that, especially when it's been in the family for generations. The biannual meeting of the Masters is sometime this week, too, isn't it?"

"Tomorrow."

IS IT? Very likely. They're such a secret high-and-mighty body that they don't trouble to publish a little thing like that." He laughed. "I like it," he said. "It appeals to the kid in all of us, that kind of mumbo-jumbo, even if it is only a sort of glorified parish council."

The superintendent looked frankly scandalized and Pyne, catching Campion's eye, burst out laughing. It was a pleasant, open sound, a trifle high-pitched like his voice, but full of limited humor.

"We're Philistines, we Londoners," he said. "The Masters are sacrosanct down here in Bridge. I'm sorry, Super. I'm behaving disgustingly. Poor old Anscombe! I didn't know him well, of course. I'd only met him once or twice.

(Continued on page 45)

Somebody's Waiting for You

By Stanley Paul

A great tennis champion meets the challenge of his life. There was more than a championship at stake

ILLUSTRATED BY JAY HYDE BARNUM

HE'D been up and down with the best of them. Trouble was, he hadn't known when to quit. They had, though, all the youngsters who'd started out with him—they were out of big-time tennis, every one.

Perhaps, Rusty McLarnin was thinking—sitting lazily in the room that he and Jimmy Grierson were sharing this week at the Brightwood Club—that accounted for the feeling that always seemed to be with him—vague loneliness, edged discontent, a little fear. He felt like a stranger in tennis this year, he whose game was a reference book from Nassau to the green summer turf of New England.

He'd had a chance to go pro, he'd delayed on it; the offer wasn't being renewed.

He could hear Jimmy Grierson shouting around in the shower, singing in that cracked skylark tenor of his. Jimmy was happy as all hell, had been now for an hour since he and Rusty had walked off the court with the menace of the quarter-final threat tucked away.

"Hey!" Jimmy yelled in a silence caused by the shutting off of water. "Borrow my best foulard. We're having dinner with my girl."

Rusty's mind drifted back to a time when he'd had a girl. Or had he? She was Jane Goodale, who'd come up with him, and for a while, in those years of carefree campaigning when they'd held mixed-doubles titles all the way from Palm Beach to Palm Springs, they'd had at least that honest affection for each other that only a couple of first-rate phonies can ever know.

Jane had walked out to go to work. She had another talent besides her way with a racket. She had ideas and she could sketch. She designed fashions now for a sportswear firm in New York, and she showed up at places like Sea Bright with a pad and crayons in her hand. She said things, though she laughed when she said them, like: "Why don't you turn honest, McLarnin? No fooling, the feeling is fine!"

Where did she get that honest stuff? Jane had been around in the game. She should know better. She knew he had to lay himself right on the line for everything he got. Of course there were places in the winter where the rooms were very luxurious, where you could look out to a cobalt sea hissing on a beach shingle dotted with vividly colored cabanas. Where sometimes a sporting host might offer to bet you a couple of hundred you couldn't hurdle a tennis net.

But they could slice it as thin as they wanted, and label it Grade-A for Amateur—its ultimate test was the gate.

But the committee was eagle-eying Rusty this year, holding him fast to the eight-weeks-with-expenses rule. They always got tough when they thought you were slipping. But there were ways of getting around that. Which was where Jimmy Grierson came in.

He'd come walking into the picture during a spring week down in Virginia, and in less than half a day he was recounting episodes from Rusty's tennis history that Rusty had almost forgotten about himself.

It hadn't taken Rusty long to recognize idealization, see almost an idolatry of himself in the kid. There were other things, too, he'd discovered: Jimmy's freehanded way with plenteous funds, his good clothes, and his big blue roadster. Best of all, Jimmy—and his pals—were on the free list at the string of Grierson resort hotels.

What more natural, then, than that Rusty and the kid should team up? Rusty'd begun by yanking Jimmy back from his headlong invasion of the big time. They'd drifted from one Grierson hotel to another, spending long hours on the court.

THEN, this week, abruptly, he was springing Jimmy on them. He enjoyed seeing them have to swallow this new, hot dish he'd cooked up.

A couple of writers were being sarcastic. Farens had said this morning in the Journal: "So long as there are new players like young Grierson, the veteran McLarnin will never have to quit the game. . . ."

"Come on!"—that was Jimmy, impatient and tousle-headed from his shower, drawing shorts around his lean, hard middle. "We've got to hurry, kid!"

Rusty walked to the dresser and yanked his neck-tie around in the glass, pulled a comb through his copper-glinted hair, eyed the image briefly—where did they get that veteran stuff? He could still step along with the best.

They went down to the lobby together. It was crowded with a lively, post-play throng. Over in a corner a cluster surrounded a gay kepi-type hat with a jaunty, feather cockade on it. The hat tipped back to reveal a face bright with laughter. It was Jane Goodale.

"Hi, McLarnin!" she said. "I want to meet your partner; been reading a lot about the man."

"Here he is," said Rusty. "Jimmy Grierson. Jimmy, somewhere in your handbook of the great there must be a page devoted to Jane Goodale."

"Is there?" Jimmy came alive. A grin wrinkled the little freckled pennants that flew at each side of his nose. "Who could forget you, Miss Goodale, in that Wightman Cup match in '35—"

"Jimmy's like that," Rusty interjected. "He can describe just the shot you made at 3:38 off your back hand, afternoon of June 10th; any year."

"Look, Miss Goodale," Jimmy seemed to do small, impatient dance step. "We're taking my girl out to dinner. Why don't you come along?"

Jane laughed and shook her head. "No, thank you. I drove all the way from New York. I just ran out here for an hour to get a preview." Her nice eyes went to the lad. "Watch her, Jimmy Grierson," she warned. "Your pal has a most engaging way."

Jimmy laughed aloud, (Continued on page 6.)

"Liking," he said, "has nothing to do with it. Before it's too late, I've got to talk with you. I want to see you alone. I'll arrange it," he told her. "Somehow"

The Patriotic Murders

by Agatha Christie

Illustrated by Mario Cooper

Story Thus Far:

HERCULE POIROT, noted Belgian detective, leaves the office of Henry Morley, a London dentist, and returns to his flat. An hour or so later, Inspector Japp, of Scotland Yard, telephones him to say that Morley has committed suicide. A skeptical person, Poirot does not accept Japp's verdict. He believes the dentist—healthy, happy, prosperous—has been driven to death. He starts an investigation. Suspect No. 1 is Amélie Morley, a wealthy Greek, who had been Morley's last patient. But before the Belgian can interview her, Amélie dies of an overdose of dental drugs! The inference is obvious: having killed the Greek accidentally, Morley in a fit of remorse had shot himself. Nevertheless, Poirot does not accept the suicide theory. Nor does Reginald Barnes, an ex-secret service agent, to whom the case goes for advice. Mr. Barnes feels certain that a band of conspirators, trying to undermine the existent order in England, planned to kill one of Morley's last patients, the wealthy Mr. Blunt. His theory is that having failed to get Blunt, they murdered the dentist because he knew too much of their

Another curious angle is added to the case when Miss Maud Sainsbury Seale, who had been in Morley's office shortly before his death, disappears mysteriously. And Poirot, busy investigating various persons—Howard Raikes, a young radiologist from America, who had been in Morley's office about the time Miss Seale had been there; Frank Carter, the fiancé of Morley's secretary; Mr. Blunt; Jane Olivera, Mr. Blunt's wife, who is in love with Raikes, and others—has no idea what has become of her.

Then, a body found in the apartment of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Chapman, the head battered beyond recognition, seems to be that of Miss Seale. Further investigation, however, shows that the body is actually that of Mrs. Chapman—disguised as Miss Seale! Following this discovery, the search for Miss Seale is mysteriously called off by the foreign office.

Meanwhile, Poirot receives a warning, by telephone, to get out of the investigation. Later, when the Belgian accepts an invitation to week-end with Blunt, at his country manor, he recognizes the voice of Mrs. Olivera, Jane's mother, as the serious telephone voice. He questions Blunt, implying that the financier himself may be in danger from his own greed. And in answer to Blunt's sarcasm, he replies that there is the one crime of which anyone—given the proper circumstances—is capable!

VII

LEAVING the room Poirot almost cannoned into a tall figure outside the door.

"I beg your pardon, Mademoiselle."

Jane Olivera drew apart a little. She said, "Do you know what I think of you, M. Poirot?"

"Eh bien—Mademoiselle—"

She did not give him time to finish. The question, though, had but a rhetorical value. All that it meant was that Jane Olivera was about to answer it herself. "You're a spy, that's what you are! A miserable, low, snooping spy, nosing around and making trouble!"

"I assure you, Mademoiselle—"

"I know just what you're after! And I know now what lies you tell! Why don't you admit it straight out? Well, I'll tell you this—you won't find anything—anything at all! There's nothing to worry about! No one's going to harm a hair of my precious uncle's head. He's safe enough. He'll always be safe. Safe and smug and prosperous—and full of platitudes! He's just a stodgy John Bull, that's all he is—without an ounce of imagination or invention."

She paused, then, her agreeable, husky voice opening, she said venomously, "I loathe the sight of you—you bloody little bourgeois detective!"

She swept away from him in a whirl of expensive velvet drapery.

Hercule Poirot remained, his eyes very wide open, his eyebrows raised and his hand thoughtfully caressing his mustaches.

The epithet bourgeois was, he admitted, well applied to him. His outlook on life was essentially bourgeois, and always had been, but the employment

Poirot regarded with interest the face of the gardener. "Very curious," he murmured of it as an epithet of contempt by the exquisitely turned out Jane Olivera gave him, as he expressed it to himself, furiously to think.

He went, still thinking, into the drawing room. Mrs. Olivera was playing patience.

SHE looked up as Poirot entered, surveyed him with the cold look she might have bestowed upon a black beetle and murmured distantly, "Red knave on black queen."

Chilled, Poirot retreated. He reflected mournfully: "Alas, it would seem that nobody loves me!"

He strolled out of the window into the garden. It was an enchanting evening with a smell of night-scented stocks in the air. Poirot sniffed happily and strolled along a path that ran between two herbaceous borders.

He turned a corner and two dimly seen figures sprang apart.

It would seem that he had interrupted a pair of lovers.

Poirot hastily turned and retraced his steps.

Even out here, it would seem, his presence was de trop.

He passed Alistair Blunt's window and Alistair Blunt was dictating to Mr. Selby.

There seemed definitely only one place for Hercule Poirot.

He went up to his bedroom.

He pondered for some time on various fantastic aspects of the situation.

Had he or had he not made a mistake in believing the voice on the telephone to be that of Mrs. Olivera? Surely the idea was absurd.

He recalled the melodramatic revelations of quiet, little Mr. Barnes. He speculated on the mysterious whereabouts of Mr. Q.X.912, alias Albert Chapman. He remembered, with a spasm of annoyance, the anxious look in the eyes of the maid-servant Agnes—

It was always the same way—people would keep things back! Usually quite unimportant things, but until they were cleared out of the way, impossible to pursue a straight path.

At the moment the path was anything but straight!

And the most unaccountable obstacle in the way of clear thinking and orderly progress was what he described to himself as the contradictory and impossible problem of Miss Sainsbury Seale. For, if the facts that Hercule Poirot had observed were true facts—then nothing whatever made sense!

Hercule Poirot said to himself, with astonishment in the thought, "Is it possible that I am growing old?"

After passing a troubled night, Hercule Poirot was up and about early on the next day. The weather was perfect and he retraced his steps of last night.

He pursued his way through a rose garden, where the neat layout of the beds delighted him—and through the winding ways of an alpine rock garden, coming at last to the walled kitchen gardens.

Here he observed a sturdy woman clad in a tweed coat and skirt, black browsed with short, cropped black hair. She was talking in a slow, emphatic Scotch voice to what was evidently the head gardener. The head gardener, Poirot observed, did not appear to be enjoying the conversation.

A sarcastic inflection made itself heard in Miss Helen Montessor's voice, and Poirot escaped nimbly down a side path.

A gardener who had been, Poirot shrewdly suspected, resting on his spade, began digging with fervor. Poirot approached nearer. The man, a young fellow, dug energetically, his back to Poirot, who paused to observe him.

"Good morning," said Poirot amiably.

A muttered "Morning, sir" was the response, but the man did not stop working.

POIROT was a little surprised. In his experience a gardener, though anxious to appear zealously at work as you approached, was usually only too willing to pause and pass the time of day when directly addressed.

It seemed, he thought, a little unnatural. He stood there for some minutes, watching the toiling figure. Was there, or was there not, something a little familiar about the turn of those shoulders? Or could it be, thought Hercule Poirot, that he was getting into a habit of thinking that both voices and shoulders were familiar when they were really nothing of the kind? Was he, as he had feared last night, growing old?

He passed thoughtfully onward out of the walled garden and paused to regard a rising slope of shrubbery outside.

Presently, like some fantastic moon, a round object rose gently over the top of the kitchen garden wall. It was the egg-shaped head of Hercule Poirot, and the eyes of Hercule Poirot regarded with a good deal of interest the face of the young gardener who had now stopped digging and was passing a sleeve across his wet face.

"Very curious and very interesting," murmured Hercule Poirot as he discreetly lowered his head once more.

Yes, indeed, very curious and interesting that Frank Carter, who had a secretarial job in the country, should be working as a gardener in the employment of Alistair Blunt.

Reflecting on these points, Hercule Poirot heard a gong in the distance and retraced his steps toward the house.

On the way there he encountered his host talking to Miss Montessor, who had just emerged from the kitchen garden by the farther door.

Her voice rose clear and distinct: "It's verra kind of you, Alistair, but I would prefer not to accept any invitations this week while yourr American relations are with you!"

Blunt said, "Julia's rather a tactless woman, but she doesn't mean—"

Miss Montessor said calmly, "In my opinion her manner to me is verra insolent, and I will not put up with insolence—from American women or any others!"

Miss Montessor moved away. Poirot came up to find Alistair Blunt looking as sheepish as most men look who are having trouble with their female relations.

He said ruefully, "Women really are the devil! Good morning, M. Poirot.

Lovely day, isn't it?" They turned toward the house and Blunt said with a sigh, "I do miss my wife!"

Hercule Poirot said, "You have a young gardener, I noticed, whom I think you must have taken on recently."

"I dare say," said Blunt. "Yes, Burton, my third gardener, was called up about three weeks ago, and we took this fellow on instead."

"Do you remember where he came from?"

"I really don't. MacAlister engaged him. Somebody or other asked me to give him a trial, I think. Recommended him warmly. I'm rather surprised, because MacAlister says he isn't much good. He wants to sack him again."

"What is his name?"

"Dunning—Sunbury—something like that."

"Would it be a great impertinence to ask what you pay him?"

Alistair Blunt looked amused.

"Not at all. Two pounds fifteen, I think it is."

"What's needed is a new heaven and a new earth! And you sit there eating kidneys!"

She got up and went out by the French window into the garden.

Alistair looked mildly surprised and a little uncomfortable.

He said, "Jane has changed a lot lately. Where does she get all these ideas?"

"Take no notice of what Jane says," said Mrs. Olivera. "Jane's a very silly girl. You know what girls are—they go to these queer parties in studios where the young men have funny ties and they come home and talk a lot of nonsense."

"Yes, but Jane was always rather a hard-boiled young woman."

"It's just a fashion, Alistair; these things are in the air!"

Alistair Blunt said, "Yes, they're in the air all right. War is an upsetting factor. A new heaven and a new earth—And it can't be done."

He looked a little worried.

Mrs. Olivera rose and Poirot opened

"I've finished my letters," said Blunt appearing later in the morning. "No M. Poirot, I'm going to show you a garden."

The two men went out together and Blunt talked eagerly of his hobby.

The rock garden, with its rare alpine plants was his greatest joy and he spent some time there while Blunt pointed out certain minute and rare species.

It was all very drowsy and peaceful.

BLUNT paused at the end of the border, looking back. The clip of the shears was quite close by, though the clipper was concealed from view.

"Look at the vista down from here," Poirot. The Sweet Williams are particularly fine this year. I don't know when I've seen them so good—and there are Russell Lupins. Marvelous color."

Crack! The shot broke the peace of the morning. Something sang angrily through the air. Alistair Blunt turned bewildered to where a faint thread of smoke was rising from the middle of the laurels.

There was a sudden outcry of angry voices, the laurels heaved as two men struggled together. A high-pitched American voice sang out resolutely, "I've got you, you damned scoundrel! Drop that gun!"

Two men struggled out into the open. The young gardener who had dug so industriously that morning was writhing in the powerful grip of a man nearly a head taller.

Poirot recognized the latter at once. He had already guessed from the voice.

Frank Carter snarled, "Let go of me! It wasn't me, I tell you! I never drew a gun!"

Howard Raikes said, "Oh, no? Shooting at the birds, I suppose!"

He stopped—looking at the newcomers.

"Mr. Alistair Blunt? This guy here has just taken a pot shot at you and caught him right in the act."

Frank Carter cried out, "It's a lie! I was clipping the hedge. I heard a shot and the gun fell right here at my feet. I picked it up—that's only natural, that is, and then this bloke jumped on me!"

Howard Raikes said grimly, "The gun was in your hand and it had just been fired!"

With a final gesture, he tossed the pistol to Poirot.

"Let's see what the dick's got to say about it! Lucky I got hold of you in time. I guess there are several more shots in that automatic of yours."

Poirot murmured, "Precisely."

Blunt was frowning angrily. He said sharply, "Now then, Dunning—Dunning—what's your name?"

Hercule Poirot interrupted. He said, "This man's name is Frank Carter."

Carter turned on him furiously.

"You've had it in for me all along! You came spying on me that Sunday and tell you, it's not true. I never shot at him."

Hercule Poirot said gently, "Then that case, who did?" He added: "There is no one else here but ourselves, you see."

JANE OLIVERA came running across the path. Her hair streamlined behind her. Her eyes were wide with fear. She gasped, "Howard?"

Howard Raikes said lightly, "Hello, Jane. I've just been saving your uncle's life."

"Oh!" She stopped. "You have?"

"Your arrival certainly seems to have been very opportune, Mr.—er—" He hesitated.

"This is Howard Raikes, Uncle Alistair. He's a friend of mine."

Blunt looked at Raikes—he smiled. "Oh!" he said. "So you are Jane's young man! I must thank you."

(Continued on page 37)

"Not more?"

"Certainly not more—might be a bit less."

"Now that," said Poirot, "is very curious."

Alistair Blunt looked at him inquiringly.

BUT Jane Olivera, rustling the paper, distracted the conversation:

"A lot of people seem out for your blood, Uncle Alistair!"

"Oh, you're reading the debate in the House. That's all right. Only Archerton—he's always tilting at windmills. And he's got the most crazy ideas of finance. If we let him have his way, England would be bankrupt in a week."

Jane said, "Don't you ever want to try anything new?"

"Not unless it's an improvement on the old, my dear."

"But you'd never think it would be. You'd always say, 'This would never work'—without even trying."

"Experimentalists can do a lot of harm."

"Yes, but how can you be satisfied with things as they are. All the waste and the inequality and the unfairness. Something must be done about it!"

"We get along pretty well in this country, Jane, all things considered."

Jane said passionately:

the door for her. She swept out frowning to herself.

Alistair Blunt said suddenly, "I don't like it, you know! Everybody's talking this sort of stuff! And it doesn't mean anything! It's all hot air! They said it in the last war—a world for heroes to live in. I find myself up against it the whole time—a new heaven and a new earth, a world for heroes—the New Jerusalem. What does it mean? They can't tell you themselves! They're just drunk on words."

He smiled suddenly, rather ruefully. "I'm one of the last of the Old Guard, you know."

Poirot said curiously, "If you were removed, what would happen?"

"Removed! What a way of putting it!" His face grew suddenly grave. "I'll tell you. A lot of damned fools would try a lot of very costly experiments. And that would be the end of stability—of common sense, of solvency. In fact, the defeat of this England of ours as we know it. . . ."

Poirot nodded his head. He was essentially in sympathy with the banker. He, too, approved of solvency. And he began to realize with a new meaning exactly just what Alistair Blunt stood for. Mr. Barnes had told him, but he had hardly taken it in then. Quite suddenly, he was afraid. . . .

● Actual color photograph—G. R. Reavis, tobacco warehouseman, inspects an extra fine lot of ripe, golden leaf.

Luckies' finer tobaccos mean less nicotine

AS TOBACCO EXPERTS like G. R. Reavis will tell you, Luckies buy the finer leaf. These men know . . . for they spend their lives buying, selling and handling tobacco.

Now here's what this means to you as a smoker... Luckies' finer tobaccos mean less nicotine. The more you smoke, the more you want a cigarette of proven mildness. So remember this fact: for two years, the average nicotine content of Luckies has been 12% less than the average of the four other leading brands★—less than any one of them.

Luckies, you see, analyze tobacco before buying it. So our buyers can select leaf that is ripe and mellow, yet milder—low in nicotine.

Remember, with independent tobacco experts, with men who know tobacco best—it's Luckies 2 to 1.

★ NICOTINE CONTENT OF LEADING BRANDS

From January 1938 through June 1940 Lucky Strike has averaged

- 9.46% less nicotine than Brand A
- 20.55% less nicotine than Brand B
- 15.55% less nicotine than Brand C
- 4.74% less nicotine than Brand D

For this period Lucky Strike has had an average nicotine content of 2.01 parts per hundred.

Copyright 1940, The American Tobacco Company

With men who know tobacco best—it's LUCKIES 2 TO 1

THE BIG MOTOR

Fluid Drive

NOW AVAILABLE ON

NEW 1941

SIMPLE AS THIS

A current of air from the running fan will set the idle fan in motion, just as a breeze turns a windmill. That's the simple principle of Fluid Drive.

ONLY 2 MOVING PARTS

Equally simple in design. One fan-like wheel drives the other by directing a current of oil against it, fast or slow as governed by engine speed.

MIRACLE HAPPENS HERE

No rigid metal connections. Driving wheel fastened to engine, driven wheel to transmission system. Power transmitted through oil. That's why it's so miraculously smooth and silent under all conceivable driving conditions.

CHRYSLER Corporation's Fluid Drive, introduced to American motorists in 1938 on the higher-priced Chrysler cars, is now available on 1941 models of Dodge and DeSoto cars, and lower-priced Chryslers.

This latest great Chrysler Corporation first is standard equipment on the Chrysler Crown Imperial and New Yorker models, and may be had for a slight additional charge on other Chrysler models and on Dodge

YOU GET THE GOOD THINGS FIRST

NEWS OF 1941 !

DODGE DE SOTO CHRYSLER

DeSoto cars. That's important, sensational news!

Luxurious as it is, Fluid Drive is vastly more than luxury feature. It's a new and better way of driving simpler . . . smoother . . . safer. It's easier on driver and passengers . . . easier on the car. Everyone who has tried it agrees that it's the drive of tomorrow . . . and you can have it today.

Smooth as oil! One fan-like wheel drives another, forcing oil against it. The result is extraordinary. You get away from a standstill as gently as a falling leaf. You mount to normal driving speed so smoothly and silently that you can hardly believe the speedometer. You change your pace or climb a grade so effortlessly that you're convinced there must be some supernatural power under the hood.

Your Dodge, DeSoto or Chrysler dealer invites you to try Fluid Driving without obligation. You just touch the throttle to go . . . touch the brake to stop. We believe you'll find it the simplest, smoothest, gentlest drive you've ever experienced.

FROM CHRYSLER CORPORATION !

"And I thought Gramps was a Grump!"

1. All I knew about Grandfather was that he owned a gold mine in South Africa, and didn't like little girls. When he wrote he was coming to visit us, Daddy and Mummy said for me to be nice to Gramps, and not bother him.

2. "Should have been a boy!" Gramps grunted to me, the day we met him at the boat. "Would have loved to have a grandson," he added to Daddy. And after that, Gramps didn't pay very much attention to me.

3. When coffee was served after dinner that night, Gramps blew up. "Never touch the stuff!" he shouted. "Love it, too, but the caffeine in it keeps me awake!" So I said to Mummy: "Let's get Sanka Coffee for Gramps!"

4. "What good would that do?" Gramps snorted. "Why," I said, "Sanka Coffee is 97% caffeine-free, and can't keep you awake. I read about it in an ad!" "You did?" Gramps said. "Young lady, let me see that advertisement!"

5. "Humph!" said Gramps, reading the ad. "The Council on Foods of the American Medical Association says: 'Sanka Coffee is free from caffeine effect and can be used when other coffee has been forbidden.' I'll try it!"

6. So Mummy made Sanka Coffee for Gramps next day. "Delightful flavor!" he admitted. "Hope it lets me sleep!" Of course, it did . . . and was Gramps pleased! "Young lady," he said, "you're as smart as a boy!" And he bought me a pony!

SANKA COFFEE
REAL COFFEE . . . 97% CAFFEIN-FREE

PRICE REDUCED!

The price of Sanka Coffee goes down again! Both "regular" and the popular, new "drip" grind are now selling at the lowest price in history!

Copyright, 1940, General Foods Corp.

NOW SELLING AT THE LOWEST PRICE IN HISTORY!

Big Girl

Continued from page 13

The crisis was surmounted by the arrival of Mr. Selznick, who had just been through all this on GWTW and could detect an unspirited vowel at a distance of three Culver City blocks. He laughed lightly, heh, heh, heh, and suggested gently that Mr. Ratoff confine himself to directing and Mrs. Rooney to checking up on stray adverbs and everything would be jolly.

"Hokeh," agreed Ratoff, "but don't blemming me hif pipples don't liking the lengwidge."

Operating under this compromise, Intermezzo was finished and proved to be nothing that would keep the judges on film awards from going home after the whistle blew. However, it established Bergman. There was immediately apparent that rumbling excitement which heralds the appearance of a new screen personality. Even before the picture opened, the rumors went chasing over Hollywood. One had the impression of an army of gnomes galloping frantically over the peaks of Beverly Hills on spitz hounds togged out to look like polo ponies. Bergman was famous before the picture was previewed and even more renowned when the public had a chance at it.

Hollywood Had to Have Her

Not only is the Bergman girl a Swede but she is a big Swede, height five feet eight inches. That might handicap her if it weren't for the fact that she is also a stunner—a simple, unaffected, uncarmined sockeroo. Having slayed the movie audiences, she appeared lately on Broadway in the revival of Molnar's Liliom with Burgess Meredith and Elia Kazan, thus showing that she was an actress and not merely a dope pushed before the camera and worked with strings. Out at Selznick International they swear she'll be the biggest star in Hollywood in five years.

Intermezzo was a remake of a Swedish film by the same name that Bergman played in. Selznick bought it because he needed a part for Leslie Howard, who was under contract to him. The idea of grabbing Bergman came as an afterthought. Then it became a matter of life or death. Either Bergman came to Hollywood or the body of Selznick would be found floating in Pedro Harbor. He phoned frantically Katherine Brown, his representative in New York. Grab the next boat and bring the lady back in the brig, if necessary.

"Like nothing, I will," answered Brown. "I've just got back from London and I hate the ocean. I'll cable."

But she soon found that cables don't sway the Swede. Scouts had been bling for years without success. There was another call from Hollywood. Mr. S. was on the wire. Miss Brown would either catch the Aquitania tomorrow or turn in her chips and get paid. So Miss Brown sailed and the deal was made after much difficulty because Bergman was quite content in Stockholm. She was the big shot there; had been married to Dr. Peter Lindstrom only two years ago, they had had a baby and Hollywood didn't seem such a much at that distance. As a result she got a contract that called for a wad of money and she does only two pictures a year.

Ingrid's mother died when she was two and her father, who was an artist and a photographer, died when she was twelve. They were an artistic family and she always had the intention of being an actress but she was so tall and gawky and shy that nobody at her school had any idea of her ambitions until she wrote the class play in her senior year. Before that she had secretly written other plays, both tragedies of Strindbergian desolation that a student could pass as comic relief. Despite this the Lyceum girls were still astonished when Ingrid entered the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art.

"Big, awkward Ingrid!" they called. "She'll trip and fall on her nose."

But instead of that she was chosen for the leading role in the Academy play her first year. It brought on a terrific rumpus, because that honor had always gone to a third term. The newspaper picked it up and the howling was a universal. The directors held a meeting and threw Ingrid out of the cast. But by this time the movie people, the vultures, were on

"I just asked him could he paint a flag and he said, 'Sure!'"

ALAN WOOD

Alarm Clock

CROCKETT JOHNSON

rail. If you don't want her, we want them, but with one proviso. "I'll act in the cinema," she said, "but if you will furnish me the same production I would have had at the Academy."

very shy, but very practical. She worked at the studios during the day and at night the professors at the Academy gave her private lessons. In all she had done eleven Swedish films, nine of them as the star. Instead of laboriously working her way up in the theater, she had been able to return to the Oscar Royal theaters as a guest player.

In some ways the Hollywood adventure was an anticlimax. She came alone and worked so hard to get through and then to her baby that she barely saw the boy. She wanted to live at a hotel but he made her take a house.

But her Swedish fans were a bit sore when she returned last summer. It was true of all other European countries, Sweden is Hollywood mad. They recall the pictures, they fall in love with the American stars, they think Hollywood is a platinum-lined version of a paradise.

They wanted to know who I'd seen in the pictures," she says, "and I had never seen any of them. They wanted to know if I'd seen the American stars, they think Hollywood is a platinum-lined version of a paradise. They wanted to know who I'd seen in the pictures," she says, "and I had never seen any of them. They wanted to know if I'd seen the American stars, they think Hollywood is a platinum-lined version of a paradise."

Not Fitted to Pattern

The Selznick people don't know quite how to handle her. It isn't that she is temperamental but she doesn't fit into the pattern. She isn't an oomph girl and when she proudly admits that she is thirty-three and has a two-year-old daughter, she obviously can't go around in gossamer. This year when she came back from Sweden, she walked off the boat with Pia, the Swedish girl, swung over her shoulder in a fur-lined papoose sack.

She had arrived to do a Selznick version of Joan of Arc but since it was to be a billion-dollar production in heptameter with 400,000 extras garbed in gold armor, it was obviously impossible to do it. Vinton Freedley offered her a million dollars. She took the script, went to work and studied it and came back and said she couldn't do it. Freedley looked at her, looked at the script and then burst into a cry.

"You've read the wrong part! We need you to do Julia, the lead."

It was fortunate for her that Benno Berolzheimer directed the play because he used to direct foreign methods and knew how to guide her. Even so, one speech he threatened to throw her. They tried it often in so many different ways that it finally became an obsession with her. She couldn't do it. At the preview the night before the opening, it was so disastrous that they considered calling the play off. But she made it at the last minute and won the rave reviews.

"Still I can't do it," she admits. "It's awful acting in a foreign language. If anything happens in Stockholm and I miss a word, I can put in a dozen others. Here if I miss one, I think maybe they're going to shoot me."

Ingrid Takes a Walk

Her life in Manhattan was like that of any devoted mother. When she wasn't acting, she was stirring up gruel for Pia. When she wasn't doing that she was walking. She walked for miles in Central Park; she walked in Harlem, being fascinated by the spectacle of Lenox Avenue on a Sunday; she was overjoyed by the re-opening of the New York World's Fair because then she could walk herself practically to death. She came galloping down to the New York Selznick office one day to report a great discovery in Central Park.

"You can rent a boat! You can row!" she cried.

When lofty Westchester devotees invited her out for the week end, she asked immediately for a pair of men's shoes and then said: "Please, I will run." So the other guests sat on the veranda and watched her loping over the hillocks like a zebra inflamed by spring. When she came back, she said: "Please, I will sleep." So she slept, watched by nobody but the angels.

She is gradually getting used to the sensation of having people come up to her in stores and begin a friendly conversation.

"It's a form of insult or disrespect when anybody does that to you in Sweden," she says. "I didn't always understand what they said and I thought they were criticizing me." She is frank and friendly with strangers but if the conversation is too rapid for her or too full of jargon or slang, she becomes shy. She almost literally seems to disappear. Interviewers who bait her (the good old American system for getting the truth out of the lofty) throw her into a panic. A hard-boiled New York reporter who asked if it was true that she was running out on her husband and taking up with Joe Blotz and Elmer Twitchnose was rewarded with a flood of tears that will undoubtedly make a better man of him in the future.

She was almost entirely unnerved by a persistent little boy who demanded not one autograph but dozens of them. When she finally escaped to a cab, he climbed in after her, got on his knees, lifted his hands aloft and began praying fervidly. She had no idea what to do but the Selznick representative with her was not so helpless. He took the little charmer by the nape of the neck and hurled him forth into the night.

"Oh, you've hurt him!" cried Miss Bergman.

"Hurt him, nothing," said the gentleman happily. "I've killed him. So long as I didn't use a gat or crown him with a dornick, it was legal. You're going to like America. It's a great country!"

Miss Bergman nodded hazily, not understanding some of those words but appreciating the spirit.

How's your "Pep Appeal"?

—by Williamson

Margaret: No! Sally, no! Play it right for gran'ma. It's supposed to be a dance! Put some oomph into it!

Gran'ma: Margaret! I'd bet my last dollar I know what's ailin' that child!

Margaret: Good Heavens! Mother—what do you mean?

Gran'ma: I'll bet this child just plain doesn't eat right—doesn't get all her vitamins! Get your hat, Sally, we're going to the grocer's.

Gran'ma: Here it is, Sally. Your first lesson in getting your vitamins. This crispy, crunchy, delicious cereal—KELLOGG'S PEP—is an extra-rich source of two of the most important ones, vitamins B<sub>1</sub> and D.

Sally: When do I taste it, Gran'ma?

Sally: Wow! Mummy! This PEP tastes grand. Can I have it every day for breakfast?

Margaret: I should say you can!

Vitamins for pep! Kellogg's Pep for vitamins!

Pep contains per serving: 4/5 to 1/5 the minimum daily need of vitamin B<sub>1</sub>, according to age; 1/2 the daily need of vitamin D. For sources of other vitamins, see the Pep package.

MADE BY KELLOGG'S IN BATTLE CREEK

COPYRIGHT, 1940, BY KELLOGG COMPANY

Lights On

Continued from page 16

strain. There are tubes of light under the cabinets to brighten every work surface, and you can't open a door—cupboard, oven or refrigerator—without having a light pop on to show you things. It turns off when the door shuts.

Knowing a good thing when he's used it, Mr. Versen doesn't mind repeating upstairs, either. The wall-bracket light is one repeater. Only in the boy's room and the girl's it extends from the ceiling, over the desk. The girl can tilt hers any way she needs it to light her face when she is using the dressing-table end of her desk. They both can be inverted, for general reflected lighting. The girl also has a wall light that swings between chair and bed. Her shades are enameled yellow, to match the curtains.

Control Your Lighting

The double-decker bunks in the boy's room have built-in reading lights that are actually showcase reflector lamps—small, tube-shaped bulbs silvered on one side, and set into a reflector pocket, giving you a lot of light for little wattage. It's the way you control light for efficiency, not the power of the bulb you use that counts, says Mr. Versen.

In the master room, wall-bracket lights, with shades soft pale green to match the walls, extend out from the mirror. You adjust them to light both sides of your face in true theatrical dressing-table fashion and proceed to make repairs. Or you give up, and twist them toward the ceiling for general illumination.

In the corner of the room next the terrace is a small wall light without the extension arm. It pivots and you want, making a streak of light shadow along the wall, or giving light through the window onto the race. Direct it up to the ceiling night light. On the table at the head of the beds is a sure-enough lamp in case you were beginning to waver. There are two standing ones down too, to make positive you have everything you want.

Bathroom lights? In the downstairs bath there's a wall light like the one in the master room. Also a photographer's red safe light, for use when the room becomes a darkroom. In the master bath the lights are like the ceiling lights in the many-purpose room, recessed in the ceiling over the bathroom counter to see that you do a good job of shaving. The other bath on the second floor is lighted by day through a skylight. At night you get the same effect, from fluorescent daylight bulbs above the ceiling of translucent glass. The glass is supported by a grid of wood, like an egg crate. Another from downstairs, it's similar to the the-bar light.

By such simplicity, cutting out variety and sticking to the job of putting light where you need it, the lighting of Collier's House is making a hit with everyone who sees it.

A booklet containing many more details about Collier's House of Light is now available. To obtain one free of ten cents to Mr. E. K. Simpson, Rockefeller Home Center, 630 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

All the Tricks

Continued from page 10

getting started on Never Say Die. But we can work together after dinner, at night. Look," he said, laughing pleasantly as the thought came to him, "that fits nicely for you, too, Jenny, doesn't it? Why don't you come down to my place after the show and keep us company during the grind?"

"Yes," Eddie said eagerly. "Jenny, that would be swell." He was looking at her but she answered Bartlett.

"I wouldn't be in the way," she said to the producer. "If you wouldn't mind having me around. I'd learn so much by being with you."

GORDON BARTLETT had a duplex apartment on Twelfth Street right off Fifth Avenue. The tall walls, painted a deep blue, were ornamented only by framed programs of the different Bartlett productions. It was cozy there in the night stillness and Jenny Field, sitting with one leg under her, listened absently to the men's voices as they worked. Bartlett had a habit of walking around the room while Eddie listened to him and fretted with the script in his hands. Occasionally the producer, watching Jenny, would break off to smile at her artless pose and reflective silence. He would pat her head and then she'd turn her eyes up to him, giving him a weary, grateful look that was wholly priceless. Eddie, raising his head to see why she had made Bartlett stop, sometimes caught the exchange of warm glances. He didn't like to see it and spoke to her once or twice in pained, reluctant tones. "You're being childish," she'd say easily. "You're a kid. He just likes to have me around. It's nothing. And if you were really right—well, then I'd only be doing it for your sake, wouldn't I?"

He never knew what to say. Ina Wynne was still in Hollywood, there were delays and the script conferences weren't going as smoothly as they should. He always let the subject drop. As the days passed, the girls in the cast of Three Decades with Jenny grew sadder, more loving and bitterer. They must have all had a rush of hope, Jenny told herself, when they had learned she wasn't getting the lead in Eddie's play after all. But it somehow disturbed her, even though they couldn't tell exactly what she was up to, that she was seeing Gordon Bartlett at the conferences every night. Again and again they came to a point of saying to her: "Honey, do you like Rocco's any more? Darling, we hardly ever see you any more. You must be very busy these days, aren't you? I guess you won't be with us much longer. Big things for you, darling, are coming soon, aren't they?"

Jenny always gave them a knowing smile and didn't bother to answer. Bill Closwall left her alone until one day he caught her at the stage door out the alley before the performance. "I've been trying to get you all afternoon," he said. "That Hollywood job at Gulliver Studios—it's yours at last. The money came through this afternoon."

She took a moment to think. "No," she said. "Not for me, Bill." "Now, listen, sweetheart!" Closwall began. "What's hit you? You can't let this down. Who do you think you are? It's a hundred a week—twenty-six dollars guaranteed. You'd be a contract player and they'll give you plenty of work at Gulliver. Small parts, but you're Katharine Cornell yet and you can't let the experience. That's what you want most."

"No," she said. "I'd just get buried. It happens all the time out there."

Closwall couldn't understand it. He leaned against the brick wall under the light of the single electric bulb. "Hey, what is this anyway? You're no better off in Three Decades. They've got two hundred extras in this cavalcade, you know." Suddenly he stopped arguing and studied her face. "Listen," he said, "if it's Gordon Bartlett, you're just wasting your time. He's got nothing for you with Eddie's show."

"I know," she said.

"Yes, yes, you say you know but you probably think you're going to talk him into giving you the part. Charm him or something. I thought you knew better. That whole thing's a phony. It smells. And it isn't Wynne either that's keeping you from the lead. Listen," he said, "this is how these things go. Bartlett signs Eddie to a Dramatists' Guild contract, gives him a hundred bucks to tie him up for a month, keeps him happy by promising him the moon, and then he goes to work on Wynne on a long-shot chance. If she likes the script and signs by some miracle, fine. Then Bartlett can raise the money on the strength of a Hollywood movie star and he can put on the show for a quick shot at a hit. The whole trouble is every star in Hollywood hollers she wants to come east for the living stage. Yes, they holler but you never see them come. Bartlett may be a good man to know, honey, but this time he's got nothing for you. Wynne's never coming east. Bartlett won't raise the dough. Eddie's just chasing himself blue in the face over nothing. I wouldn't expect him to know what's going on by himself but, frankly, I'm disappointed in you, Jenny. I didn't think Bartlett could fool you so badly." He explained it all patiently to her but the expression on her face stayed fixed.

"Bartlett didn't fool me," she said. "I knew the whole setup from the start."

The agent stared at her. "You knew? Well, I don't understand it! Then what are you stalling for? Sign up with Gulliver and go out to the coast!"

"What you forget, Bill," Jenny said slowly, "is that Gordon Bartlett's putting on Never Say Die. And he's got the money for that show."

Closwall's eyebrows went up on his forehead as he finally saw what she was working for all this time. "But Eddie?" he asked. "What about Eddie? You're letting him live in hopes. You're letting him sweat and plug away. I've seen some pretty hard babies in my time but I never thought you'd use your own husband just so you could be near Bartlett and play him for a spot in Never Say Die."

"I'm not hurting Eddie," she shot back at him. "I'm not keeping Wynne in Hollywood, am I? And if I can help myself, why shouldn't I?"

Closwall shook his head helplessly. "You're pretty cold-blooded," he said. "Jenny, you sure know what you want."

She didn't answer. She turned and calmly went inside on her way to the dressing room.

ANY feelings of guilt she had about Eddie never lasted very long with her. She told herself Ina Wynne might still come east, Bartlett might still live up to all the promises he had given Eddie, and besides, all theatrical ventures were speculative and uncertain. Nothing was ever sure on Broadway, and she'd be a fool to pass up a big chance for herself. She kept silent until that afternoon after she had lunched with Bartlett and come back to the hotel to find Eddie depressed and worried. It was almost three weeks since he had signed the contract.

"What's the sense in fussing over

A STATEMENT

TO THE TRUCK OWNERS OF AMERICA

FROM ★ DODGE ★

"A DOLLAR SAVED—a dollar earned" is one way to make money in business.

"Invest freely but wisely" is another way of doing it.

And then—there's a third and even more profitable way: "Save wisely by investing wisely."

Trucks are business equipment to which you can apply rule Number 3—"Save wisely by investing wisely."

The price you pay for your trucks is important. But what you get for what you pay is even more important. For example: Trucks that are under-powered are not economical at any price! They won't last on the job. And if a truck is over-powered, that's pure waste.

Apply this same rule to every other truck feature . . . clutch, transmission, frame, rear axle, brakes and springs. You reach the conclusion that the only truly economical truck on any job is a truck that fits the job.

That was the conclusion reached long ago by experienced Dodge truck engineers. And, that's the reason why Dodge builds over 100 chassis and body models that fit 97% of all hauling needs . . . with one to fit your job.

When you buy Dodge trucks you profit by precise quality standards that Dodge alone offers. You profit by a Dodge determination to maintain a long-existing reputation for Dodge dependability. You profit from the low prices of Dodge trucks . . . and from continued low operating costs.

Our 1941 line of Dodge Job-Rated trucks is now in production. Dodge sincerely believes these new trucks offer outstanding quality, value and dependability.

H. J. Hill
President, Dodge Division of Chrysler Corp.

DODGE Job-Rated TRUCKS

"Here's the tooth powder for you, Arm & Hammer or Cow Brand Baking Soda, an efficient dentifrice that is acceptable to the American Dental Association Council."

"The young and old in any family go a long way toward lifelong dental health by brushing their teeth regularly with either of these dependable Baking Soda Brands."

"This Baking Soda aids in cleaning the teeth, in brightening them to their natural color, leaves the mouth pleasantly refreshed. Costs only a few cents a package."

THIS BAKING SODA IS BICARBONATE OF SODA

ARM & HAMMER or COW BRAND
BICARBONATE OF SODA
BAKING SODA

CHURCH & DWIGHT CO., Inc.
10 Cedar Street, New York
Please send me Free Book, describing uses of Baking Soda, also a set of Colored Bird Cards. J-44

Name _____

Street _____

City _____

State _____

(Please print name and address)

crazy little changes?" he broke out irritably. "I don't know why Bartlett keeps pestering me with all these revisions. Why doesn't he get Wynne here? Why don't we get going?"

"Eddie," she said, "Eddie, listen."

"What?" The frown was deep on his face as he paused to listen.

"Wynne's not leaving Hollywood, Bartlett told me. I just had lunch with him."

THE news seemed to stun him, catching him unprepared. His mouth hung open stupidly. "He told you? You had lunch with him?"

"Yes. I'm sorry it's me who's telling you but you have to know. Bartlett can't raise money for the production. He's dropping the play."

"I don't get it," Eddie cried in a burst of resentment. "After everything he said to me, it just doesn't make sense. The play's good, Wynne or no Wynne. It's a good show, isn't it?"

"Well, don't blame me," she said softly. "It isn't my fault. They sell a show to backers on the cast, on the star, not on the script. That's the way it is."

He looked at her for a moment. His anger broke. He slumped into a chair and miserably held his hand up to his face. In the silence there was a knock on the door and Bill Closwall walked in.

"Congratulations," he said at once to Jenny. "I came over as soon as I heard."

"Congratulations?" Eddie asked.

"Yes," Closwall said, wondering. "Don't you know yet? Bartlett's giving Jenny a tryout for the girl lead in Never Say Die."

As Eddie rose to his feet, a blank, bewildered expression on his face, Jenny cursed Closwall furiously under her breath for a blundering idiot. Eddie would have had to know sooner or later but it didn't have to be just then.

"I've just told him Bartlett's dropping his play," she told Closwall.

"Oh, I see," the agent fumbled. "I forgot that. I thought it was all ancient history by this time." He stopped, realizing he was only making things worse.

Eddie's lips were twisted in a bitter smile. He kept his eyes fixed firmly on his wife. "Ancient history. I guess you all knew about it but me. Oh, boy," he laughed, "what a prize chump. I know now why you made me keep going back to Bartlett's place. You always told me everything was going to be all right and I guess you knew what you were talking about. I understand all those loving smiles, those sweet looks you gave him. So if I was really right and if you were really putting on an act for Bartlett, it was only for my sake, wasn't it?"

He mimicked her words to him with cruel, merciless effect.

"Sure," he cried, his voice rising. "Be smart and clever and work all the angles. Use everyone for all he's got no matter who he is. Be tough, mean, disloyal, anything. Get what you want. Don't bother with talent. That's unimportant to an actress, and experience is just a waste of time. The only thing that counts is to get ahead, and it's a lot of sentimental junk to let anything stand in your way." He picked up his hat and coat and went to the door. He faced Jenny, making an effort to restrain himself, to lower his voice. "All you ever wanted out of me was a chance to meet some big shot. Well, I produced my big shot for you and I hope you get your money's worth. My wife," he said, his hand on the knob. "My wife—she knows all the tricks." He closed the door and was gone.

The room seemed strangely quiet after he left. Closwall had hidden himself in a corner and Jenny, feeling angry, unhappy and a little guilty too, bit her lip and walked slowly to a chair.

"I didn't do anything against him," she said. "He's just sore on account of his play and because I got a break."

"Of course," the agent said. "Well, you can understand how it is. When a person wants something as bad as you kids want it, and when he nearly gets it and then loses it—well, it's more than disappointment. It's a kind of poison. He thinks the whole world's been plotting against him. He goes a little wacky. Somebody ought to keep an eye on Eddie until he gets over it. He's taking it hard."

Jenny let him talk. She kept her eyes on the carpet and the more her conscience troubled her the angrier she grew. "I didn't do anything against him," she said over and over again. "I didn't hurt him. I didn't scheme and plot against him. He's just crazy. It's a neurotic delusion. He's got a persecution complex or something."

"Yes," Closwall said carefully from his corner. "It's a complex. The whole trouble, though, with people who have complexes is that very often they've got some good reason for their insane delusions."

"Oh, get out," she flared up at him. She was almost crying. "You know everything. You're so wise. Oh, leave me alone."

EDDIE didn't return to the hotel that night and Jenny didn't see him the next day but she told herself fiercely that she didn't mind. Working with the script of Never Say Die, she spent the whole day in her room. She had decided to stay on with Three Decades for a while longer until everything was definitely set with Gordon Bartlett, but when she went to the theater that evening she saw no one, and if any of the girls tried to talk to her she showed no interest and waited impatiently to be left alone.

The other actresses buzzed in corners and sent her stony, disapproving glances. She knew they had learned about the part in Never Say Die and about Eddie as well. She could guess they were all busy making up nasty little details, energetically elaborating a rich tale to show her as being completely cheap, unscrupulous and disgusting. Jenny didn't care. She hated them. She hated their stupid, hopeless ambitions and their malicious jealousies.

The run-through performance was scheduled for three o'clock the next afternoon, but when Jenny reached the gloomy, deserted-looking auditorium there was one delay after another and she had almost an hour to while away. She saw Bill Closwall sitting deep in the theater, one leg hooked over the armrest of the seat next to him. Their eyes met but he didn't come forward to meet her and so she stayed where she was. Bartlett introduced her to the back stage. These were a pair of brothers, harassed men who inspected her frantically as they chewed on cigars. Their faces were baldly doubtful and as one of them stared at her he kept scratching his head in a way that seemed insulting.

Bartlett finally led her up to stage. Off in the wings, he whispered nervously to her. "Go out there and show them what you can do. Remember, I'm depending on you."

"Don't worry," she said calmly. "They'll like me. You'll see."

Her confidence was perfect. It gave Bartlett courage. He ran down the steps, smiling, and clapped his hands quietly. The actors began.

The moment her cue came and she stepped in front, she forgot herself, got everything except the character she was playing. Using makeshift props, ignoring the brick wall behind them, ignoring the bare stage and the ineptness of the costumes the actors were wearing, she moved through her performance with a complete belief in what was happening. She injected into her performance a sincerity that nearly lapsed for a moment. The first act forty minutes or so, but when the act stopped she was hardly aware any time at all had passed. Bartlett called out that there would be a minute interval for rest and they straggled off stage.

Jenny was tired but she felt sure. She went down the steps and groped around backstage until she found the alleyway led to the front of the theater. The stage was covered with heavy curtains and she pushed through them into the orchestra, she saw the two brothers, Bartlett arguing heatedly in a group.

"Stinks!" one of the backers was waving his hand at Bartlett. "An amateur. What are you trying to do on us? She smells up the place—"

Her heart had stopped. Everything inside of her went sick all at once as was as though the blood were drained from her, but the expression on her face didn't break for an instant. She smiled serenely enough. Bartlett had been nudging the heavy man and now three of them were looking at her.

"Oh, I'm sorry, girlie," the brother said. "See, I didn't quite realize. With these expressions, it's just a way of life."

"What it is," the other brother said diplomatically, "you got talent, a plenty of talent. You'll go far. For a show like this, you see, we need another type altogether. An actor

"Go 'way—it's my turn! You drove Aunt Ruth the last time"

ADOLPH SCH

"AT THE LOWEST POSSIBLE COST"

Keeping rates low, in the face of rising costs, has been one of the outstanding achievements of the Bell System.

This would not have been possible without efficiency all along the line, economies resulting from centralized research and manufacture, and a sincere desire to serve the best interests of the public.

BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM

ARTURO TOSCANINI
Victor Artist

KIRSTEN FLAGSTAD
Victor Artist

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Victor Artist

ARTIE SHAW
Victor Artist

LILY PONS
Victor Artist

Double Your Pleasure! GET Choose the instrument

Made For Each Other... Victor Records and the RCA Victrola

Lauritz Melchior, whose latest selections, "Three Famous Scenes" from Wagner, are in Victor Album M-644, is the famous Danish tenor of the Metropolitan Opera and an exclusive Victor artist. He is shown here with Mrs. Melchior in their charming home, enjoying RCA Victrola "Anniversary" Model V-205, which has Gentle-Action Automatic Record Changer... Exclusive RCA Victor Tone Guard... American and Foreign radio reception... 9 RCA Victor Preferred Type Tubes... Stabilized Electric Tuning... and other features... $150.00***

This instrument is also available with Home Recording Unit, as Model VHR-207, only . . . . . $200.00***

Ask your RCA Victor dealer

Model V-302 . . . The finest 1941 RCA Victrola. Beautiful Adam cabinet comes in walnut or rare feather crotch mahogany. Gold-plated Automatic Record Changer. Overseas Dial for superb radio reception. Generous record storage space . . . $300.00***

Model V-301 . . . A gorgeous pendule cabinet available in walnut or crotch mahogany. Automatic Record Changer. Overseas Dial for superb radio reception . . . . . $200.00***

NAT KING COLE Victor Artist    LOTTE LEHMANN Victor Artist    JOHN CHARLES THOMAS Victor Artist    TOMMY DORSEY Victor Artist    LARRY CLINTON Victor Artist

WORLD OF RADIO PLUS THE JOY OF RECORDS

Great artists choose

The Genuine

RCA Victrola

Combines Record and Radio Entertainment

Backed by 42 years of experience, these new, genuine RCA Victrola models bring you great new features in beautiful cabinets designed for every taste—at prices lower than ever before!

EVERYONE wants the double pleasure of records and radio—and now RCA Victor makes it possible for everyone to have it! These new 1941 RCA Victrola models are only radio-phonographs that offer you all these features!

1 Beautiful New Cabinets in Authentic Period Styles in Walnut or Mahogany—to fit in perfectly with your decoration... 2-Gentle-Action Automatic Record Changer—makes possible your own uninterrupted record concerts... 3 Amazing New Tone Guard—traps out unwanted external noise—makes purer, finer tone... 4-New Supersensitive Speakers and Audio Systems—full, rich tone at any volume. Reproduce long-wanted background music at whisper level without distortion... 5-New Home Recording—you can make your own records on many models... 6 Built-in Magic Loop Antenna plus separate short-wave aerial... 7-American and Foreign Radio Reception—remarkably clear, excellent volume... 8-Stabilized Electric Tuning—push a button—there's your station... 9-RCA Victor Preferred Type Tubes—for finer performance.

To be sure of real quality and value in buying a radio-phonograph, it will pay you to remember these facts: ...the RCA Victor engineers who developed famous Victor higher fidelity recording, work hand-in-hand with those responsible for the reproducing mechanism. Victor Records and the RCA Victrola are made for each other—all records sound better on this instrument.

...for 42 years RCA Victrola has been the leader. None can compare with it for beauty and fidelity of tone, excellence of cabinetry, trouble-free service and reasonable price. ...you may well be guided by the world's greatest artists—their choice of the RCA Victrola is prompted by the same confidence that inspires them to put their finest performances exclusively on Victor Records.

Your RCA Victor dealer will gladly show you how much more pleasure the features above will give you. See why the genuine RCA Victrola is the instrument that gives you the most for your money! Practically all models designed for use with Television or Frequency Modulation Attachments.

A SERVICE OF THE RADIO CORPORATION OF AMERICA

You can buy RCA Victor Radios and RCA Victrolas on C.I.T. easy payment plan. *Prices f.o.b. Camden, N. J., subject to change without notice. Trademarks "RCA Victor," "Victor," "Victrola," and "Magic Eye" Reg. U. S. Pat. Off. by RCA Mfg. Co., Inc.

Model V-100... 5 RCA Victor Preferred Type Tubes. Superheterodyne radio circuit. Constant-speed self-starting motor. Built-in Loop Antenna. Plays 10" or 12" records with lid closed. 2-point tone control for records and 2-point tone control for radio. Highly efficient permanent magnet dynamic speaker... $29.95***

Model V-102... 7 RCA Victor Preferred Type Tubes. Constant-speed, self-starting motor. Stabilized Electric Tuning. Built-in Magic Loop Antenna. 3-point bass and treble tone control for records. 2-point tone control for radio. Push-pull audio system—6 watts output. Automatic turntable start and stop... $59.95***

Special Victor Record Bonus Offer on each of these models

Model V-405... A graceful Sheraton cabinet—in walnut or mahogany, with antique brass finish grille work. Automatic Record Changer. American and foreign radio reception... $180.00***

Model V-201... Gentle-Action Automatic Record Changer for 10" or 12" records. American and foreign radio reception. 7 RCA Victor Preferred Type Tubes. Stabilized Electric Tuning. Built-in Magic Loop Antenna... $115.00***

Model V-200... Gentle-Action Automatic Record Changer for 10" or 12" records. American and foreign radio reception. 7 RCA Victor Preferred Type Tubes. Stabilized Electric Tuning... $99.95***

Model V-170... Gentle-Action Automatic Record Changer for 10" or 12" records. American and foreign radio reception. 6 RCA Victor Preferred Type Tubes. Stabilized Electric Tuning. 2 Built-in Magic Loop Antennas. 3-point tone control for records. 2-point tone control for radio... $89.95***

Model V-170... Gentle-Action Automatic Record Changer for 10" or 12" records. American and foreign radio reception. 6 RCA Victor Preferred Type Tubes. Stabilized Electric Tuning. 2 Built-in Magic Loop Antennas. 3-point tone control for records. 2-point tone control for radio... $89.95***

IT GETS THERE FAST

STEPPED UP FIRE-CHIEF

... the gasoline that keeps car engines alert ...

A little pressure on the starter...your engine snaps to action. A touch on the accelerator and you're away.

That's stepped-up FIRE-CHIEF performance for you...eager...effortless...alive! Quicker starts...smoother go...and real economy every mile you drive. That's what controlled volatility plus knock-free smoothness does.

Fill up with stepped-up FIRE-CHIEF. At its price you can't get a better gasoline.

at

TEXACO DEALERS

Texaco Dealers invite you to tune in The Texaco Star Theatre—starring Kenny Baker and Frances Langford Every Wednesday Night—C. S.—9:00 E.D.T., 8:00 E.S.T., 8:00 C.D.T., 7:00 C.S.T., 6:00 M.S.T., 5:00 P.S.T.

actress, more mature, a woman, not a girl. You know."

"Oh, of course," she said, forcing herself to say the words with easy nonchalance, fighting desperately to keep back the tears. "I know. It's just a case of miscasting."

"Now you said it, girlie," the first brother said hopefully. "Miscasting, yes. You hit the nail on the head."

Bartlett took her elbow and walked her away, going up the aisle with her. He was mumbling explanations and apologies to her but she wouldn't listen and blithely brushed his excuses aside.

"It's perfectly all right," she assured him. "I don't mind at all. These things happen. And there are plenty of other offers for me to consider." Her eyes wandered as she spoke and she looked for Bill Closwall but he was gone. "Well," she laughed, "I guess there's no point in going on with the other two acts. I guess I might as well leave now. I guess..." Her voice trailed and, without looking back at him, she left abruptly, going into the empty lobby and then out to the street.

The throngs of people filled the sidewalk. Bustling past her, they seemed self-contained, inhumanly hard and indifferent, concerned only in their own affairs. They didn't stop to notice her even though she was crying and the tears were at her eyes. Alone and numb, she made her way slowly back to her hotel. She thought of the humiliation she would have to go through when the girls would all group around her to say what a louse Gordon Bartlett was and how shabbily he had treated her. Outwardly they would all be sympathetic and endearing; they would comfort her glibly, Jenny knew, but within themselves they would gloat and be happy. And then she found she no longer hated them. They were all like herself, she saw, living in the dreary hotels off Broadway, eating quick drugstore meals, waiting from day to day, and as they waited they all had to battle constantly not only for some opportunity but also to maintain their courage, their confidence, their hopes, themselves. She felt achingly lonely. With all her heart now she wanted someone near her, someone she could trust and cry to, and thinking of Eddie, the realization came to her with a sweeping rush of pain that she had been utterly wrong and shameless.

She was surprised to find Bill Closwall waiting for her in the hotel lobby. He drew her aside to a corner where they could be alone.

"Well," she said hopelessly, "you saw it. You know."

"I stayed ten, fifteen minutes. It was enough."

"All right. Then say it. So I wasn't so smart. So the tricks didn't work out after all..."

HE MADE her stop. "Never mind that now," he said. His face was glum. "It doesn't matter. Listen, Jenny. You know show business and movie people. When you need them, they lose interest in you. When you turn down an offer, they think you must be wonderful. And when Gulliver Studios heard you were getting the lead in Never Say Die they went a little hysterical with excitement. They took it into their heads you must be the hottest prospect on Broadway since John Garfield." He paused and watched her face carefully. "The offer was on the teletype this morning. They've got an important spot for you in a picture they're beginning to shoot. They want you out there right away. It's seven-fifty a week and there'll be thirteen weeks of it anyway until they find out whether you're worth it or not." He finished and waited.

The exultation shot through her, bringing new life. She beamed and clasped her hands. "Oh, Bill!" she cried, nearly weeping. "Bill, it's so magnificent for me! It's everything I want at this time, too. I'm so happy..."

Then she had to halt. She had noticed the sober, thoughtful expression on his face. "What?" she asked. "What?"

"Well, nothing," he said. "It's just Eddie. He's been drinking. You went a little wild and all that. He's up in the lockup in Philadelphia. He'll be all right now. I had a man checking on him and we brought him home this afternoon. He's in the upstairs. Jenny," he said, "he could use somebody around him for a while. Needs somebody strong, right now."

Closwall had stopped talking but Jenny didn't speak. She could feel his eyes on her even though she wouldn't meet his gaze. The first flush of anger was gone. She stood in the dim light of the lobby and debated within herself whether to go home or to stay. She felt cool and unexcited as she considered the offer.

"They've booked a reservation for you on the seven-o'clock plane to Newark. The contract's waiting for you in Hollywood. Of course," he said liberally, "of course, I'm an agent and I get ten per cent. That's how I make my living. I don't have to know about anything else and ten per cent of seven hundred and fifty dollars is a nice piece of money each week. Of course," he said, "He lingered a moment or two and then left her alone."

JENNY sat in the large dressing room before her mirror, completely absorbed as she put on her make-up for the evening's performance of Three Dollars. She had come early and so she was alone in the room which she shared with five other actresses. She spent nearly an hour in regrets. She dabbed grease paint on her face and then worked it in with her fingers. Then she lightly touched on a coating of powder. Bill Closwall had come up to the opened door but she didn't know he was there until he said, "I was at the airport," he said quietly. "I didn't see you."

"No," she said. She didn't turn to look at him but her voice was firm and sure. "I decided against Hollywood. There's no sense in going out there just for the money and I think it's better for me to stay east. I'd rather work the stage. I'm not interested in pictures just now."

For a moment Closwall didn't speak. "That's right," he finally said. "You certainly know what you're doing. You're smart, Jenny." She couldn't see his face but he was smiling broadly. He shook his head in the helpless wonder she drew from him, and as he started to turn away he was whistling happily to himself.

Jenny picked up the pot of rouge and leaned close to the mirror to get the color on her face just right. She worked patiently. With painstaking care, giving full time to each detail, she applied the eye shadow to her lids, brushed mascara on her lashes, darkened her eyebrows with the pencil. Her resolution had never broken. With her body lived Jenny Field—herself, free from everyone outside, a separate identity that would never pause to be hurt. She would succeed. Her heart she knew it had to come to her.

She heard the girls in the passage outside now. Their voices came and went, a little gayer tonight than of late. Jenny thought, because she had learned of her failure at the rehearsal. They came on, and when they were alone in the room they all rushed to her. They put their hands around her shoulders and hugged her and their sympathy gushed: "Dear Jenny, they cooed, 'it must be so terrible for you. Darling, we're so sorry. Of course, Gordon Bartlett's such a louse. It's just terrible to deal with, darling, but one always says that..."

The Patriotic Murders

Continued from page 24

With a puffing noise as of a steam engine at high pressure Julia Olivera appeared on the scene. She panted out: "I heard a shot. Is Alistair— Why—" "I stared blankly at Howard Raikes. "You? Why, why, how dare you?" "Jane said in an icy voice, "Howard has saved Uncle Alistair's life, Mother." "What? I—I—" "This man tried to shoot Uncle Alistair, and Howard grabbed him and took his pistol away from him." "Frank Carter said violently, "You're a body liars, all of you." "Mrs. Olivera, her jaw dropping, said quickly: "Oh!" "I took her a minute or two to readjust my poise. She turned first to Blunt. "My dear Alistair! How awful! Thank heaven you're safe. But it must have been a frightful shock. I—I feel quite faint myself. I wonder—do you think I could have just a little brandy?" "Blunt said quickly, "Of course. Come back to the house." "He took his arm, leaning on it heavily. "Blunt looked over his shoulder at Poirot and Howard Raikes. "Can you bring that fellow along?" he asked. "We'll ring up the police and send him over." "Frank Carter opened his mouth, but no words came. He was dead white, and his knees were wilting. Howard Raikes asked him along with an unsympathetic air. "Come on you," he said. "Frank Carter murmured hoarsely and unconvincedly, "It's all a lie. . . ." "Howard Raikes looked at Poirot. "You've got precious little to say for yourself for a high-toned sleuth! Why don't you throw your weight about a bit?" "I am reflecting, Mr. Raikes." "I guess you'll need to reflect! I should say you'll lose your job over this! It isn't thanks to you that Alistair is still alive at this minute." "This is your second good deed of the day, is it not, Mr. Raikes?" "What the hell do you mean?"

"It was only yesterday, was it not, that you caught and held the man whom you believed to have shot at Mr. Blunt and the Prime Minister?"

Howard Raikes said, "Er—yes. I seem to be making a kind of habit of it."

"But there is a difference," Hercule Poirot pointed out. "Yesterday, the man you caught and held was not the man who fired the shot in question. You made a mistake."

Frank Carter said sullenly, "He's made a mistake now."

"Quiet, you," said Raikes.

Hercule Poirot murmured to himself, "I wonder. . . ."

DRESSING for dinner, adjusting his tie to an exact symmetry, Hercule Poirot frowned at his reflection in the mirror.

He was dissatisfied—but he would have been at a loss to explain why. For the case, as he owned to himself, was so very clear. Frank Carter had indeed been caught redhanded.

It was not as though he had any particular belief in or liking for Frank Carter. Carter, he thought dispassionately, was definitely what the English call a "wrong un." He was an unpleasant young bully of the kind that appeal to women, so that they are reluctant to believe the worst, however plain the evidence.

And Carter's whole story was weak in the extreme. This tale of having been approached by agents of the "secret service"—and offered a plummy job. To take the post of gardener and report on the conversations and actions of the other gardeners. It was a story that was disproved easily enough—there was no foundation for it.

And on Carter's side, there was nothing at all to be said. He could offer no alternative explanation, except that somebody else must have shot off the revolver. He kept repeating that. It was a frame-up.

No, there was nothing to be said for Carter except, perhaps, that it seemed an odd coincidence that Howard Raikes

Our ads neither coax nor hoax—

YOU DON'T find personal opinions... private research... high-pressure claims... or special pleading... in ads for Philip Morris cigarettes.

Claims or pleas look silly against this vital, proved difference:

Read it...summed up in the findings of a group of distinguished doctors:
WHEN SMOKERS CHANGED TO PHILIP MORRIS EVERY CASE OF IRRITATION OF THE NOSE OR THROAT — DUE TO SMOKING — CLEARED COMPLETELY, OR DEFINITELY IMPROVED!

SMOKING-PLEASURE without penalties! Philip Morris' superiority — for the nose and throat — is recognized by eminent medical authorities. No other cigarette can make that statement!

CALL FOR PHILIP MORRIS

America's FINEST Cigarette

CREATORS OF FAMOUS CIGARETTES FOR 92 YEARS, ALWAYS UNDER THE PHILIP MORRIS NAME

Is this the way homework is done in your home? Diligently, laboriously, and yet—ineffectually? According to psychologists, a portable typewriter will help solve this common problem.

Or is your child on the brilliant side? If so, educators will tell you that this youngster needs a typewriter to give wings to her hidden powers of imagination.

Why should eager minds be chained?

WHAT MAKES homework drudgery for so many children . . . possibly your own?

Why does even a brilliant youngster seem to freeze up when it comes to putting thoughts on paper?

Modern educators and leading psychologists give this as the answer: Your child's creative processes are chained to the crawling pace of his pencil! The tedious job of handwriting is a shackle that fetters his imagination. As the mere task of writing causes your child to freeze off answering letters.

What's the solution?

A portable typewriter! The proof? Thousands of tests in the nation's schools have shown that children learn faster . . . concentrate better . . . get 10% to 30% higher grades in many subjects when they do their work on a typewriter.

The reason is obvious.

Typing—because it is faster . . . easier . . . releases the child's mind and energy for imagination . . . frees his imaginative powers . . . improves spelling . . . punctuation . . . grammar. It helps bring mental order out of tangled thinking. And remember, most children can learn to type faster than they can write.

Not only is the portable typewriter a valuable educational tool—but knowledge of its use helps in many occupations . . . or is a profession in itself! When your child goes into secretarial, newspaper, advertising work . . . becomes a salesman with product to fill out, a young lawyer with briefs to draw up, a doctor handling his own correspondence . . . a typewriter is indispensable.

Which Portable will help your child most? Isn't it common sense to select that Portable which most closely resembles a standard office typewriter? In other words, a Royal.

The Royal Portable is actually a replica of the standard office machine—choice of 20,000 schools. For example, only the Royal has a keyboard identical with that on a standard machine. (One person typing teachers recommend the Royal.)

Your child will learn typing quickly by the touch system . . . especially with the exclusive Royal "Self Teacher" which is included at no extra cost with every Royal Portable. Tests show that the average child readily learns to type 30 to 40 words a minute. Your hastily scribbled note is written at the probable rate of only 29 words a minute. Thus, the normal child easily teaches himself to type faster than he can write.

Which is the typewriter? A smart, airplane-luggage case with brass fittings is an engaging feature of the new Royal Quiet De Luxe Model, last word in Portable perfection. (All Royal Portable cases are so constructed that the machine cannot fall out—even if the case is carried open. Rubber suction-cups on the bottom of each case anchor the typewriter to the table top—eliminate table-top scratches and scars.)

There are only a few of the features which have made Royal World's Number One Portable—

MAGIC* Margin—No fussing with mechanism to change set margin on a Royal. Flip the MAGIC Margin lever . . . it's set! Only Royal has it.

Touch Control*—Do you tap, peck, or pound when you type? Simply adjust the accessible Touch Control to the position where it exactly matches your touch. Again . . . only Royal has it!

Locked Bob-Less Shift—Less noise . . . less eyestrain as you shift for capital letters on the Royal. The carriage won't jump!

Automobile-Type shock absorbers—rubber-cushion feet and metal springs—practically eliminate shock to fingers.

Finger-Comfort Keys—Even the keys on a Royal are different. Shaped to fit the finger, each is protected from grime and discoloration, with Lucite. Only Royal has it!

Margin Release—Like the backspacer, this key is in the same position on the Royal Portable as on a standard office machine. Only on a Royal is this true!

It costs no more to own a Royal Portable than to rent one! Your typewriter dealer is authorized to sell you an easy-paying Royal for as little as $3 down and $3 a month (typewriter case and instruction book included).

Little enough to pay for the greater freedom of expression, the new-found wings for an eager mind . . . that a Royal means for your child! Write to Royal, 2 Park Avenue, New York City, for a free trial in your home.

ROYAL ARROW MODEL $54.50. OTHER PORTABLE MODELS FROM $34.50 TO $64.50

*Trademarks Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

Copyright 1940 Royal Typewriter Co., Inc.

Royal Portable

The Only STANDARD Typewriter
in PORTABLE Size

"Disappointed? Rowena, I should think you would be!... with the dear child studying by that flickering fire."

Think what a strain that puts on his eyes! Every youngster needs plenty of good sight-saving light to help him see better without eyestrain. The right size G-E MAZDA lamps in the right places will help protect his eyesight... probably improve his grades and may even help him to be a "dark horse" some day.

SEE HOW LITTLE THEY COST

40, 50, 60-watts 13¢ 75 and 100-watts 15¢

7½, 15, 25-watt 10¢

G-E MAZDA LAMPS
GENERAL ELECTRIC

WHICH of these women has learned the secret of Fifteen Minutes a Day?

TWO women live in neighboring homes. They are the same age. Their husbands' incomes are about equal. They seem to have the same chance of social success and happiness. And yet one of these is seldom invited to go out.

The other woman is always the center of a group. She is sought after as a guest.

MAKE HER SECRET YOUR OWN

Her secret is very simple. She has learned how to attract people. She has read many things. Her mind is keen and alert, and people feel instinctively that she is worth knowing.

Make her secret your own. It is possible to secure all at once and at

THIS COUPON ENTITLES YOU TO FREE BOOKLETS

P. F. Collier & Son Corporation
250 Park Avenue, New York City
I am interested in receiving by mail, free and without obligation, your valuable booklet, "Fifteen Minutes a Day," describing the famous library, Dr. Eliot's Five-Foot Shelf of Books (The Harvard Classics) and the beautiful brochure, the "Men Behind the Classics." 448 HCS

Mr. _____
Name Mrs. _____
Miss _____
Address _____

very small expense the few great books that enable anyone to think clearly and talk well.

You will understand how this is possible when you have read "Fifteen Minutes a Day"—a wonderfully interesting Free book which tells you about the beautiful new Home Library Edition of The Harvard Classics—now easily available to the most modest home budget.

You need not decide now. Simply mail the coupon for the Free booklet "Fifteen Minutes a Day" which has brought new happiness to thousands who have sent for it. Also, for limited time only, we will send you "Men Behind the Classics" which contains dramatic biographies of men whose immortal writings appear in The Harvard Classics. A fine piece of literature. Both of these booklets will be sent you free, postpaid and without obligation. Simply fill out and mail the coupon.

should have been present two days running at the moment when a bullet had just missed Alistair Blunt.

But presumably there wasn't anything in that. Raikes certainly hadn't fired the shot in Downing Street. And his presence down here was fully accounted for—he had come down to be near his girl. No, there was nothing definitely improbable in his story.

It had turned out, of course, very fortunately for Howard Raikes. When a man has just saved you from a bullet, you cannot forbid him the house. The least you can do is to show friendliness and extend hospitality. Mrs. Olivera didn't like it, obviously, but even she saw that there was nothing to be done about it.

Jane's undesirable young man had got his foot in and he meant to keep it there!

Poirot watched him speculatively during the evening.

He was playing his part with a good deal of astuteness. He did not air any subversive views, he kept off politics and the war. He told amusing stories of his hitchhikes and tramps in wild places.

"He is no longer the wolf," thought Poirot. "No, he has put on the sheep's clothing. But underneath? I wonder..."

As Poirot was preparing for bed that night, there was a rap on the door. Poirot called, "Come in," and Howard Raikes entered.

He laughed at Poirot's expression.

"Surprised to see me? I've had my eye on you all evening. I didn't like the way you were looking. Kind of thoughtful."

"Why should that worry you, my friend?"

"I don't know why, but it did. I thought maybe that you were finding certain things just a bit hard to swallow."

"Eh bien? And if so?"

"Well, I decided that I'd best come clean. About yesterday, I mean. That was a fake show all right! You see, I was watching his lordship come out of 10 Downing Street and I saw Ram Lal fire at him. I know Ram Lal. He's a nice kid. A bit excitable but he feels the wrongs of India very keenly. Well, there was no harm done, that precious pair of stuffed shirts weren't harmed—the bullet had missed 'em both by miles—so I decided to put up a show and hope the Indian kid would get clear. I grabbed hold of a shabby little guy just by me and called out that I'd got the villain and hoped Ram Lal was beating it all right. But the dicks were too smart. They were onto him in a flash. That's just how it was. See?"

Hercule Poirot said, "And today?"

"THAT'S different. There weren't any Ram Lals about today. Carter was the only man on the spot. He fired that pistol all right! It was still in his hand when I jumped on him. He was going to try a second shot, I expect."

Poirot said, "You were very anxious to preserve the safety of M. Blunt?"

Raikes grinned—an engaging grin.

"A bit odd, you think, after all I've said? Oh, I admit it. I think Blunt is a guy who ought to be shot—for the sake of progress and humanity—I don't mean personally—he's a nice enough old boy in his British way. I think that, and yet when I saw someone taking a pot shot at him I leap in and interfere. That shows you how illogical the human animal is. It's crazy, isn't it?"

"The gap between theory and practice is a wide one."

"I'll say it is!" Mr. Raikes got up from the bed where he had been sitting. His smile was easy and confiding. "I just thought," he said, "that I'd come along and explain the thing to you."

He went out, shutting the door carefully behind him.

"Deliver me, O Lord, from the evil man: preserve me from the violent man," sang Mrs. Olivera in a firm voice slightly off the note.

There was a restlessness about the enunciation of the sentiment, which made Hercule Poirot deduce that M. Howard Raikes was the wicked man immediately in her mind.

Hercule Poirot had accompanied his host and the family to the morning service in the village church.

Howard Raikes had said with a faint sneer, "So you always go to church, M. Blunt?"

And Alistair had murmured vaguely something about it being expected of you in the country—can't let the pars down, you know—which typically English sentiment had merely bewildered the young man, and had made Hercule Poirot smile comprehendingly.

Mrs. Olivera had tactfully accompanied her host and commanded Jane to do likewise.

THE tenors and basses demanded with gusto, "Keep me, O Lord, from the hands of the wicked; preserve me from the violent man; who have purposed overthrow my goings."

Hercule Poirot essayed a hesitant baritone.

"The proud have hid a snare for me," he sang, "and cords; they have spread a net by the wayside..."

His mouth remained open.

He saw it—saw clearly the net in which he had so nearly fallen!

A snare cunningly laid—a net with cords—a pit open at his feet—dug carefully so that he should fall into it.

Like a man in a trance Hercule Poirot remained, mouth open, staring in space.

He remained there as the congregation seated themselves with a rustle until Jane Olivera tugged at his arm and murmured a sharp, "Sit down."

Hercule Poirot sat down.

He was in a daze—a glorious daze where isolated facts spun wildly around before settling neatly into their appointed places.

It was like a kaleidoscope—shades of buckles, No. 10 stockings, a damaged face, the low tastes in literature of the page boy, the activities of the Amberiotis and the part played by the late Mr. Morley all rose up and whirled and settled themselves down into a coherent pattern.

For the first time, Hercule Poirot was looking at the case the right way up.

"For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry. Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, He hath also rejected thee from being king. Here cometh the first lesson," quavered the aged clergyman all in one breath.

As one in a dream, Hercule Poirot rose to praise the Lord in the Te Deum.

"M. Reilly, is it not?"

SURE FIRE!

SPARK PLUGS

Clean Plugs mean better performance and gas economy, too

Dirty and worn spark plugs misfire. That makes your car lazy, causes hard starting, and wastes as much gas as one gallon in ten. Spark plug cleaning "by the AC Method" gets rid of these troubles. So, have your neighborhood Registered AC Cleaning Station clean and regap your plugs every 4,000 miles. And when you need new plugs, get AC's and get full satisfaction.

Here's the EASY AC WAY . . .

 LOOK for this SIGN- 70,000 Service Places Display It	Have Plugs CLEANED by the AC METHOD Cleaning Includes REGAPPING to the Engineers' Standards The Cost is only 5c EACH the biggest nickel's worth you ever got
---	--

SPARK PLUGS NEED CLEANING, TOO

Replace worn plugs with new AC's for best engine performance

For More Than 31 Years THE QUALITY SPARK PLUG

Buick, Cadillac, Chevrolet, LaSalle, Nash, Oldsmobile, and Pontiac motor cars; Chevrolet, Diamond-T, Federal, GMC, and International Trucks; Allis-Chalmers, J. I. Case, Cletrac and International Harvester Tractors . . . these are some of the well-known cars, trucks, and tractors which use AC Quality Spark Plugs. Trust your spark plug requirements to the same brand of spark plugs which the leading, big-volume manufacturers select.

Get a Set—and Get the difference

AC SPARK PLUG DIVISION • General Motors Corporation
FLINT, MICHIGAN

The Sign of Friendly Service

“That’s M Riding Habit!”

And it's the habit of 1½ million motorists daily to stop at the Red Horse Sign. Reason: Mobilgas and Mobiloil deliver all good gasoline and oil qualities in full measure!

IT'S A GOOD HABIT . . . stopping at that famous Sign of the Flying Red Horse. That's where you're sure of your money's worth in gasoline!

For Mobilgas is made to give you all good gasoline qualities—not just one or two. It's made to meet every demand of your modern, fast-firing motor—in traffic or on the road.

It atomizes instantly, fires evenly, burns completely. Every drop is scientifically clean . . . all pep and power!

No matter what you ask—quick starts; smooth getaway; or long, low-cost mileage—you get it in Mobilgas. Fill up for “Balanced Performance”!

1. Quick starts despite cool engine.
2. Fast warm-up—rapid acceleration.
3. Freedom from vapor-lock—no stalls.
4. Minimum crankcase oil dilution.
5. High anti-knock value.
6. Cleanliness—freedom from gum.
7. Full, smooth power under all conditions.
8. Long mileage—economical operation.

SOCONY-VACUUM OIL COMPANY, INC.
AND AFFILIATES
Magnolia Petroleum Co.—General Petroleum Corp. of Calif.

young Irishman started as the spoke at his elbow. turned.

ending next to him at the counter of shipping company was a small man with large mustaches and an egg-shaped head. "You do not remember me, perhaps?" "You do yourself an injustice, M. Poirot. You're not a man that's easily forgotten."

turned back to speak to the clerk at the counter who was waiting. His voice at his elbow murmured: "You are going abroad for a holiday? Not wise in wartime?"

"Not a holiday I'm taking. And myself, M. Poirot? You're not going your back on this country, I think sometimes," said Hercule Poirot, "I'm on a short trip to the country." "I'm doing the same," said Reilly. "I'm going to Ireland I'm bound for." He said: "And I don't think I'll be coming back, either. Later, maybe, I'll go to America."

"I'm sorry to hear that, Mr. Reilly. Well, then, abandoning your practice on Queen Charlotte Street." "You'd say it was abandoning me, wouldn't you?" "I'm nearer the mark."

"Need? That is very sad." "It doesn't worry me. When I think of the other day, I shall leave behind me a very un- happy man."

"I'm pained engagingly. I'm not I who'll be shooting myself out of money troubles. Leave them to you, I say, and start afresh. I've got qualifications and they're good. I say so myself."

"I saw Miss Morley the other day."

"Is that a pleasure to you? I'd say not. A more sour-faced woman I've never lived. I've often wondered what she was like drunk—but that's what no one ever knows."

"Did you agree with the verdict of the coroner's court on your friend's death?"

"I don't," said Reilly emphatically. "I don't think he made a mistake in his injection?"

"If Morley injected that with the amount that they say he did, he was either drunk or else he meant to kill the man. And I've never seen Morley drink."

"So you think it was deliberate?" "I'd not like to be saying that. It's a grave accusation to be making. Truly now, I don't believe it."

"There must be some explanation." "There must indeed—but I've not thought of it yet."

Poirot said, "When did you last actually see Mr. Morley alive?"

"Let me see now. It's a long time after to be asking me a thing like that. It would be the night before—about a quarter to seven."

"You didn't see him on the actual day of the murder?"

Reilly shook his head.

"You are sure?" Poirot persisted.

"Oh, I'd not say that. But I don't remember—"

"You did not, for instance, go up to his room about eleven thirty-five when he had a patient there?"

"You're right now. I did. There was a technical question I had to ask him about some instruments I was ordering. They'd rung me up about it. But I was only there for a minute, so it slipped my memory. He had a patient there at the time."

Poirot nodded. He said, "There is another question I always meant to ask you. Your patient, Mr. Raikes, canceled his appointment by walking out. What did you do during that half-hour's leisure?"

"What I always do when I have any leisure. Mixed myself a drink. And as I've been telling you, I put through a telephone call and ran up to see Morley for a minute."

Poirot said, "And I also understand that you had no patient from half past twelve to one, after Mr. Barnes left. When did he leave, by the way?"

"Oh! Just after half past twelve."

"And what did you do then?"

"The same as before. Mixed myself another drink!"

"And went up to see Morley again?"

Mr. Reilly smiled.

"Are you meaning did I go up and shoot him. I've told you already, long ago, that I did not. But you've only my word for it."

Poirot said, "What did you think of

"Er—later on for that, Watson!"

DOUGLAS BORGSTEDT

Keep Up with the Times in Your Own PIPER CUB

Do You Know...

that more people have learned to fly in Cubs than in any other make of plane?

that owners of Piper Cubs get up to 100,000 miles on a single set of tires?

that you require only 35 solo hours to be eligible to apply for a private pilot's certificate?

that over 50% of light planes are sold on the installment plan, much the same as automobile financing?

that you learn to fly in the plane, at the controls, right from the start of instruction?

that every new Piper Cub must fly in straight and level flight for extended periods with hands and feet off the controls before test pilots will release the ship for delivery?

that traveling by light plane is the most economical form of power transportation?

that an average person can solo a Cub after only eight hours of flight instruction?

that more than 70% of the airplanes being used in the Civilian Pilot Training Program are Piper Cubs?

that you get as much as 25 miles to a gallon of gasoline in a Piper Cub?

that the Piper Cub factory is geared to the production of one airplane every 40 minutes?

that anyone sixteen years of age or above in normal health and with normal judgment can learn to fly?

See the Piper Cub Exhibits at Both of the World's Fairs

DOWN PAYMENT
PRICES NOW START AT

$333

FOR THE EASY-TO-FLY
PIPER CUBS

YOU, too, can be one of the thousands of people who this year are winning their wings in the new Piper Cub! You require no unusual abilities because the Piper Cub is the easiest-to-fly of all airplanes. You need no great wealth because the Piper Cub costs no more than a medium-priced car . . . and far less to operate. You can discover the enjoyment of flying this safe, dependable airplane in a very few minutes because the Piper Cub Dealer at your airport will be pleased to give you a free flight demonstration, with you handling the controls under the guidance of a government-licensed instructor. When you take your free demonstration, ask about the given every purchaser of a new Piper Cub. It consists of eight hours of dual flight instruction . . . take-offs, landings, taxiing and fundamental air maneuvers. At the completion of this free instruction the average person is ready to solo . . . Piper Cubs are priced as low as $995 for the famous two-place tandem models. The quiet, comfortable Piper Coupe, seating two people side-by-side, from $1848. The Piper Cruiser, which accommodates three people, only $1798. All prices F.A.F. Lock Haven, Pa.

FREE FLYING COURSE

FREE CATALOG!

Send today for free literature, details of the free flying course and name of your Piper Cub Dealer. Piper Aircraft Corporation, 940 R Street, Lock Haven, Pa., U. S. A.

Piper Cub

OUTSELLS ALL OTHER LIGHT PLANES COMBINED

STERLING HAYDEN 23-year-old skipper, who has sailed the
"Seven Seas."

WHEN THERE'S A WHIFF O' Velvet
IN THE WIND

... watch all the pipes come out! That wonderful aroma and milder taste can only come from Kentucky's finest Burley...

You'll Say VELVET'S
THE RIGHT WORD FOR SMOOTH SMOKING
MILD and COOL—NO "BITE"

*Try Velvet...
Better Smoking Tobacco*

Copyright 1940, LIGGETT & MYERS TOBACCO CO

the house parlormaid, Agnes?" Reilly stared.

"Now that's a funny question to be asking."

"But I should like to know."

"I'll answer you. I didn't think about her. Georgina kept a strict eye on the maids—and quite right too. The girl never looked my way once—which was bad taste on her part."

"I have a feeling," said Hercule Poirot, "that that girl knows something."

He looked inquiringly at Mr. Reilly. The latter smiled and shook his head.

"Don't ask me," he said. "I know nothing about it. I can't help you at all."

He gathered up the tickets lying in front of him and went off with a nod and a smile.

Poirot explained to a disillusioned clerk that he could not make up his mind about those tickets after all.

Poirot paid another visit to Hampstead. Mrs. Adams was a little surprised, perhaps, to see him. Though he had been vouched for, so to speak, by a chief inspector of Scotland Yard, she nevertheless regarded him as a "quaint little foreigner" and had not taken his pretensions very seriously. She was, however, very willing to talk.

AFTER the first sensational announcement about the identity of the victim, the findings of the inquest had received little publicity. It had been a case of mistaken identity—the body of Mrs. Chapman had been mistaken for that of Miss Sainsbury Seale. That was all that the public knew. The fact that Miss Sainsbury Seale had been probably the last person to see the unfortunate Mrs. Chapman alive was not stressed. There had been no hint in the press that Miss Sainsbury Seale might possibly be wanted by the police on a criminal charge.

Mrs. Adams had been very relieved when she knew that it was not her friend's body which had been discovered so dramatically. She appeared to have no idea that any suspicion might attach to Mabelle Sainsbury Seale.

"But it is so extraordinary that she has disappeared like this. I feel sure, M. Poirot, that it must be loss of memory."

Poirot said that it was very probable. He had known cases of the kind.

"Yes—I remember a friend of one of my cousins. She'd had a lot of nursing and worry, and it brought it on. Amnesia, I think they called it."

Poirot said that he believed that was the technical term.

He paused and then asked if Mrs. Adams had ever heard Miss Sainsbury Seale speak of a Mrs. Albert Chapman.

No, Mrs. Adams never remembered her friend's mentioning anyone of that name. But then, of course, it wasn't likely that Miss Sainsbury Seale should happen to mention everyone with whom she was acquainted. Who was this Mrs. Chapman? Had the police any idea who could have murdered her?

"It is still a mystery, Madame," Poirot shook his head and then asked if it was Mrs. Adams who had recommended Mr. Morley as a dentist to Miss Sainsbury Seale.

Mrs. Adams replied in the negative. She herself went to a Mr. French in Harley Street and if Mabelle had asked her about a dentist she would have sent her to him.

Possibly, Poirot suggested, it might have been this Mrs. Chapman who recommended Miss Sainsbury Seale to go to Mr. Morley.

Mrs. Adams agreed that it might have been. Didn't they know at the dentist's?

But Poirot had already asked Miss Nevill that question and Miss Nevill had not known or had not remembered. She recollected Mrs. Chapman, but did not think the latter had ever mentioned a Miss Sainsbury Seale—the naming an odd one, she would have remembered it had she heard it then.

Poirot persevered with his questions.

Mrs. Adams had known Miss Sainsbury Seale first in India, had she? Mrs. Adams agreed.

Did Mrs. Adams know if Miss Sainsbury Seale had met Mr. or Mrs. Albert Blunt at any time out there?

"Oh, I don't think so, M. Poirot," he meant the big banker? They were some years ago staying with the roy, but I'm sure if Mabelle had met them at all she would have talked it or mentioned them.

"I'm afraid," added Mrs. Adams with a faint smile, "one does usually meet the important people. We're all snobs at heart."

"She never did mention the Blunts," Mrs. Blunt in particular?

"Never."

"If she had been a close friend of Blunt's probably you would have known?"

"Oh, yes. I don't believe she knew anyone like that. Mabelle's friends were all very ordinary people—like us."

"That, Madame, I cannot allow," Poirot gallantly.

Mrs. Adams went on talking of Mabelle Sainsbury Seale as one talkative friend who has recently died. She called all Mabelle's good work her kindnesses, her indefatigable work for the mission, her zeal, her earnestness.

Hercule Poirot listened. As Mrs. Adams said, Mabelle Sainsbury Seale was a person. She had lived in Calcutta, taught elocution and worked among the native population. She had been a respectable, well meaning, a little stupid and perhaps, but also a woman with a heart of gold.

And Mrs. Adams' voice ran on as if it was so much in earnest over everything. M. Poirot. And she found people apathetic—so hard to rouse. It was difficult to get subscriptions out of people—worse every year, with the cost of living rising and the cost of living rising and the cost of living rising. She said to me once: "What one knows what money can do—wonderful good you can accomplish with it—well, really sometimes, Alice, I would commit a crime to get it. It shows, doesn't it, M. Poirot, how strongly she felt?"

"She said that, did she?" said Poirot thoughtfully.

He asked, casually, when Miss Sainsbury Seale had enunciated this particular statement, and learned that it had been about three months ago.

He left the house and walked away lost in thought.

HE WAS considering the character of Mabelle Sainsbury Seale.

A nice woman—an earnest and kind woman—a respectable, decent woman. It was amongst that person that Mr. Barnes had suggested a potential criminal could be found.

She had traveled back on the boat from India as Mr. Adams. There seemed reason to believe she had lunched with him at the Savoy.

She had accosted and claimed acquaintance with Alistair Blunt, claiming to an intimacy with his wife.

She had twice visited King Mansions where, later, a dead body had been found dressed in her clothes with her handbag conveniently lying by it.

A little too convenient, that!

She had left the Glengowrie Hotel suddenly after an interview with the police.

Could the theory that Hercule Poirot believed to be true account for all plain all those facts?

He thought it could.

(To be continued next week)

Traitor's Purse

Continued from page 21

didn't know him at all, did you, Campion?"

appear to have been the last person to have seen him alive." The remark seemed to be the most cautious he could make in the circumstances but it was not altogether fortunate. Amanda, who followed Aubrey into the room at that particular moment, heard and said the first and natural thing to come into her head.

"He was there, too," she said, "unless you saw him in the garden when you showed him in."

Everybody looked at Campion. Aubrey and Hutch looked because they knew where Anscombe had died and Amanda and Pyne looked because the others were looking.

"That's right," said Campion. "I followed him into the garden with a parcel he'd left in the car. I didn't catch it, though, so I put the package on the doorstep and went back."

There was another pause after he had spoken and again it was broken by Pyne.

"What an extraordinary thing to do, a boy," he said, and laughed awkwardly.

Campion hesitated, remembering his reasons for not ringing the doorbell, and, meanwhile, Amanda leaped to the rescue.

"We were so late," she explained. "I was jittering in the car in case we wouldn't have time to dress. I begged Al not to be a moment and he wasn't." "How long would you say you were, then?" The superintendent was making cryptic glyphs on the back of one of his pressing envelopes.

"I don't know exactly. A minute and a half, perhaps. I went straight up the stairs and I came straight back again." "You didn't meet anyone or hear anything?"

"No. What was there for me to hear?" "Hutch was magnificently deaf to the situation."

"I think I'll ask you to step across the hall, if you don't mind, sir," he said rudely. "I'd just like to see exactly where you put that parcel. We haven't come across it yet."

"I'll come too, shall I?" Amanda's young voice was eager, as usual, and Campion found it very comforting. She at least was definitely on his side.

The superintendent was dampening, however.

"No, Miss — er — Lady Amanda. That'll be quite all right," he said firmly. "I won't disturb Mr. Aubrey's dinner party more than I can help. If I want any more from you I'll know where to find you, shan't I?"

"You'll come back later on, then, Hutch." Aubrey spoke for the first time since his return from the drawing room and Campion, glancing at him, saw that he was annoyed by the whole situation. It was such an unexpected reaction that he noticed it and filed it for future reference. However, Aubrey caught his glance and evidently realized that he had betrayed a weakness, albeit a somewhat godlike one, for he smiled at Campion awkwardly and murmured apologetically, "It's absurd, but I believe I'm worrying about my wretched duties as a host. One finds oneself doing incredible things like that."

His complete frankness was disarming. He did not change his mind and Campion saw himself delivered over to Hutch, alone and unprotected.

While he had someone with him to use as a stalking horse he felt he had at least an outside chance of getting by with his damning disability undiscovered, but alone he felt that the superintendent must detect him in five minutes. Some of his alarm must have shown itself in his face for, as he turned from Aubrey, Pyne suddenly laid a reassuring hand on his shoulder.

"I'll come along with you," he said. "Any reason why I shouldn't, Super?"

The touch of belligerence in the question was unmistakable, and Campion was aware of Hutch's bright eyes regarding him curiously.

"None at all," he said grudgingly. "We'll go at once if you don't mind. The chief constable will probably be

NATURE'S AUTUMN PAGEANT ...at its best in Pennsylvania!

Skies clear as crystal, air like mellow wine... invite you to come, make your best score on mountain-top golf courses, or learn the thrill of a brisk canter along forest trails aflame with the glory of Autumn. For Penn's "Land of the Woods" soon will be wearing its scarlet and golden best to welcome visitors. Lucky you... if you've postponed your vacation until this brilliant season! Come spend it where you'll harvest a rich return of happy days... in Pennsylvania.

Grand Canyon, near Wellsboro

Betsy Ross House, Philadelphia, where the first official American flag was made in 1777.

Fort Necessity, near Uniontown. Scene of Washington's first battle as Commander of Colonial troops, in 1754.

40,000 miles of modern highways make it easy to see more in less time.

FREE PICTORIAL MAP AND FOLDER HOSPITALITY PASSPORT

Send for this complete guide to Pennsylvania—the historic and picturesque—illustrated in color. Out-of-state inquirers also receive the Hospitality Passport that assures Pennsylvania's guests of a cordial welcome. Address: Pennsylvania Department of Commerce, Division D-23, Harrisburg, Pennsylvania.

TO SEE AMERICA FIRST....

FIRST
SEE

Pennsylvania

THE NATION'S BIRTH-STATE

ARTHUR H. JAMES, Governor

RICHARD P. BROWN, Secretary of Commerce

"I want to call Mrs. Herman W. Snork, Dallas, Texas, 77-6982. If a man answers, hang up!"

NED HILTON

If you want to help that son of yours make the grade in and out of the classroom, send him off to a flying start with a Schick Injector Razor. It's a razor young men take to because it's full of young ideas—up-to-date features that spell surpassing comfort, safety and speed. He'll find Schick Injector shaving so easy, so fast, that he'll never want to skip a single day's session with this razor.

He (and you) can change blades in 3 seconds flat with this razor! An easy pull and push on the Injector slide shoots out the old blade and inserts a new one automatically. No fumbling with wrappings, nothing to unscrew, reassemble.

Another feature that rates tops with millions of users is this razor's solid guide bar that controls the action of the skin in front of the blade edge, and "sets up" each whisker for a perfect stroke. Even the sharp blade corners are sheathed by metal guards that protect the face against nicks and cuts.

You can treat that young man to a SCHICK INJECTOR RAZOR

FOR ONLY $1.00

—a trim, pigskin-grain case containing razor and cartridge of 12 double-thick Schick Blades. Razor carries a 20-year guarantee stamped in bottom of case.

Schick Injector Razor

MAGAZINE REPEATING RAZOR CO.
Bridgeport, Connecticut Niagara Falls, Ont., Canada

there by now and we can't keep him waiting."

He led the way and they followed him.

The three men made the short journey on foot. It was a ghostly night. The moon had come out of the clouds and was riding high and serene, her blunt horns cutting into the sky, but the ground mist had become thicker, so that the superintendent, marching along in front, looked like a ridiculous bust of himself, his head and shoulders alone clearly defined in the cold light.

They passed down the drive with the gravel crunching under their feet and out of the misty sea around them other buildings, some of them very square and modern, rose up on either side.

Pyne shook his head. "You can't help handing it to Aubrey," he remarked. "In seven years he's turned this place from a museum into a living brain factory. There's more valuable work done in these twelve acres than in any other place in the country. He's got breadth of vision, that chap. I've never met such a personality, have you? It gets me every time."

Campion hardly heard him but his voice, friendly and matter of fact at his elbow, was very reassuring. He wondered how long he had known the man and what degree of friendship was theirs. It seemed ridiculous to think of it but they might be partners, or school friends, or members of the same profession.

THEY passed through the wrought-iron gates and, turning on to an old and narrow pavement made of the thin rectangular flags of other days, they came up to the entrance through which Campion had last seen Ancombe disappear. There were several cars drawn up against the curb and a shadowy figure in uniform came out to challenge them.

While Hutch was talking to him, Campion grew acutely aware of Pyne. The stocky man had become unnaturally still. He was standing on the pavement looking up at one of the high stone pillars of the gateway which rose up white in the moonlight.

"Interesting?" he murmured to Campion, and there was just a shade more than the ordinary casual question in the remark.

Campion looked at the gate pillar and saw nothing more than the heraldic leaden eagle on the top. It was a nice piece of period decoration but too small and in no way remarkable.

"Charming," he said politely, and turned back to the man. The light was deceptive but he thought he saw a gleam die out of the bright round eyes.

The superintendent's minion had stepped aside by this time, however, and the little procession moved on into the dark garden. Just before he passed behind it, Campion glanced at the pillar again. He caught it at an angle and saw upon its smooth surface something he had not noticed before. His heart jolted violently and once again all the old, dark anxiety, which was mingled with an exasperated yet fearful curiosity, swept down upon him. In shallow relief, and now outlined by the shadow which the angle gave it, the house number showed up clearly. It was a 15.

Campion's first reaction after the shock was one of complete relief and his first impulse was to turn to Pyne as to a proven friend, but second thoughts brought misgivings. The dead man, Ancombe, had also indicated that he attached some special significance to the number, and he had not been a friend—or at least Amanda had not seemed to think so. It occurred to Campion that he was pinning a lot of faith to Amanda. Pyne was friendly and evidently knew him well, perhaps even better than the girl. He decided to await his opportunity and put out a feeler on the subject. It was as well to go cautiously.

Just then there was not much time for investigation. As he entered the drive, Hutch crossed over to him and walked by his side, while, to his intense discomfort, he found that the sergeant had come up on his other elbow, separating him from Pyne.

"Just show us exactly what you did, sir," Hutch spoke formally, and it occurred to Campion that the words were very familiar, as if he had heard them many times before, which was absurd. He did what was required of him and pointed out the exact spot in the corner of the doorstep where he had deposited the bundle.

"It was not a big parcel," he said. "It measured about six by five, I should think. I took it that it was a couple of books."

Hutch seemed satisfied. "You just went away without ringing," he remarked.

It occurred to Campion that the literal truth, which was that he happened to be dressed up as a fireman and did not wish to be seen, might be misunderstood, so he repeated his original story about the hurry. The superintendent made no comment.

"One does things like that every day," said Pyne, obviously with only the best of intentions. "They only sound so jolly fishy when something happens. You're being damned mysterious, Superintendent. There's no question of foul play, is there?"

"There's always a question, sir," Hutch sounded reproachful. "I'd like you to see him, Mr. Campion. He's been taken into the house. Lead the way, will you, Sergeant?"

Even in his uncertain state Campion realized that the request was extraordinary from a policeman to a layman. It seemed hardly likely that Hutch had reverted to the ancient custom of confronting the suspected murderer with the body of his supposed victim, and it went through Campion's mind for one wild moment that he might himself be some sort of eminent pathologist, but he dismissed the theory immediately since the idea conjured up no answering memory.

Yet, as they stood in the brightly lit bedroom, overcrowded with furniture and still full of the medicine bottles, books and intimate personal impedimenta of the dead man, again Campion was touched with that sense of the familiar.

Ancombe was lying on his face and the pillows had been removed, so that his head received no support. He was still clothed in the light raincoat which he had worn in the car.

THE four men, Campion and the superintendent, Pyne and the sergeant, stood around the bed in complete silence. If Campion and the police were stolid, Pyne was rattled. His heavy cheeks were several shades paler and his paunch drooped. He whistled through his teeth.

"Horrible," he said. "He's broken his neck, hasn't he? How on earth did he do it?"

The superintendent turned away from the sprawling body with the dreadful, unnatural angle of its head and looked at Campion earnestly.

"There's a little bit of a lawn at the left of the drive," he said. "I don't know if you noticed it? It's very dark there, hidden from the road by the wall. Well, in the middle of this lawn there's a sort of ornamental basin, a lily pool I think they call it. It's in a saucer-shaped hollow and there's a ring of very shallow brick and stone steps leading down to the actual water. We found him on his back, lying across the flight if you see what I mean?"

Fleas and lice—warns U. S. Dept. of Agriculture Circular No. 338—can transmit tapeworms and sarcoptic mange to dogs.

That flea, for which your dog may now be scratching, may be a carrier of tapeworm larva. If your dog snaps at it successfully and swallows him, he may become infested. Don't let your dog continue being exposed to the dangers and torments of fleas and lice. Act at once!

Insure complete eradication by using Pulvex, the powder which will kill every flea on your dog with incredible speed. None ever revive to reinfest. Pulvex also destroys any lice, ticks, sticktites on dog. Kills fleas, too, when put on single spot. Amazing—unbelievable—but true! As Pulvex is borated, it will help allay itching from scratching. But even more important—

YOUR DOG WILL BE ABSOLUTELY PROTECTED AGAINST FLEA INFESTATIONS if you use Pulvex by the remarkable "minute-a-week" control method. Read about it in folder on can. If your dog is scratching, get Pulvex at once. At leading drug, department and pet stores, 50c.

PULVEX FLEA POWDER

ASK DEALER TO SHOW YOU THIS FOLDER

PULVEX FLEA SOAP oils and grooms the coat, deodorizes, cleans and destroys the fleas, only 25c!

Try SIROIL if PSORIASIS BARS YOU FROM SUCH SPORTS and PLEASURES

Do ugly psoriasis lesions make you so conspicuous in sports costume that you refrain from anything requiring such attire? Then try SIROIL.

Siroil FOR SALE AT ALL DRUG STORES

SIROIL has helped thousands. It tends to remove the crusts and scales of psoriasis which are external in character and located on the outer layer of the skin. It is applied externally, does not stain clothing or bed linen does it interfere in any way with the daily routine? SIROIL is offered to you on a two weeks' faction-or-money-back basis

SIROIL SHAMPOO

SIROIL Liquid Shampoo is made of pure oil, coconut oil blended in a neutral, non-caustic. Cannot injure or irritate the most sensitive or hair. No vinegar rinse needed. Bears the Housekeeping Seal of Approval.

SIROIL LABORATORIES, INC., DETROIT, SIROIL LABORATORIES OF CANADA, LTD., BOX 488, WINDSOR,

ORIGINAL PARTS ASSURE "LIKE-NEW" PERFORMANCE

WESTCLOX ON PARADE! Big Ben Electric heads a sparkling array of electric time clocks, wall clocks, alarm clocks—priced from $2.50 to $6.95. Only a few are shown here. See them all at any Westclox counter!

BIG BEN ELECTRIC the self-starting clock that delivers the quality his famous name promises—delivers it handsomely in a smart streamlined case. 2-voice chime alarm for light and heavy sleepers, current interruption signal, and a host of other features. Ivory finish, gold color trim or black with nickel trim. $4.95
Luminous dial a dollar more

MANOR self-starting electric wall clock—makes a handsome and marvelously handy addition to any kitchen. Choose from four gay color combinations . . . $3.50

COUNTRY CLUB electric alarm. Ideal for any room. Luminous dial, ivory finish . . . $3.45. Maroon with gold color trim and plain dial . . . $2.50

BACHELOR self-starting electric alarm. Blue, black, or ivory finish, plain dial, $3.95. Ivory finish, luminous . . . $4.95

Westclox, LaSalle-Peru, Ill. Division of General Time Instruments Corporation.

WESTCLOX
ELECTRIC CLOCKS

unreal and confusing as pantomime scenery in the unnatural glow, Campion edged closer to Pyne. It was difficult to choose a sufficiently noncommittal opening but at last he ventured a sighting shot.

"Not much like the old days," he said heartily.

Pyne seemed engrossed with the exhibit, or at any rate he took some seconds to reply. Then his cheerful murmur came briskly out of the darkness:

"When we were in the States together, you mean?"

"Yes." Campion did not wish to be drawn into any further reminiscences

FUNNY-BUSINESS MEN

Self-Portraits of Collier's Cartoonists
No. 3

Some years ago John Arthur Ruge (Roogy) saw a movie in which an artist fell in love with and married a beautiful model who inspired him to paint a masterpiece. This so impressed our subject that he rushed to art school and studied for four years. (Something of what he learned is shown on the opposite page.) Originally (1916) from Minnesota, Ruge moved in 1925 to New York where he likes to "lunge around golf courses and sit in night clubs watching the customers wear themselves out doing the Conga."

until they had had time to talk, but it was not going to be so difficult after all. They were old friends; that was the main thing.

His immediate hopes were defeated a minute or two later, however, when they were all three walking back to the Principal's house together. At the Institute gates Pyne took his leave somewhat abruptly.

"I must get back at once," he said. "You know what work is, Superintendent, and you know where to find me if you want me, don't you? I'll see you in the morning, Campion. This is a bad business, Super. I believe it's turned me up a bit. I'm a novice, you know. I feel like a kid at the hunt who's been blooded."

He stumbled off down the road and the policeman looked after him and laughed soundlessly.

"I'm afraid we've upset that stomach of his," he said. "Serve him right for nosing in. Look here, Mr. Campion, I shan't come back with you now because I've got to wait for the chief. I don't know what's delaying him. He ought to have been here hours ago. I only came along here because I wanted a word with you in private if I could get it. I wasn't quite accurate up at the house when I said we hadn't found the parcel. I wanted an excuse for getting hold of you. We had found it, of course, just exactly where you'd put it. I didn't want to go into it up there because in some ways it's rather peculiar, and I thought you might be particularly interested. Do you know what it contained?"

He bent closer and a trick of the light gave his face a menace that it did not normally possess.

"Close on four thousand pounds in cash," he said softly. "I found it interesting because we had another case earlier today in Coachingford when a lot of money cropped up. It's been a very funny business altogether over there, with one of our fellows laid out and an unknown in hospital. When I come along, I'll tell you about it."

To Campion it seemed that the great, starry arc of the sky above him reeled over and back like the lid on a bacon dish, but if the superintendent knew what he said his game of cat and mouse was inhumanly effective. He gave no sign of meaning more than his actual words, but just before he turned on his heel and left his victim to go up the drive alone he made one further remark which was, if anything, even more annihilating than the first.

"I wonder at that fellow Pyne sticking to us like that," he said earnestly. "He only met you three days ago. He told me that himself last night. And he doesn't know me at all. You wouldn't think any man would thrust himself forward like that, would you? I'll be seeing you later, then."

"I'M AFRAID Hutch has let us down. It's abominably late."

Lee Aubrey broke a long silence with the remark, which he delivered with an effort, as if he had been thinking of it for a long time. He, Campion and Amanda were sitting around the fire in the drawing room with the candles burning low and the uncomfortable silence of the night bearing down upon them. Campion had returned from Anscombe's house just as the dinner guests were leaving and had found himself let in for a more or less formal tête-à-tête, his host the one person in the way.

He was more than anxious to talk to Amanda alone. Every time he set eyes upon her she became clearer and dearer to him. Whatever other values were upset, whatever other mistakes he made in this new nightmare world of his, she was real and solid, a living part of that self which he was rediscovering so painfully.

She was sitting curled up in her chair between the two of them, very much alive but gloriously composed. She looked very young and very intelligent, but not, he thought with sudden satisfaction, clever. A dear girl. The girl, in fact. His sense of possession was tremendous. It was the possessiveness of the child, of the savage, of the dog, unreasonable and unanswerable. He glanced irritably at Aubrey.

The great man had risen and was leaning against the mantelpiece. Suddenly he laughed.

"Well," he said, "we've thrashed it all out, haven't we? Anscombe appears to have fallen down and broken his neck: that's all it amounts to. I'll go up and see poor old Miss Anscombe in the morning. Until Hutch condescends to report we can't do anything else. You look fantastically tired, my dear fellow. Why don't you go to bed? Amanda and I will give the wretched Hutch another half-hour. Don't you think so?"

The final question was put directly to Amanda and as he looked at her his expression softened so much that the change was positively theatrical. However, he seemed quite unconscious of

W.O.O.O.O! 10¢ WORTH OF SANI-FLUSH WOULD CLEAN OUT THAT RADIATOR!

DON'T RISK unnecessary repair bills due to clogged radiators. Keep water circulating freely—keep motors running cool—with Sani-Flush. Cannot injure motor or fittings. Removes rust, sludge, scale, sediment. Keeps the delicate veins of a radiator clean.

Do the job yourself in a few minutes for 10c (25c for the largest truck or tractor). Or ask your service station to use Sani-Flush to do the job for you. You'll find Sani-Flush in most bathrooms for cleaning toilet bowls. Directions are printed on the can. Sold by grocery, drug, hardware, and 5-and-10c stores. 10c and 25c sizes. The Hygienic Products Co., Canton, Ohio

Sani-Flush Safe
CLEANS OUT RADIATORS CAUSTIC

Clearer Complexion
by using
Mercolized Wax Cream

This dainty Skin Bleach helps freckles and lightens a dull, sun-tanned complexion. It speeds up Nature's process of flaking particles. Exposes the lighter, clearer skin beneath. Using Mercolized Wax Cream tonight as directed makes for a fairer, prettier complexion and enjoy new skin beauty. SAXOLITE ASTRINGENT tightens loose skin. Gives a delightful sense of freshness. Reduces excess surface oil. Dissolve Saxolite Astringent in one pint witch hazel and use this tingling face lotion. PHELACTINE DEPIPLATORY removes superfluous facial hair quickly. Easy to use. No unpleasant odor.

United Air Lines' Rule of 3—first, safety; second, passenger comfort; third, schedule performance; applies even to incidental details of plane equipment. That's why United stewardess hands you an Enders Speed Razor if you wish to shave. Enders Speed Razor fills the Rule of 3 in shaving, safety, comfort, speed. Cuts shaving time in half for man gives wings to your morning shave. Send for Flight Model 29 or 39c for Flying Shave.

ENDERS SPEED RAZOR
DURHAM DUPLEX RAZOR CO., Mystic, Conn.

aying himself and it was as if he not in the habit of considering self objectively, ever.

manda avoided his eyes and might not, for the light was deceptive, have been. Her involuntary behavior seemed to annoy her, however, for she looked at him squarely.

"Very well," she said.

Campion sat up. In the ordinary way might well have been startled, for there are few hosts who send their guests off so blandly, but now, in his confused state, he was bewildered.

First Campion had every intention of refusing baldly and of forcing him upon them, but Amanda swept the shining ground from under his feet. "Good night, Albert," she said.

WENT up to his room and sat on his bed with the door open, as if he were a schoolboy in the throes of a first affair. Until that moment he had not fully assimilated her announcement earlier in the evening. So many things had happened since then and the emlike quality of his new existence seemed to allow of lightning changes of content and fact. Now, again, it seemed to him that Amanda was real, being real, she was consistent, the concrete thing in a world of fantasy. He meant what she said. She was not going to marry him. Beside this actual matter all the other inconsistencies—his cat-and-mouse behavior of the past, the too friendly Pyne who had led him into a betrayal and then disappeared on heaven knew what torments and subversive mission—faded into fantasy.

On top of this blinding desolation came a new fear. It was a fear for Amanda. It occurred to him that it was the first completely unselfish thought he had since the disaster, or, of course, in his life, for all he knew. It was filled with something he knew about some vulnerability he had forgotten, and with something he knew about Aubrey. There was something from which he must protect her. She was a responsibility of his, quite as much a responsibility as that other which was rapidly assuming such enormous proportions. Apparently he was a responsible person. It seemed a pity he had lost half his mind.

He got off the bed and walked out into the upper hall. He strode up and down there for what seemed an eternity, his footsteps deadened by the heavy carpet. The lights were very bright, with the cold brilliance which seems to be a part of the middle of the night, and when the drawing-room door opened he walked over to the banister without hesitation and looked down.

"Good night, Amanda."

Aubrey's deep, delightful voice was soft and packed with meaning. He was leaning against the doorpost with his head bent and a lock of his thick hair drooping boyishly forward. He had taken Amanda's hand and was swinging it backward and forward in the careless, inarticulate fashion which Gerald du Maurier used to use so effectively in so many of his scenes. He was not a man who would ever appear handsome, but his whole pose was negligently graceful, which was odd in such a large-boned, loosely constructed figure.

Campion got the impression that Amanda was a trifle flustered and also that the condition was hitherto unknown to her.

"Good night, Lee," she said, sounding positively schoolgirlish in an effort to be matter of fact. Then, turning away, she hurried upstairs, to arrive pink and a little breathless before Campion in the upper hall.

She was astounded to see him and obviously accepted the first explanation which came into her head.

"What's the matter?" she demanded. "What's happened?"

(To be continued next week)

"Maybe we should see the medical exhibits after we eat"

JOHN A. RUGE

Sound your "Z"—it's the Play that Wins Safer, Smoother Motor Performance

Take it from an old timer in the car-service business, when you beat sludge and varnish you've won the big battle against engine trouble. My advice is to check them now with anti-sludge PennZoil Motor Oil!

BETTER SEE YOUR Z-MAN SOON!

From coast to coast, thousands of the nation's finest dealers display the yellow PennZoil oval. Next time you need service, drive in . . . and be sure to sound your "Z" for PennZoil. It's a whale of a buy at today's price!

Be oil-wise
specify PennZoil

GIVE YOUR ENGINE AN EXTRA MARGIN OF SAFETY

BRINGING UP BABY

THE FAMILY PRIDE and joy that sits in the garage, instead of the high-chair, is one of the household's major investments—and interests.

Yet—the car that is everybody's sweetheart doesn't get much pampering. Too often, the car's good health is ignored and allowed to run down, all for the want of a little advice on how to keep an automobile fit and rarin' to go.

Last Fall, Collier's launched its now famous Preventive Service campaign to tell car owners, in simple language, how to get greater safety, comfort and economy from their automobiles. Motorists learned how easy it is to protect their investment in their cars—that preventive service is wiser and cheaper than emergency service.

It's easy, it's practical, and it pays big dividends in satisfaction—the satisfaction of owning an automobile you can be proud of anywhere, any time.

More P.S. articles will appear during the coming months. Watch for them in COLLIER'S.

---

HOW IS YOUR "CAR-Q" (Answers on Page 64)

- |  |   |
|--|---|
| A. What actually happens when you "give it the gas"?             | D. How many places on your car need lubrication?    |
| B. How does hot water affect the condition of your car radiator? | E. Where is your engine liable to wear out fastest? |
| C. What causes firing in the cylinders?                          | F. What does the distributor do in your engine?     |
|  | G. What causes "ping" in your motor?                |
-

P.S.

PREVENTIVE SERVICE

sponsored by Collier's

FOR MOTOR CAR OWNERS

Air Power

Continued from page 18

in the ancient faiths." (Italics mine.)
 read that paragraph aloud, not too
 It rolls beautifully, doesn't it?
 you know why? Well, for one thing is a kind of rhythm that grows out the reiteration of words and phrases.
 her, it sounds important—because pauses—set off by dashes in the president's own copy—project empha-and authority.

is technique of pause and reiterais a very deliberate one. I have finished studying eleven of the president's addresses and in every one, without exception, this repetitive pattern is threaded throughout.

It Makes You Feel Friendly

his address to the American Youth Congress on the eleventh day of February, 1940, you hear it again:

"This is a straight-from-the-shoulder fact—a sad fact. . . . It is also a simple straight fact that in 1930, 1931, and just by way of further illustration the fact that we have been making progress, since those dark days, not as the progress, of course, as we want or it, but just by way of illustration let me repeat. . . ." (Italics mine.)

your eyes aren't trained, as a radio technician's must be, to "hear" these scripts, then read them aloud. Note the breaking up of the sentences—use of pause—projects not only an informality to the words—a friendliness more important, the effect of spontaneity—the effect that Mr. Roosevelt in his libbing remarks, in a natural way, to his listeners.

is all contributes to making him a "warm" personality, one with whom we feel friendly. He's talking to us!

Mr. Willkie's technique, on the other hand, might be called directness and simplicity.

Let's study directness first: Here is the opening paragraph of Mr. Willkie's address at Wooster College last January:
 "There are several reasons why I accepted your invitation to speak here today. First of all, I appreciate the honor of being the speaker at this celebration of your seventieth anniversary.
 I am glad to have the opportunity to contribute to the work which this college has done, and to the program which it hopes to develop in the future. Then,
 I have a special interest in any activity connected with Ohio, because it is the state where I really started my business career and where I now have as many friends as in my native
 state of Indiana. . . ."

There are no dramatic tricks in that paragraph. It is a direct, simple statement. Now, that we may understand exactly the difference between Mr. Willkie's technique of speaking and Mr. Roosevelt's, compare the above paragraph with the following opening paragraph of the president's Charlottesville address:
 "President Newcomb, my friends of the University of Virginia. I notice by the program that I am asked to address the classes of 1940. I avail myself of that privilege, but I also take this happy occasion to speak to many of the classes—classes that have graduated through all the years, classes that are still in the period of study, classes that are one of the schools of learning of the nation, but classes that have come through the great schools of experience. In other words, a cross section, a cross section just as you who graduate are a cross section of the nation whole." (Italics mine. I couldn't find 'em.)

The difference between the two styles is apparent: One flowery, deliberately repetitious; the other, simple, direct.
 Both are probably most effective for the men who speak them.

One of Mr. Willkie's best radio addresses was the one he made on NBC's Town Meeting of the Air, in January, 1938. The subject was "How Can Government and Business Work Together?" and Mr. Willkie shared the platform with Robert H. Jackson, then assistant attorney general.

The selections I have taken from Mr.
 Willkie's address are from a recorded playback of the broadcast which I heard a few days ago.

Mr. Willkie began:

"I wonder if it seems strange to any of you tonight that we should be discussing the question of whether or not the government should co-operate with American business? I have an idea that if, from the town meetings of the past, our forefathers should arise to attend this meeting, they would be a little puzzled by such a topic. They might ask, with some surprise, if it was not the function of American government to encourage the development of private enterprise. . . ."

Could you say that any more directly?
 More simply? I don't think so.

Is such a technique dramatic? Does it "project" the personality of the speaker? Is it as effective, from a radio point of view, as Mr. Roosevelt's pause and reiteration?

A Good Guy Mustn't Go High-brow

The answer to these questions is yes —for Mr. Willkie. His tones are pure—and average. There is no Harvard harp where his vocal cords ought to be. As long as he employs a direct technique in his addresses, he won't sound as if he's "putting on airs" or trying to be an "orator." It is embarrassing to hear a good guy's voice trying to go high-brow.
 But that's the way Mr. Willkie's would sound if he were to read a Roosevelt
 address.

I recall at this point the sad case of Elmer A. Benson, the Farmer-Labor governor of Minnesota who was defeated in 1938 by Republican Harold E.
 Stassen, now a close adviser to Mr.
 Willkie.

It was Mr. Benson's exquisite misfortune to succeed as governor one of the best "beat the drum, boys, and light another flare" radio speakers in America—the late Floyd B. Olson.

Mr. Benson's voice, like Mr. Willkie's, was that of a good guy. As United States senator he made some radio talks —all good, solid and average. And the people liked them.

After Governor Olson died and Mr.
 Benson began his gubernatorial campaign, a metamorphosis took place. The lamb became the lion. Certain of Mr.
 Benson's ghost writers insisted he give "fightin' talks." Actually, they were frightful squawks. Mr. Benson was now out of true character.

The people heard—and knew it was phony. The radio technique, that is, not Mr. Benson's integrity, which even his political enemies admitted was high.

Then Harold E. Stassen began to talk on the radio. Mr. Stassen's voice, like Mr. Benson's and Mr. Willkie's, was good, solid, average. But Mr.
 Stassen did not make Mr. Benson's mistake of regarding a microphone as a verbal punching bag. Mr. Stassen did not put on airs—which is why he clicked on the air.

The second element of Mr. Willkie's

Your Motor Oil, too, Must be Kept Clean!

Time and again you've seen how quickly a spick-and-span car gets dirty as you drive. If you could only see how dirty your oil gets, too! Without the benefit of constant "cleaning," dirt sucked in from the air combines with impurities within the engine itself—forming an abrasive mass that ruins the smooth surfaces of moving parts. First thing you know, the engine loses pep and power. Next thing is a stiff repair bill.

Make sure your engine is protected by a genuine Purolator Oil Filter. Purolator keeps both oil and engine clean. If your car is factory-equipped with a Purolator (every fourth car made today is Purolator-equipped), have the cartridge changed regularly. If your car doesn't have a Purolator, by all means get one now! Don't take chances with dirty oil. . .

KEEP IT CLEAN
 with
PUROLATOR
 Motor Improvements, Inc.
 Newark, N. J.

New, replaceable element type Purolator for Chrysler-built cars equipped with filter *Slightly higher on West Coast

$350***

Replaceable element type Purolator with necessary fittings for Ford, Chevrolet, Mercury—only

$500

Replaceable elements only $100

DON'T GAMBLE WITH YOUR BRAKES

HAVE YOUR CAR CHECKED PERIODICALLY at a STATION DISPLAYING THIS SIGN

It is important to have the master cylinder of your automobile brake system filled to the proper level with genuine WAGNER LOCKHEED Hydraulic BRAKE FLUID

FOR SAFETY'S SAKE don't guess about the condition of the hydraulic brake system of your automobile. Drive to an authorized station that displays the Wagner red, white and blue sign, and let a trained mechanic check your car. If additional brake fluid is needed, Wagner Lockheed Fluid is the answer. If new parts are required, Wagner Lockheed Parts assure the kind of brake performance the automobile manufacturer had in mind when designing the car.

21 IS AN ALL-WEATHER YEAR-ROUND FLUID

The small cost of having a master cylinder filled to the correct level with No. 21 is negligible compared with the added safety gained. And one filling lasts a long time.

No. 21 is an all-season all-weather fluid, and is recommended for all hydraulic brakes. It retains its highly efficient qualities under all driving conditions. It completely and properly mixes with all other approved fluids, furnishes necessary lubrication for working parts of hydraulic brake system, and, in general, preserves the essential characteristics of the entire system.

FOR ALL CARS and TRUCKS

Behind this quality product are fifteen years of Wagner development and research. No. 21 is used by car manufacturers, and is recommended for the service needs of all cars and trucks having hydraulic brakes.

For safety's sake—why not have your car checked TODAY! There is a station near you.

AUTOMOTIVE PARTS DIVISION H40-6
Wagner Electric Corporation
6400 Plymouth Ave., St. Louis, Mo., U. S. A.
(In Canada: Wagner Brake Service Company, Ltd., Toronto)

Wagner

LOCKHEED HYDRAULIC BRAKE PARTS and FLUID
...CoMaX BRAKE LINING...NoRoL...AIR BRAKES

technique is definition. I was struck at once, in listening to some of his talks, and in eye-hearing others, at the immediate definition of terms, ideas and points which he makes in the progression of the address. A few examples from Town Meeting to illustrate:

"After all, a large corporation is simply a corporation in which as a rule the interest is divided among a great many small stockholders. . . ."

"The oil industry, for example, is one in which there are a number of very large companies of the kind Mr. Jackson dislikes. . . ."

"Mr. Jackson is mistaken: The Commonwealth and Southern Corporation, of which I have the honor to be president, operates in eleven states, five of them in the North. . . ."

And here are a few examples from the Elwood acceptance speech:

"I need the help of every American—Republican, Democrat or Independent—Jew, Catholic, Protestant—people of every color, creed and race. . . ."

"As you who lived here with them well know, they (Willkie's parents) were fiercely democratic. They hated oppression, autocracy or arbitrary control of any kind. They believed in the qualities that have made America great—an independent spirit, an inquiring mind, a courageous heart. . . ."

"We must admit that the loss of the British fleet would greatly weaken our defense. This is because the British fleet has for years controlled the Atlantic, leaving us free to concentrate in the Pacific. . . ."

This technique of defining terms, ideas and points as soon as they are uttered is a very effective one, for it draws the audience down the path of the speaker's thinking, and does not permit the audience's mind to wander off into other possible interpretations. Read the paragraphs above aloud again, and you will find yourself accepting Mr. Willkie's definitions almost automatically. Yet you and I have both heard other definitions of large corporations, depression cures, etc., offered—good ones, too. Mr. Willkie knows that—and his technique is geared so that we won't think of any other definitions while he's talking.

Willkie's Number One Hurdle

Mr. Roosevelt's voice has what radio advertisers call "a lot of product appeal." When Mr. Roosevelt says "My friends," or "I hate war!" you know that Mr. Roosevelt and nobody else is speaking. For the Roosevelt voice and voice manner are distinctive, and stand out, and do not sound like everybody else's voice.

But if you heard Wendell Willkie on the radio right now—if you tuned in three minutes after the announcer had identified him—would you know it was Wendell Willkie?

The chances are you would not; and so the business of winning radio-listener cognizance is Mr. Willkie's Number One hurdle.

How many people have probably heard Mr. Willkie on the radio? Well, let's see. Prior to his nomination, he appeared on two national network programs—the Town Meeting, and Information Please. The Town Meeting of the Air, in January, 1938, had an audience of some four million. Before the debate began, Mr. Denny, the moderator, spoke for three minutes (a long time at the opening of a broadcast) about the history of the Town Meeting series. He then introduced Mr. Jackson, who spoke for about fifteen minutes.

Whatever evidence we have of radio-audience loyalty points to the fact that at least one quarter of the original audience was lost by the time Mr. Jackson finished his part of the evening's discussion. The same thing happens each week to the University of C Round Table. We probably lose original listeners proportionately the Town Meeting during a broadcast but that is only because we are a minute program and Town Meeting a sixty-minute program. It is so easier to hold original listeners for than for sixty minutes.

As for Information Please—it is a popular program, but, contrary to popular impression, Information Please is not one of the four or five top shows of the air. As a matter of fact, it is in thirtieth place in C.A.B. (audience) ratings.

Do these microphone appearances make Mr. Willkie a "radio personality"? Obviously not.

Fireside Chats Aren't Patent

But how popular is Mr. Roosevelt's "radio personality"? How many people listen to him? How does his audience compare with the audience of other radio figures?

With a few but important exceptions Mr. Roosevelt's top audience is equal to the top audience of other radio figures. For example, when President opened Congress on January 4, 1939, only 16 per cent of the set owners heard him. When he addressed the Retail Federation on May 22d, only 10 per cent of set owners heard him. However, when he opened the special session of Congress on September 21st, 60 per cent heard him—one of his highest audience ratings.

In April, 1939, the Fortune poll reported that 24.1 per cent of the set owners "usually" listened to Mr. Roosevelt's fireside chats; 38.6 per cent reported that they "sometimes" listened, and 37.3 per cent said they "never" listened. The fireside chat is a Roosevelt invention; but the President has no patent, and other candidates can copy it, for it is easy listening, pleasant listening. There are no crowd-pleasing orators introducing you to stimulate excitement. No banal, corny orators introducing you to voice will bounce like a tennis ball. Rather, a small studio, one microphone, a comfortable chair, soft lights, a few seconds' silence as the station-bank given. The announcer's signal. A begin to talk—with your friends, at home—a guest, not a leader, not a candidate. . . .

Mr. Willkie, if he can be trained in style, should go on the air during the campaign, "taking time out from politics, fellow Americans, to discuss with you our mutual problems and ideas. The technique of the fireside chat is informality-plus. This is not to be achieved, as those of us who produce discussion-and-talk shows, or who have ever had to speak on the radio know. First, the illusion of a speaking script must be projected. If you think it is easy to read without sounding as if you're reading, try it sometime. The chances are you won't fool anyone. But a lot of the time Mr. Roosevelt makes it as if he were just talking. That makes you feel as if you'd like to listen. Or are you?

And when a candidate for the presidency of the United States—Mr. Roosevelt or Mr. Willkie—you feel that way why you're inclined to listen. Or are you?

At any rate, the campaign campaign both camps think you are. They're going to let loose with radio artillery between now and November 5th. The order of the day is to go to Admiral Roosevelt and Willkie—"Don't shoot until you see the pink of their ears—then talk fast!"

What Happened to France

Continued from page 19

picture at the expense of great quantities of gasoline. But General Marlene, director of military intelligence and a man with a thorough knowledge of the German army, who alone of all the English held pessimistic views about the issue of this campaign, refused to consider an offensive against the Low Countries a certainty.

"The hundred and ten German divisions are still in the region of Aix-la-Chapelle," he said. "They're not being moved here without reason."

On May 11th I entered Belgium with British columns. In the charming towns, with their ancient houses, in the well-kept villages, women standing on their doorsteps, with vases full of flowers offering them to the soldiers. One of the British war correspondents who had described this triumphant entry with honest optimism was summoned back to reality by a telegram from his paper: "Less news; more facts, please." He had been obeying that order. From the second day the flowers disappeared and the soldiers made themselves brutally felt.

THE Belgian villages women still stood on doorsteps but they were looking anxiously at the sky. Nevertheless the German airplanes had thus far done no damage. Here and there in a village two or three houses had been destroyed. Elsewhere the Germans had been at a grade crossing and had hit a watchman's house. In the open country a few buildings were burning, among them a convent and its chapel. None of this seemed very serious to me. It was wrong. The purpose of these bombings was to terrify the civilian population and in this they were completely successful. Later on we discovered that in each village there had been a number of the fifth column, a German agent, whose duty it was, as soon as the first bombs fell, to say to the inhabitants:

"Have at once while there is still time! This village will be destroyed soon, and the Gestapo will follow the fliers. You know how they treated the Poles!"

The people listened to them. The village, infected with a strange collective panic, would leave with its curé, its town officers. The streets were flooded with refugees. It was a amazing spectacle. First came the rich, driven by chauffeurs in long gloves and smart caps; then the middle class, driven by their owners, with a mattress tied across the back; then the big country carts pulled by horses and carrying whole platoons, battalions, armies of bicyclists.

Nothing is more contagious than panic. As soon as this tidal wave, which formed near the French frontier, reached a new town it caught it up and carried it along with it. Our motorized divisions, which had set out on the first day in such fine formation, floundered in these waves of human beings.

Even in the war of 1914, even at the moment of the break in the front before the Germans did we see similar disorder. Because now the terror was more than in 1914, because stories of the German no doubt spread deliberately, and even those who were passionately devoted to their lands, with a desire to escape at all costs from an undreaded and dreadful danger; because the German had spread alarming news among the masses of peasants who in 1914 had been uninformed and hence inert; because the German air force possessed so great a numerical superiority that these unfortunates gained the impression that they were undefended.

To stop these people and force them to remain in their places would have required extreme firmness on the part of the civil and military authorities, and absolute refusal to allow anyone to leave his home, and also some appearance of defense, a few machine guns mounted on the roofs, and a greater number of Allied fighting planes in the skies of Belgium. But too often the authorities themselves were carried away by the tide; as for the machine guns and airplanes, there were none. Helplessly abandoned to their fears, everyone started off straight ahead without goal and without order.

To this horrible confusion, which prevented the execution of orders, was added bad luck, which kept those orders from being issued in time. Not only were the generalissimo and fifteen generals changed in the midst of the battle but General Weygand, who had to come from Syria, was delayed on his trip by a storm. The group of armies of the north that had received the brunt of the attack was commanded by General Billotte, a man of great energy with a thorough understanding of his trade; at the most critical moment in the battle he was killed in an automobile collision. General Blanchard, who took his place, was, like him, an able leader, but he was taken by surprise without well-established communications with his troops and in most unfavorable circumstances for directing battle.

Indeed, when one reflects upon the uninterrupted sequence of accidents, failures and fatal coincidences that alone made possible so complete and sudden a catastrophe, one cannot fail to be reminded of those classical tragedies in which Fate pursues, by the most improbable combination of events, an unfortunate hated by the gods.

I was with the British general staff when the latter learned of the disaster at Sedan, the German break-through and the rout of Corap's army. For two days my English comrades—from delicacy, I think, and perhaps also from timidity—did not tell me about it. The official communiqués continued to be cautious and obscure, but I could easily see that something was being kept from me. I noticed that my friends stopped talking when I entered a room. Also orders for a retreat had been given. Finally the British told me what they knew.

THE break-through had been immediate and complete. How had this been achieved? As a result of mass, surprise and terror. Thousands of tanks equipped with flame-throwers and airplanes equipped with sirens had been hurled upon Corap's army. The bravest men, placed unexpectedly before such a menace, for which they had not been prepared, had little chance of holding their ground.

Even so they would have tried to resist if they had had guns capable of stopping tanks. One can imagine their horror when they discovered that their shells could not penetrate the armor of the most powerful German tanks. The Skoda Works had built armor plate thicker than any that had been foreseen and these new tanks ignored our projectiles as Gulliver had ignored those of the Lilliputians. Our artillerymen discovered fast enough that our seventy-fives, fired in certain circumstances, could serve at need as antitank guns; but this was an expedient and not an organized defense.

All of us asked one another in the

LEE is changing the HAT-I-TUDE† of the Nation with the
WATER-BLOC* HAT at ... $5.00

Now! See how much better you look

THE PADDOCK... $5.00

A feather weight Water-Bloc worn "brim up"—Pinched in front and low on the forehead.

THE GUARDS... $5.00

A medium weight Water-Bloc with that trim, military look and hand felted edge.

LEE ALSO MAKES: Aetna, The Insured Hat... $3.50
The Danway... $2.95 • Lee Hats for boys... $1.95 and up Obtainable at all Leading Dealers or write to us giving size, style and color.

LEE HATS

358 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

*† REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

because it's filled with flavor through and through!

Tastier? Yes. More enjoyable for a longer time? You bet! That's why you'll like Beech-Nut Gum. The finest flavors are mixed through and through to bring you a wealth of fine flavor. Your choice of 7 delicious varieties.

Full-flavored Peppermint, Spearmint, Oralgum
4 flavors of BEECHIES (Candy Coated) Peppermint, Spearmint, Pepsin, Cinnamon

COME ONE! COME ALL! See the N. Y. World's Fair
Be sure to visit the Beech-Nut Building. If you drive near the lovely Mohawk Valley of New York, stop at Canajoharie and see how Beech-Nut products are made.

month of May: "How did they pass the Meuse? Hadn't the bridges been mined?" What was said then in the British army was that parachutists or spies had killed the men whose duty it was to blow up the bridges and that, moreover, the number of mines had been insufficient. In addition the advance of the German motorized units had been so greatly aided in Ardennes by the fifth column that their speed greatly exceeded anything that had been foreseen and Corap's army was taken by surprise.

ONE of the most courageous actions of the war was performed over the Meuse. Certain French and English aviators received an order to destroy specified bridges at all costs. Two groups of bombers, one from each country, sacrificed themselves. The French went first at a low altitude, then the British followed. I never learned the number of French losses but I know that of sixty British planes forty did not return.

This example, as well as a thousand others, proves that the most heroic courage was not lacking in the Allied armies. It is not true that the soldiers showed themselves from the beginning morally incapable of resistance. But just as microbes, which try without success to attack a healthy body, can easily permeate an organism already weakened by fatigue or worries, so the elements of moral weakness which existed in our armies suddenly began to multiply as soon as one dreadful experience had shown them the insufficiency of our armament.

Victory and defeat are habits. Lieutenant de Jumilhac, who had acted as my guide when I visited Corap's army and who was a horseman, said to me while talking about the Norwegian expedition:

"It's bad business that our first enterprise in this war met with failure. A young horse must never be defeated in his trial runs. If he is, he gets the habit, loses his self-respect and comes to consider it perfectly natural that he should stay behind."

What is true of horses is also true of armies. A victorious troop acquires a vital force which multiplies its strength; a vanquished troop loses its confidence.

After the disaster at Sedan the myth of the enemy's invincibility spread rapidly and served as an excuse for all those who wanted to retreat. Terrifying reports preceded the motorized columns and prepared the ground for them. These columns, veering toward the west, took our armies of the north from behind. Trying to elude them, the British general staff to which I was attached took me with it toward Arras. The city was buzzing with rumors: "The Germans are at Douai. . . . The Germans are at Cambrai. . . ." All this was to be true a little later; at the moment it was false; but a phrase murmured from shop to shop, from house to house, was enough to set thousands of men, women and children in motion, and even to startle military leaders into ordering their detachments to retire toward the coast, where as it turned out they were captured.

German parachutists in Holland and Belgium played a role that was real enough, but fear of them increased their effectiveness tenfold. In the eyes of the peasants and soldiers every costume became a disguise. No priest was considered a priest any more; an officer in uniform might prove to be a fake officer; authentic telephone messages were received with suspicion. Jean Cocteau, when I saw him a little later, told me with a poet's vivid conciseness: "All you see now on the roads of France are nuns winding on their puttees."

It was these myths and rumors, a hundred times speedier than Messer-schmitts, that explain how such small forces were able to occupy important positions without a fight. A few motorcyclists, bold and well-armed, would enter a railway station, kill a few employees and disrupt the train service. Often those in possession could not should have defended themselves. I encountered a group of British engineers who, with shovels and pickaxes, had killed one at a time all the members of an advance motorcycle detachment.

The defense of Arras by the W. Guards and by a handful of French Zouaves was another example of what could be done in this war-behind-the-line by a group of resolute men. I saw the W. guards, aided by a French officer, Commandant Poumier, prepare the defense of their positions with great calm. They all the entrances to the city they erected sandbag barricades which protected machine guns and antitank guns. When the German tanks arrived, they stopped them by destroying some and setting others to others. The enemy column made a detour around the city, but the Zouaves' effective and courageous resistance continued for almost a week, then the W. guards and the Zouaves retired in good order toward Dunkerque.

Such strong points, had there been enough of them, would have made possible the counterattack that General Weygand had planned and that was designed to close up the breach from Arras to Bapaume behind the German motorized columns. The disorder caused by the fugitives, the lack of reserves, the disruption of lines of communication and the disorganization of the German general staffs by the enemy air force prevented it from ever being launched. The speed with which information was supplied by the German espionage service approached the miraculous. Had there been a general established himself in some village when the enemy air force came to bomb him.

Blitzkrieg, as it had been described by the Italian General Douhet and as the Germans had waged it in Poland (a war we believed impossible against an army well established in its positions) was proved possible and victorious through the German superiority in equipment and the inadequate number of our effective forces. Our lack of arrangement in depth was also by that imprudent, that made advance into Belgium which rendered useless the network of subterranean communications established by our armies in the course of eight months.

AMIENS was the parting of the ways for my English comrades and me. We had arrived there in a torrent of tears. The whole city was full of tears. Around the railroad station, seated on their bags, on sidewalks, on pavements they made an immense human carpet worked in dull and lifeless colors. They had emptied the larders of the restaurants, the ovens of the bakeries, the shelves of the groceries, as completely as necrophagous insects clean a corpse.

The charitable Salvation Army was able to give me a cup of tea. I went to sleep rolled up in a blanket.

At three in the morning, Colonel Medlicott, with whom I had gone, sent me word that it was dangerous to remain in Amiens, that he was staying for Boulogne and that he assigned me the duty of taking back to Paris a French journalist attached to the British army, for whom to his great regret he no longer had means of transport.

This was an order that was easier to give than to carry out. The Germans were approaching and thousands of refugees besieged the station. The women emitted shrieks. The only train that was still scheduled to leave for Paris carried as many as twenty persons in each compartment. Distracted men inding babies through the win-travelers crowded on the seats, hil never seen the babies before, ghem: "You'll give him back to aris. . . ."

nd a place in any of these cars eless. Finally an ingenious and ight military commissioner auze us to get into the baggage car as taking to safety the cash e railroad stations and from branches of the Bank of France.
 it was, standing between boxes
 th coins in a train pursued by airplanes, that we returned to t took us fifteen hours to make that in ordinary times takes wo. At each grade crossing we et by a flood of refugees, rising ose-colored waves. My journalnds attracted attention by their (it was not the same as that of
 ry) and I heard people murmur:
 utists!" At one station a woman tell me they had found a spy id as an officer in the next car a policeman had shot him with ver. It was probably untrue but e an idea of the atmosphere of and suspicion produced by this ithless, the conductor of the up car, a solid old Frenchman, bred and ruggedly built, main-

 is equanimity:

ne is nothing I can do," he said to eges, extending his arms across of the car, "nothing at all! You et in. This is a car containing ave my orders to let no one on d I shall let no one aboard. No, er woman, I am not heartless.
 d all of you leave home? Bebomb fell on your village? Well, hat? I saw plenty of bombs fall
 '14 and '18 and torpedoes and en barrages, which are much
 No one ran away because of hat's that you say? That you're Oh, yes you are. In this yone is a soldier, since everynder attack. Don't you know helping the Germans by choking ois, swamping the stations and up the trains and the troops?
 is moment there is only one thing
 rters: to win the war."

ain went on very slowly. Above an bombers, pursued by Eng-iger planes, tried to destroy the
 On an embankment some umping first to the sky and then ound, joyfully indicated to us of the Germans had been shot looked at the conductor who regarding all this noise, and was ychecking off his cash boxes. At ie I still had hope. . . . However, saw the terrifying refugees all e railroad from Amiens to Creil id the impression of a cataclysm oning could stop.

exhausted when I arrived at the Nord but I had only one idea communicate as quickly as pos-those who could make use of mation, the things my comrades d observed in the course of the
 It seemed to us that a small number of measures, relatively easy to adopt, would deprive the enemy of some of the opportunities he now had of successfully repeating the same operation.

 I immediately composed a memorandum intended for Paul Reynaud, drawing his attention to the necessity of replacing the superannuated commanders in the villages directly behind the front by younger men who would be more resolute in defense; to the necessity of prohibiting civil populations from all movement; to the ways of defending cities against incendiary bombs and to other subjects of a like nature.

WHEN I presented myself at the ministry of war, Roland de Margerie, Reynaud's head diplomatic secretary, said to me: "Wait, you will see the chief himself."

A little later, I was in fact taken into the office of the premier and handed him my memorandum. But I found him so completely submerged by the complaints that everyone was showering upon him that I had no illusion about any chance our modest suggestions might have of being acted upon. On that occasion Reynaud gave me the impression of a courageous boxer bravely trying to stay on his feet but already reeling and offering an easy target for a knockout blow. I stayed only a minute, but before I left I asked him, "Do you see any reason for hope?"

"As long as the patient is not dead," he replied, "the doctor always tells the family there's still a little hope."

He was standing in front of his desk, his head thrown back, hands in his pockets. I have not seen him since that day.

I was received on the following day by my military superiors and I found them less pessimistic. They were loud in their praises of the disposition of the troops in depth along the lines of the Somme and the Aisne. General Wey-gand had decided, they told me, to make no attempt to form a continuous line but to allow the tanks if necessary to pass between the occupied positions and to hold the latter in order to prevent the infantry and artillery from following the tanks. Unfortunately we had lost our best divisions in the north and the new line was even thinner than that of the tenth of May.

On the third of June Paris was bombed by two hundred and forty airplanes. On that day Duff Cooper, the British minister of information, had come to Paris and I had been invited to lunch with him by two French ministers, Frossard and Jullien. This luncheon took place at the Ritz; at the moment when we were about to sit down at the table the sirens sounded an alarm. Immediately the waiters, according to regulation, disappeared into the cellars.
 The ministers and their assistants found themselves in an embarrassing situation.
 To seek shelter seemed to them to show lack of courage; to serve themselves lack of dignity. They took the course of sitting down at the table in front of empty plates and waiting to the accompaniment of a violent cannonade.
 But the alarm was a long one, and the

OUR AIRLINES A Bulwark of Defense

While we build up the military to meet any challenge, let us remember that no nation is stronger than its communications. With peaceful Douglas wings over the Americas, our airlines have perfected the fastest, most efficient system of scheduled communications the world has ever known. Because this system is integrated with and best serves the economy we must defend, it should be accelerated in time of emergency. Only through expansion can this bulwark of defense be improved. "It Pays to Fly."

First Around the World
 First in Air Defense

DOUGLAS

AIRCRAFT CO., INC., SANTA MONICA, CALIF.

INSIDE WILLKIE'S HEAD

and heart, too, for that matter—an intimate appraisal of Willkie the man, by Bruce Barton, who was a leader in Willkie's fight for the nomination

IN NEXT WEEK'S COLLIER'S

My dentist had no toothache — it was his pride that was hurt.

He said, "I did a beautiful cleaning job on your teeth last time you were here and now look how dull they are!" And then he gave me a valuable tip—

"Why don't you try chewing Dentyne — regularly, every day! It's extra firm chewing gum, you know. Helps cleanse and polish your teeth. Yes, helps 'em keep their bright sparkle. Gives your teeth healthful exercise, too, and tones up gums and mouth tissues. Try some Dentyne right now!"

One taste of that spicy flavor and I was all for Dentyne — it's so delicious, so refreshing! I bought a package quick — it's just the right shape to slip into my bag, so I always have Dentyne handy. And it does help keep my teeth pearly-bright. But try Dentyne yourself — buy a package today!

HELPS KEEP TEETH BRIGHT

... MOUTH HEALTHY

DENTYNE

greater their hunger became the duller grew the conversation. A secretary went to telephone the prefect of police and returned with the report:

"It's serious. Bombs have fallen on the Citroën Works. The ministry of aviation is in flames. There are several hundred casualties."

When I returned home my children told me they had seen the airplanes very high up like a swarm of bees, flashing in the sunlight. Paris did not seem at all terrified by this bombing. On that occasion I came to the conclusion that the German threat against London would not be as frightful as people had thought. The following day news came that the new German offensive had been launched all along the fronts of the Somme and Aisne. As General Gort and his staff were no longer in France, I made a request to join the Royal Air Force, and permission was granted.

THE general headquarters of the advanced striking force was established at that time at Troyes. I was received there by the commander, Vice-Marshal of the Air Playfair. When one has met a number of the leaders of the Royal Air Force one is struck by a strange, indefinable similarity among them. These handsome faces, with blue eyes that remain young even under gray hair, this combination of gentleness and firmness, this friendly but efficient discipline, are characteristic of the army of the air.

"Although the German air force is superior in numbers," Marshal Playfair told me, "it is certainly inferior to ours in quality. Their losses are three or four times higher than ours, so that today our situation is better than at the beginning of the battle."

But the French aviator Saint-Exupéry, author of Night Flight, whom I met a few days later, gave me a quite different report.

"The Royal Air Force," he told me, "is much too optimistic. For my part I am certain of one thing: my squadron has suffered terrible losses; very soon it will cease to exist."

I saw in the neighborhood of Troyes two fine squadrons of Hurricanes and some nineteen-year-old boys with blond hair and blue, forget-me-not eyes, each one of whom had to his credit more than ten victories, but I was struck by the small number of machines. The British had in France, at least in the region I visited, no more than a few squadrons. When I returned to Paris (where I found a very sinister communiqué that talked of motorized columns at Forges-les-Eaux and at the gates of Rouen), I communicated my impressions to my chief, Colonel Schiffer, and I added:

"I am sure the English still have a large number of fighter planes in England. We must get them to give them to us. It's their fate as well as ours that's being decided at this moment."

"You must go to London," he said, "and send out a sort of SOS to the English people by radio; apparently public opinion over there does not understand the desperate character of the situation."

"I shall be glad to go, Colonel. But I must have an order."

"I shall talk to G.H.Q. about it."

G.H.Q. sent Captain Hermant, with whom I had a conversation, and it was decided I should leave for London on the tenth of June in an army airplane. The news grew worse and worse. The German tanks had now arrived at Vernon, then at Mantes, that is, at the gates of Paris. The government continued to swear it would defend the capital, but on Sunday, the ninth of June, as I was passing through the Place de la Concorde in front of the ministry of the navy, I saw sailors loading immense vans.

On the tenth of June at seven in the morning, Roland de Margerie telephoned me that I had better send my wife south.

"Is the government leaving?"

"Today."

"But Paris will be defended?"

"No."

At that moment I knew everything was over. France, deprived of Paris, would become a body without a head. The war had been lost.

I was due at the Buc airport at noon. My wife and I decided to visit, perhaps for the last time, those corners of Paris we loved best. And so we said goodbye to the Invalides and the Quays of the Seine and the Place Dauphine and Notre Dame. The city had never been more beautiful. The sky was of a very pale blue, the air soft. In the streets, traffic policemen stopped our little car with as much punctiliousness as if the world were not about to come to an end. The salesgirls in the store we entered were alert and obliging. One sensed tears in everyone's eyes, but each went about his business without talking about the great sorrow.

"The common people of France are magnificent," my wife said. "At once simple and brave. How can men like that have been defeated?"

"Men," I replied, "can do nothing against machines. They were ordered to defend a line. They would have defended it. But it was never attacked. It was taken from behind and encircled."

"I still can't believe," she said, "that the Germans are going to march into Paris. . . ."

A few days earlier we had had a long conversation about this entry of the German army into Paris with one of our dearest friends, the surgeon Thierry de Martel.

"As for me," he had said to us, "my mind is made up: the moment I learn that they are in the city I shall kill myself."

And then he explained to us at length that most people do not know how to kill themselves, and bungle the job, but that a surgeon holds the revolver as precisely as he holds a scalpel and always hits a vital spot. Then, half-seriously, he added: "If you, too, have no desire to survive our misfortunes, I offer you my services. . . ."

At ten o'clock in the evening, when I was already on the plane bound for England, the sound of the telephone interrupted my wife, who was sadly selecting the few objects she could take with her. It was Thierry de Martel.

"I wanted to find out," he said, "whether you and your husband were still in Paris."

"André has been sent on a mission to London," she replied, "and, as for me, I am leaving tomorrow at dawn."

"I am going to leave too," he said in a strange tone, "but for a much longer voyage. . . ."

My wife, remembering our conversation about suicide, understood that he was going to kill himself and attempted to dissuade him:

"You can still do much good said. Your patients, your assistants, your nurses, all of them need you."

"I cannot go on living," Martel said. "My only son was killed in the last war. Until now I have tried to believe he died to save France. And now it is France, lost in her turn. Ever since I have lived for is going to disappear cannot go on."

And when she continued to plead with him he hung up.

ON THE twenty-fifth of June during a stopover of the clipper at the American Consulate, my wife, glancing over an American newspaper, learned that Thierry de Martel had killed himself by an overdose of strychnine at the moment the German army made its entrance into Paris.

In him we lost an incomparable man and France one of the noblest types of man bred. This surgeon was a great gentleman. He had made fortunes as a doctor and used them to support free clinics in which he operated on thousands of unfortunate people. I know of a case in which he saved a man from death, by an operation that he alone could perform, a man who had pursued him for years with jealousy and hatred. He had proved on a thousand occasions his physical and moral courage. There is no better measure of the immense confusion of the French in the face of this complete disaster than the emotion by this brave man that he was unable to go on living.

During the retreat from Flanders, the road from Vimy, an old French peasant woman, standing on her doorstep and watching the procession of refugees stream by, said to me: "The pity of it, Captain! Such a country. . . ."

The pity of it, I thought in my mind when I learned of the death of Thierry de Martel. It was maddening to think that such people (for France had produced more than one) found themselves driven to despair, and a great civilization saw itself foredoomed, because of a few thousand tanks and ten thousand planes, which we could have bought without trouble, were not constructed in time.

The fifth and concluding article of this series will appear next week

"Well, maybe he isn't as big as I think he is, but I hope you'll notice we're going backwards!"

LOUIS

"All Aircraft Returned Safely"

Continued from page 11

"Here are your instructions for tonight. You all have target maps in front of you. The primary target is an airfield factory at (we can't mention the names of targets or give the full names of pilots). We don't know much about defenses around the primary target. When you get there, use your own judgment. You'll see by your maps that it's about 700 miles from here. The weather should be good all the way. If you can't find the primary target or if visibility is bad when you reach it, the second primary target will be ———. You know all about that." There was a stirring in the room and smiles appeared on the faces of the boys. I knew about that secondary target too. It was in the Ruhr, which was full of oil tanks and munition factories. In the army they talk of a place as being to be stormed as an "objective" but in the R.A.F. it is always "target."

A Perilous Night Ahead

"You know what to expect there," the commander continued. "Now you should be over your primary target at midnight, or a few minutes afterward. When you find the target, drop your bombs and give us a signal that you are okay and are returning. If you go to the secondary target be careful not to bomb northeast of it. That is a residential section. Be very careful to avoid that. Incidentally, you will carry pennies with you. Drop them if possible over residential sections."

"Pennies" today was the code word for pamphlets. Millions of pamphlets were being dropped over Germany every night.

Now the Intelligence officer said a few words. He told what he knew of both targets and what defenses the boys would be up against. This seemed to soothe the fifty silent lads in uniforms. There were just fifty of them, five to one of the ten bombers.

Incidentally, on the way back," the Intelligence officer said, "watch out for searchlights near any of the Channel ports. If you aren't being teased too much when you are over them have a look and see what they are. Any questions?"

"What is the moon tonight and how much light will we have?" a pilot asked. "Quarter moon," the Intelligence officer said. "Daylight will come at about 4 A. M. You must leave your target area to be clear of enemy territory before daylight."

There were no more questions and, the youngsters in any classroom, they piled out of the door. It was tea-time now. We went to the officers' quarters and tables were piled with bread, butter, cakes and large pots of tea. Brownie and the tall Scotsman named Ted, and chunky little Red and I sat and talked and I was the only one thinking of the perilous night ahead. After the men went to study maps in the room.

Two hours of this and it was dinner-time. The whole group assembled in the mess room for cocktails. They sat around the table, laughing, having sherry, beer, whisky or Martinis and it was all very pleasant. The O. C. (officer commanding) entered and everyone stiffened for a moment and then, when he smiled, everyone relaxed. The R.A.F. officers were all too busy to bother with useless formalities. They are very close to their work. It was a pleasant dinner. These boys seemed completely indifferent to the faces they would see either that or completely confident. Then they drifted away to change clothes.

The ten planes were being warmed up. It was almost eight but the sun sets very late in England in the summer. I walked with Brownie to his plane.

"Wish you were coming along," Old Brownie said cheerfully. "Looks like a nice night."

The setting sun was just casually putting an end to a beautiful day. The clouds were very high and there was practically no breeze. All twenty motors (the Whitley is two-motored) were humming now. I walked with tall Pete to his airplane. Pete looks like Gary Cooper, lanky, amiable, slow-talking.

"Wish I had a book to take along," he said.

In my pocket I had a paper-bound detective story called The Green Diamond Mystery. I gave it to him, but wondered when he'd get time to read it.

"I'll let the kid fly for the first few hours," he said.

"Have a good trip," I told him, "write to me every day."

He grinned and climbed up the tiny ladder into the huge plane. They were all giving the motors a final blast at full throttle. Then the huge, dozing earth-bound planes suddenly became live, mobile things. They didn't look lazy and unwieldy now as they trundled around into the wind. After fifty feet their tails lifted and after 200 yards their wheels raised. One by one, they lifted themselves into the air, at two-minute intervals. In the air they looked slim and full of eager vitality. They circled once and then surely, swiftly they soared away and soon even the sound of their motors died.

The airdrome seemed strangely quiet now and lonely as a college campus looks and feels in vacation time. Some of us played cards for a while and then several pilots who weren't working tonight took me to the local pub in a near-by town. We talked of many things, sitting around there, but we didn't talk about the ten pilots and their crews who were now gradually approaching enemy territory. I couldn't think of anything else. I could imagine Pete reading his detective story, stopping every few minutes for a quick check with his crew. I could imagine Old Brownie and Alec sitting there casually, lightly fingering the controls, looking at a dozen instruments at once.

To Keep the Pilots Awake

Time passed very slowly. We went back to the airdrome. Everything was pitch-black. The dying moon, having only one quarter of its life left, was giving little light to a blacked-out world. It was bright enough inside of "Operations." Then I went into the holy of holies, the Operations room. This was the heart of the airdrome. Here were the wireless and the telephones and maps, and now and then the wing commander would make marks on the maps.

The clock moved slowly. Once the yellow signal was given, meaning that an unidentified aircraft was in the neighborhood. Other reports came in. On a map we followed its course, wondering whether it was an enemy bomber. Then the word came that it was an English training plane. England is so full of defending fighting planes that it has become hazardous to train bombers at night. They are no sooner in the air than they find a Spitfire or a Hurricane nosing inquisitively against them. There is always the danger that the

— and so, John, I am returning your engagement ring...

Don't take chances!
Of all popular soaps Lifebuoy is...

THE ONE SOAP
ESPECIALLY MADE TO PREVENT B.O. (BODY ODOR)

DON'T BE FOOLED! ALL SOAPS DON'T DO — CAN'T DO — EQUAL JOBS OF PROTECTING YOU FROM "B.O." ONLY ONE POPULAR SOAP IS ESPECIALLY MADE TO PREVENT "B.O." — LIFEBOUY.

Pretty-pretty scented soaps—wishy-washy lathers—are not for you, if you want to be sure you don't offend!

Lifebuoy has a deodorizing ingredient found in no other popular soap. Lifebuoy in your daily bath gives ALL-OVER protection against "B.O." You need that, because perspiration occurs anywhere on the body, due to heat, exercise, or nervousness.

It's modern—the lift of a Lifebuoy bath! It's super-refreshing—the tang of Lifebuoy's purifying lather! More folks bathe with Lifebuoy than any other soap. Get Lifebuoy today!

ITS CRISP ODOR GOES IN A JIFFY... ITS PROTECTION LASTS AND LASTS

LIFEBOUY HEALTH SOAP

"Those bulletins we rushed out weren't readable . . . but the complaints are clear enough!"

NOTHING BACKFIRES quicker than a blurry, illegible message. It won't get a prospect's business. It's likely to get his goat. Tell him your story quickly, legibly. Tell him on Hammermill Mimeo-Bond. This paper gives sharp, clean copies—as many as 5,000 from one stencil. You can write on it with a pen; the ink won't feather. Test Hammermill Mimeo-Bond free. Send for 100-sheet packet and "Good Stencil Duplicating"—how to get better results from your equipment.

HAMMERMILL
MIMEO-BOND

HAMMERMILL MIMEOGRAPH PAPER

MADE BY THE MAKERS OF HAMMERMILL BOND

FREE! Hammermill Paper Co., Dept. C, Erie, Pa.
100 SHEETS As operators of a model
Stencil Duplicator, we would like to test Hammermill Mimeo-Bond. Send 100-sheet packet and "Good Stencil Duplicating." (Students and outside U. S., 60¢)

Name _____

Position _____

(Please attach to, or write on, your company letterhead) C-9-14

When the car in front of you turns sharp left without so much as a how-do-you-do, you can either hit it broadside or run off the road into green pastures—or, if your car is equipped with Grey-Rock Balanced Brake Linings, you can simply come to a quick, quiet, smooth stop without interrupting your conversation . . . Pull in where you see the Grey-Rock sign—where a trained mechanic can show you why ever-mounting numbers of passenger cars, trucks, and buses are turning to this long-lasting lining.

Give your car an even brake
with
Grey-Rock
BALANCED BRAKE LININGS

U. S. Asbestos Division of Raybestos-Manhattan, Inc., Manheim, Pa.

THIS IS THE SIGN OF A FIRST-CLASS
SERVICE STATION

bomber might be mistaken for a Heinkel or a Dornier. Now most of the training is done either in Canada or over France.

It was a little after midnight and now reports began to come in. The pilots of our bombers had reached the target; had found it; had dropped their bombs; had started home. Pete checked in with his one word "Okay." So did Alec and so did Red. There was a chart on the table and, as word came from the radio room, the squadron commander would check them off, one by one. By one o'clock nine of them had checked in and were now on their way home.

But we hadn't heard from Brownie yet. No one mentioned it. We listened to a German radio maintained for the amusement of German pilots. It was good music. At ten-minute intervals, over and through this music, would come three staccato dashes, repeated three times. This was a German beacon. The music was just to keep the pilots awake. The Germans use beacons a lot and the R.A.F. know where each is located and sometimes use them too.

Officers who had left orders to be called at two o'clock drifted into the room. They looked at the chart. Everyone was all right but Brownie. Still no one mentioned it. I had only met Brownie twenty-four hours before but now I felt sick with worry. Someone brought in tea. We drank it and talked about a speech Churchill had made the day before.

I was visualizing long fingers of white light reaching up for Brownie, covering him with light. I imagined him trying to swerve away from it and meeting another long finger coming through the sky. I saw him desperately trying to get into the merciful blanket of a cloud and I saw the tracer bullets go up after him and pom-pom guns, and then the heavy stuff battering the sides of his plane.

It was four o'clock now. I walked out onto the field. A faint dawn was showing in the east but above it was cloudless. A wind from the west brought a chill with it. Then faintly I heard the sound of a motor. It became a roar and then the plane came into view. It was flying low and its lights showed brightly through the thinning night. Green lights, the "Come on in" signal, blinked from the field and the big ship landed. It taxied to its hangar. Figures climbed down and I walked to meet them. Tall, lanky, Pete the Scotsman had landed safely.

Home to Roost

"You can have this book back," he said. "I guessed who did it in the first ten pages."

"How was the trip? Any trouble?"

"No, they threw some stuff at us but it wasn't bad. Damn' cold though at sixteen thousand feet—fifteen below."

Another plane was approaching and then another. While one landed, another circled. Two more approached. The chickens were coming home to roost. But what of Brownie? One by one they landed. The crews walked straight to the Operations room to report everything that had happened. I went back and listened.

Pete said, "We found the target at 12:05. There were cumulus clouds at four thousand that were breaking. I dropped the one 'stick' and then went back and dropped the rest. The clouds thickened and I turned for home. Listen—about those lights over the Channel. I had a good look at them. That's phosphorescence, I think. It's shallow in there and it may be that the light from the moon hits the rocks on the bottom and that light is reflected."

Alec reported, "Found the target. The clouds were getting thick. Dropped two sticks but couldn't see result."

Red reported, "Never could find target. Too many clouds. Went to secondary target. They got a lot of light stuff there and plenty of searchlights. I dropped a couple of flares. I guess they figured it was me. Went down in flames and the searchlights went out. It was easy to pick out target then. I dropped my bombs. Saw a big explosion. Hit it, I guess."

Questions were asked. I kept keeping one eye on the door. A man opened and a fair-haired lad with blue eyes and slightly apologetic walked in. It was Brownie.

"You scared us," I told him. "I never got your report."

He looked blank. "I forgot all about the damn' thing," he said. "Never catch it."

The wing commander looked at Brownie and then wrote, "All returned safely." Brownie gave a report casually as the others had. We all went to the mess for bacon, eggs and hot tea. Nine crews were joking, kidding one another.

More Than Halfway to New York

England is a country that produces great many old fools who somehow find their way to high places. England doesn't produce many young fools. These kids weren't fools. They did a great job tonight and they knew it. They weren't going to get serious about it.

"Say, I got a scare just before reaching the target," Alec said to Red. "An aircraft came out of a cloud a hundred yards away. I told the watch it. I was hoping it was a friend. It looked like one. And who was it? Was Red?"

"Yeah, I saw you, too," Red said, munching some bacon.

"Where's Eddie?" someone asked.

"He'll be right along," someone said.

"Bet he'll have a swell time," Brownie laughed. "He'll say, 'I was, at twenty thousand feet, in my knees to the rudder bar. I was right up there in the sky. I feel of ice on my wings and twenty mileserschmitts around me. I got there by one, and then went down and dropped my bombs on a Dornier factory. Flames shot a thousand feet in the air.'"

Eddie walked in then, a big, tall, fair-haired kid who was twenty-two or so. He looked very unhappy.

"I could not find the main target," said dejectedly.

"Did you bring your bombs back?" Red asked.

"No," Eddie said casually. "I dropped them on the secondary target. I went around and found five big oil tanks. I dropped my bombs on them and you should have seen those flames. They were—"

"They were two thousand feet high," Brownie said.

Eddie looked hurt and ordered bacon and eggs. Brownie and I walked to the side. It was six-thirty now and the dawn was touching the hangars, making them almost bright.

Brownie yawned, "How about you? Shut-eye? This has been a long night."

"Sure," I said sarcastically. "Tough day. How far did you go tonight?"

"About 1,500 miles," Brownie said. "That's more than halfway from New York," I said.

"That's a flight I wouldn't make," Brownie said. "All over. Not me. This was a cinch compared to that. I'll see you later. How about Pete and you and me going into tomorrow? We'll have the night shift."

I said, "Sure, that'll be swell. Then I went to bed."

Waikiki Mirage

Continued from page 15

ed by an awful woman and didn't e in anything any more. What you do?"

oking around the room Mrs. Crawas unable to detect any literature ellow tinge. "Who is this man?"
sd cautiously.

His—uh . . . just a man," Virginia

Back home?" Ellen Crawford thought ing Mrs. Howard a polite note of ng.

no," Virginia said, "right here."
h's head reeled. She said, "Vir-re you making this all up?"

course not," Virginia said in-tly.

th thought quickly, maintaining a ul look of interest. A cable to ia's mother tonight. There was a t for the mainland day after toy if she could wangle a reservatit. Tonight was the dinner party h Murgatroyds'. She could keep e on her there. Tomorrow she stick to Virginia like a shadow od willing, day after tomorrow,

r on a ship bound for home. Un-

h, strategy was plainly the only
She said, "It sounds a terribly eing problem. I wish I had time about it now but I'm due at the dinner's." She felt some misgivout leaving Virginia alone. "You t," she said hopefully, "like to our hair done?"

id it done yesterday."

Apap would be nice," Ellen said,
y'll be fresh for tonight."

some letters to write and I have an up on my diary."

it take you all afternoon?"

yes," Virginia said.

n be dressed by seven," Ellen We'll discuss your problem when d time to think about it."

nia went to the door with her.
nise I'll break it to him gently,"

ed.

ak it to him?"

pin," said Virginia. "And bene, Mrs. Crawford, nothing will eak up my friendship with John."

"Oh . . . John," Ellen said. She had quite forgotten about John. She closed the door and went directly to the cable office. Her message to Mrs. Howard read: V MADLY IN LOVE WITH SCOUNDREL ADVISE IMMEDIATE RETURN TO MAINLAND REGARDS ELLEN.

Alone, Virginia gazed raptly into space. Then, after chewing her pencil a while the result was: "Dear Diary. I have neglected you. But you will forgive me when you know why. I am madly in love and have been very busy.
Diary, I have met the man who is my destiny."

In the throes of composition she glanced idly out of the window. The sun was going down. Beach boys were collapsing the huge striped umbrellas and carrying in the gaily colored pads.
And the man of Virginia's destiny was sitting on the prow of a beached out-rigger canoe watching, with melancholy mien, the sunset.

VIRGINIA put on a bathing suit, hurried downstairs and out of the hotel.
She walked past him once and he didn't notice her, so engrossed was he in his memories that burned without blessing.
She walked back. A voice broke in on Mike's wondering whether or not it would rain, saying, "Hello."

He jumped. "Oh . . . hello," Mike
said.

Breathlessly Virginia said, "Should I sit there beside you?" She gazed longingly at a bit of seat Mike was not occupying. He moved over. Virginia sat down and stared with large, tragic eyes at the setting sun. After watching her a moment Mike said, "Is something the matter?"

She turned eyes steeped with pity full upon him. "I was thinking about wasted lives," she said.

"Oh," said Mike. There wasn't, really, any answer to that. He contented himself by examining the tilt of her nose and a soft curl lying at the nape of her neck. She was certainly a pretty little thing when she hadn't been drowning.
"I wouldn't think about wasted lives if I

What chance have we got with every radio program giving it away"

REAMER KELLER

137 years ago...in 1803...the Louisiana Purchase was made

313 YEARS AGO...IN 1627
the Haigs were making Scotch!

You can be sure of utmost enjoyment in Scotch that has satisfied the public for over 3 centuries! So choose Haig & Haig! It is the only Scotch that can point to a 313-year-old history of continuous satisfaction. And yet Haig & Haig makes no extra charge for its great name and fame!

PINCH BOTTLE 12 YEARS OLD

Haig & Haig
THE OLDEST NAME IN SCOTCH

BLENDED SCOTS WHISKY • 86.8 PROOF

SOMERSET IMPORTERS, LTD., NEW YORK

COMPACTO, the unique French-type Syringe, folds ingeniously into a small rubberized case—equally handy for your bathroom or for travel.

Not only is the mouth of this syringe non-collapsible, it is also extra wide... making it much simpler to test water temperature.

EASY TO FILL—QUICK TO DRY—
COMPACTO ACTUALLY HOLDS
2 QUARTS, 10 OUNCES OF LIQUID

• At home, just tuck it away on your medicine-cabinet shelf—concealed in its smart-looking, talon-fastened case. On trips, it takes no more space in your suitcase than a small handbag. Yet a Compacto holds far more liquid than an ordinary syringe... and is the only folding syringe with a non-collapsible mouth to facilitate mixing and to prevent spilling when in use. $2.95 at leading drug and department stores—in Red, Jade, Blue, and White with Cases to match. White also with Black Case.

A Selected
RED-SEAL VALUE

The
SEAMLESS RUBBER
Company

NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT

Specialists in Fine Rubber Goods for 65 Years were you," he said. "There isn't much, actually, that's worth being unhappy about."

"I'm talking about love," Virginia said simply.

"Oh... love," Mike said.

"Suppose a woman isn't worth anything to begin with," Virginia went on. "And a nice man, for instance, never knows that she doesn't really love him but only wants the presents he brings her because he is rich. Then when his money is gone she spurns him. You know?"

"I know," Mike said gravely. How intense she was and what long eyelashes she had!

"He would go away and try to forget but her face would haunt him," said Virginia, "but he should not forget that somewhere there might be a girl who would—uh—go through fire for him. And he might look back years later and say, 'What a fool I was to think I loved that other one.' He would be married then and have children, of course."

"Of course," Mike said.

"Children," Virginia said, "make a man's life complete."

Mike nodded solemnly, thinking privately that if she was any sample she was quite right. She was certainly making him very happy, just looking at her. He knew if he sat there any longer he was going to kiss her. The urge was as insistent as a sneeze rising in church. He stood up and pulled her to her feet. "Let's go for a quick dip," he said.

SHE swam with the same kind of intense concentration with which she talked. Mike paced his strokes to stay near her. When they came in he gave her his hand to help her through the shallow water and then when he held her robe and felt her shivering as she got into it he just suddenly leaned down and kissed her. Immediately remorse overtook him. "I'm sorry," he said.

Virginia said intensely, "Oh, you mustn't be. A man has to fall in love again sometime. It isn't fair to expect him to live with a memory. I mean..."

"Look," Mike said, taking hold of her two shoulders, "what is your name?"

"Virginia Howard."

"Well, Virginia Howard, you go straight inside and have a hot bath. You're shivering. I will call on your mother tomorrow."

"Oh, but I'm not cold. I..."

"You are cold," Mike said, "and you're going to do as I tell you or there'll be awful trouble."

She stood on tiptoe, kissed him again and then without a word padded obediently toward the hotel entrance for bathers. For a moment Mike considered going after her and inviting her to the party that night but he thought better of it. Meeting her mother in a crush of people wasn't exactly the way he wanted it. It was bound to be a rout what with the Murgatroyds bringing their dinner guests in later. He waved as she went through the doorway and went home to dress.

Virginia had her bath and got into her clothes in an almost comatose state. Engaged. She, Virginia Howard, was engaged. Really, this time, not the old frat-pin business. This was an honest-to-goodness engagement, the sort you read about. What would Mrs. Crawford say? Sudden fear gripped her. Mrs. Crawford would pry about his family and his past. That awful past of his!

All during the ride to the Murgatroyds', John kept trying, under cover of darkness, to hold Virginia's hand. John had magnanimously forgiven the surf-board episode and was prepared, as he put it elegantly to himself, to do a little smooching. Virginia snatched her hand away as fast as he grabbed it because, to her way of thinking, her hand no longer belonged to her.

At dinner Virginia was very quiet. She was dying of pneumonia. Mike knelt through the soup, fish and entree and begged her to live for him. Virginia arrived at the convalescent stage just as the butler arrived with coffee. He was a little surprised to hear her murmur, "Our love is stronger than death."

Gulping his coffee hastily, John leaned over and twitched at her sleeve. Virginia turned to him with a weak and tender glance, left over from the convalescence.

John said hoarsely, "Let's go out in the garden. This joint gives me the vapors." The vapors was John's most persistent and nagging disease.

In the garden Virginia took the bull by the horns. "John," she said, "I feel there is something I should tell you."

John grabbed at her. "I feel there is something I should tell you," he said greedily. In the ensuing scuffle the leis of ginger flowers he had bought her were badly bruised but Virginia emerged from the conflict victoriously unknissed, yelling, "I'm pledged to somebody else!"

"You're what?" John said.

"My poor John," Virginia said, with the rapidity of one who has frequently rehearsed a speech, "I have met my great love. I was such a child, John... such an inexperienced child... and nothing will ever break up our friendship."

John said belligerently, "What do you mean 'poor John'?"

Mrs. Crawford was, at the moment, prowling among the trees trying to round them up to go on to the house of a man named Lester. She called, "John! Virgin-hia!" They suspended hostilities and joined her in silence.

The Lester house was large, situated down a steep hill off the road and overlooking the water. Grass mats had been spread on the lawn and Japanese lanterns in gay colors with black rims were strung crisscross between two poles at either side which were topped by flares.

Virginia's first impression as she came out onto the veranda was that there were a great many people there. Then she saw Mike. He was wearing a tropical dinner jacket. Beachcombers didn't have tropical dinner jackets. And engaged men didn't have tall, lovely girls hanging onto their arms and laughing up into their eyes. Somebody touched her arm. "If it isn't my little hula girl," Lillian Dexter said. "How are your muscles?"

"Stiff," Virginia said, without moving her eyes off Mike.

"I didn't know you knew the Lester family," Lillian Dexter said.

"I don't," said Virginia.

"You saw Mike Lester this morning at the studio, remember?"

"Is that his name?" Virginia asked.

"Who... who is that girl with him?" Lillian looked across the lawn. "Myra Lester," she said.

"Miss," Virginia said, "or Mrs. Lester?"

"Mrs. Myra Lester," said Lillian Dexter. "She's your hostess. You like to meet her?"

"Later," said Virginia.

MIKE saw her then as she turned to go into the house. By the time she reached the veranda she had disappeared. He saw John standing looking bewildered and said, "I'm John Lester. How do you do? I saw you surfing this afternoon."

"I'm John Crawford," John said. "How do you do?" They shook hands.

Mike said then, "Is there anything you can get you? A highball? My mother makes a wonderful julep. He's coming out over there at the other end of the veranda."

"Thanks," John said, "but I think I had my quota for the evening. I neglected to mention that his quota was none. If he seemed a bit preoccupied was because he was thinking up a way to that 'Poor John' crack of Virginia. Just wait until he got her alone. He has a few things to tell her."

Virginia crept into the house and found a dressing room and stood in it carrying her ruined life. She sat there shaking all over. From her habit she hiked right into a chair and spent years in as many months. When she was called upon to nurse for malaria the suffering was in Great tears rolled down her cheeks. She took her hand at the last and said, "I wronged you, Virginia," and she died. "It doesn't matter... now. I have devoted my life to serving others. I'm happy. Would you like to see a picture?"

Myra Lester, looking down at

"Don't be alarmed, dear... it isn't a guest towel"

ROLA

THOUSANDS HAVE BEEN HELPED BY TYPING!

Why not consider what an L C SMITH or CORONA typewriter will do for you?

CLEARER expression, better marks," say student users of Corona. "This fast L C Smith is my bread and butter," says a top-notch secretary. Anyone can quickly acquire useful typingspeed . . . many ambitious people learn typing as the first step toward self-improvement. Perhaps it is a step which you too can profitably take.

We make many fine typewriters, honestly built and reasonably priced . . . portables for the student, the traveler, the "occasional typist," and fast standard and silent typewriters for the expert, the secretary, the executive's office. At your request we will gladly send free descriptive booklets.

In the far-flung service of Uncle Sam, as in business, many a man has won his stripes a little quicker through ability to type. It's an asset anywhere.

There's an L C SMITH or CORONA typewriter for everybody... beginner... or expert!

CORONA ZEPHYR . . . "the 9-pound wonder of the typewriter world." Lower in cost, a genuine sensation among modern portables . . . yet has 4-row 84-character standard keyboard, back-spacer, high-speed escapement! Two models, Regular and De Luxe. List prices, $29.75 and $34.50 (or 75¢ a week, plus small down payment).*

NEW Super-Speed L C SMITH Take a good look at the latest word in office typewriters . . . modern, complete, and almost incredibly fast. Automatic Margin Set, Touch Selector, Floating Shift . . . standard or silent, choice of many type faces and carriage widths. Free demonstration in your office. List prices from $115.50.*

THREE SPEEDLINE CORONAS Standard, Sterling, and Silent . . . each with Floating Shift, each "tops" among portables in its price class. Easy to operate, fast, sturdy, and dependable. Touch-typing chart and smart carrying case included with each Corona. List prices, $49.50, $59.50, $64.50 (or $1.00 a week, plus small down payment).*

*All prices subject to revision

L C SMITH & CORONA Typewriters

FREE BOOKLETS! For the beginner, a helpful folder, "Typing is Easy," by World Champion Typist Norman Saksvig. For the secretary, "Tips to Typists" . . . time-saving ideas for the expert.

L C SMITH & CORONA TYPEWRITERS INC Makers also of Carbon Ribbon Typewriters ★ Corona Adding Machines ★ Vivid Duplicators ★ Typebar Brand Ribbons and Carbons. Branches or Dealers in all principal cities.

L C SMITH & CORONA TYPEWRITERS INC Desk # 705 E. WASHINGTON STREET SYRACUSE NEW YORK

I am interested in ☐ Office Typewriters ☐ Portable Typewriters. Please send free copy of booklet checked below.

☐ "TIPS TO TYPISTS" ☐ "TYPING IS EASY"

Name _____ Street _____ City _____ State _____

Sid Luckman, football star, says, "Typing saves time in school and college . . . time you can spend in other things. I certainly would be lost without my Corona . . . and I advise every young student to acquire the typing habit early, and stick to it for life."

Mother wins scholarship. Mrs. Grace Darnell, Brooklyn, N. Y., mother of two children, worked at home and with the help of her Corona won a $1400 scholarship at New York University. Other Corona users tell us of winning contests with neatly-typed entries, selling scripts, landing jobs!

Hardest typewriter user? Many typists say it's the Court Reporter. And Court Reporters (buying their own machines) use more L C Smiths than all other makes combined! John J. Sheehan, New Orleans Court Reporter, wrote 51,000 pages of testimony on his L C Smith, spent 40 cents for repairs in ten years!

Light—not heavy—with a flavor
found in no
other brew

A TRUE ALE, with the extra flavor coming from ale yeasts, Ballantine's is, at the same time, a particularly lively drink . . . bright, brisk, sparkling . . . brewed especially to the American taste.

Call for a glass of Ballantine's Ale today. Taste it critically . . . and you will meet the most satisfying combination of qualities ever brewed into an ale . . . PURITY, BODY and FLAVOR . . . with the emphasis on FLAVOR.

Millions enjoy Ballantine's Ale above any other brew. On sale coast to coast . . . in bottles and cans (12 oz. and full quart).

BALLANTINE'S America's Largest Selling ALE

anxiously as a woman can look while powdering her nose, said, "Is something wrong?"

"Nothing, thank you," Virginia said. Poor woman. Her heart was probably all his. Maybe she'd die never knowing that he had been unfaithful to her. She said suddenly, "Are you happy, Mrs. Lester?"

"Divinely," Myra Lester said. "Why, aren't you?"

"Oh, I'm happy," Virginia said, "but I'm not married."

"But that's when you're happiest," Myra said. "Don't you think being married is nice?"

"I think it must be awful."

"Why, for heaven's sake?"

"Well, for instance, if I had a husband I'd worry," Virginia said.

"About what?"

"I'd hate to think my husband loved me and then, for instance, find out that he kissed other women," Virginia said. She clenched her fists. "Just walked up to them and kissed them without knowing their names or anything and a nice wife like you waiting at home for him all the time."

Myra Lester's face changed suddenly from that of a happy woman to that of an angry woman. Virginia noticed the change. Myra said, "What did you say?" between her fine, white teeth and Virginia came conscious.

She gasped, "Oh . . . I'm sorry . . . I . . ." and lunged for the door.

Both John and Mike saw her whip across the veranda and dart into the garden. For personal reasons quite independent of each other, they both followed her. Myra Lester came, an avenging fury, to stand in the doorway and look at her perfidious husband who was, with every outward evidence of innocence, mixing mint juleps and handing them out. She started for him.

Mike overtook Virginia by a hedge. She was trying to get through it and into the road. He hauled her back. John paused on the other side of the hedge in his headlong pursuit because what he had to say to Virginia was private.

Virginia said, "Please don't touch me, Mr. Lester."

"All right," he said, "but why not go through the gate? It's cleaner than the hedge. What's the matter with you, Virginia?"

"I hope," Virginia said through stiff lips, "that you don't think anything meant anything to me, either. I mean just because I let you kiss me doesn't mean that I thought we would be married or anything like that. I've kissed lots of people and anyway I'm engaged to be married already."

Mike said, "Oh, I see."

"Yes," Virginia said, "I am engaged to marry John Hillary Crawford the third. And my fiancé is very funny. He won't understand my being out here alone with you."

JOHN couldn't stand it any longer. He burst through the hedge. "I'm not funny," he said wrathfully, "and we're not engaged any longer and you give me back my fraternity pin right here and now in front of witnesses!"

By witnesses he meant Mike and another distracted young man who had burst through a second section of the hedge in search of Mike. "Mike," said Allen Lester, "do come and do something about Myra. She's gone absolutely batty . . . accusing me of all sorts of things. Now she's having hysterics. What do I do?"

Mike said to Virginia, "Stay right here. Don't you move." He went with his brother in the direction of the sound of hysteria.

Virginia clawed at the clasp of John's fraternity pin and thrust it into his hand. "Here, take your old pin," she said, "who wants it?"

"Poor John my eye," said John, as thrust it into his pocket.

"Oh, leave me alone," Virginia sobbed. "I'm so miserable!"

She found the gate and a taxi outside it. Crawling in, she directed the driver to the hotel and then lay on her face in the back seat having a good old-fashioned cry.

At the hotel she lay down on her bed and went on crying. Life was awful. Everything was pretty until you got close to it and then it exploded in your face. People were awful. They lied and kissed people and it didn't mean anything.

"I MUST tell you, Mr. Lester," Ellen Crawford was saying in a taxi, "that little Virginia is a most unreliable source. In view of what you tell me I hesitate to say this but . . . but I don't think a child knows what love means."

"Yes she does," Mike said. "She's in love with me."

"But tomorrow it may be all over," Ellen warned. "Why, only this afternoon she was madly in love with that beachcomber who does nothing, so as I can figure out, except drink and boast of the woman he loved before Virginia fell in love with him."

"Umm hmm," Mike said. "The woman's face is haunting him and he's wasting his life."

"How in the world did you know?" Ellen said.

"Oh, I know a lot of things," said Mike. "I can surf and sail a boat and manage a sugar plantation and I know a lot of other things too."

Virginia's sobbing had died down when the door opened. She was simply crying drearily and staring at the ceiling. They ranged around the bed, Ellen, Mike, Myra and Allen, and stared down at her. Their collective stare brought forth another loud wail. Mike leaned down and touched her. "Look, Virginia," he said, pointing to his brother, "do you know this gentleman?"

Virginia shook her head vigorously and tried to get it under the pillow. She pulled it out again. "Do you know me?" he said. She nodded and did for the pillow again. Firmly, he cut off her retreat. "Did I kiss you this afternoon?"

Then she really howled. Mike turned to Myra: "You see? I told you."

"Brothers," said Myra darkly, "I have been known to lie for brothers."

"Now about this beachcomber," Ellen said worriedly.

"I'm her beachcomber," Mike said. "She's been trying to reform me all afternoon. I didn't reform well because I didn't know I was a depraved character. Now will all you earthbound grownups get out of here and leave me alone?"

When the door closed behind them, Mike sat down on the edge of the bed. "Do you believe in love at first sight?" he said.

Virginia gulped. "Y-yes," she said.

"So do I," Mike said. "Now let's close our eyes and go down and tell our brother's wife he doesn't go around kissing strange girls. Then we can have a nice long talk about love and reform and I'll forget about that other woman and we'll be very happy. How about it?"

"O-oh," Virginia said, "you're posing to me!"

"Definitely," Mike said. "It's dangerous to leave you around loose."

"Just think," Virginia said, rosy-eyed, "I might have broken up with your brother's home and they might have gone on for years and years never knowing that he hadn't been unfaithful. They might have died of broken hearts."

"Now don't start," Mike said. "You're going to have a very adventurous romantic life and I don't want you worn out before we start."

Somebody's Waiting for You

Continued from page 22

ed said quickly, "Him! Say, I'd trust Rusty with anything, any time. Look, I'll scare up the car."

Rusty shrugged when he'd left them. "I'm not even a romantic menace any more."

Jane was watching Jimmy through a window, saw him scissor his long, flared legs over the door of the big, blue duster and tool it around to the porch. "Nice kid," she said. "You must be fond of him."

"I am," Rusty honestly replied; but he wondered if that was oblique imputation. It bothered him all the way to town.

He watched from a chair in the Copley by while Jimmy strangled a telephone, saw his face light up and yearn to the mouthpiece when he obviously reached the wanted voice. What would he be like, Rusty wondered. Wellesley field-hockey freshman with a flat voice and flat heels? What other kind could Jimmy have?

Jimmy walked back. "She'll be right down now. Any minute, pal!" He backed Rusty lightly on the shoulder. "Stand up, you dope, and look handsome! This doesn't happen every day!"

HE wasn't at all what he'd pictured, coming toward them from the elevator bank. There was nothing flat-heeled about this one. Her stride was a light, easy thing to look upon, graceful on exquisitely fashioned slim legs. She was intense with abundant, lovely life—there was warmth, a pasted flame of heat at the column of her throat. Her body was fully and sweetly curved with living, uncrowded lines. Her mouth was delicately open-lipped in greeting. Her voice on the "Jimmy!" was low and clear.

Pleasure in reunion lighted her eyes, brought up little flaming pin points in them, like tiny, golden candles—Rusty could see them burning there.

"Marilyn! Marilyn!" said Jimmy. Rusty liked her name at once. "This is Rusty McLarnin, Marilyn Patterson! My gal and my pal! Have a look!"

"Hello." Her hand was warm in Rusty's.

What did I tell you!" Jimmy crowed. But you didn't," said Rusty, still looking at her. Was he staring?

The girl said: "Jimmy, your father told me to tell you that if you win tomorrow, he'll fly up for the finals Saturday."

"Wait here a minute, you two. I'll wire him to make a reservation now."

It gave Rusty a little time alone with Jane. He moved in a bare half step. He saw her make an instinctive gesture of retreat. He liked that. She was highly conscious of him. Her eyes came undoubtedly to his.

He seems so confident," she nodded to Jimmy. "I suppose it's because he's playing with you. He thinks you're the best in tennis—ever! He also thinks you're a great guy."

Rusty said: "It isn't hurting him to think so, whether I am or not."

"No," she said, "I guess it isn't."

Rusty nodded toward the wire desk where Jimmy was hunched in a scribble.

"Boy and girl?" he asked.

"We grew up together."

Rusty smiled. "All the way to here."

"And beyond," she added very quickly.

"Oh, of course," Rusty said. "And why not?"

He saw color rise in the small, rounded planes of her face. She, too, knew that there was an answer to that question: that sometimes two people in one meeting by the merest exchange of a word, a glance, brief contact of fingers can set up a small, fierce blaze. No one had ever hit him this way. Never. Not even Jane.

Jimmy came hurrying back to them. "Let's eat in the Sheraton Room. Tennis crowd may be in there. Like to have them meet you. Nice bunch."

Jimmy proved right. A table hailed them, its occupants cordial in their greeting, perfunctory, as always, toward Rusty, but positively eager in meeting the girl.

Rusty was almost rude in getting her away before Jimmy made her known around the board; even as someone was calling for more chairs, Rusty said to her—he didn't ask, "Dance with me, Marilyn." It was his first use of her name. It made a small melody in his mouth.

Her breath came quickly in a corner where, shielded from the table, he drew her close. He felt a ruthlessness within himself; his arm was urgent at her waist, her body stiffened against his own.

With her right hand she pressed away from him. He laughed, let her hear it, drew her closer as the music drifted and died. "Nobody's going to get hurt," he said.

She was silent as he led her to the table, but he knew by the way her eyes stole across the board with a look at once resentful and furtive that she was not going to forget their dance.

He made small talk and watched her dance with Jimmy. Jimmy was such a poor dope. He'd never know... never... you'd have to draw him a diagram.

Then Rod Haven blew in from the lobby with a protesting Jane Goodale on his arm. "Snared her," he said triumphantly. "She thought she was going to get to bed. What'll it be, Jane?"

Jane took the chair at Rusty's side. "Something to make me sleep."

"Who's your money on Saturday?" asked Trix Reghart, a sun-tanned little dervish just out of the juniors.

"McLarnin and Grierson, if McLarnin wants to win. You always win when you want to, don't you, McLarnin?" Then she dropped her voice to a more subdued note. "Why, McLarnin," she said, "you old fire horse! What makes you tremble that way? What's coming down the wind, McLarnin?"

BEFORE he got his eyes away from the dance floor, she had followed them to Jimmy and his girl.

"Oh!" Jane said. "Would that be the lovely anything he could trust you with any time?"

Rusty turned to her brusquely and he'd never been that way with Jane. "You're way off form on your guessing." He pushed back from the table to rise. "I'm tired," he said, "Tell Jimmy I left. Tell Jimmy and his lady good night."

He couldn't run away from the memory of Marilyn. It was with him through the night, and when he awakened. He spent breakfast trying to forget her. When it was over he knew that he could not.

He had no further need for memory when they walked out on the court that afternoon. She was the first thing of which he was conscious, once within the enclosure of center court. She sat down front in a box at the rail looking lovely, smartly turned out.

Perhaps her presence was the reason that he and Jimmy clicked as they never had before: were component and flashing members of a hard, driving, fierce

Bring in Your Entire Family's Shoes

National SHOE "CHECK-UP" DAYS

September 9 to 14

FREE SHOE CONDITION CHART

for FREE "CHECK-UP"

✓ APPEARANCE ✓ CONDITION ✓ FIT ✓ CONSTRUCTION

SIX BIG DAYS TO SEE THE MIRACLES OF MODERN SHOE SERVICE

Round up the family footwear for a trip to your shoe repairman. Then be prepared for the surprise of your life! Modern shoe service technique works wonders! Gives you "old-shoe" comfort with "new-shoe" beauty... saves you new-shoe dollars with old-shoe pennies!

...and during these money-saving days... Sept. 9 to 14... your shoe repairman will make a FREE Condition Report on every pair, showing you how economically your worn shoes can be made like new!

Remember NATIONAL SHOE "CHECK-UP" DAYS Sept. 9-14
AT GOOD SHOE SERVICE SHOPS EVERYWHERE

WHO SAID GOOD BLADES HAVE TO BE HIGH-PRICED?

Marlin BLADES

20 FOR 25¢

GUARANTEED BY THE MARLIN FIREARMS CO. NEW HAVEN, CONN.

FREE: WEEK'S SUPPLY - SINGLE OR DOUBLE EDGE - WRITE TODAY!

LAW

Win greater respect and success. Learn more, earn more. We guide you step by step—furnish all text material, including fourteen-volume Law Library. Degree of LL. B. conferred. Low cost, easy terms. Get our valuable 48-page "Law Training for Leadership" and "Evidence" books free. Send for them NOW.

LaSalle Extension University, Dept. 940-L, Chicago
A Correspondence Institution

FACTORY-TO-YOU SAVES YOU UP TO 50%

14-TUBE CHASSIS IN YOUR OWN CABINET

30 DAYS TRIAL

AMAZING FOREIGN RECEPTION

Other chassis and cabinet models 5 to 17 tubes, up to 8 wave bands... including radio-phonos, Home Recorder. FREE catalog. (User-agents make extra money.)

Only $19.95 COMPLETE WITH TUBES AND SPEAKER

MIDWEST RADIO CORPORATION DEPT. 87-AA CINCINNATI, OHIO

REWARD! For a little of your spare time as a special Subscription Representative. WRITE TODAY.

Independent Agency Division
THE CROWELL-COLLIER PUBLISHING CO.
250 Park Ave. New York, N. Y.

Get this 1940 OFFICIAL All-American FOOTBALL MAP FREE!

In Full Color!

Endorsed by GRANTLAND RICE!

Brand new! Just out—the finest of Albert Richard's popular football maps! Shows locations, official colors and nicknames of 244 leading colleges. Identifies conference members, also major "Pro" teams. New features—1939 Won-Lost Records of all schools, and 437 all-time All-Americans! "Most comprehensive and interesting map of the year!" says America's football authority, Grantland Rice. Size 26 x 19 in.—a work of art for home or office.

ALBERT RICHARD leather and wool sport coats are the choice of All-Americans. You'll want one, too! At leading stores everywhere.

Mail Coupon NOW for FREE Copy of Map

ALBERT RICHARD CO., Makers of the Coat of the Stars—Dept. 540, Milwaukee, Wis.

I would like to have a FREE copy of your 1940 Football Map in full color.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____

MAIL COUPON NOW!

...because it tastes so good!

...I LIKE PARKAY

ON bread

MOM LIKES PARKAY

AS A FLAVOR SHORTENING FOR MAKING cake

DAD LIKES HIS

FRIED IN PARKAY

P. S. And Mom says It doesn't spatter or stick to the pan.

Parkay made by KRAFT THE DELICIOUS VEGETABLE OLEOMARGARINE

CONTAINS VITAMIN A (8000 U.S.P. units per lb.)

TRY PARKAY! The Delicious New Margarine Made by Kraft

Made by the Makers of Miracle Whip

Easy Way to EARN MONEY

Show friends beautiful Christmas Folders with sender's name—50 for $1. Also fast-selling 21-card Christmas Assortment for $1. You make 50c. Eight other Assortments—All Parchment, Religious, Gift Wrappings, Everyday Cards. Big line DeLuxe Personal Christmas Cards—finest out. All easy money-makers. Write today for FREE SAMPLES.

WETMORE & SUGDEN, INC., Dept. 705
749 Monroe Avenue :: Rochester, N. Y.

Sell 50 PERSONAL Christmas Cards WITH NAME

No More CORNS

★ Quicker Relief Than Before! Easier Removal

NEW! KEEPS YOU FREE OF CORNS, SORE TOES

Thanks to Dr. Scholl, corns need never bother you again, if you use the New Super-Soft Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads. Quicker relief from pain; greater protection from shoe friction and pressure; no more corns, sore toes or blisters—or "breaking-in" discomfort of new or tight shoes! They are cushioning, soothing, clinic-tested and 63% softer than before! Don't come off in the bath! Separate Medications are included for removing your corns or callouses quickly, gently. Get a box today! Costs but a trifle—greater value than ever. Sold everywhere. Sizes for Corns, Callouses, Bunions, Soft Corns between the toes.

There is a Dr. Scholl Remedy for most common foot troubles.

NEW Super-Soft

Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads

BUNIONS CALLOUSES

attack that swept them into the finals in three straight, blistering sets.

Jimmy was obviously suppressing exultation as they picked up togs and rackets; as they stopped for a word with Marilyn he was nearly at the emotional flash point.

"You were wonderful. Wonderful!" said Marilyn.

"Weren't we though!" Jimmy agreed. Rusty said: "Take a duck for the showers. I want to get a line on tomorrow's match."

He slipped around the rail to sit by Marilyn, looked once around the enclosure, saw Jane Goodale, pad on her knees, brow drawn down as she sketched. He thought she looked up and stared their way. No, she didn't. Jane wouldn't stare. Anyway, what difference did it make? He leaned toward Marilyn, pulled on a camel's-hair coat against his increasing chill. He said, "You and I add up to something," with a deep intensity in his voice. She made no answer.

He went on: "I've got to know what it is."

She spoke then. "I wanted to like you," she said. "I still want to like you. For Jimmy's sake. Why won't you let me—please?"

"Liking," he said, "has nothing to do with it. Before it's too late, I've got to talk with you. I want to see you alone." He stood up then and closed a muffler at his throat. "I'll arrange it," he told her. "Somehow."

Rusty didn't have to do any arranging. Jimmy's father had taken care of that. Jimmy was rushing through dressing. A wire lay beside him on the bench.

"Dad's landing in an hour. I'll have to meet him," Jimmy said. "Do me a favor, Rusty: dinner'll be terribly dull. Family bilge. You know. Take the car and take Marilyn somewhere."

Do him a favor! That was pathetic. "Sure, kid," Rusty said, and tried not to feel like a heel.

Rusty remembered a spot near Cohasset when, at twilight, there was beauty on the sea. When he reached it he turned off the shore highway and charged spinning rubber up a bastion of salt-polished stones. They crunched to a stop by a seawall.

There was only the gentle, rhythmic wash of a summer sea on the sand. The sweep of the beach was deserted.

"Marilyn," Rusty said; they'd hardly spoken since pulling away from the club.

"Please, a cigarette," she said to him.

That, he knew, was defense. He disregarded it utterly. Broke through it, and took her in his arms. His hand was urgent at her shoulder, drawing her, holding her close.

"I love you!" His voice was harsh with feeling. "I've never said that to anyone . . . ever . . ."

"No!" she protested. "Jimmy . . ."

He blocked the words that were to follow with hungry, demanding lips. She fought against him for a moment—then he felt all resistance drain away, go out of her entirely with a long-drawn sigh; her mouth was sweet and seeking against his own.

This was the way he had dreamed it. It was their world. For a moment, they were safe. She stirred, and he sensed that she was thinking. He said: "I'll tell him . . . tomorrow afternoon."

FENNO and Stearns, against them in the finals, were no Sunday competition at the club. Maybe that was why Jimmy was so silent, so tense in the way he moved about.

Marilyn's eyes, as they rallied, seemed to reach out to him. Beside her, sat a gray-haired, square-jawed older man—the same look of eagerness on his face that was the habit of his son, tempered a bit by the years.

Her eyes seemed to say: "This much for Jimmy. This little thing, at the least."

They swept into it and Rusty gave them McLarnin at McLarnin's flashing top form. McLarnin's blistering backhand. McLarnin's smoking forehand drives. The "whomp" of McLarnin's racket as McLarnin came up with an ace.

That was the way it was right from the beginning, until incipient weariness sent tiny signals up the long length of his legs.

This was where he'd schooled Jimmy to take over. But, shockingly, Jimmy wasn't ready. Jimmy was torpid, slow; unsettled, flubbing like a tyro. They left the court at the end of three sets with two of them gone forever, only one tucked away in the bag.

RUSTY held back, looked over at Marilyn. He wanted to smile reassuringly, make it, if he could, seem to say: "Don't worry! Don't worry! There are still two sets."

But would there be? Rusty was tired, drained, completely washed out. The smile when he broke it felt wooden and he saw no response on her face. He saw nothing there but a sharp despair.

"McLarnin," said a voice on the pathway. He turned toward it wearily. It was Jane. "It's my fault," she said.

"What's your fault?"

"The way that Jimmy is playing." She opened a loose-leaf book. "See?" she said. "Jimmy saw it, too, when he came looking for you last night. He sat with me for a while in the lounge and I let him run through my book of sketches. . . ."

The simple lines, though roughly blocked were unmistakable. Jane had caught that look on a young girl's face that had shown itself on Marilyn's, tension, distress, almost fear, when Rusty had leaned so close to her the previous afternoon and said: "I've got to see you alone."

And the figure beside her, impetuous in attitude: it was McLarnin's head close in urgency; there was almost a desperation on the face.

It wasn't a pretty picture, at least for Jimmy to see.

"Go in there and fix it," Jane said to Rusty. "Just tell him it's one of those things that happens. That you're sorry you had to turn around and walk back a few years for Marilyn and yank her out of his life. Tell him you'll be good to her. He'll feel better."

Rusty went into the locker room. Jimmy was there, slumped on a bench, his head dropped down in his hands. If the kid would only get up and sock him! But he didn't.

"Jimmy . . ." Rusty slowly said.

Jimmy's head came up and then Rusty saw what lay in his clouded eyes. It wasn't scorn, or hate, or anger. It was a sickness, and not of the flesh. It was the first shoddy seam in Rusty's bright fabric of dreaming and, once rent, it began to drop apart. He could feel it tatter and drop away as he stood there looking down. He could almost laugh aloud at his hopelessness—what had he to offer any girl but a reputation as a top-flight tennis player—which would drop away overnight.

Here sat the only friend that tennis had ever given him. The kid who thought he was such a great guy, looking up at his hero with this terrible sickness in his eyes.

Rusty's voice was harsh when he spoke again: "What the hell is the matter with you, Jimmy? Your old man's out there, and your girl!"

He heard his voice going on, the things it was saying almost fascinated him: "And if you can't think of yourself or your folks, think of me. I have a girl out there, too, you know."

Shock and wonder came into Jimmy's

Your Fountain Pen is a "Machine!"

The Better the Ink You put into it, the Better it works and the More Satisfaction You Get out of it.

SANFORD'S FOUNTAIN PEN INK
Makes Every Pen Write Better GO TO YOUR STATIONER

Other Sanford's Products for Office and Home include:

Sanford's Library Paste...Sanford's Liquid Solvent...Sanford's White Rubber Cement...Sanford's Solvener (Typewriter Type Cleaner)...Sanford's Ink Eraser (Magic 2-Drop Liquid Method), etc.

ANSWERS to the P. S. Question on Page 50

- We say—"give it the gas" when in reality pressing down the accelerator we merely open a valve to let more air in. As this air rushes through the carburetor it picks up drops of gasoline. —from the P. S. article in COLLIER'S December 9, 1939.
- Hot water has a habit of leaving a little scale on the inside of boilers or even on the passages through which the water travels as small as a 32nd of an inch in diameter. If the passages become clogged, circulation is slowed down and overheating results. —from the P. S. article in COLLIER'S November 4, 1939.
- The firing in the cylinder is created by having electricity jump a little gap of about 25/100 of an inch from one to the other electrode spark plug. —from the P. S. article in COLLIER'S November 4, 1939.
- Depending on the make of car, there are 25 different places that need to be lubricated. —from the P. S. article in COLLIER'S March 30, 1940.
- The first wear comes on the piston rings and bearings. —from the P. S. article in COLLIER'S January 27, 1940.
- Here is the "substation" which distributes electricity to each spark plug in the sequence, and at the proper time. —from the P. S. article in COLLIER'S November 4, 1939.
- "Ping" or "gas knock" or "spark knock," have become such common terms, are often the result of the gas burning from two different causes the two waves of combustion to the piston like sudden blows. —from the P. S. article in COLLIER'S June 1, 1940.

If you would like to have a little book of questions and answers covering the material in this and other P. S. messages, merely PREVENTIVE SERVICE, COLLIER'S, 250 Ave., N. Y., asking for "P. S. Question Answers," enclosing ten cents in stamps.

yes. It was good to see that beaten book go. "Your girl?" he said, and his jaw dropped.

"Didn't you hear Jane Goodale at the opey? Didn't you hear her say: 'McLarnin can win whenever he wants to?' at chance, Jimmy, playing with you! Come alive, you dope! Snap out of it!" "McLarnin!"—a ball boy thrust his head in the door.

"Be right out, son. Jimmy, come on." It was like breathing life into a puppet whose strings had been severed. Rusty killed the kid through the next set. Jimmy was overeager in sharp contrast to his lassitude before. He fought for control, sometimes he had it—his forehead was a smoking, wicked thing. His powerful smashes when he leaped to the ball were becoming ungettable kills.

THEY closed out in a rush at two even. Jimmy came crowding to the top of his form when the final set got under way. He was sure-footed now, and jiggling, eager to wear on the ball.

His racket machine-gunned felt-pelted bullets. He usurped three fourths of the court. Rusty let him, felt no surge of resentment. He had little left with which to guard what was his own.

Fenno and Stearns in mounting desperation threw all attack that they could muster. Rusty raced with legs one leaden and reached with a heavy arm. But they pulled out games, he and Jimmy. Pulled the set to an even three all. Got the next game on Jimmy's whipping service. Another with placements and craft. Came out in the end, five games to three.

Rusty's vision smoked up. He had to focus and do it with effort. He held up his hand to the ball boy, let three fresh balls gather there. His wide shoulder went down and his racket went up. It snapped at the ball with a mighty Whomp!—an unreturnable ace.

"Oh, kid, kid, kid!" Jimmy was chattering, softly under his breath. You didn't need your eyes to place them like that with McLarnin's years on the court. You could tuck one away in a corner with a blindfold over your face. It was the wide returns that had you guessing, that you couldn't be sure of at all.

But you didn't need to be sure of anything if you had Jimmy. Jimmy could be there and ready, waiting for anything, seemed. He could lean on the ball with your own blinding speed. He was something from out of your past.

Rusty heard the referee say: "Forty-two!" Where in hell had they picked up that lead. An ace would do it. He whipped at the ball, and the referee sang out: "Fault!"

Damn! That would have done it. He was careful. His second ball went in. Stearns returned deep and wide with power. Oh, too wide! Too far for a get! He forced Rusty over into the vacant court, racing, running, gasping. He had to call on all he had left to get there—but he spent it on one wild swipe, one for the money off his backhand—it smoked and kissed at the tape, went smoking beyond it to kiss a corner—forced Fenno racing, tumbling back. Fenno did well to trap it with a soft, defensive floating lob.

Rusty, running back, saw Jimmy waiting, racket dropped down behind his shoulder, dancing around a little a bare six feet from the net.

He knew, then, that it was over. He slowed, dropped into a walk. Jimmy would never miss on that one. He would tuck it, for keeps, far away.

Not quite over, though, for there was something else that Rusty wanted to see. He came to a stop and turned toward the stands. Over there, Marilyn's sweet face.

He watched that face turn downward with sharp suspense on it, tenuous waiting in the uplifted eyes, down—oh, slowly, with the falling ball. Then "Whomp!" went Jimmy's racket. Marilyn's face was ecstatic in relief. There was joy there, gladness, triumph. It was what Rusty wanted. He would always remember that look. He carried it away with him now.

His handshake at the net was hurried. Three minutes saw him in his room. It was there, a bit later, that Jimmy found him. Jimmy was jubilant, breathless in the door.

"Come on, pal! Get dressed! Dad's buying! And how he's buying!" Jimmy said.

"No, thanks, kid."

"Jane?"

"Well, we have got a date."

"Well, get her, dope! It's a party."

"Uh-uh. We'd rather be alone. Not up to youth and laughter."

"Oh," said Jimmy. "Like that, eh?"

"Yes, it's like that," said Rusty.

Through the window he saw the roadster roll out from the parking area and come along up the drive. Marilyn was driving. She didn't look upward. Rusty was very glad. He had the snapshot of Marilyn that he wanted printed forever on his mind.

Rusty said: "Look, you'd better beat it, kid. Somebody's waiting for you."

He waited ten minutes. Packed his bag and went down. He liked it this way. No farewells.

"Hey," said a voice on a chiding note. "Where are you going, McLarnin, so big and noble and brave?"

RUSTY put his things down. "Hi, Jane," he said. "I don't know, really. Somewhere. Maybe I'm turning honest."

She said: "If you're not hating me much, McLarnin, I can give you a lift to New York."

She said, while they waited to fill up at a station, "If it helps you any, the girl looked back till the car was out of sight. That book isn't closed, McLarnin; you can still write another page."

"Nope," said Rusty. "Nothing to write. Nothing to offer, either, but a lot of secondhand dreams."

"I'm sorry it happened," said Jane.

"Aren't you angry at me?"

"Nope. It was a good way to have it happen. You see, Jane, nobody got hurt."

Jane said a little uncertainly, "It kind of looks like my fine Italian hand . . . well, I mean, McLarnin, you might think that I was jealous. That I might even want you myself. Isn't that a laugh?"

"You're not laughing, Jane."

Rusty paid for the gas. Jane said, "McLarnin, how does it feel? You've turned honest already."

Rusty said: "It feels like you said it would. No fooling, the feeling is fine!" That was one answer. Were there others? he wondered, as they bowled along through the dark. Answers to what would he do for a living? And to this, which was bothering him a lot: What was he? A damned fool? A softie? Or a great guy like Jimmy Grierson thought?

"MY CRIES WERE WHISPERS AS MY LIFE EBBED!"

A true experience of P. S. NICHOLLS, South Bend, Ind.

"LATE ONE NIGHT, returning from a fishing trip, I dozed at the wheel of my car while going at a fast clip," writes Mr. Nicholls. "Suddenly there was a blinding crash!"

"MY CAR HAD VEERED off the road and smashed head on into a tree. My throat was gashed and bleeding badly. I was able only to whisper—and seemed doomed to die in the inky darkness. Then . . .

"...I REMEMBERED MY FLASHLIGHT! Somehow I managed to get it from my tackle box and crawl weakly back to the road. Quickly the bright beam of the flashlight, waved in my feeble grasp, stopped a motorist, who took me to a hospital just in time. There is no doubt that I owe my life to dependable 'Eveready' fresh DATED batteries!"

(Signed) P. S. Nicholls

SAFETY FIRST! Keep an EMERGENCY LIGHT in your car—for tire changing, roadside repairs, locating lost articles, if lights go out, etc. The "Eveready" Auto Flashlight, shown here, complete with "Eveready" fresh DATED batteries and steering post clamp, is only $1.25.

The word "Eveready" is a registered trade-mark of National Carbon Co., Inc.

FRESH BATTERIES LAST LONGER... Look for the DATE-LINE

NATIONAL CARBON COMPANY, INC., 30 East 42nd Street, New York, N. Y.
Unit of Union Carbide UCC and Carbon Corporation

Write For 27 Reasons Why YOU MAKE MORE MONEY

With P. H. DAVIS

INSURED Custom-Tailored Clothes
Here's one reason: Insured satisfaction makes permanent customers who lead to more customers. One Davis man traced 400 customers to his first ten! Write for 26 other reasons! P. H. Davis Tailors, Dept. 1, Cincinnati, Ohio

This Is Your Invitation

to get acquainted with our attractive money-making offer for taking care of subscriptions for COLLIER'S and the other popular Crowell-Collier Publications. Write to:
Independent Agency Division
The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company
250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

MANY FORMER SMOKERS OF EXPENSIVE PIPES NOW PREFER

Frank MEDICO

because its 66 Baffle filter accomplishes what no other pipe ever achieved. Ask any man who smokes one.

1 FINEST BRIAR MONEY CAN BUY

GENUINE FILTERS FOR MEDICO PIPES PACKED ONLY IN THIS RED & BLACK BOX

The Battle of Washington

WE HAVE witnessed the Battles of Poland, Norway, Flanders and France; are witnessing the Battle of Britain at this writing.

There is another battle going on which, though bloodless, is more important to the United States and its people than any of the others. It is a battle that cannot be lost if we are to continue a safe and sovereign people.

This battle is the Battle of Washington. It has been going on ever since May 10th, when Hitler tore into Holland and Belgium after eight months of "phony" war, and convinced Americans that his philosophy might be phony but his army was anything but.

The Battle of Washington is raging on many fronts. It is a fight to arm ourselves to the teeth, by land and sea and air, and to arm ourselves as fast as we can. Main specifications are a two-ocean navy fanning out from a core of 35 battleships, an air force of some 50,000 planes with the trained men needed to fly them and service them, and a highly mechanized army of anywhere from 500,000 to 1,000,000 men.

Most important of the Battle of Washington's manifold fronts is the front that runs, so to speak, through the American heart, the American soul.

We have to change our whole historic attitude toward military training and military service. If American public opinion cannot line itself up voluntarily and wholeheartedly behind the idea of universal selective military service, the Battle of Washington will not be won. In the losing of it, we may lose everything that matters to any of us.

So we'd all better concentrate on several facts:

For one—a big military establishment will NOT automatically sow the seeds of Fascism here, or turn our young men into blowhards and bullies.

No such thing happened in 1917-18, when our National Army at its peak numbered about 4,000,000 men, or more than 1/30 of our entire population at that time.

The reason why it didn't and won't happen here is that militarism, Fascist tendencies and so on either exist in the souls of people or they don't. Most of the Germans in Germany like fighting and uniforms and regimentation. So do many of the Japanese. So do the only people who have any power in Italy and Russia. Democratic armies historically have fought no aggressive wars.

Americans never have been given to slave-state ideas. We shall not implant those ideas in ourselves by building up a large, democratically administered defense machine for our protection.

This machine, if it has to fight at all, will fight to keep a slave state from being imposed on us by outsiders. If we build the machine big and efficient enough, it perhaps won't have to fight at all.

We can understand the feeling of such opponents of universal selective training as Senators Wheeler and Norris. They are sincere liberals, whose domestic ideas are frequently valuable and progressive but whose international vision is badly stippled with blind spots.

All of us can understand, too—and we may have to do something drastic about—the Communists, Nazis, Fascists and their fellow travelers among us, and their efforts to block this program. These birds are loyal to foreign dictators first and to the United States second, if at all. To choke off their activities when and as necessary will not be a Fascist gesture on our part. It isn't Fascism to jail a spy or deport a foreign secret agent. It's self-protection.

Another of the ideas we'd better get thoroughly in mind is that the universal selective draft is the only really democratic way to build up a big defense establishment. It is also the only fast and efficient way, especially in a country that has had a long-standing tradition, carefully nurtured by pacifists and googoes, against military training.

A third of these essential facts of life is that it is fully as honorable for a young man to go a year to learning how to fight for his country and himself as it is for him to serve an apprenticeship term in a machine shop, or win a letter in college football, or make a hit as a band leader.

Still another is that life in a big, free National Army, continually infused with new blood and new ideas, is bound to be different from the stiff, formalized, initiative-deadening existence now led by many of the men of our skeletonized Regular Army.

A hitch in the hoped-for draft Army cannot be the best thing that ever happened to many a young man. It had better be, or there will be some kind of explosion, and a justified one.

Here's something to comfort those who fear the big defense program will bankrupt the country. The Encyclopedia Britannica has this to say about what army reorganization on a universal-service basis did for Prussia after a disastrous defeat at Jena in October, 1806:

Army expenditure became the flywheel which steadied her disorganized finance. The troops had to be fed, clothed, equipped and housed; and several occupations and trades involved in the processes gave profitable employment both to the intellect, which was required to invent, devise, control, and to capital, which would have shirked the risks attending any but government contracts and remained in private hoards, to the detriment of the reproductive power of the nation.

It is reasonable to hope that words to the same effect can be truly written about the United States ten years from now—IF we win the Battle of Washington.

If we don't—well, the end result can be that we Americans will join the Czechs, Poles, Danes, Norwegians, Dutch, Belgians and French as unwilling but unconsulted workmen in a world vineyard run by and for a slave-state coalition heading up in Berlin.

Collier's

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY

September 21, 1940

5¢ A COPY

VERNON
GRANT

Inside Willkie's Head By Br

THE CROWELL-COLLIER PUBLISHING COMPANY—PUBLISHERS OF COLLIER'S—THE AMERICAN MA

1/20X
C
82641
A

PUB LISR
BUHLINGAME
CALIF

"All that is imperishable of England"

FREE

...TO NEW MEMBERS

OF THE BOOK-OF-THE-MONTH CLUB

The new Oxford Book of English Verse

He is always saying apologetically:

"I just can't find any time to read books!"

Yet... IF HE SPENT (ON AN AVERAGE) ONLY 30 MINUTES A DAY—BEFORE BEDTIME, OR WHILE TRAVELLING TO OR FROM WORK, OR IN OTHER LEISURE MOMENTS—HE COULD EASILY READ EVERY BEST-SELLER DURING THE YEAR, AND A GREAT DEAL MORE!

An average of only half an hour a day would have enabled you to read, within the past few months, one of the following widely-discussed new books:

- AS I REMEMBER HIM by Hans Zinsser
- MARRIED ADVENTURE by Osa Johnson
- HOW GREEN WAS MY VALLEY by Richard Llewellyn
- AMERICAN WHITE PAPER by J. Alsop & R. Kintner
- STARS ON THE SEA by F. van Wyck Mason
- NATIVE SON by Richard Wright
- KITTY FOYLE by Christopher Morley
- THE NAZARENE by Sholem Asch
- FAITH OF A MISSION by Sir Neville Henderson
- DAYS OF OUR YEARS by Pierre van Paassen
- WIND, SAND AND STARS by Antoine de Saint Exupéry
- ESCAPE by Ethel Vance

Read, you may have been confessing to friends that you could "never get around to reading books." Over 250,000 book-reading families—persons like yourself—have found a subscription to the Book-of-the-Month Club by far the most effectual way to keep themselves from missing the new books they are really interested in. It is an interesting fact that, of the dozen best-sellers listed above, eight were chosen as book-of-the-month.

You are not obliged, as a member of the Club, to take the book-of-the-month its judges choose. Nor are you obliged to buy one book every month from the Club.

You receive a carefully written report about the book-of-the-month chosen by our judges, in advance of its publication. If it is a book you really want, you let it come to you. If not, you merely sign and mail a slip, saying, "Don't want it."

Scores of other recommendations are made to help you choose among all new books with discrimination. If you want to buy one of these from the Club, you merely ask for it.

In addition, there is a great money-saving. Time and again our judges' choices are books you find yourself buying anyway. For every two books-of-the-month you buy you receive, free, one of our book-dividends.

So many of the Club's members ordinarily want the book-of-the-month that an enormous edition can be printed. The saving on this quantity-production enables the Club to buy the right to print other fine library volumes. These are then manufactured and distributed free among the Club's members—one for every two books-of-the-month you buy. For every $1 you spend for a book-of-the-month you actually receive about 75¢ back in the form of free books, figured at retail value.

You pay no yearly sum to belong to the Book-of-the-Month Club. You pay nothing, except for the books you buy. Your only obligation is to buy four books-of-the-month a year from the Club.

REVISED AND ENLARGED
FOR THE FIRST TIME IN FORTY YEARS

The Oxford Book of English Verse, which contains nearly one thousand poems, has achieved recognition as a permanent part of English literature. Very few are the books that can be read and reread through a lifetime, without their boundless treasures ever being exhausted. This 1200-page book—"all that is imperishable of England"—is one of that select company. Within its richly bound covers are the poems you have always loved and will love as long as you live.

If you decide to join the Book-of-the-Month Club now, we will give you a copy of this new and enlarged edition of The Oxford Book of English Verse, free. This was one of the recent book-dividends of the Club. Or, if you prefer, you may choose any past book-dividend, listed in the coupon below, which we still have on hand.

BOOK-OF-THE-MONTH CLUB, Inc., 385 Madison Ave., N. Y. A479

Please enroll me as a member. It is understood that I am to receive a free copy of THE OXFORD BOOK OF ENGLISH VERSE, that I am also to receive, without expense, your monthly magazine which reports about current books, and that for every two books-of-the-month I purchase from the Club, I am to receive the current book-dividend then being distributed. For my part, I agree to purchase at least four books-of-the-month a year from the Club.

IMPORTANT: Please check whether you would like us to ship the current book-of-the-month with your free book ☐ YES ☐ NO ☐

Name <sup>MR.</sup> <sup>MRS.</sup> <sup>MISS</sup> } PLEASE PRINT PLAINLY

Address.....

City..... State.....

Business Connection, if any.....

If you do not wish to receive The Oxford Book of English Verse as your free enrollment book check box below for title you prefer.
(No others available at this time)

☐ JOSEPH IN EGYPT ☐ INSIDE EUROPE

☐ BARTLETT'S QUOTATIONS ☐ TELLERS OF TALES

Books shipped to Canadian members, DUTY PAID, thru Book-of-the-Month Club (Can.) Ltd.

THIS WEEK

SEPTEMBER 21, 1940

SHORT STORIES

JOHN RUSSELL

The Hanging of Hassan Hangat. Fate conspires in the making of a soldier. Page 9

WILLIAM MacHARG

Twice Dead. The second time was for keeps. Page 12

THOMAS McMORROW

Mid Pleasures and Palaces. Home is where your bills are sent. Page 18

PHILIP CLARK

Sunday Pitch. When a ballplayer falls in love . . . Page 24

THE SHORT SHORT STORY

A Present for Ruth Ann, by William Brandon. Page 13

SERIAL STORIES

AGATHA CHRISTIE

The Patriotic Murders. The eighth of nine parts. Poirot knows the answer. Page 14

MARGERY ALLINGHAM

Traitor's Purse. The third of ten parts. In the secret caverns of the Masters. Page 20

ARTICLES

QUENTIN REYNOLDS

A Spitfire and a Boy. A combination for victory. Page 11

BRUCE BARTON

Inside Willkie's Head. Meet Wendell Willkie the man. Page 15

HENRY L. JACKSON

Fit to be Tied. Pick your neckwear. Page 16

ANDRÉ MAUROIS

What Happened to France. How England and France were separated. Page 17

BILL CUNNINGHAM

Spare Wheel. Baseball's utility man. Page 22

HERBERT RAVENEL SASS

The Man Who Looked Like Napoleon. He, too, was a military genius. Page 23

FRELING FOSTER

Keep Up with the World. Page 6

EDITORIALS

What Goes On Off Alaska.

P.A.L.'s Pappy. Page 74

COVER

VERNON GRANT

ANY WEEK

THE freshman chemistry odor that attaches to so many national conventions was still noticeable in Chicago when a different, sweeter gathering moved into the rooms recently occupied by Mr. Roosevelt's nominators. This time Chicago was invaded by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. You could notice the difference almost immediately. We dropped in. We were greeted by a plump, pretty woman who at once invited us to join her in a few Amethyst drinks. She was Mrs. Blanche Pennington of Huntingdon, Pennsylvania. She used to be an actress (Blanche Cornwall) and was pleasantly talkative. We had several Amethyst drinks with Mrs. Pennington and learned their names—May Magic, November Chill and, we think, Jollyo. May Magic was a bit tartish but Mrs. Pennington told us not to be afraid as it was just rhubarb tea well iced and slightly sugared. We became a little confused about the others but remember sassafras punch, orange eggnog and blue nectar made with blueberries and strawberry water. They were, as we need not tell you, nonalcoholic. We left the ladies, our pockets crammed with Amethyst drink recipe books—Mugs o' Joy and Brisk Beverages. On our way out we stopped to speak to Mr. Joe Welty, a bartender we became friendly with during Mr. Roosevelt's convention. We told him what we'd been doing and together we looked over Mrs. Pennington's recipes. "Well," said Mr. Welty, "'twill be a noble experiment."

WE WERE sorry to leave but we were on a political survey of our overstimulated country. What we hoped might be a very important conference of Northwestern statesmen was about to be held in Minneapolis. It didn't turn out so well but we didn't regret it so much because we met Mr. Joe Bungert, one of Minneapolis' many able detectives. When Mr. Bungert heard what we were about he took us in charge, bidding us follow him. "Talking to politicians is okay," said Mr. Bungert, "but it doesn't get you close enough to the honest, common people—the plain folks whose votes tell the story. Come along." So Mr. Bungert introduced us to a prodigious lady known far and near as Lotsa Momma. Mrs. Momma, an experienced authority on human nature, said that most of her friends would vote for Mr. Roosevelt while conceding Mr. Willkie was a fine gentleman. But Mr. Roosevelt was "spend happy," she said, and her friends loved spenders. "As far as we're concerned," she added, "we feel they ain't no use throwing away your old shirt till you're sure of getting a better one." Then Mr. Bungert led us to a gentleman named Egg Chin. Mr. Egg Chin will vote for Mr. Willkie, it being his belief that the farmers are getting the breaks over the city fellow. "Look at them hay tossers," challenged Mr. Egg Chin. "Their children are all broke out with hives from strawberry shortcake and are sick to their stomachs with fried chicken while me—if I take home two pounds of hamburger my kids think it's birds of paradise."

BUT we didn't, alas, meet Mr. Leo Tossie of Denver, Colorado, because he was safely in jail where he has to spend sixty days. Mr. Tossie had been arrested for panhandling, an occupation the court thought unnecessary in his case inasmuch as he had a steady WPA job. In vain did he try to explain. "Why are you begging in the streets while drawing down WPA wages?" demanded the judge. "Your honor," replied Mr. Tossie, "that's my real profession, and while I'm doing okay on relief I don't know how long it's going to last and I don't want to take any chances of getting my hand out."

AMONG the several people we've talked to lately is a lady who owns an antique shop. She told us that a highly expensive motorcar stopped at her place not long ago disgorging an exceptionally fine specimen of female—young, perhaps twenty-five, with a lovely Southern accent, exhibiting every popular sign of breeding and wealth. Altogether worth bothering about. She bought a pair of candlesticks, an ancient but still reliable chair and a book. She asked the proprietor to hold them for her for a day and departed, leaving behind her handbag. She didn't return. After a week they decided to open the bag, looking, of course, for an address. They found none. But they did find a lipstick, a compact, a pack of cigarettes and four thousand dollars—in Confederate money. The lady telling us the story thinks this remarkable. But we don't know. There are so many remarkable things these days.

WE'RE informed that all that's necessary to make a large number of people believe something that isn't so is to feed it to them through a loud-speaker. This discouraging bit of information comes to us from Dr. Frederic P. Flintteller of St. Louis, Missouri. The doctor says that he had a caller who told him that the United States had already declared war on Germany, Italy and Japan but that the President was keeping the news from the people until after the November election. Flintteller tried to reason with the caller, arguing the high unlikelihood of the news and explaining that only Congress could declare war and that Congress could hardly be regarded as a secretive body. "I don't care what you say," said the disturbed fellow. "I was a Socialist speaker down here the other night who said more than a hundred of us hear-

SO NO wonder that such quietude as Mr. Robert Smith's has been rising over the tumult. Mr. Smith, Minnesota's state securities commissioner, is famous for slapping wildcat stock promoters and investment bandits who are, we stand, taking advantage of the market and the unwary patriot. The he, are times when we should gate oil, gold and armaments before buying. Be sure your stocks are registered with the ties commission, national commission. There are several common to look for in stock-selling said Mr. Smith. Invariably the magnificent motorcars, spend lavishly, talk too smoothly and dress. But they don't like in prospects. So ask them lots of questions. Talk to a reliable banker that you know. Don't be a sucker. Thank Mr. Smith for you.

AND yet smarter people have bought gold bricks and signed unwisely on dotted lines. The Republican National Convention came near to ruining itself perhaps Mr. Willkie, too. When it moved up its Chicago offices it took floor in the magnificent Civic Building, signing an invulnerable at a whacking rental. They were moving in, the address in the book and everything, when they discovered that they'd made the magnificently cozy in assumption that still give many Americans aches—the late Sam Insull headquarters, built by him, one of many of his stock-pyramidalities. Anyway, it was no Republicans to rejoice in. But still paying rent for it, although for in less pretentious blocks away. And they'd just forget all about it.

AND hope you do too. . . .

IT'S EASY TO FLY!

So you're going to fly this trip! That's fine! See how easy it is. Just phone your travel agent, any airline or telegraph office. Where to? When? The name? Yes ma'am. Your reservation's made.

2 Surprise! Your ticket costs much less than you'd think! And there is no tipping. No charge for meals en route. None of the extras that one encounters in other forms of transportation.

3 From your hotel or the Airline ticket office, a limousine whisks you comfortably to the airport. Luggage? Checked through—returned to you at your destination. No handling. No worries.

4 You step from your car to the waiting airliner. My, it looks big. It is—and roomy! The sky beckons. You board. You're off! You're a mile high on effortless wings before you know it!

You lounge back in your big armchair. How quiet it is—how clean and snug and restful. The colorful map flows smoothly beneath you. You read—play games—or dream. Peacefully!

6 Mealtime aloft. A trim, trained stewardess or steward serves you a delicious, hot, complimentary meal. Such delightful dining—each course "just what you like." Food never tasted so good!

7 Bedtime. Great skysleepers are standard equipment on many overnight flights. Your berth is twin-bed size! A mattress soft as moonlight. A lullaby of stars. Such deep, dreamless sleep!

8 And there you are—rested, clean, refreshed, exhilarated—at your destination. No matter where you live or where you want to go, you can be there in hours, overnight at the most—if you fly.

ES, it's that easy to travel by air!

Compare the comfort of your plane armchair berth with the comfort you find in any other forms of conveyance—and you'll fly!

Compare the convenience of going by plane to going by other means—and you'll fly!

Compare the effortless speed of your plane with the slowness of anything on land or sea—and you'll fly!

Compare the rest you get in a plane with the fatigue of traveling other ways—and you'll fly!

Costs less than you think, too! Often less than the fastest first-class surface transportation. Meals are free in the air—no tips, no extras.

You know you've planned to try air travel. So next trip—take a plane and learn why It Pays to Fly!

Write for the free, illustrated booklet which tells the dramatic story of our great Air Transport service.
Address: AIR TRANSPORT ASSOCIATION,
Room 735, Field Building, Chicago, Ill.

This educational campaign is sponsored jointly by the 17 major Airlines of the U. S. and Canada, and Manufacturers and Suppliers to the Air Transport Industry.

ASK YOUR TRAVEL AGENT

It's easy to buy an air ticket to any place in the United States or the world. Simply phone or call at any Travel Bureau, Hotel Transportation Desk, Telegraph office or local Airline office, for airline schedules and fares or general information.

IT PAYS TO FLY

Don't let "dry scalp" make your hair go wild!

Why have brittle, lifeless, unattractive hair? Discover for yourself the amazing results you get from the regular use of 'Vaseline' Hair Tonic.

REWARD FOR CHECKING DRY SCALP IS GOOD-LOOKING HAIR!

DON'T be fooled about brittle, hard-to-manage hair. Often the very things you do to correct it only aggravate a "dry scalp" condition.

'Vaseline' Hair Tonic is different. It does more than make your hair "easy to comb." It actually checks dry scalp—leaves your hair with that natural, healthy look everyone admires. Remember, you don't have to douse your hair with 'Vaseline' Hair Tonic. A few drops on the comb every morning are enough to supplement the natural scalp oils. Then once a week, before you shampoo, give your scalp a good 'Vaseline' Hair Tonic massage. You'll notice the beneficial results almost immediately.

A few drops supplement the natural scalp oils, keep your hair good-looking.

CHANGE TO 'VASELINE' HAIR TONIC today and see the improvement in the way your hair looks and feels!

40¢
and 70¢

Vaseline HAIR TONIC

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

Copyright 1940, Chesebrough Mfg. Co., Cons'd.

KEEP UP WITH THE WORLD

By Freling Foster

Although Michigan enacted a law in 1935 requiring prisoners who are financially able to pay for their maintenance (about a dollar a day) the state has only been able to collect this payment from two of the approximate 20,000 persons who have passed in and out of its prisons during this time.

As the Eskimo language contains so many nouns and verbs that can be spoken and written in several hundred different ways, few traders or explorers have ever tried to learn it. Instead, they use a sort of "pidgin Eskimo," which contains words from many languages including the Danish, Spanish and Hawaiian.

The pigeon is the only bird that drinks by suction, all others having to throw their heads back in order to swallow; and the owl is the only bird that can look at one object with both eyes at the same time, all others having to use one eye or the other to see a single thing.

The average college football game actually contains less action than the majority of other sports as the ball is in motion only twenty per cent of the time, the other eighty per cent of the hour being taken up by huddles, formations and other business.

One of the strangest cases of human albinism occurred in Africa some years ago. A Negro couple had three white and three black children, born in the following order—two consecutive black boys, two consecutive white girls, one black girl and one white boy.

In the spring of 1880, a freight train of thirty cars, belonging to the Kansas Pacific Railroad, started on a run and disappeared completely, no trace of it nor its crew ever having been found. Another case, equally mysterious, occurred in France several years ago, when naval men, while draining out a disused dock, discovered an old submarine of which there was no recollection or record.

Of the hundreds of different kinds of sugars, some of which are bitter and poisonous, many are derived from such odd substances as weeds, cottonmeal, chicory, dahlias, artichokes and ivory nuts.

Of the six Presidents of the United States who died in office, only two—William Henry Harrison and Zachary Taylor—passed away in the White House. Lincoln died in the Petersen House in Washington, Garfield in Elberon, New Jersey, McKinley in Buffalo, New York, and Harding in San Francisco.

Sometimes a bullet embedded in the tusk of an elephant leaves an imperceptible mark where it entered that its presence is not discovered until after ivory has been carved. A billiard ball with such an embedded bullet is preserved in the Museum of the Royal College of Surgeons in London.

As late as 1913, the pearl fishery of Borneo, still holding to the old belief that pearls had sex, sent a likely pair from time to time to the hope that they would give birth to a number of pearls.

About a century ago when the United States allowed banks to move from town to town at will, many banks went into hiding so their notes could not be presented for redemption in the One of them, The Bank of Missouri, was found by detectives, after a year's search, in a cabin in a cave in an Indiana forest.

On the Samoa Islands in the South Pacific, whole villages of natives frequently pack and go on "malangas," or glorified excursions during which they call on a number of other villages, some of the trips lasting six months and including visits to other islands as far as sixty miles away.

Five dollars will be paid for each interesting or unusual fact accepted for this column. Contributions must be accompanied by a factory proof. Address Keep Up with the World, Collier's, 250 Park Avenue, New York City. This column is copyrighted by Collier's. The National Weekly. None of the material reproduced without express permission of the publisher.

Stetson hits a new high with the new light-weight streamlined hat...the Stratoliner

The Stratoliner comes packed in a streamlined box

"TODAY I'll be in Boston . . . Baltimore
... Chicago . . . Omaha . . . and points west . . .
BUT I'll be home tonight to put you to bed!"

That's telephone traveling!

Long Distance multiplies a man's ability to be many places in the same day.

He can reach any town, anywhere, in a minute and a half (average).

He can go direct to the right man, without a long lobby-wait.

He can get facts and give them, in friendly fashion.

He can adjust a complaint, make an appointment, settle an account, or follow up a promising lead.

Long Distance saves days and dollars for many types of business. It is fast, adaptable, definite. Try it and see!

The doctor nodded and gave a professional flicker of approval at the face of Hassan Hangat

The Hanging of Hassan Hangat

By John Russell

ILLUSTRATED BY MARTHA SAWYERS

case of that corporal tain Forsyte's, whose was not so good
il they hanged him

APPENED on a day of strange her; the day when they were due ang him: a man of no account. It rling down for a sunset of streaky against a blood-red sky over Tem-jail. At the last moment they spring a trap door beneath his nd the same would be right and
But it was curious how the time
ing dragged; how a foreboding pon everybody with the shadows;
e heat and the stifled air and the
As if the hanging of Hassan were worth any such trouble as walled fortress beside a rambling, stick-and-string village in the far uplands of Malaysia. At one end, in the residency quarters, lived two white men—the district officer and the medical officer—who, with a handful of armed Sikh guards, held ward and governance over a lot of wild jungle—and a lot of wild and jungly people, too. At the other end dwelt Fat Malik the warder. He governed about a score of native convicts, taking what squeeze he could get from those still able to pay something, but giving all paupers the benefit of a rich profanity. Of which Hassan Hangat had surely had his share.

Now there was nothing about a mere casual hanging to upset Malik the warder; he had prepared too many travelers for that journey. But he squinted one fearful eye at those sunset clouds, gathering like a sinister troop, and he swore with a catch in his fat throat:
"Djinns. Devils and fiends of the Pit!
Can it be they have come for him—that useless, damned weevil? Less than a louse? Let them take him then, for the sake of Eblis. . . . And quickly, before they make a mistake!"

Whereupon he hastened the ceremony, with its formula from which—uttered anywhere, by anyone, for anybody—no slur can detract the age-old dignity.

"Peace be unto thee in the name of Allah the Merciful and Compassionate," he said, and offered Hassan a gourd of fair water. The condemned took it between bony fingers, his palms pressed in supplication. He was a most luck-less-looking specimen; not yet old, but with hair drawn in a knot like an old woman's. He resembled a mummy, and moved like one on wires, as if the sap of his soul had dried in him. He retained only the meanest of Malay garb, except a jacket of threadbare yellow silk which he wore wapped about him.

Presently he made answer in a low voice. "In the name of Allah," he said.

"All-Knowing; Refuge of the Afflicted; Avenger and Giver of Wrath—Creator of Strength from Weakness; Judge over Iniquity and Master of the Day of Requital—Thee we beseech!"

Thus he spoke, and drank three times. On his knees, three times toward Mecca he touched his forehead to the ground. Then silently he took his place between the two Sikh guards and started off on his march to the gallows.

SO FAR as Malik was concerned, that was the finish of Hassan Hangat. It lacked perhaps a quarter-hour of sunset, when the two white officials would complete the job.

Meanwhile, he went about his business of sweeping up the death cell for its next tenant. . . . The next tenant, he piously hoped, would be anyway somebody of some account. Almost anybody would be an improvement on the wretch whom he had just turned out.

Contemptuously he considered the gift—to call it a gift—which the late departed had left for him. A patched quilt, a bowl, a brass betel box and a torn copy of the Surah on God's Vengeance from the Koran. The whole value being less than ten depreciated Singapore cents. And was this really all the fellow could leave?

Why, it was not long since Hassan Hangat had amounted to quite a considerable person in the countryside. Owner of a rich bit of crop land, with a house and a family. As things went thereabouts he lived well and well-regarded, and, in fact, might have been envied by almost anyone. And now to have lost everything? Shameful!

But wait—there had been something else. Malik remembered how, when first he had searched the prisoner, there had been one other thing.

A hairpin. That was it! A hairpin; and very suitable, too, for such a weakling. A Ceramese hairpin of cassowary bone, of a sort the heathen make in that far island. Finely joined and carved cunningly, with a hooked handle. Smooth like a piece of ivory, but better, because the long leg bone of a cassowary is partly flexible and never splinters. Actually, the thing was a curio rather rare, and might fetch a good price in the bazaar.

And now, where was that hairpin? Not here in the cell. Certainly Hassan had not worn it, marching off to be hanged. Therefore and evidently, Hassan had hidden it inside his jacket and had carried it along with him, just to cheat Malik the warder of his rightful squeeze of a last tangible, negotiable bit of property.

"May Allah blacken his face and sink him in the nethermost hell!" quoth Malik, and was the more pleased to think that presently he was going to earn a profit on the life of Hassan Hangat, after all.

. . . This very afternoon had come to him a local great man, the noble and powerful Penglima Hitam, whose name was high in Tembinok. He came ringing arrogantly at the jailhouse gate, and he began the same way:

"Peace to you, Malik. Behold and regard. Here are three Singapore dollars, paid to you in hand. For the which I desire you to do me a service."

"Honored sir, to do you a service is ever my dearest dream," said Malik, who had a sweet tenderness for the nobility, and even sweeter for Singapore dollars.

"Then so much you shall undertake

Hassan Hangat regarded Malik with a spectral, a scornful gleam, and pointed with a bony finger toward the bell gate for me. Attend. Tonight, when convict Hassan Hangat is hanged, shall display a white cloth from roof. A large cloth like a flag, so—watching from my house above hill yonder—may see it, and may for a certainty that the dog is dead, it understood?"

"Understood, my lord," said his little pig eyes aglitter with and curiosity. "It is natural, honor wishes to be sure that your household have nothing to fear from Hassan Hangat."

"No such thing! I fear no one," turned the Penglima, harshly, for a proud, overbearing man. "It is commonly known how Hassan is a distant relative of my family long has been a sorrow and shame to us. There will be rejoicing when he ceases to breathe!"

"But it must be known also excellence that the appointed sunset. This is the order; and rest content that the order never has failed."

"Will you give me back my dog?" demanded the Penglima, with a sneer. "Or will you earn them?"

"Assuredly, lord," exclaimed Malik, cramming the money hastily into his sash. "A white flag on the jailhouse make your lordship aware that the lordship can sleep in peace. As the trap is sprung, it shall be done, my head be it!"

And now the occasion was very late. For a flag—for a mockery—had nothing fitter than Hassan's own quilt, which made a good enough wag. So he took it, and he sighed, and climbed the ladder that led to the corridor to the upper battlement.

IN THE meantime, in the red quarters at the farther end, the white officials of Tembinok had been waiting, themselves. Not shivering, any means, but suffering the oppression of each weighted moment.

"I don't like it," Captain Forsythe saying, fretfully. "It's a beastly thing, really, to wind up my civil territorial district with a hanging."

"You're starting down for tomorrow?" asked Dr. Doty, the white-haired medical.

"That worries me too," frowned Forsythe. "I expected to take twenty recruits with me. These hill rascals make grand soldiers; and they are as terriers once I land 'em. But I've scraped only ten so far. . . . D'you suppose it's some silly superstition, or wrong? Are they waiting for some omen before they'll join up?"

Dr. Doty nodded. "They're a fine race. Good idea of the government—enlisting a Malay federal around Singapore this time. You'll have a command, of course."

"Receptive. I was too young for last show."

"And I'm too old for this one," Doty, resignedly. "Still, somebody to carry on behind the front. I'll be the officer, magistrate and so on for Tembinok—all myself."

"Then I hope you get no more convicts like Hassan Hangat's!" said Forsythe.

They were sitting in their study, off the barrack wing. The white door giving on the inner courtyard where the scaffold stood, out of sight.

"Go ahead and talk about it," said Doty, watching the other's nervous fidgeting with a warrant.

"Well, I had the bench—clerk on administration, you know. I never was satisfied with him. So helpless. Without money or any defense. Helpless."

"I remember. Wife murdered it? He pleaded not guilty, naturally."

"Yes, but nothing else. Would you

(Continued on page 64)

Present for Ruth Ann

by William Brandon

The colt left in a closed van. He wore a new blue-and-white cooler and he looked like a million dollars, almost was. Well, then, a man and.

He returned in the same closed van, wearing the same new cooler. The driver told Johnny Wells an unsealed letter. She says bring him back and give him this."

Johnny took it savagely. "What does it say?"

"Why, it says— Why would I be mad at you, Johnny?" The driver grinned and went back to open the van.

"Wait a minute!" Johnny opened the envelope. He read:

"You can't seem to understand that I'm in what I said when I told you that Ruth Ann did not care to hear from you. Take your old horse back again and keep him. LINDA PEABODY."

Johnny found a pencil in his shirt pocket, scratched out the note and on the opposite side of the paper wrote:

"He's not my horse, he's Ruth Ann's. She's been hers ever since I promised her the first stud colt out of Star Fly by Star. I don't keep other people's horses in my barn. JOHNNY WELLS."

He gave the note to the driver of the truck without folding it, and the truck rolled away again, bearing the colt, wrapped in his new blue-and-white cooler, and beginning to wonder what was going on.

Johnny turned away and walked toward the white gravel to his barn, where there was a confusion of trucks and people. His chin was hard and stubborn and his gray eyes were unhappy.

He kept himself busy around the barn for an hour and then began to watch for the closed truck. Presently it rolled up the lane. The colt was still in it, looking indignantly out his window. The driver held out an envelope. Johnny tore it open, and read:

"Ruth Ann does not wish to accept presents from a horse trader and neither, regardless of their nature or excuses. Ruth Ann and I may wish nothing at all from you, Mr. Wells, except to be left completely alone. I hope I make that clear. LINDA PEABODY."

"B. I take the liberty of furthering you to restrain yourself from away expensive animals, for I am certain the day will come when you need whatever they will bring to our betting losses. L. P."

Johnny swore tonelessly but a little less fervently, without much fervor, and another answer on the blank side of the notepaper:

Ruth Ann's colt comes back here

"He's not my horse, he's Ruth Ann's. . . . I don't keep other people's horses in my barn" again it will be time for his dinner and I'll damn' well send you a board bill and damn' well collect it. I don't care what she does with him. She can turn him loose in the street. I don't care if I never see him again or her again, he's her horse. JOHNNY WELLS."

"N. B. Don't hold your breath until I go broke either."

The driver said: "Well, you're the doctor, Johnny. But she won't take him."

"Listen." Johnny rested his elbows on the cab door and ran a hand over his chin. "Park away from the place, George. Lead the colt around the back way to the stable and put him in the stall."

The driver pressed his lips together and raised his eyebrows. The truck's motor thundered. "All right, Johnny."

"Don't forget to give him some water before you leave him."

THE truck rolled away. Johnny looked after it for a while, rubbing his chin in warm, sober reflection, and then turned on his heel and strode back to the barn.

He was at the auctioneer's desk, a half-hour later, looking over the sale records so far, when he was called to the phone in his office. He answered shortly.

"Hello, Johnny? George."

He relaxed. "How'd you come out?"

"Well, I ain't quite out yet. See . . . They caught me, leadin' him in. They told me to put him back in the truck—I mean she did, but I told her—"

"Where you talking from?"

"Well, from—well, from her house. She made me come in and call you—"

"Listen, George. You tell her as far as I'm concerned Ruth Ann is scratched. Got that?"

"Yeah, yeah. . . . But—"

"Go ahead, tell her. Tell her so I can hear you."

He heard George say finally, also reluctantly, "He says to tell you as far as he's concerned Ruth Ann's scratched." He heard a light, distant voice answering. He couldn't understand the words. Sweat came out on his forehead and he brushed it away angrily with his sleeve.

George's voice returned. "She says to tell you Ruth Ann ain't either scratched. She says you were a long time ago. She says—"

"Listen," Johnny shouted, "tell her—"

He heard George say wearily, "Oh, hell," and he realized no one was listening. Again he heard distant voices briefly.

He clutched the phone as if it were trying to get away.

After a time a cool, impersonal feminine voice said politely, "Are you still there? If you are, won't you please go away?"

"All right," Johnny yelled. His voice cracked and he lowered it. "You've had your fun. Take it big. But Ruth Ann keeps the colt."

"I don't," said the cool voice, "want it."

"I'm not giving it to you. I'm giving it to Ruth Ann."

There was a patient sigh and the cool voice said, "I don't intend for Ruth Ann to see it. She might like it. I don't intend for her to accept any gifts from a gambler and—"

"And a horse trader that might go broke! Well, I am broke! I'm selling out today, if it makes you any happier, but she—gets—that—colt!"

The cool voice crumbled and said, "Johnny," breathlessly, "no . . ."

But he had hung up and didn't hear it.

An hour later the big closed truck rolled up the lane. Johnny came out grimly from the crowd around the barn.

"George," he said flatly, "if that colt—"

"He ain't, thank the stars, he ain't." George lowered himself from the cab. "This time he stayed. But this didn't." He gave Johnny another letter and said, "Good night," and went away.

Johnny crammed the letter into a pocket and started back to the barn. Halfway there he stopped and took the letter out and read it:

"I made George tell me what you were going to do and he said you were taking that job at the Wharton Farms that I always wanted you to get. . . . Oh, Johnny darling, I didn't want to be right just to be right, but—and I know now you only wanted to give Ruth Ann the colt because you wanted her to have something from you while you were still able to give it to her, and I did too, but I've been holding out for more than a colt, Johnny. I've been wanting her to have you."

"Maybe you can't ask me to come back now, Johnny, but I think I'd ever so much rather have my name Wells again than go on with it Peabody, if you will only come over and help me change it back. And I know Ruth Ann would like it better too, if she could tell you—"

A HALF-HOUR later he was jumping out of his car in front of a large white house on the other side of town, and running up the walk and through the open front door. He heard a baby crying in a near-by room and hesitated, swallowing the lump in his throat, and heard Linda's voice at the end of the hall and turned toward it. Ruth Ann could wait.

The Patriotic Murders

By Agatha Christie

ILLUSTRATED BY MARIO COOPER

The Story Thus Far:

HERCULE POIROT, noted Belgian detective, leaves the office of Henry Morley, a London dentist, and returns to his flat. Shortly, Inspector Japp, of Scotland Yard, telephones him to say that Morley has committed suicide.

A skeptical person, Poirot does not accept Japp's verdict. He believes the dentist, healthy, happy, prosperous, had been shot to death. He starts an investigation. Suspect No. 1 is Amberiotis, a wealthy Greek, who had been Morley's last patient. But before the Belgian can interview him, Amberiotis dies of an overdose of dental drugs!

The inference is obvious: having killed the Greek accidentally, Morley in a fit of remorse had shot himself. But Poirot does not accept this theory, nor does Mr. Reginald Barnes, an ex-secret service man, to whom the Belgian goes for advice. Barnes feels certain that a band of conspirators, trying to undermine the existent order in England, planned to kill one of Morley's last patients, the wealthy Alistair Blunt, and, failing to get Blunt—killed Morley, because he knew too much of their plans.

Another problem is added to the matter when Miss Mabelle Sainsbury Seale, who had been in Morley's office shortly before his death, mysteriously disappears. And Poirot, busy investigating various persons—Howard Raikes, a young radical from America, also present in the office about the time Miss Seale had been there; Frank Carter, fiancé of Morley's secretary; Mr. Blunt; Jane Olivera, Mr. Blunt's niece, in love with Raikes; and others—has no idea what became of her.

At first, a body found in the apartment of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Chapman, head battered, seems to be that of Miss Seale. Further investigation, however, proves that the victim is Mrs. Chapman—disguised as Miss Seale. And following this, the search for Miss Seale is called off by the foreign office. Meanwhile, Poirot receives a warning by telephone to keep out of the investigation—or he will meet harm! Later, when he accepts an invitation to week-end with Blunt, at his country manor, he recognizes the voice of the warner as that of Mrs. Olivera. Attempting to warn Blunt that he may be in danger from his own household, he encounters only the financier's pleasant but sarcastic doubt. But a short time later, in the garden, an assailant takes a shot at Blunt. Either of two men—Raikes, unaccountably present in the garden, or Carter, disguised as the new young gardener—could be guilty. Poirot questions his list of suspects, particularly about the missing Miss Seale—and slowly a pattern of the murder begins to form in his mind.

VIII

THESE meditations had occupied Hercule Poirot on his homeward way until reaching the vicinity of Regent's Park.

He decided to traverse a part of the park before taking a taxi. By experience, he knew to a nicety how far he could walk before his smart patent-leather shoes began to press painfully on his feet.

It was a lovely summer's day and Poirot looked indulgently on courting nursemaids and their swains, laughing and giggling while their chubby charges profited by nurse's inattention.

Dogs barked and romped. Little boys sailed boats. And under nearly every tree was a couple sitting close together. . . .

"Ah! Jeunesse, jeunesse," murmured Hercule Poirot, pleased and affected by the sight.

They were chic, these little girls. They wore their tawdry with an air.

Their figures, however, he considered lamentably deficient. Where were the rich curves, the voluptuous lines that had formerly delighted the eyes of his admirer?

He, Hercule Poirot, remembered women. . . . One woman, in particular. What a sumptuous creature—Belle Paradis—a Venus. . . !

What woman was there among the pretty chits nowadays, who could hold a candle to Countess Vera Rossakoff? A genuine Russian aristocrat, a crat to her finger tips! And all remembered, a most accomplished. . . . One of those natural geni-

With a sigh, Poirot wrenched his thoughts away from the flabby creature of his dreams.

It was not only, he noted, the nursemaids and their like who were being wooed under the trees of Regent's Park.

That was a Schiaparelli there, under that lime tree, the young man who bent his head so close to hers, who was pleading so earnestly.

One must not yield too soon, he hoped the girl understood that. The pleasure of the chase must be maintained as long as possible. . . .

His benevolent eye still on the scene, he became suddenly aware of a faint smile in those two figures.

So Jane Olivera had come to Regent's Park to meet her young American admirer! A revolutionary!

His face grew suddenly rather stern.

After only a brief hesitation, he crossed the grass to them. Swiping his hat with a flourish, he said: "Bon jour, Mademoiselle."

Jane Olivera, he thought, was entirely displeased to see him.

Howard Raikes, on the other hand, was a good deal annoyed at the interruption.

"Oh, so it's you again!" he greeted Poirot.

"Good afternoon, M. Poirot," said Jane. "How unexpectedly you popped up, don't you?"

"Kind of a jack-in-the-box," said Raikes, still eying Poirot with considerable coldness.

"I do not intrude?" Poirot asked innocently.

Jane Olivera said kindly: "Not at all."

Howard Raikes said nothing.

"It is a pleasant spot you have chosen here," said Poirot.

"It was," said Mr. Raikes.

Jane said: "Be quiet, Howard. You need to learn manners!"

Howard Raikes snorted and said: "What's the good of manners?"

"You'll find they kind of help you along," said Jane. "I haven't got myself, but that doesn't matter much. To begin with I'm rich."

(Continued on page 3)

Poirot saw her, with the young man who bent his head so close, who was pleading so earnestly

Inside Willkie's Head

by Congressman
Wendell Willkie

author made the first speech second-Wendell Willkie's nomination. Here trying to be nonpartisan. He has d with men who grew up with Willwith his college and business associ-Adding their impressions to his own, ives you this fine composite portrait shadow of disillusion comes to all of us with years. Some morning we make the surprising discovery that a majority of the cops are younger we are; the men in the pulpits begin suddenly so immature; or the leaders of whom we have and heard in our youth turn out to be of flesh ood like ourselves, dipping their toast surrep-ly in their coffee, scratching their heads in pub-ing all the things that our wives have told us do.

the writer of this article—or rather report, for it composite of the views of many men who have the subject intimately at one phase or an-of his career—has lived in New York thirty He has seen the top players in business and s at close range and does not cherish many il-
s. Yet, thank heaven, he is still capable of a al enthusiasms, one of which is about Wendell
e. It began back about 1930 and has grown y ever since.

these pages will no doubt be tinged by that en-sm, yet there is no hero worship here, and no partisanship. The attempt is to answer hon-the unspoken question of millions: "If we put ell Willkie in the White House, what kind of ent will he make?"

oppose we start by lifting the top of Willkie's so to speak, and taking a look at the contents.
is there that is unusual? Or, even before we to that question, is there any element customound in human minds that seems to be ab-Examination shows that there are four striking important absentees, the first of them being fear.
le example will illustrate.

out a year ago Willkie set out with a business ate in a private plane to fly from New York to ergency meeting in Cincinnati. Somewhere in ountain region the radio went out of commisthe pilot lost his way and flew in circles while soline gauge dropped lower and lower. Tell-story, the friend says:

fter what seemed a year to me Wendell went up talked to the pilot and asked him how much is left. The pilot told him enough to last about minutes. "Have you any parachutes?" he asked.
lot said, "No." Coming back to his chair, Went down calmly, buckled his safety belt and ind me that we were going to crack up. "I'd sure o get hold of a parachute," he exclaimed. I at him in some amazement. "Wouldn't you aid to use it?" "Afraid?" he said. "Why should I've done it before." And there, while the min-ragged by, he told me how once when he was Army he jumped out of a plane to win a bet
He was as cool as if we were sitting in the window of a club.

or myself, I was a long way from being cool.
the time I began counting out last seconds we over a field where a night football game was played. The pilot flew low and dropped a note as picked up by the local sheriff. That gentle-most no time in collecting a hundred cars and g them to a near-by emergency field. There we

PHOTOGRAPH FOR COLLIER'S BY EUGENE SMITH

"New York puts a hard polish on recruits from the provinces, but it has not polished Wendell Willkie" landed by the aid of the auto lights and with our gasoline supply down to only a couple of teaspoonfuls.

"As we rode off together in a borrowed car I turned to Wendell, who sat beside me quietly pulling away at a cigarette. 'Weren't you scared?' I demanded.

"For a minute, yes," he confessed. "Then it was all over. I thought, being scared won't help, there is nothing I can do. So I began to think about my family, and how they were fixed, and how my wife would get along. And I guess I just forgot to be scared."

The friend who has known him so intimately adds:
"The man's courage is mental as well as physical.
When he has arrived at a conclusion he has a courage of conviction that nothing can sway."

Which leads us to consider another blank in the mental inventory—there are no brain cells dedicated to fretting.

You and I have known men, and some in high positions, who go through three agonies per decision.
They suffer before they make up their minds, when they make up their minds, and after they have made up their minds and are questioning their decisions.
Willkie usually starts in by getting all the facts that he can from the printed page. He can read at almost lightning speed and he remembers what he reads.

Having immersed himself in the subject he then likes to call in men of varying views and have them argue back and forth. This habit, incidentally, accounts for a good deal of dismay among his well-wishers. His conservative associates are shocked that he should have been in company with a well-known radical; his liberal friends quake for fear he is being influenced by a reactionary. He has respect for every point of view and finds mental stimulus in a diversity of opinions.

"Wait a minute—I want to hear this fellow out," is a saying familiar to all his associates. Or, "You know, even a blind hog picks up an acorn now and again." But be not deceived. No one ever makes up Wendell Willkie's mind.

I have seen enough important people pass in and out of his office to know that. He reads and listens and then he decides. Sometimes he decides wrong.
But at no stage of the process is there any fretting.
When he has done the best he could it's done.

The two other absentees are intolerance and vindictiveness. For their absence heredity is partly responsible.

As Willkie said of his ancestors in his speech of acceptance:

"One (of them) was (Continued on page 67)

Windsor-blue shirt with white stripe and Windsor knotted Spitalfields tie for the gentleman who's dressed for a picture. The photographer wears an ivory-colored shirt with a cherry-and-copper stripe tie

Fit To Be Tied

By Henry L. Jacobs

You don't have to take a course to learn how to combine colors in clothing. There are a few general rules to help chart a

PHOTOGRAPHS FOR COLIER'S BY RUDOLF HOFFMANN

THE fact that seventy-five per cent of all ties sold in America are bought by women seems to prove (a) that men are dopes, (b) that men are lazy and can't be bothered, (c) that the female is the dominant sex or (d) that women have better taste.

Looking back at the period when this latter canard was launched, it seems plain that the great ambition of men of that generation was to look like a pallbearer. The ladies decided to introduce color into the stupid lives of their mates and, boy, did they introduce it!

Ties, like clothing, fall into one of four classifications: town and business, country and campus, semisports and formal. There are plenty of ties that go with a town suit—rep, charvet, Macclesfield and Spitalfields silks and satin. If you're wise you'll stick to neat, geometric patterns, solid colors, inconspicuous figures, grouped stripes and small checks.

If you live in the country or occasionally wangle yourself a week-end invitation, you need a country tie. Foulards in printed patterns, wools, tweeds, cashmeres and knit ties are safe bets. This is one place where you can go in for bright stripes, animal figures and bold patterns. If you go in for semisports clothes—flannels, tweeds and gabardines—you'll also want the old country tie. If you're the country or college type, you'll probably go in for stripes, the evenly spaced sort that appear in regimental, club and school ties. They are also worn in town with informal types of suits such as tweed and gabardine. With a real town suit—worsted or sharkskin—fancy stripes fill the bill.

You can't go far wrong with evening ties. A dinner jacket calls for black satin, ribbed grosgrain or barathea, and it's considered a neat touch to match the tie with the dinner-jacket lapels. The white tie worn with a tail coat is generally of bird's-eye pattern piqué and may match shirt and waistcoat.

When you talk about ties, you naturally have to go into the subject of shirts. Smooth-surfaced fabrics are preferable for town; rugged types for country. Checks, plaids and plain colors are worn both for town and country, but keep on the quiet side for town. Never let the shirt be darker in color than the suit or tie. Blue, tan, gray and white can be worn by practically any man, but green is dangerous, and pink and lavender downright treacherous.

An easy way out is to have shirts and ties harmonize with the suit. It means that a single color is used for shirt, suit and tie in varying tones. For instance, you can get complete harmony with a dark brown suit, an ivory-colored shirt and a brown-and-tan tie. On the other hand, colors may contrast provided they do so agreeably. If you are in doubt limit yourself to a range of three colors. For example:

Gray suit, blue shirt, maroon tie. Blue suit, gray shirt with blue stripe, blue tie and brown tie. In truth, you have to brush up on your primary colors if you want to avoid making a fool of yourself. The three primary colors are red, yellow and blue, and the three secondary colors are orange, green and violet, combinations of the primary colors. Watch your combinations or take the consequences.

On her right, a white oxford shirt with brown stripe and a plaid tartan shirt of tie; on her left, a Scotch flannel, worn with maroon knit tie

College men like stripes in jackets, shirts and ties. Outstanding shirt favorite, however, is still the button-down collar-attached variety

What Happened to France

3- André Maurois

TRANSLATED BY DENVER LINDLEY

What completes the work begun by German propaganda. On an official mission to the island, the author sees distrust between the Allies grow. On a ship crowded with child refugees and under the protection of a British battleship, he learns with dismay of the battle of Oran.

HOW FRANCE AND ENGLAND WERE SEPARATED

FROM the beginning of the war in September, 1939, German propaganda set as its goal the separation of France from England. For eight years it pursued this aim with remarkable adroitness and tenacity. Each day it repeated to the French that the English had dragged them into the war; that the English themselves were not fighting and, moreover, never fought; that the English were furnishing the machines and the French the men fodder. It distributed pictures showing a bath of blood toward which an English soldier was pushing a French soldier, and others representing English soldiers in Paris fondling half-naked women while a French soldier kept silent in the Maginot Line. In June, 1940 it had succeeded not only in separating the two allied nations but in setting them against the other. Why? First of all because this propaganda was reinforced in the minds of many Frenchmen by strong and ancient prejudices. Before Germany, and for longer than Germany, England had been France's hereditary enemy. The memory of the Hundred Years War. True, Delcassé had reconciled the two countries in 1904 and established the Entente Cordiale; but England had fought at our side with perfect loyalty from 1914 to 1918; there were a million British dead lying in the cemeteries of northern France; but after the war there had been misunderstandings between the two nations. England, fearing France might become too strong, had most imprudently ordered the rearmament of Germany. "The English," Lord Tyrrell, ambassador to France, said to me about 1930, "the English made two mistakes after the war: we believed the French, because they had been victorious, had become Germans; and we believed the Germans, through some mysterious mutation, had become Englishmen."

In 1936, at the time when the German troops had reoccupied the Rhineland in defiance of the Treaty of Locarno, French public opinion, drunk with nationalism, had refused to support us.

FOR THOMAS

André Maurois, historian and biographer who will deliver the Lowell Lectures at Harvard this fall

"Why should we?" an English politician said to me. "The Germans can do what they like in their own back garden."

And another:

"What you hold against us English is that we are not good Frenchmen."

That was not true. What I held against the English at that time was that they were not good Englishmen and that they did not realize that a rearmament of Germany would be as great a menace to them as to us.

For a long time I had felt esteem and friendship for the English people. I went through the war of 1914 as a liaison officer with the British army. This experience taught me that England carries out to the letter the agreements she has signed. I knew too that if she was capable, like all nations, of harsh action when her national life was at stake, at least there was no malice in her violence.

It is inferiority complexes that make nations, like individuals, cruel. England had no inferiority complex. Far from it. Nine centuries of prosperity had instilled in her an invincible optimism. Because she had always ended by winning the wars in which she had engaged she had finally ceased even to think of the possibility of defeat and its terrible consequences. From the day of the Armistice, England had wanted nothing but to return to her well-kept lawns, her country houses, her sports, her traditional way of life, and she turned a deaf ear to all talk of armaments and fighting. Her professors taught the youth of the country that war was a survival of barbarism and could easily be eliminated. They did not tell their pupils that unless force is used to sustain justice injustice will triumph.

IN ATTACHING so much importance to the idea of the League of Nations, England was moved in part by a sincere idealism but also by a false idea she had formed of a League of Nations that would overcome cannon with volleys of edifying discourse. Harold Nicolson, a member of the British Parliament, told me he had received the following letter from one of his constituents:

"I hope you are for the League of Nations and no foreign entanglements."

This confusion of ideas, this incredible self-confidence, this refusal to look reality in the face had produced the effects that might have been foreseen. Having slumbered on her green lawns from 1919 to 1939 England awoke after Munich when it was too late, and she came to the war with almost no army.

That was the second element in the success of German propaganda. "Just look," the French were told, "the English have no soldiers; they will fight to the last Frenchman." That was far from being fair. England had the best navy in the world and an air force that gave promise of being excellent. But it was true that on land, through lack of men and arms, she could hold only a tiny sector of the long line.

"The English? But where are the English? There really are English soldiers in France?" many Frenchmen asked me ironically.

Even so, if Great Britain had acted promptly after the declaration of war, if she had quickly formed a number of new divisions, perhaps public opinion in France would have been reassured.

(Continued on page 51)

Mid Pleasures and Palaces

By Thomas McMorrow

ILLUSTRATED BY GILBERT DARLING

BUSINESS was fierce. Honest, I had a good mind to end it all and let Molly and the children have the insurance. I was busted and disgusted.

I went into the bank that I owed fifty thousand dollars and that was making all the trouble for me and I wept to Third Vice-President Pintsch who was in charge of putting me through the wringer. He took off his specs and looked at me with two glass eyes.

"Next Monday, Mr. M'Gaffin," he said, "either you make a very substantial payment then or you get a blitzkrieg! Sorry."

So I saw my lawyer again. He gave me a pep talk.

"Stand back and skin your teeth at them, M'Gaffin!" he advised. "If you're honest they ought to trust you, but do they expect you to be honest and pay up too? Grab all the cash in sight, give it to Mrs. M'Gaffin, and take a bath! It is your duty to your dear wife and two dear little children."

"That's the stuff," I thought, going over to the station to get the 4:15 home. "For Molly and the children, I will take a bath!"

We lived in Greenford. You know Greenford? It is only an hour out, but it is across the line from the New York income tax, so it's a good residence if you got heavy sugar.

My chauffeur met me at the Greenford station, escorted me into my three-thousand-dollar Pearce-Paine and off we whirled for the M'Gaffin estate. We had a place of sixteen rooms and six baths on five acres and, of course, since we couldn't live in it all by ourselves, we had to have help. We had a chauffeur, gardener and all such.

There's no place like home—with sixteen rooms, six baths, and all the mortgages in proportion

I didn't get a chance to talk business with Molly till we were going to bed, as some of the help were always listening in; we never had any privacy in that house. I was always meeting strangers, upstairs and down; I was lucky some of them didn't shoot me for a burglar.

I finally got Molly alone.

"Baby," I said, "I have got to move quick or go clean. So my lawyer thinks I better take a bath."

"Go bankrupt?" said Molly, turning pale. She understood me. That girl's got a great head and I always talked it over with her.

"Go bankrupt or go broke, baby! And my duty to you and the children is not to go broke." And I explained to her my lawyer's plan. I was to milk the business of the last drop of cash, slip it to Molly, and tell them all to whistle.

She wouldn't hear of it! And Molly is a very pigheaded girl.

"Terence M'Gaffin, that's stealing, and we'll do no such thing. They can put us in jail and what will the children do then?"

Well, I argued her and argued her, but she wouldn't budge; and it was her or nobody. You can't ask everybody to hold hot money.

"Okay, baby," I said, getting pretty sore, "then we are up the spout right now! We can move back to the east Bronx. You can do your own work, Junior can go to a big public school—where he's a stranger—and little Molly when she gets big can make her debut in the five-and-dime instead of the picture papers!"

I WAS sore. After a man has raised himself from a keg to a barrel, from a bricklayer on the wall to a big contractor and a country gentleman, he is going to get sore at anybody who hands him back his overalls. I was so sore I decided to stop worrying and I turned over and corked off for the first good night in months.

The next morning I was wakened around my beautifully landscaped garage and mourning over the blow would be to stop paying the upkeep. I happened into the garage. The garage always allowed me to go where I wanted but they made me know they didn't want it and kept me under observation. This morning Dudley the chauffeur gave me a nice smile. He'd been looking for my Pearce-Paine to see could he get a bill on it.

"Transmission out of order, sir," reported happily. "I had it in Rafferty's garage yesterday and they can fix it for only eighty-five dollars. It won't be more than three days."

It was Rafferty sold me that car in the first place. He could have given it to me and made money, as he drew a salary income from it ever after. And tell me Dudley wasn't getting a salary out of it.

"Fine!" I said. "And while you are doing nothing you can help James build the grape arbor, or will you wash the cellar?"

"Oh, no, that's not my work," said M'Gaffin, he said.

"Would you rather," I offered, "sit in on the interest and taxes if you're going to sit around and help me be a gentleman?"

"Perhaps, Mr. M'Gaffin," he said, "you are not satisfied."

That was to throw a scare in me. It didn't work this time.

"That pain in the pants, Dudley," said, "is costing me upward of ten

"This stuff about how nice it is to be rich," I said, "is a lot of propaganda. Money is the root of all evil"

...a day, what with your salary board and depreciation and Raffer-bills; and I can take the bus for a ... I figure the bus is cheaper. Come to the house and get your money." When I went after James the gardener, he was another bird burned me up. If he was a little real work, James hold for extra help. "Good morning, James," I said when I found him where he was resting his ... for a hundred and forty a month free vegetables. "Well, you are in these hard times; you not only job, you got two jobs! After this will drive the car as well as take ... under other pretenses." "No, indeed, sir!" he said, insulted. "It's not my work." "You are not satisfied?" I said. "Okay, yes, you and me. Come up to the ... and get your time." "I was busted, so I was independent. A ... man needs help but a poor man can care of himself."

ANWHILE Molly was telling the house help that we were going to ... up and go traveling and they better ... their packs. We pulled out in a day or two; no ... hanging on in Greenford if we ... busted. Moving wasn't so bad as ... didn't have to move the furniture, ... that there was a mortgage on it. I towed the family and the dog in ... eration wagon and off we went to the ... shed bungalow that was our first ... . Lucky it was in Molly's name. ... was a blow. I'd seen it coming for ... or I wouldn't seriously be think- ... taking a run-out powder and get- ... Molly the insurance; but it was a ... when it hit.

I started to think how people would ... Everybody would be looking at the ... and saying, "Did you hear M'Gaf- ... the big contractor and country gen- ... is up the spout? He used to live ... " I could just hear them.

And how they would talk in the old ... borhood when we came back— ... five years—with our tail between ... gs!

So I was feeling shy as I turned the ... n wagon into Beverley Lane and ... the little old house. I figured every- ... would stop me and want to know ... broke my neck, and run and tell ... body and we would have a crowd ... like a trunk murder.

Well, the first one I saw was Lana- ... the cop on the beat. I shouted: "Hello, Lanahan! Here I am again!" "Hey?"

"Say hello! Remember me, don't ... "

"Hey? What do you mean, M'Gaffin? ... was looking for you last week. ... of mine wanted a wall painted ... and I told him I knew a bricklayer ... on Beverley Lane. Where were ... Or did I have the wrong house? ... that the one you live in?" "Used to live there!"

"Oh, are you moving out? Well, good ... M'Gaffin. Goodby, Mrs. M'Gaf- ... We're going to miss you! Goodby!" Then I went down to get Molly's gro- ... order.

"And two quarts of Grade B," said ... the grocer, totaling up the list. ... away, Mr. M'Gaffin? Oh, you ... Have a nice trip? I'll send it right ... "

Mrs. Dugan next door was about the ... one knew we'd been away for ... and she didn't have it right. She ... Molly, "It's often I've thought ... you since your husband lost his job ... you had to move out. He's working ... now? Ain't that just fine. And the ... llen, would you look at the size of ... "

I want to tell you they almost talked ... to it myself. Sitting with Molly ... porch steps that night as we used ... "

"Perhaps, Mr. M'Gaffin," he said, "you are not satisfied." That was to throw a scare in me to sit, listening to the music from Star-bright Amusement Park, with the chil- ... dren asleep inside, I almost thought it was all in my mind. About making a lot of money in a hurry and branching out into a country gentleman.

It hit Molly the same way. We were sitting there holding hands and watching for the trunks to show up and Molly jumps up and runs in the house. She comes out laughing and crying a little.

"I went in to look at the children and be sure it was all real," she says, snugg- ... ling down again. "Remember, Terry, the first day we moved in here ten years ago? That night we were sitting right here waiting for the trunks like now. And all excited about having this great big house all to ourselves. Remember?"

And she went on and said, "And the time you found me crying because we weren't going to have the house all to ourselves! That was when Junior was coming, and I was so happy, but I got to thinking that we were never going to be alone together, just us, any more."

So I kissed her.

WELL, we went on a sight-seeing tour. Molly and me, and it was like old times. Molly cried a little but not because she was sad. There were the marks on the door of our room where we'd measured Junior. He was a foot higher now, and we weren't so dead sure he was going to be President soon, the way he stuck in the third grade. And there was the phony Russian teakettle still in the mantelpiece corner that was our first bank. All little things like that.

I went out in the back yard and I saw where I would have a week's pleasure pruning the trees and trimming the hedges and weeding; that back yard wasn't big but it was ambitious. I had an orchard on it and a flower garden and a vegetable garden; though the last two were always getting mixed up on me. I would plant watermelons and up would come sunflowers, or it might be petunias and I would get radishes. I was always a natural-born gardener. So then I could get lathered with dirt from head to heels, and nobody'd run and snitch to Molly!

That night I walked the dog like I used to, and talked to everybody with- ... out fear and favor; to strange ladies, too—a dog is a great one for introductions. I was independent like I used to be and could talk to everybody I met. Well, could I do that in Greenford? People you'd meet walking on the roads would be somebody's help and a country gentleman couldn't be friends with them. You'd meet somebody on the road and put out your hand and say, "My name's M'Gaffin; what's yours?" And he would back up and say, "Call me Robert, sir."

It was the same with joining, now I mention it. I was always a great joiner, but what could I join in Greenford?

Well, the country club and the shore club, but I couldn't belong to these big national clubs and societies such as I might mention, because the local help belonged to them. It doesn't do in Greenford to be Terry and Bob with the neighbors' help. It just struck me, I was lonely in Greenford.

And eating! And I was always a great eater. I had to keep out of the icebox or the cook would snitch to Molly. And we had to eat when the help wanted, and if we wanted to ask people to dinner we had to ask the cook could we, and she'd give us to understand it mustn't happen too often. And eating prime ribs when you wanted spareribs and filet mignon when you wanted pea soup and hot dogs. Hash? Ask for it in Greenford and stand back. Now in the Bronx I went in and bought three pounds of breast of lamb for the dog for twenty cents and when Molly saw it she cooked it for us, and we ate the dog's dinner and it was the best eating we had in years.

And we had privacy in the Bronx, the house to ourselves, no strangers. Greenford was like a tenement house.

And all the things I owned in Greenford and had to take care of! Now I could walk the dog on Fordham Road and we'd look in all the store windows and I don't know which one of us was the most independent. Neither of us wanted anything we saw. We didn't want them, and I had all those things once, and what were they? Dust catchers. Something more to take care of.

I WAS always a great thinker and philosopher but I didn't figure this thing out till we were back in the little old Bronx house a few days.

The first day or two I was so busy feeling sorry for myself for going broke; and then I began to notice that I was liking it. It was like coming home. Every- ... body ought to be rich once in his life. Once is enough. I began to notice I was sleeping like a night watchman, and Molly noticed I wasn't biting every- ... body's head off.

"You are like yourself, sweetheart!" said Molly, watching me lay into my plate. The four of us were having dinner.

"Why wouldn't I be, baby?" I said, sit- ... ting back and snapping my suspenders.

(Continued on page 26)

Traitor's Purse

By Margery Allingham

ILLUSTRATED BY ELMORE BROWN

The Story Thus Far:

WAKING in a hospital room, Albert Campion is bewildered—he has no idea of his identity, or of the reason for his presence in the hospital! When he hears himself accused of seriously injuring a policeman, he determines to flee until his confused mind has recovered a fuller knowledge of the circumstances. Undetected, he starts down the hospital corridor, resorting to a fireman's costume, found in a closet, as a disguise. However, in taking the costume, he sets off the fire-alarm system. In the resulting confusion, he flees from the building, but not before he is stopped momentarily by an attractive girl. He eludes her, and escapes finally in a coupé parked before the building.

He speeds down the highway, but is eventually overtaken by a pursuing car, the occupants of which—Mr. Anscombe, an old man, and the beautiful girl he encountered in the hospital—seem to know him very well. From the girl, he learns that he is Albert Campion, and that they are on their way to a dinner engagement.

On the way, they drop Mr. Anscombe off at his home. Discovering that the old man has forgotten a package, Campion dashes up the path after him, but second thought of his eccentric costume makes him decide to leave the package on the doorstep.

Later, when they arrive at the home of Aubrey Lee, their host for the evening, Campion makes one important discovery: Somewhere in his confused mind is a clear knowledge that he loves the girl, Amanda, and that she belongs in his life. A short time later, during the evening, he receives a letter from a Scotland Yard official, in which he learns that he is entrusted with a highly important and secret mission—which he cannot remember! He has no time to ponder further, for just then the police arrive to question him. They announce that Mr. Anscombe has been found murdered—in his garden. And Albert and Amanda are the last two people to have seen him alive!

Feeling his cautious way through a nightmarish interview, Campion is assisted in his explanations by another guest—Mr. Pyne, who seems to have had some previous connection with his life. At the scene of the murder, Campion discovers that he has a clear and apparently accurate vision of how the murder was accomplished—and has the horrifying thought that he himself may be the murderer! Depressed and harassed by his vague, uncertain mind, he returns to his host's home—there to be assailed by uneasy recollections that Amanda is in some sort of danger—involving Aubrey—their host.

III

"I WANT to talk with you," Campion said.

"All right. What is it? I say, nothing else awful, surely?" Amanda appeared to expect disaster and hurried into his room as if she thought to find concrete evidence of it there.

He followed her and closed the door. Had there been bolts upon it he would have shot them.

"There's one thing you've got to tell me," he said. "I've been trying to find out all evening."

"What?"

"What day is it?"

She stared at him. Her brown eyes were wide with astonishment at first, but as he looked at her the fine brows came down in a straight line above them and the fiery color spread over her face.

"Did you hang about on the staircase simply to ask me that? You're behaving rather extraordinarily, aren't you?"

He was, of course. He saw that the moment she pointed it out. To the uninstructed his behavior and the all-important question could have only one explanation: that he was acting like a jealous child. He felt unreasonably angry with her for his own helplessness.

"I want to know the day and the date of today," he said doggedly. "You're the only person I dare ask. What is it?"

"It's the thirteenth, I think." She was furious, and the dignity which her control lent her was the coldest thing on earth.

"Friday, I suppose?"

"No. Tuesday. Now I think I'll go to bed."

Tuesday the thirteenth. That meant Thursday the fifteenth. A day. A day to do what?

Amanda moved over toward the door. He thought she was going out without a word and was helpless to stop her. He was completely unprepared, therefore, for what was evidence of one of the most lovable traits in her makeup. On the threshold she turned and quite suddenly grinned at him.

"I've gone all theatrical, Albert," she said. "What's up?"

He groaned. "I don't know," he said truthfully.

AMANDA came back into the room and sat down on the edge of the bed.

"Are you all right?" she demanded. "I don't want to fuss you—I know how you hate it—but you do look a bit green, you know. I've noticed it all evening and haven't liked to mention it."

He cocked an eye at her, and a great surge of desire for comfort from her broke over him. She was alive. She was his only link with reality. It was on his tongue to risk everything and come out with the awful truth when her next remark silenced him.

"I'm sorry I behaved so badly. I've got a bit self-centered. I thought you were playing the fool because I was falling in love with Lee." She spoke without any affectation and was free from any suggestion of the coyly blunt. Her eyes were as candid as her words.

"Are you?"

"I think so." There was a quiet softness in her voice, a gentle satisfaction which he knew he had never heard in it before.

"Why?"

She hesitated and finally laughed. "It's a thing I couldn't possibly tell you if you weren't yourself," she said. "I mean if I didn't know you as well as I know myself almost. He's like you, isn't he?"

"Is he?"

"I think so, very. Except for the one important thing."

"What's that?"

She looked up at him and there was a sort of rueful shyness in her young face.

"He loves me so. He's doing his best about it but it's bubbling out all over him and making him shy and silly, like an undergraduate or a peasant or something. And since he's a great man—because he is brilliant, you know—well, that makes it pretty irresistible." She paused and shook herself. "Let's not discuss it. It's not a bit in your line and things are getting up speed, aren't they? I feel disgusted with myself for getting—er—overtaken by this thing, but it's like that. It does—er—overtake. Tell me about Anscombe."

"He was murdered."

"What?" She sat staring at him. "But that's impossible! Who?"

"I don't know," Campion shrugged. Amanda clasped her knees and her heart-shaped face looked small and worried.

"Of course I'm not competent to judge anything in this business," she said unexpectedly, "since I don't know the full strength."

"My dear," he said with elaborate deference, because he was still tingling from the blow which seemed to have hurt the secret, forgotten part of himself even more than his conscious needy present, "I only wish I could tell you."

"Yes, well, you can't," she said briefly. "You're under oath and that's final. I don't mind. I know you well enough to work under sealed orders. Otherwise I'd hardly have done the unforgivable thing and got Lee to invite us down here without telling him you were working on something in the town. I've got your assurance that it's desperately important—that's good enough."

CAMPION was standing with his back to her and did not dare look around.

"Let's see," he said mendaciously, "how long have we known Lee?"

"You mean how long have I known him," objected Amanda. "You've known him three days, as you very well know. I came down here from Dell on some work on the new armor for the Seraphim planes. There was a man working at the Institute we had to get hold of. I made friends with Lee then."

She was talking gibberish apart from the all-important dates, as far as Campion was concerned, and he wondered how far he dared press her for information. Fortunately she helped him unconsciously.

"Have you told anyone about the hospital episode this afternoon?"

"No."

"Nor have I. And I was thinking, Albert, I don't suppose Anscombe did. So suppose we stick to our original plan, which is, if you remember, that I took you into Coachingford on Sunday night to catch the London express. That was immediately after you had the wire which was waiting for you when we arrived. Then yesterday, I was supposed to fetch you from the same station after your return. At dinner tonight I was very vague about our delay, but it was a boring gathering anyway and didn't matter. Still, if it does come up we'll have to call it tire trouble. How's that?"

"Excellent," he said dubiously, and waited for her to continue.

"How did you get on at Coachingford?" she inquired at last.

He shrugged his shoulders and she nodded gloomily.

"Like that?" she said. "Never mind. It'll come suddenly. I don't like this Anscombe business, though. That's horrible. Just when we thought he knew something."

He turned on her. "What made you think he knew something?"

"I don't know. I just got that impression."

"Not—'fifteen'?"

"Fifteen?" She seemed surprised. "Fifteen what?"

"Fifteen men on a dead man's chest," he said and half wondered if he had invented the ringing phrase.

"Yo-ho-ho and some nice sound sleep," said Amanda. "You can't do any more tonight, anyway, if the whole world's at stake. You go to bed."

Campion leaned heavily on the back of a chair. His wooden face was haggard and he looked tired and frustrated.

Her face looked small and worried. "Of course I'm not competent to judge anything in this business," she said unexpectedly

"I wonder if perhaps it is," he said. She gave the question serious consideration.

"It seems a bit presumptuous, but it might be," she said.

Campion felt the beads of sweat break out on the line where his forehead met his hair.

"That's the kind of silly premonition I've got," he said.

Amanda smiled at him. "If it is, I'd rather it was in your hands than anybody's," she said honestly. "You've got all the cards, Albert, and fundamentally you're so . . ."

"So what?"

"So sort of sufficient at heart. So cold. You'll get by."

After she had gone he sat very still in the silent room and the strong light beat down upon him with chilly clarity. The warmth had gone out of the dream again and he was back in the familiar nightmare. He knew what it was like now. It was like one of those trick films in which familiar objects are photographed from an unfamiliar angle. The strange shadows thus cast make vast secret shapes, forming a horror where there is none and, worse still, concealing a horror where horror lies.

Now that Amanda had gone he wondered why he had not confided in her. It was not only because of Lee and because he dreaded her pity as he dreaded insufferable pain. There was another reason. He reached down into the darkness in his mind and drew it out from its skulking place in all its hideousness. It was a fear. If she knew of his mental state, if she knew of that overheard conversation in the hospital and had it presented to her with the facts as they both knew them about Anscombe's death, then would she still regard him with that candid trust which was the most precious thing about her? Or would the gleam of a doubt come creeping into her eyes before her loyalty doused it? That was the risk he had not dared to take. He was the man involved and he could not entirely trust himself.

The whistle cut into his thoughts. The low note, which was just sufficiently unlike a bird's to be uncanny, sounded twice before it brought him to his feet. He switched out the light and stood listening. It sounded again just beneath the window.

He pulled the heavy curtains aside, unlatched the old-fashioned shutters, and threw up the sash as quietly as he could.

The whistle began and ended suddenly and there was a long silence. The house cast a deep shadow and the space below the window was black as the pit.

"IS THAT you, sir?" The voice was very quiet and almost directly beneath him. "Are you ready? I've been waiting around the other side. I must have mistook your meaning. We'll have to get a move on if we're to get the job done tonight. Can you come at once?"

"What? Yes, yes, all right, I'll be with you in a moment." Campion drew in his head, closed the window and replaced its various shroudings. Then he went downstairs with the soft-footed tread of a professional burglar. In his mind was a single, unqualified question mark, for the voice had been the utterly unmistakable one of Superintendent Hutch.

Campion came out of the front doorway noiselessly. He picked his way over the gravel to the silent turf of the lawn and stood waiting. If this was arrest the whole world was as lightheaded as he was.

The superintendent's jaunty figure emerged from the black shadows around the house and dropped into step beside him. He did not speak, but, taking Campion's arm, led him into the narrow line

(Continued on page 28)

The utility man in baseball is an unsung hero who may warm the bench for weeks before being called into a game to meet an emergency. Smart managers rate him as valuable to the team as they do their regular stars

SPARE WHEEL

By Bill Cunningham

PHOTOGRAPHS FOR COL-
LIER'S BY CARL OESER

IF YOU found yourself in Cleveland talking with a baseball fan, and you chanced to ask the gentleman which of the Tribesmen he considered most valuable to the club in a pennant fight, he might say Boudreau, or Mack, or Keltner, or, and undoubtedly, Feller. But, if you approached Manager Oscar Vitt, and asked him the same question, he might amaze you by answering Oscar Grimes.

Who?

That's right. He's not in the line-up. You probably never heard of him, but Grimes is the name, Oscar the first one. He's twenty-four years old, five feet eleven inches tall, weighs 180 pounds and bats and throws right-handed. His public rating, if any, is spare second baseman.

And if you went along to Detroit and started quizzing the baseball customers, they'd give you Greenberg, Gehringer, York or Pinky Higgins, maybe. But up around the front office, they'd tell you they'd just as soon nothing happened to a young fellow by the name of Frank Croucher. Maybe you can't exactly pick up a Gehringer, a Tebbetts or a Pete Fox every day, but you can get a reasonable facsimile. But Crouchers are harder to find than shamrocks in Kansas.

Who in thunderation is Croucher?

He's just another young fellow about Grimes' age. He hasn't been in there often this season, either.

And if you went along to Cincinnati, they'd tell you Eddie Joost. If you got as far as the Boston Bees, they'd name Johnny Cooney, who's been playing ball almost since the original A. G. Spalding.

Every team has one of these sleepers, if it can possibly be arranged. You never see their names in any All Star line-ups. The fans scarcely know they're alive. They may not break into the box score more than two or three times a month. Yet no team considers itself really safe without one. These anonyms occupy an especial niche all their own, and, by some managers, are rated as even more valuable than the stars they'll never be.

(Continued on page 71)

Lou Finney of the Red Sox (above) was a spare wheel until he learned to bat. Now he's a hitting sensation. The man to watch next year is Dick West of Indianapolis (below). He plays six positions and is a wicked pinch hitter "Tell General Howard I know his heart. I am tired of fighting. From where the sun now stands, I will fight no more"

The Man Who Looked Like Napoleon

By Herbert Ravenel Sass

ILLUSTRATED BY HERBERT MORTON STOOPS

Joseph, chief of a Nez Percé tribe, was a born strategist. Too bad he didn't fight with the United States Army instead of against it

OUT one o'clock in the morn-a trooper of Brevet Colonel Perry's command struck a match his pipe. This was contrary to and Captain Trimble reprim-him sharply. The man mutat he hadn't understood the light, small flare of the match, only a moment, was no more point of fire in the immense over Idaho; yet to Lieutenant on edge and anxious, it seemed as a rocket would have seconds later a coyote howled llside above. This passed al-noticed, for coyotes were com-hundred yards away, at the en-White Bird Canyon, an Indian louching motionless on his ked to attention as he heard the cry. Head thrown back and one side, he listened intently;

the last quavering notes came he wheeled his horse and faded deeper blackness of the canyon.
hother end of White Bird Can-he it opened into the valley of river, the most remarkable in-the West waited.

This man was an Indian also—an Indian chief. Thirty-six years of age, tall, straight and handsome, with a mouth and chin resembling Napoleon's, he had given no hint as yet of the dangerous genius smoldering in him. His name was In-mut-too-yah-lat-tat, which meant Thunder-Rolling-Over-The-Mountains.
To the white settlers of Idaho and eastern Oregon he was known as Joseph, chief of the Wallowa band of Nez Percés, a tribe that had always been friendly to the whites and had several times come to their aid when they were few and weak.

This had been forgotten when the white men became many and strong.
"If ever a tribe was worthy of fostering," Captain Trimble wrote later, "it was the Nez Percés, but no recollection of former service could stand against the white man's greed." Gifts and cunning persuasion had induced the other chiefs to sign away their lands, but the Wallowa band clung to their lovely valley between the sinuous Snake and the swift Grande Ronde. It was their home. In its soil their ancestors lay and, Indian-like, they held it sacred. "I buried my father," Joseph told the white commissioners, "in that beautiful Valley of Winding Waters. I love that land more than all the rest of the world."

They didn't care why or how much he loved it. They wanted Wallowa and meant to have it; so they twisted a dubious treaty to suit their purpose and told Joseph and his people to get out. Joseph strove desperately for peace, even consenting as a last resort to give up Wallowa to the whites. Then, when he and his band had already left their "Valley of Winding Waters," new injuries inflamed some of his young men beyond endurance, and without his knowledge, they avenged blood with blood.

Joseph knew then that the war he dreaded was upon him. Where the White Bird flows into the Salmon in western Idaho he pitched his tepees, posting his pickets at the entrance of White Bird Canyon, for he knew that Perry's troopers from Fort Lapwai were already on the march. That night of June 16, 1877—the night when a careless trooper struck a match to light his pipe—Joseph was resting quietly in his lodge with his wife and his twelve-year-old daughter waiting for two things that he expected to happen: for the birth of another child (his wife being very near her time) and for the hoofbeats of an Indian rider coming in haste down White Bird Canyon with news that the soldiers were at hand.

The child was not born that night, but the rider came.

Near the entrance of White Bird Canyon, where the howl of a coyote had been heard but scarcely heeded, Colonel
(Continued on page 60)

Sunday Pitch

By Philip Clark

ILLUSTRATED BY CARL MUELLER

Baseball has known a lot of little miracles. Most of them have involved only the players. Here is one a girl helped to bring about

EVEN before the ball got off his fingers, Clint knew it was a cripple. Something wrong with his grip or wrist action that killed the break. And, as always, Clint's world stopped rolling in that brief instant of the pitch. He was down off the rubber in the smooth, powerful motion that the sports writers raved about. The stands, the whole sun-brilliant ball park were suddenly still, a frame of silence for the thudding scurry of the man racing in from third; for Dwyer hulking down behind the plate, his big mitt a hopeful target, and for the batter, Earle Griscom poised lean and hungry, the tip of his bat waving slightly. And that ball going in as soft and helpless as a baby's prayer.

Then the leashed, level fury of Griscom's swing. The sharp, clean crack, the ball a white-hot streak right through the box, almost at Clint's head. No time to get his glove over. He threw his pitching hand up, yielding to the stinging impact, only trying to knock the ball down so it could be fielded. It was bobbling on the grass between the box and first. Clint ran after it, hearing the thud as the runner's cleats hit the plate. He scooped the ball off the grass and threw in a single motion, almost a dead heat with Griscom's lunge across first. But in back of first Morrity's short, fat arm jerked up in the finishing gesture. Three out. The run from third hadn't scored.

Clint walked toward the dugout through the confused sound of a suddenly disappointed crowd. They'd wanted their team to score, and the fast thinkers were groaning the put-out while the slow ones were still cheering Griscom's almost certain hit. With a few scattering claps for Clint Malone's eight scoreless innings and the fine play that had saved his one-run lead.

Clint crossed inside first, meeting Dwyer coming in from the plate. Dwyer looked anxious, and Ben Talbot, the Wasp's manager, climbed out of the dugout looking anxious too, and a little mad. Dwyer said, "You sure handed him that one. I could read the label."

"It got away from me," Clint said. "I'm lucky he didn't knock it out of the park."

Talbot snorted irritably. "You're lucky if you didn't bust a finger, making that sucker stop. Let me see your hand."

Clint spread his right hand, crooking his fingers. They were red where the ball had hit, and the sting was still pretty sharp. But he didn't think they were bruised. Talbot was pressing down on his fingers and palm, probing for an injury. "That was a sucker play," he said. "We could've got the run back. If your hand swells—"

Clint said, "It won't. And if you guys would just muscle over a couple of runs, it wouldn't matter anyway."

He turned away from Talbot, flexing the fingers of his pitching hand, rubbing them gently with his left. He leaned against the corner of the dugout, staying out in the sun, because he was hot and loose and sweating freely, and wanted to go on doing it. He felt fine. His hand wasn't going to swell. He had a one-run lead. He was still in the driver's seat.

DWYER was going up to the plate, swinging his bats, and out on the coaching line Talbot was barking for a hit. Just in back of him, Clint heard someone speak his name. He turned and saw Harry Chelten leaning forward in the box behind the dugout. Chelten's tanned face was friendly, as always, and a little worried. He said, "That was a hot shot, Clint. Any damage?"

Clint said, "I reckon not, Mr. Chelten. Nothing to worry about."

Chelten said, "I hope. We sure need that old soup bone of yours."

He smiled, but his words put Clint's teeth on edge. As words, there was nothing the matter with them. But in Chelten's mouth they sounded self-conscious and all wrong. There wasn't anything the matter with Chelten. He was a nice guy. Nice, and very rich. He owned the Wasps. He also owned a copper mine, and a few utility companies and other things. The newspaper boys said he'd spent a cool two million trying to build the Wasps into a championship club. So far it was just money down the drain, but Chelten hadn't complained. He was too good a sport for that.

Looking at him, Clint thought, maybe that's what sours me. He's such a damned good sport. Always the nice smile, the right word. Always one of the boys. But it doesn't cover up how badly he wants that pennant. He'll spend any amount of money to get it. But that's not the same as spending sweat and guts. . . .

Chelten was leaning back in his chair, introducing Clint to the couple behind him in the box. Clint didn't catch their name, but he'd seen them with Chelten before, and nodded smart, well-turned-out people. Chelten's crowd, only probably thinking owning ballplayers was pretty much owning horses, but funnier. The was suddenly conscious of the Chelten's side.

He wasn't conscious of all of once. Gray eyes first, and auburn and a grave, friendly smile. cably, Clint had that odd feeling. The feeling that for one split second world and everything in it was dead still.

Chelten was saying, "Clint, Faith Jerrold."

CLINT said something, he didn't know what. The crowd roared suddenly and he knew Dwyer had struck. Clint tried to think of something, but the words wouldn't shape. The Jerrold girl said seriously, as though it really mattered, "I hope you didn't hurt your hand."

Clint was suddenly tired of about his hand. He said, more brusquely than he intended, "Don't worry. I'll get by."

It sounded rough and unfriendly, but the girl's face changed a little. Clint was sorry, but there wasn't anything about it. The crowd was howling pily over the third out. Clint said, "I got to get back to work."

He walked out to the mound feeling that the game was in his hands. He put the Jerrold girl firmly from his mind as he settled down to work. He retired the side on eight pitches and was another day.

He had supper that night in a restaurant down by the lake, and walked back to the hotel in the dark. He made himself think of playing ball. It was what he knew was having a great season. In two and two, with four weeks still to go, the Wasps were doing all right. They had a four-game lead. If they tightened up in the final stand, they'd get Chelten his pennant. Clint thought warmly about pitching the series.

IN THE hotel lounge, he stopped at a newsstand to buy a couple of magazines, and started for the elevator. He was passing the door of the lounge when Chelten hailed him. Chelten was a party in the lounge. Clint saw the whole table. He shook his head and grinned a polite refusal, but got up and came out to him. Clint by the arm and said, "Just a minute, Clint. You can't pitch like that without giving us a chance to talk it up a little."

His voice was warm and friendly, but Clint couldn't think of an answer. He refused, Clint went into the lounge.

Ben Talbot was there, and a woman who had been in the box, and a couple of debutante girls. The Jerrold girl wasn't there. Clint cursed himself wryly for being appointed. Chelten introduced the two girls, and Talbot said, "You're off for tonight, Clint. You go yourself a beer with that one."

One of the girls said, "A beautiful road to ruin," and everyone laughed as though it were really funny. Chelten started talking eagerly about a game that afternoon, and the chances. It made Clint uncomfortable because he knew when you look at too much, you tightened up. He then that there was an empty chair between him and Chelten, with a finished cocktail on the table. But he had time to do any wondering in a pale green dress was drawn to the chair and slipping into it. He was turned toward Chelten, and could see her hair, and the top of her head.

(Continued on page 51)

Clint was suddenly tired of the talk about his hand. He said, more brusquely than he intended, "Don't worry about it"

PICTURE OF A DREAM COMING TRUE

New Furniture . . . The Great Thrill For The Home . . .

Delivered in Safe, Sure, Economical International Trucks

International Trucks cut costs for Furniture Dealers and Manufacturers alike

Most folks plan a long time, save for years, and do a lot of dreaming to get everything they want for their homes. And it's worth all the effort, for each season the furniture makers and dealers surpass themselves in creating new designs—classic and modern, period and traditional—charming suites for every setting, priced for every purse.

Price is always a basic factor in the great furniture industry. And a vital item in price-control is transportation. Furniture delivery from factory to store and from store to home requires expert handling and the most dependable and economical of motor truck equipment.

Much of this is heavy-duty hauling—in which International Trucks have excelled for many years. In fact, for the past ten years, now, more heavy-duty Internationals have been bought than any other make.

This sweeping preference for International Trucks has spread from a single, unmistakable fact: they reduce the costs of hauling.

That, in a nutshell, is why manufacturers and merchants alike depend on International Trucks for outstanding delivery service at lowest possible cost. They get it . . . and so can you!

If you have loads to haul and want to cut the cost, call on the International Dealer or Branch in your city. International has all truck sizes, from ½-Ton to powerful Six-Wheelers.

Write for catalog, and haul your loads for less.

INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER COMPANY
180 North Michigan Avenue Chicago, Illinois

NATIONAL FURNITURE WEEK

September 21 to 28 is National Furniture Week, across the country furniture dealers everywhere will display the newest things for your home. To the Furniture Makers and Dealers of America International Harvester dedicates this advertisement of the Trucks that Furniture Men themselves prefer.

Copyright 1940, by International Harvester Company

INTERNATIONAL TRUCKS

Mid Pleasures and Palaces

Continued from page 19

"This is the life! Not a care in the world. No worry about business or money; I haven't got any. I'm broke and I like it! Poor and content, as the fellow says, is rich enough!"

"Yes, sweetheart," said Molly, "finish your potatoes."

"This stuff about how nice it is to be rich, baby," I said, "is a lot of propaganda. It's a gyp! Instead of telling people to be poor and content and live to the end of their lives they tell them to kill themselves with work and worry and get buried in Greenford. Money, baby, is the root of all evil, and you can quote me on that!"

"Yes, sweetheart."

"Americans, baby," I said, telling it to her, "are a lot of saps. Working and worrying to get ahead and get rich. Why can't they settle down and enjoy life like me? You know Pink Solomon that I used to work for—the Pincus Solomon Construction Company?"

"Baby, I am going to work for Pink Monday morning, fifty a week. It's steady and it's all we want. Why wouldn't Junior go to public school with the greatest men this country ever knew? Why wouldn't little Molly step out and grab herself a job when she gets big? The greatest woman this country ever knew—take a bow, baby!—was hustling trays in a cafeteria when I first seen her. I have lost my shirt and I am happy! I am happy again the first time in five years!"

"Yes, sweetheart," said Molly. "Don't holler."

THAT afternoon I went down to 42d Street to close up the office for good and give the furniture to a secondhand man. I was all washed up, and glad of it. Was I happy!

Though I was very sore at the same time about the bank, the people that busted me.

This is what they did to me. I took a contract to put up a big building, and I wasn't to get paid most of the money till the building was finished. So I had to borrow. Well, the bank agreed to finance me along, and I went ahead and put all my cash in the building, and some of the bank's, and then with the building half finished the bank gets cold feet.

They wouldn't go on financing me and lending me more money, and they wanted back what they'd lent me already. What? Oh, yes, they can do that to you, and all you can do is go broke and like it. That's the law; you look it up.

So I was feeling very happy and also very sore as I walked down the hall to my office. And who do I see leaning against my office door as if he's been there quite a while but Mr. Pintsch, the third vice-president of the bank.

He gave me a shout. "Hello, Mr. M'Gaffin, hello!" he called, very cordial, reaching for me. "Nice to see you again! You're looking well—been on a vacation? We've been thinking of you every day, Mr. M'Gaffin. Being unable to contact you on the phone, I thought I'd step over today and say hello."

"Hello, Pintsch," I said, and walked into my office.

But he followed me. "Take the family with you, did you, Mr. M'Gaffin? How love-ly! I inferred as much from making inquiries at your delightful home in Greenford and it seemed vacant."

"Greenford?" I said. "I used to live there, but I didn't like it. I'm living in the east Bronx now, Beverley Lane."

"Beverley Lane," he said, making a note to go there and put the bite on me.

"Well, Mr. M'Gaffin, now that you're rested, shall we talk business?"

"No," I said. "I have retired from business."

"How love-ly!" he said, reaching for me again. Either he was going to be my best friend or get a rupture. "That you are so well off you can retire! I am sure you have made arrangements to take care of the fifty thousand dollars you owe the bank."

"No."

"How? I don't understand, Mr. M'Gaffin."

"Yes, you do too, Pintsch!" I said, letting out at him. "I told you backward and forward that if you stopped my credit line with the bank I'd have to stop the building I was putting up and go busted, didn't I? All right, you stopped it, and all right, I am busted! All the money you lent me so far, and all my own money, is sunk in that new building, and the building is stopped and neither of us is ever going to get back a dime!"

"Don't shout, kindly, M'Gaffin," he fin," he said, sweating more. "Just to throw up all and walk away—"

He jumped and took the telephone off me and said, "Don't call the secondhand man yet, kindly, Mr. M'Gaffin. First let me talk to the bank."

I WAS a little late getting back to Beverley Lane that evening because the bank asked me over for a conference.

It took a little time. Maybe you never had to explain to four bankers that this thing of being rich is the bunk and money is the root of all evil, but it is a new idea and they don't get it right off.

There was Mr. Crump, the chairman, who has the say, and Mr. Pintsch and two more. I told them up and down how I argued Mr. Pintsch till I was blue in the face that I would go broke if they stopped financing me as they promised. And now I was broke.

"We are very sorry, Mr. M'Gaffin," said old Crump.

"Not at all," I said happily. "I am liking it! No more worry about my didn't mean to be rough; he forgot himself.

"You can't rub that on me," he said, and I was only afraid bite my nose off. "You can't. Coming around here making remarks about finances and you wouldn't sell your soul! If it wasn't that you got some your side I'd see you in Hal. You jump back in your office eat or change your clothes till us all out of this, the bank and The bank will lend you the mo."

"Well, Mr. Crump," I said, to smile at Mr. Pintsch, "if both of us a great favor, and pa the bank, and you offer me a proposition, perhaps I might be to go back into the cares of bus being rich."

"You scuttler," said Mr. Crump, then he gave Mr. Pintsch a too, and said, "It was never of this bank and never will be chairman of the board to go b word and run out on a custe anybody who thinks different too much on himself. It wou pen if I knew it. From th randums I see we agreed to fin M'Gaffin till he got this bui ished, so we are going to do it fin, get back on the job."

SO I was a little late getting Molly.

The stew was on the stove was in the bathroom soaking the tub and singing like a lark contented. She gave me a ha and I gave her a big hug.

"Put on the war paint, bab while I round up the childre all going over to O'Hara's and Italian Gardens and have carte Rhode Island shore dinn

"But, sweetheart, we can't."

"Who can't afford it?" I said her again. "Baby, I was in bank and everything is jal opened the bag and told me to self; so I am back in busines morrow we will be back in C Do you think if we give Raffi age a ring they can get us in Dudley and James?"

"You mean, sweetheart," s "that we are going back to C We are, for real and true?"

And down she flops and cries on till I had to sit next her an on my lap and hush her and

"Don't feel so bad about Circumstances alter cases, would we be contented if we to be? This is a lovely little we are very happy here, but—

"Oh, Terry, it is a nasty litt she said, spraying tears. "Whe into it two weeks ago and t would have to be here again I nearly died! We are really to that lovely Greenford?"

I went down to the drugstor subcontractors, and I saw Le cop on the street.

"Hello, M'Gaffin," he sai I thought you moved!"

"I did, five years ago," I living in Greenford now."

"Five years?" he said, hard "Don't the time fly! Yes, y five years older, M'Gaffin, look at you; and you've had ries. Five years, is it? What I have. I remember that goodby to you and the miss the street as if it was only weeks."

"Come on! Cut the clowning!"

JAY IRVING

said, beginning to sweat. Well, the office was stuffy, closed two weeks. "The bank changed its policy on loans and we couldn't lend you any more money, but we thought you had ample resources, living in such a beautiful home."

"Like it, do you?" I said. "You can have it. It's mortgaged to the top of the radio antenna on the roof. All that's free and clear on the place is the robins, and you can have them too."

"YOU have filed in bankruptcy, Mr. M'Gaffin?"

"Why would I? I don't need a bath. I'm not going in business again. I will just owe you the money from now on."

"You have got funds hid somewhere!"

"Think so? There's the books. Look and see. Take them with you. The secondhand man don't want them."

"You have a house in the Bronx. We'll grab it."

"Nix on that either, Pintsch," I said. "It's the wife's and always was. . . . Well," I said, "it's been nice to see you! Now excuse me and I will call up the secondhand man and sell him the desks."

I took the telephone.

"This is highly irregular, Mr. M'Gaf-money, or about yours either. Nobody eating on me but my family. I am free and independent and live as I please. A man is a sucker to be rich. Money, gentlemen, is the root of all evil."

"Money is what?" said one, working on his ear.

"Whose money?" said Mr. Crump. "What nonsense!"

"Neither a borrower nor a lender be, gentlemen," I said, and how they liked that slur. "Poor and content is rich enough." And then I spoke them a piece I learned out of the third-grade reader when I was a boy: "Loss of wealth is loss of dirt, sages in all times assert, the happy man's without a shirt!"

"What bosh!" said Mr. Crump.

"Well, it's been nice to see you, gentlemen!" I said, getting up. And then they all began to sweat. Listen, if I stepped out from under and let everything crash, the bank would lose fifty thousand dollars, every nickel.

So they all began to sweat; except Mr. Crump. He jumped up and shoved me against the wall with an arm like the pole of a truck. Mr. Crump is an old man and a rich banker but he used to be a plasterer in his younger days and that's a business gives you arms. He

Compare Pall Mall with your old cigarette

... FOR GENEROSITY

Place a Pall Mall beside your old cigarette. The difference in value is startling. Pall Mall is over 20 per cent longer.

And this longer cigarette brings you not only more tobacco, but the finest tobacco money can buy.

Moreover, you receive a definite service, too, for the additional length travels the smoke further, giving you a noticeably cooler cigarette.

... FOR SMOOTHNESS

The rich smoothness of Pall Mall is the result of re-discovering the almost lost art of BULKING — an old-fashioned, slow, deliberate method for mellowing fine tobaccos.

In BULKING, an unhurried miracle of nature transpires; harsh qualities grow mild, delicate aromas merge, permeating every shred of the superb Pall Mall tobaccos. The result is a mellower, really smoother smoke.

Yourself, try Pall Mall critically!

PLACE YOUR OLD CIGARETTE HERE

You'll see this better cigarette

"WHEREVER PARTICULAR PEOPLE CONGREGATE"

Traitor's Purse

Continued from page 21

of darkness below the row of close-growing poplars that lined one side of the path. He walked very fast and did not open his mouth until they were a good two hundred yards from the window. Finally he sighed.

"Very nicely done, sir," he said with approval. "I didn't know you'd come out until I set eyes on you. It's as well to be careful. We don't want to give a lot of fancy explanations. Once you start that game, it's my experience that you have to go on remembering what you've said for years afterward."

Campion made no specific comment. He grunted noncommittally and pressed on toward the gateway.

As he had hoped, Hutch continued to talk. He revealed a friendly soul and a justifiable pride in his rise to eminence in the force.

"That's why I'm doing this little job myself," he remarked. "It's not that I haven't got half a dozen men I could trust to be both efficient and discreet, but I don't want them to take the risk, don't you see? When it's something unorthodox and a little bit delicate it's the chief's job every time. Don't you agree?"

"Oh, every time," said Campion heartily. He wondered where they were going with such determined speed.

They turned away from Anscombe's house at the end of the drive and plunged off downhill in the opposite direction. Hutch kept to the shadowed side of the street and his long strides were as silent as a ghost's. Most English country towns are picturesque in the moon's eye but this winding hill was like a part of an old fairy story in the cold, yellowish light. Tudor shops with overhanging upper stories and windows like those on a galleon, squeezed prim Queen Anne houses that wore shutters and graceful fanlights. There were mounting blocks and lantern posts at every dozen yards, and through carved archways occasional glimpses of cobbled courts and stone gardens.

It was probably the most hackneyed picture-postcard subject in the world but Campion saw it with the eyes of a child and its charm startled him. The crazy roofs were like witches' hoods huddling together for whispered consultation and the dark windows winked their little panes at him from a bygone world.

Meanwhile, the superintendent's silence became oppressive, and Campion ventured a leading question:

"Why exactly is this trip so delicate?"

"Perhaps that isn't the word I ought to have used," Hutch seemed a little put out, and for a moment Campion was afraid that he had silenced him.

As they turned across a wide market square that might well have decorated any calendar the policeman opened out a little.

"I don't like to talk under windows," he said. "In a place like this everyone knows your voice, let alone your life story. You don't quite understand the position of the Masters in this town, do you?"

"No," said Campion truthfully. "I'm afraid I don't. Most of the offices are hereditary, aren't they?"

"All of them." Hutch appeared to respect the fact. "It's a very interesting survival," he announced, a touch of the professional guide creeping into his voice and mixing oddly with the confidential police low-down which was his natural manner. "Their records go back nearly five hundred years. This is the only example of what you might virtually call a free city in the British Isles—other than London, of course. We're in a funny position, you see, stuck here on a navigable river which yet isn't quite big enough to make us a port."

"Yes, of course," Campion held his breath. They were halfway across the square now and in a moment or two windows would be over their heads again.

"That fellow Pyne," said Hutch, "he called the Masters a glorified municipal council, you may remember. So he can, but if he realized how glorified they are, he'd keep his mouth shut like the rest of us. Do you know, Mr. Campion, there's not a man in this town selling so much as a packet of cigarettes who doesn't do his business solely at the direct discretion of the Masters? They're kings, that's what they are, little kings. Between 'em they own the whole place and the Institute makes 'em rich."

"Why do you think there's no cinema in the whole of Bridge? Because the Masters don't want to alter the character of the town. They own the land, they appoint the magistrates, they control the licenses and it's their say-so. Same with the trippers. You'll never see a charabanc in Bridge although it's the most famous beauty spot in the whole of the southwest. The Masters don't want charabancs. They know their town-folk. In fact they are their town-folk. They're all related—the whole town is related—and charabancs aren't allowed."

He paused in his stride and lowered his voice:

"Of course, being so old and so rich and having all the ancient ceremonial and secrecy and so on, it makes them very powerful. They've got such a pull. They always put up a member of Parliament and they subsidize the chair at one of the universities—oh, they've got a finger in all sorts of pies! They're thick as thieves with the government, and, in fact, I shouldn't be a bit surprised if they weren't one of the most powerful bodies in the whole country in their own quiet way."

"Quiet," Campion repeated the word aloud unconsciously. It was coming back to him, or rather it was all there. He knew it all, just behind the shadow in his mind. The superintendent's urgent words were like a new facet on some old stone that he knew well.

Hutch snorted. "They're quiet all right," he said. "There's never been a meeting of theirs discussed at a tea table, let alone reported in the press. It's amazing what you can keep quiet if it's in your interest to do so. That's why I called our little job tonight delicate. We haven't got too much time either. This way, sir. It's quicker."

He took Campion's arm again as he spoke and drew him down a narrow alleyway between two dark houses whose sugar-loaf roofs bowed to each other overhead.

"This brings us out directly into the Nag's Pykle," he said. "Around here."

Another sharp turn brought them out into the open moonlight again and Campion, still with his new child's eyes, was brought up short before what is perhaps one of the most dramatic natural pictures in England.

A broad road, still paved and flanked with squat houses, rises slowly to the Corn Exchange and the Nag's Head Inn. The hostelry, fourth oldest in the country, is three stories high and its center gable, gallant but drunken, leans appreciably westward, lending the whole structure a note of ancient and irresponsible festivity both laughable and endearing. Behind this, and behind the Corn Exchange and the low tower of St. Nicholas' Church, stands the Nag itself. The bare hill rises up stark and unexpected, like the head of the giant horse it is said to resemble. It is thread-bare limestone and is entirely naked save for the double line of ragged pine trees on the crest which in Bridge are called the Mane. In broad sunlight it is impressive and even menacing, but that night, by the moon, it was breathtaking.

Even the superintendent was tempted to comment.

"Extraordinary formation," he observed. "When you come on it like this you can almost believe the old tale about the bridge. You know that one, don't you? Oh, well, if you don't, it's interesting," he added with some satisfaction. "It shows you how far back the name of the town goes. There's the river mouth behind there, as you know, and that other hill on the opposite bank is called the Manger. It's got a big hollow in the top. You can see it on a clear day. The story goes that there was a great flood here once that cut the town right off from the mainland. There was a terrible famine and no one could put out in a boat because of the storms. Right at the last moment, when everyone was practically dead, the mayor—or local saint or somebody—said his prayers extra strong and lo and behold, 'with a roar like a million drums' the Nag raised his head and shot out his great neck and put his nose in the Manger over on the other side of the river."

"Those who were still strong enough ran along his mane and brought back food for the rest. The Nag kept his head in the Manger until the floods went down and then one night, when everything was quiet and everyone was asleep, like it might be tonight, he drew it very quietly back again. That's the legend of how the town got its name and there's certainly no bridge in the place except the little humpbacked one down by the mill on the Coachingford road."

He laughed a trifle self-consciously.

"I always think of it when I come along here at night," he said. "I like that bit about the 'roar like a million drums.' You can just imagine it, can't you? I don't know that there's much moral to the tale, unless it's that the Nag looks after Bridge. So he does, of course, to this day. Very much so. But it's remarkable how an old tale like that gets handed down. I wonder you hadn't heard it. It's very well known. One of the big composers wrote a bit of music about it. Holst, was it?"

Campion said nothing. The story, coupled with the unexpected sight, was strangely moving. He knew he must be hearing it much as a savage might, or as the early unsophisticated inhabitants of the town must have. It was damnable convincing. He felt quite a thrill of superstitious fear.

Meanwhile, the superintendent's attitude toward him was growing more incomprehensible at every step. He was friendly, not to say obliging, and, moreover, the farther they came the less certain of himself he appeared to be. But where they were going so fast and so secretly remained a complete and utter mystery.

Campion was naturally tempted to begin careful pumping operations but he was alive to all the dangers. He knew so little about anything at all that the most innocent remark could easily prove a disaster. He ventured one little feeler.

"Mr. Aubrey rather expected you to come along earlier this evening," he said.

"I dare say he did, sir," Hutch became an official again. "I had one two things to see to. I'd hardly left Anscombe's house when something else cropped up."

"Oh?" Campion tried to show interest without anxiety and the superintendent rose to the fly.

"I had a call from Coachingford said briefly. 'They're having a bit of a man hunt all around here tonight. As far as I could get it on the telephone, the case seems to have all the usual features, but it's a worry in wartime. The stolen car abandoned on the high road and all the rest of it. They pick him up in the morning when they can see what they're doing. They're circularizing a full description of him, we are, sir, this way.'"

The final announcement was provisional since it covered Campion for a necessary moment. He had started like a cat, he noticed with concern, and had a conviction that his nerves were not usually so unreliable.

They had passed the inn now and had taken a side turning which ran around the eastern base of the Nag. This street was particularly ancient and here the buildings hung together, shrinking in the very sides of the hill. The shop in front of which Hutch had paused was a grocery and in its bow windows the familiar cartons of breakfast food, condensed milk and sugar substitutes looked ridiculous. Such a place should have sold love philters at least.

The superintendent took Campion by the elbow and led him into a minute alleyway which ran down between the shop and its neighbor. This passage was so narrow that they could not walk abreast and at one point, where the wall bulged there was scarcely space for Campion's shoulders. Hutch was treading like a hunter. His tall figure passed like a shadow and his feet made no noise. Campion followed him with equal technique.

At the end of the alley they came to a yard. It was little more than a wall with the Nag rising sheer on one side and the building crowding down upon them on the other.

Hutch produced a torch no larger than a rifle cartridge. Its pin-point beam up a keyhole in a surprisingly modern door set in an ancient frame. A shadow slid into position and the light turned over. They passed inside a spicy, slightly rancid atmosphere of a storeroom. Campion followed the superintendent blindly. His passage had all the actual qualities of dream. He had no idea where he was and velvet dark was warm and faintly esthetic.

They seemed to go on walking some time and his impression was that they were following a narrow path through all kinds of obstacles. Another door brought them to a flight of wooden stairs and a surprising change of atmosphere. It was still warm but the now smelled of paper and floor polish and the gentle, exciting odor of old wood. It was a long climb, and Hutch began to relax some of his elaborate caution.

"We're right in the hill now," he said unexpectedly. "You wouldn't think would you? We'll go right on up to council chamber, shall we? The nothing much down here."

"By all means," Campion spoke gently. He was struggling with incredulity. "Where are we?" he demanded, throwing caution to the winds. "In town hall?"

Hutch laughed. He seemed to take the question as a witticism.

"That's about the size of it, really."

Join the parade!

Replace
with a DELCO
battery

It's millions strong, the procession of car owners who rely on Delco batteries . . . millions strong, and growing every day, as more and more drivers learn about Delco battery's extra starting power—long life—and dependable performance. The news spreads, too, about the new automatic Delco Electro-Level that prevents overfilling . . . that safeguards the satisfaction built into Delco batteries.

Join this parade for quicker starting—increased motoring pleasure—complete battery satisfaction. Then you'll have the battery that is original equipment in 43% of all new cars sold. There is a Delco battery to fit any style, make, size or model of passenger car or commercial vehicle. There is a Delco battery dealer near you.

Be sure to register your new Delco battery with your car dealer or Delco battery dealer. Delco batteries are distributed nationally under the direction of United Motors Service.

Delco-Remy

World's Largest Manufacturer of Automotive Electrical Equipment

For '41 - Finest W

With this advertisement, Buick ushers in a brand-new automobile model year.

1940 production is history — recording the greatest manufacturing and selling season our company has ever known.

You may be sure we grimly realized we had to accomplish things in our new cars for 1941 that we could count on to continue our advance.

You don't stand still in this business. You go ahead or you fall back. And we're putting in what it takes to keep us on the march.

So, on top of the $42,000,000 spent on our plants and machines these last four years we've added another $10,000,000 in new facilities.

We've dreamed and schemed the last twelve months in our experimental and engineering divisions sucking fertile brains for new ideas and new values.

We've taken our greatest all-time car and steadily and carefully

Under the sleek fantail there's more room for luggage, made more usable by upright mounting of the spare.

More ROOM
—from longer, broader bodies

More POWER
—from stepped FIREBALL engines brought it forward to a perfection of action, ease, goodness beyond anything ever offered under our name.

We honestly mean that, as you will see when you look it over — more, when you drive it — most of all, when it serves you as your very own.

It's hard to picture the new 1941 Buicks fairly with old adjectives.

ONLY CAR IN THE WORLD WITH ALL THESE FEATURES

BUICK FIREBALL VALVE-IN-HEAD ENGINES—115, 125 and 165 horsepower. Higher compression, better combustion, greater economy from design that makes the most of modern fuels.

MICROPOISE BALANCING AFTER ASSEMBLY—engines with less vibration per ounce than a fine wrist watch.

COIL SPRINGS ALL AROUND—no lubrication, no spring covers, no breakage, softer ride.

"MASS-STREAM" BODIES, BIGGER, ROOMIER—Unisteel Bodies by Fisher with concealed running boards and hidden hinges on all doors.

COMPOUND CARBURETION—reserve twin-barrel carburetor that cuts in as needed; greater brilliance with 30-mile economy at 50-mile speed.

PERMI-FIRM STEERING—freedom from steering wheel play over three or four times the usual service period.

DUREX MAIN BEARINGS—mechanical and chemical bond between babbitt and backing plate; practically indestructible in normal service.

FORE-N-AFT DIRECTION SIGNAL (Automatic Cut-Off)—with rear signal flush-mounted in fender.

MASSIVE BUMPERS—four front and two rear bumpers; built-in front license frame, and gravel guards front and rear.

PLUS: Full-Length Torque in Sealed Chassis ★ Tiptoe Hydraulic Brakes ★ One-Piece "Lift-Off" ★ Easier, Quieter Concentric Steering ★ Built-In Automatic Choke ★ Duty Oil Bath Air Cleaners ★ Saver Fan and Water Pump ★ Matched Connecting Rods ★ Beam Headlights ★ Two-Tone Colors ★ Safety Plate Glass All Around

THE FIREBALL* DOES IT!

Modern gasolines have high octane ratings to permit higher compressions without "ping." Note how this piston, which can be used only in valve-in-head engines, rolls the fuel charge into the shape of a flattened ball that centers around the new, smaller, racing-car type spark plug. Fired at its very heart, this more highly compressed fuel lets go with such full-forced, "ping-free" wallop that any gasoline of 75 octane rating (now available at standard-fuel prices) may be used in the 115-hp. engine. Any fuel of 80 octane rating serves in the 125- and 165-hp. engines.

*According to the Encyclopaedia Britannica, a super meteor which travels with a great explosion like the shock waves of a great projectile is called a "FIREBALL."

e Done!

COMFORT
m softer,
ier ride

More VALUE
—any way you measure it!

WHEN BETTER AUTOMOBILES ARE BUILT BUICK WILL BUILD THEM

Every car in all five series of the whole new line deserves unused fresh-minted language.

Styewise, their suave and dynamic beauty refreshes the jaded eye as would sight of a hydrant in the desert.

They move and function like young wild things. They're all grace and poise and eagerness. They bring to driving and handling a keener pleasure and a new thrill.

Go see these superb new cars at your dealer's
—they make plain why Buick is rightly called “exemplar of General Motors value.”

Ask especially about the new micropoisebalanced FIREBALL engines—the 1941 furtherance of Buick's Dynaflex design and kingpin of all the features that make Buick the sensation of the new automobile year.

COOL SHAVES

bat "1000" against razor burn and sting!

If your morning shave leaves your face hot and stinging, you're a candidate for Ingram's cooling, soothing, quicker shaves!

Mister, the minute my soothing lather touches your face you know it is really different! For it's COOL—purposely planned COOL—to help condition your face for shaving as it wilts those wiry whiskers!

Yes, sir! And all the time you are shaving you feel that bracing Ingram's Coolness... as billowing brushfuls of rich, creamy lather help you to get just about the quickest, most comfortable shave you ever had!

UNTIL you know Ingram's... until you've felt the soothing touch of Ingram's cool and bracing lather... you don't know how free from irritation your morning shave can be!

Switch to Ingram's now. You'll get cooler, smoother, quicker shaves. Your skin actually looks more attractive... and your face feels a bracing freshness you've probably never known before! No lotion ever needed!

Get Ingram's today—in the tube or jar. You get the same face-freshening, penny-saving cream in both. And both help you get the quick, comfortable shaves you've always wanted!

INGRAM'S SHAVING CREAM

IN TUBE OR JAR

isn't it?" he said. "The Masters run the show in Bridge, not the officials in Basket Street. At one time, you know, this used to be the only administrative headquarters in the town. I believe they used to hold the courts in the council chamber. The whole place is formed from the natural caves in the hill. The air shafts are artificial but they're prehistoric."

"Is this the only entrance?" inquired Campion faintly.

"NOT likely." Hutch paused in his stride. "You know about that, surely? Excuse me, sir, but don't you read your guidebook? I thought everyone knew about the doors of Bridge, as they call them. It's one of the features of the place. It's my opinion that it's those four doors which give the Masters their peculiar fanciful quality. In the old days it served as a fortress, and stood a long siege in the Jacobite rebellion. But those four doors, each one marked by an innocent-looking house, give it a sort of romantic touch, if you see what I mean."

"What houses?" inquired Campion, who appeared to have given up subterfuge.

"Well, there's the pub for one." Hutch was torn between astonishment and delight at the discovery of such ignorance. "The old Nag's Head is built across the main door. You can see it in the big back room, a lovely bit of carved wood. Takes up all one side. That's the ceremonial entrance where the Masters go in on a meeting night. Then there's the gate house, where Mr. Peter Lett lives. He's the hereditary gatekeeper. That door leads out of his drawing room and isn't often used. His house is around the other side, in the Haymarket Road."

"The third door is off the rectory. It's in a sort of gallery there, next the church. And the fourth lies behind the Wain House, farther off down the street. Mr. Philips, who is the hereditary groom, lives there. It's all very old-world and out of the ordinary, if you come to it new, but of course when you're as used to it as we are you don't see anything in it. It's just a custom, that's all."

Campion felt an absurd desire to sit down on the stairs. He wondered vaguely if all ancient history sounded as picturesque as this when it was heard for the first time, and, if so, if most children lived in this perpetual state of astonishment.

"We came in by a fifth door, then," he murmured.

"We came in by the back door," said Hutch firmly. "Not many people know about it and I dare say it's comparatively recent—not above seventy years old perhaps. Like everybody else the Masters have to have cleaners and they have to have goods delivered. I imagine they must have bought the shop at some period and installed a caretaker there. It's an old-fashioned business. It's been in the same family for years. I came in that way tonight because it seemed safest. I don't want to have to give a lot of explanations and I'm sure you don't."

This is the last step, sir. Now to your right."

He produced a larger torch as spoke and Campion was startled by the height of the gallery in which they stood. It seemed to have no ceiling but to go up and up into infinity. There was a pleasant, dull sound of wood on wood and then a great rush of cool air as it passed into the room within.

Hutch swept a broad beam of light around them and Campion stepped back. The place was enormous. He received a confused impression of black panels, the lower halves of mighty pictures, the length portraits of heroic size, and, overhead, canopies of ragged banners, so bright and gallant after their passage down the centuries. The centerpiece turned out somewhat tamely to be a table. It was a mighty affair of glistening black oak and it fitted snugly on a carpet which must have been nearly the size of a tennis court. Twelve chairs encircled it and at the head before a seat larger than the others, was a pile of papers and a very prominent water bottle and glass.

The silence was remarkable. It lay over them like a smothering pall. There was not a breath anywhere, not a crack of shrinking wood, not a scurry of dust upon the stone floor, nothing. Hutch sighed deeply.

The man's words when they arrived, however, took him completely by surprise.

"Well, sir." He sounded a trifle breathless. "Here you are. I've risked my warrant to get us in and I hope you'll forgive me if I ask you to do whatever you have to do done as soon as possible, so we can get out before the light. I don't like to think what would happen if we got caught. No one would lift a finger for us. But you know that even better than I do, I expect."

CAMPION did not move. The man who dries up center stage in the middle of the big scene and who stands there blankly with the urgent silence growing more acute as every second feels much as he did then.

His first coherent thought was a more terrifying, however. Since he had evidently engineered this illegal entry himself, and had apparently persuaded a superintendent of police to break the dearest law in the British constitution in order to achieve it, it must obviously have some vital importance and he himself must possess much more than ordinary influence. There was something he had to do here, more probably something he had to find out, and there was no knowing what stupendous machine hung upon his success. Already it was long past midnight. The morning of the fourteenth had begun. The fifteenth far as he knew, was zero hour.

It came to him that he must lay cards on the table and take the consequences. He turned to Hutch, prepared to speak, but as the first difficulty was formed in his mind the superintendent began again.

"I don't like to criticize," he said in apology making the reproach a hunt.

Wood Splitter

CROCKETT JOHN

TOMORROW'S DRIVING WILL BE

Fluid Driving!

AN INVITATION

IF YOU WANT a new experience, a new sensation in driving, here's an invitation of the utmost interest.

The Dodge, DeSoto and Chrysler dealers of America invite you to try one of motoring's great advances of recent years . . . Fluid Driving!

In terms of engineering, Chrysler Corporation's Fluid Drive is simplicity itself. Yet it creates such an amazing new kind of performance that the only way to know its results is to try it.

Fluid Driving is smooth as oil because it literally is a drive through oil. It banishes jerks and jars. It makes driving so easy, so simple, so completely effortless that it becomes an entirely new experience. As one man puts it, "You just say when, where and how fast . . . the car does the rest!"

Yet, even that description can't give you the complete idea of Fluid Driving. Smoothness and driving ease are sensations; they really can't be described, they must be felt!

Fluid Drive was introduced to the public in 1938 on the higher-priced Chrysler cars. It has behind it today the proof of millions of miles and many thousands of delighted owners.

For 1941, Fluid Drive will be available on models of Dodge and DeSoto as well as on all Chrysler cars. And Dodge, DeSoto and Chrysler dealers are making special arrangements to accommodate the many who will want to experience Fluid Driving.

Watch for announcements of the arrival in your city of 1941 Dodge, DeSoto and Chrysler cars with Fluid Drive. Then accept our invitation to drive one. There is no obligation.

Just one short ride will reveal the advantages of Fluid Drive more clearly than any words . . . it will show you why this revolutionary development foretells that tomorrow's driving will be Fluid Driving!

FLUID DRIVE
AVAILABLE ON 1941
DODGE, DE SOTO AND CHRYSLER CARS

YOU GET THE GOOD THINGS FIRST FROM CHRYSLER CORPORATION!

"Look," said Elsie, "you're turning green!"

"YES," SAID ABIGAIL, the cow on the other side of the fence. "I am turning green. What of it?"

"Well—er—" stammered Elsie, the Borden cow. "Isn't it a bit unusual?"

"Not at all," Abigail replied. "I often turn green when I'm jealous. It's what people call turning green with envy."

"What are you envious of?" inquired Elsie.

"You," said Abigail. "I'm envious of the clean, tidy barn you live in. I'm jealous of the way that young veterinarian checks up on your health. And I do wish someone was as careful about the purity of my milk as all those Borden folks are of yours."

"They might be," said Elsie rather tactlessly, "if your milk went into as many important products as mine."

"Like what?" snapped Abigail, for every cow has her pride.

"Oh, like cheese," said Elsie. "Chateau. Borden's celebrated cheese food, is made from my rich milk, you know. It's delicious—a secret blend combined with rare, old, aged cheese. And though others have tried hard to imitate its flavor, they haven't got anywhere."

"I never got anywhere, either," sighed Abigail, "not even as far as the village store."

"That's a shame," sympathized Elsie. "If you had, you'd have seen, incidentally, two of my famous canned products on the shelf."

"What are they?" Abigail asked.

"One is Borden's Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk," Elsie replied. "Cooks who know their cookies always make them with Eagle Brand. It's magic for candies and cake frostings, too."

Abigail turned a deeper shade of green, about the color of a well-dressed bull frog, as Elsie continued:

"And my Borden's Irradiated Evaporated Milk is digestible and rich in Vitamin D that doctors of recommend it for infant formulas. It also makes serole dishes and whipped potatoes fit for a gourmet.

Abigail, now green as a traffic light, said: "You almost got me licking my chops."

"I will have you licking them," declared Elsie, "when you hear about Borden's Ice Cream. It's the smoothest, creamiest, most delicious thing that ever melted your tongue. Wise men have been known to write poems about it."

"William Wordsworth, if I remember my poem," smiled Abigail, "said that he could write a poem about glue."

"Indeed, he might have," Elsie countered, "if he knew about Borden's Casco Glue. It's made out of casein extracted from my milk. It's such good glue you can use it for the heaviest jobs or for delicate work on things like ship models."

"And I suppose because it never comes unstuck, you're terribly stuck up about it," laughed Abigail.

"I am proud of it," said Elsie. "I'm proud of everything Borden's make...it's so good. We sure live up to our motto."

"What motto?" asked Abigail.

"That one," cried Elsie, pointing to a big sign painted on the barn... "if it's Borden's, it's GOT to be good."

See Elsie in her Cow Boudoir at the Borden Building, New York World's Building.

more poignant in the circumstances, "and I know men in your position have to keep their mouths shut, just as a question of policy, don't think it would have made things easier if your department had seen the trust the chief constable and myself with just a little more information? I can see how it is. We're quite folded, aren't we? We're instructed to give you every assistance, every assistance no matter what you ask, and so will, but it would make things simpler if we had just a glimmer of what were up to."

He paused hopefully but, when the constable before him did not reply, went on restlessly:

"OK, at that business this evening, for instance. I haven't been on the job for close on thirty years without being able to recognize a corpse which has been slugged when I see one. But what am I to do? There's a ready-made hole there and we've got a young constable. If I shut down on the inquiry I let the whole investigation collapse without any trouble. But am I right in that? Is it in the country's interest to have it nothing to do with the case? I don't know. I'm asking you. I'm in a dark. I gave you every opportunity you didn't give me any lead."

Campion pulled himself up as the ground gave way at his very feet. "I can't tell you," he said helplessly. "Do you understand? I am simply unable to tell you."

Hutch stiffened. He was like a soldier under attention.

"Very good, sir," he said. "I'm in your debt. Carry on."

Campion took the torch from him and moved toward the table. It seemed a very obvious thing to do. As he came up to it, its enormous size became more apparent and panic seized him as he looked across that vast expanse of shin-wood. It was so empty, so utterly formative.

He glanced toward the papers neatly arranged before the main chair and exchanged his first ray of hope. They were not all the usual blanks. On the table the pile was a fold of foolscap headed "Agenda." Anscombe had written his last duty for the Masters.

The light of the torch he read the items down for discussion at the meeting. It began archaically with "Prayers to Almighty God," went on to the orthodox "Senior Master's Opening Remarks," "Minutes of Last Meeting," and "Correspondence." But the third entry was more unusual. "Ceremony of the Bale of the Bale," it stated simply, and continued, "though the one were the counterpart of the other, 'Report on the New Sewerage System for the Lower Town, Temporarily Suspended by War.' The 'Minute Report' followed, and the fifth recorded 'Extraordinary Council: Election of John Robert Anscombe, Mayor.'"

The sixth heading brought Campion short, his brows rising as he read the characterless copperplate. "Suggested Purchase from the Government of the French," it ran briefly. "Island of Malaguama. 950,000,000."

The somewhat staggering project brought him to the foot of the page and he read it casually, unprepared for further statement, but there, staring at him and in the same childish hand, was another consideration for the Master of Bridge.

"Win Business of the Evening," he read, and saw underneath it, in a large, easily drawn circle in red ink, the number figure 15.

He folded the sheet, put it back into the tin and stepped back. His knees were trembling. It was all here, he felt certain, all under his hand, and yet he could not recognize it. The other half of the talisman was lying just out of his reach in the monstrous darkness of his own brain.

Hutch remained stiffly at his side. Campion peered around him in the gloom.

"There are other rooms, of course?" "This is the only actual habitable room, sir. The others are only caverns. They go right on down to the Trough."

"The Trough?" "Yes, sir. That's the local name of the big cave on the estuary bay. It runs a long way under the hill and the old river road leads past it. At one time it used to be a great place for picnics and so on, but the water comes right up to the entrance at high tide and there were so many cases of people getting caught down there that the Masters declared it shut and ran a railing across the entrance, which isn't very wide. A place like that gets very dirty and untidy if you leave it open to the public."

"I suppose so. Can you get down to it from here?"

"I don't know, sir. No one's allowed in here, you see. I don't think you can. As far as I know you can get on to a sort of gallery which looks down into the Trough, but I don't think there's any way down from that. When I was a boy we used to dare one another to get up into the Masters' storerooms, but it was a terrific climb and you needed a rope. We never got very far."

"I see. I'd like to go on a bit, though. Is that possible?"

"It's possible, sir." Hutch did not add that it was also insane in his opinion.

A new doggedness had come over Campion and he hunched his shoulders. "We'll have to risk it," he said.

They found the way by considering the formation of the cavern in which the chamber was set and came at first to an astonishingly efficient furnace room with a chimney built up through a prehistoric air shaft in the hill. From there they passed on into a passage which had been roughly lined at some much earlier period, and thence an iron ladder took them down into the Masters' storerooms.

These long caverns were unexpectedly well ventilated and they confirmed Campion's suspicions that the whole Nag was nothing less than a fortress, probably dating back to Neolithic times.

A BRIEF inspection disclosed that the main use to which the Masters put their space was for the storage of wine. A smile appeared on the superintendent's strained face as he looked at them.

"They must have done themselves proud for generations," he said. "I bet there's a fortune here. As a matter of fact they do own vineyards all over the world, I've heard."

Campion did not comment.

At the end of the gallery the entrance to the next cavern was small and had been boarded up at some time. Hutch ran his torch beam over the edges of the torn wood lying in a neat pile on the uneven floor.

"This hasn't been down long," he remarked. "They've been making room for more liquor, I suppose."

It certainly looked like it. It seemed hardly credible, but the thin shafts from the superintendent's two torches disclosed pile upon pile of small packing cases, each sealed and labeled with a grower's name and burnt with the same hieroglyphics.

Hutch gaped. "There's a cargo of it," he said, sounding thoroughly shocked. "A perishing cargo. Hallo sir, what's the matter?"

Campion had paused in the middle of a step. His body had become rigid and he stood immovable, his head raised.

"Listen," he whispered.

(To be continued next week)

ALPHONSE AND GASTON AT THE BEACH

Copyright, 1940, by Kellogg Company

Join the "Regulars" with
KELLOGG'S ALL-BRAN

I'd spent my all to be a bridesmaid . . .

... and don't think I begrudged a penny, for the dresses and the hats that Mary chose for us were the loveliest I'd ever seen. And the ushers (especially one!) were answers to a maiden's prayer! But the day of the wedding, my dear -- I awoke with one of those logy, sickish headaches!

I didn't know of anything that would clear it up in time, but Anne, the maid, recommended Sal Hepatica. She said it gave fast, two-way help. And it did!*

Soon, my head coming out of that fog, my pep returning fast, I was off for the most exciting day of my life. Wedding reception (I caught the bouquet!), dancing (with The usher cutting in every minute) and ... but I haven't time for more now. Only this -- Sal Hepatica is a marvelous, quick-acting laxative! And it's grand good-times insurance!

*The reason Sal Hepatica helps so fast is -- First, it's speedy yet gentle in its laxative action. Second, Sal Hepatica helps counteract excess gastric acidity -- chases away that sickish feeling.

SAL HEPATICA

for a faster come-back

TUNE IN! Abbott and Costello—laughs, music—Wed. at 9 P. M., E. D. S. T.

The Patriotic Murders

Continued from page 14

moderately good-looking, and I've got a lot of influential friends—and none of those unfortunate disabilities they talk about so freely in the advertisements nowadays. I can get along all right without manners."

"I'm not in the mood for small talk, Jane," Raikes said. "I guess I'll take myself off."

He got up, nodded curtly to Poirot and strode away.

Jane Olivera stared after him.

Poirot said, with a sigh, "Alas, the proverb is true. When you are courting, two is company, is it not, three is none?"

"Courting? What a word!" Jane said.

"But, yes, it is the right word, is it not? For a young man who pays attention to a young lady before asking her hand in marriage? They say, do they not, a courting couple?"

She turned suddenly to Poirot.

"I want to apologize to you. I made a mistake the other day. I thought you had wormed your way in and come down to Exsham just to spy on Howard. But afterward Uncle Alistair told me that he had definitely asked you because he wanted you to clear up this business of that missing woman—Sainsbury Seale. That's right, isn't it?"

"Absolutely."

"So I'm sorry for what I said to you that evening. But it did look like it, you know. I mean—as though you were just following Howard and spying on us both."

"Even if it were true, Mademoiselle—I was an excellent witness to the fact that Mr. Raikes bravely saved your uncle's life by springing on his assailant and preventing him from firing another shot."

"You've got a funny way of saying things, M. Poirot. I never know whether you're serious or not."

"At the moment I am very serious, Miss Olivera," Poirot said gravely.

Jane said, with a slight break in her voice, "Why do you look at me like that? As though—as though you were sorry for me?"

"Perhaps because I am sorry, Mademoiselle, for the things that I shall have to do so soon. . . ."

"Well, then—don't do them!"

"Alas, Mademoiselle, but I must. . . ."

She stared at him for a minute or two, then she said, "Have you—found that woman?"

"Let us say—that I know where she is."

"Is she dead?"

"I have not said so."

"She's alive, then?"

"I have not said that either."

JANE looked at him with irritation. She exclaimed, "Well, she's got to be one or the other, hasn't she?"

"Actually, it is not quite so simple."

"I believe you just like making things difficult!"

"It has been said of me," admitted Hercule Poirot.

Jane shivered. She said, "Isn't it funny? It's a lovely warm day—and yet I suddenly feel cold. . . ."

"Perhaps you had better walk on, Mademoiselle."

Jane rose to her feet. She stood for a minute irresolute. "Howard wants me to marry him," she said abruptly. "At once. Without letting anyone know. He says—he says it's the only way I'll ever do it—that I'm weak—and he—he's thinking of joining that International Corps to fight." She broke off, then with one hand she gripped Poirot's arm with surprising strength. "What shall I do about it, M. Poirot?"

"Why ask me to advise you? They are those who are nearer!"

"Mother? She'd scream the house down at the bare idea! Uncle Alistair? He'd be cautious and prosy. Plenty of time, my dear. Don't rush into a hasty war marriage. Got to make quite sure you know. Bit of an odd fish—a young man of yours. No sense in rushing things—"

"Your friends?" suggested Poirot.

"I haven't got any friends. Only a silly crowd I drink and dance and use inane catchwords with! Howard's the only real person I've ever met."

"Still—why ask me, Miss Olivera?"

"Because you've got a queer look on your face—as though you were sure about something—as though you knew something—that—that was—clearing. . . ." She stopped. "Well," she demanded. "What do you say?"

Hercule Poirot slowly shook his head.

WHEN Poirot reached home, General Japp said, "Chief Inspector Japp is here, sir."

Japp grinned in a rueful way as Poirot came into the room.

"Here I am, old boy. Come around and say 'Aren't you a marvel? How do you do it? What makes you think of these things?'"

"All this meaning—? But perhaps you will have some refreshment? Perhaps the whisky?"

"The whisky is good enough for me. A few minutes later he raised his glass, observing, "Here's to Hercule Poirot who is always right!"

"No, no, mon ami."

"Here we had a lovely case of suicide. H. P. says it's murder—wants it to be murder—and dash it all, it is murder!"

"Ah? So you agree at last?"

"Well, nobody can say I'm wrong-headed. I don't fly in the face of evidence. The trouble was there was any evidence before."

"But there is now?"

"Yes, and I've come around to the amend honorable, as you call it."

"I am all agog, my good Japp."

"All right. Here goes. The point is that Frank Carter tried to shoot Poirot with on Saturday is a twin pistol to one that killed Morley!"

Poirot stared. "But that is extraordinary!"

"Yes, it makes it look rather interesting for Master Frank."

"It is not conclusive."

"No, but it's enough to make us consider the suicide verdict. They're foreign make of pistol and rather uncommon one at that!"

Hercule Poirot stared. His eyes looked like crescent moons.

He said at last, "Frank Carter? Surely not!"

Japp breathed a sigh of exasperation. "What's the matter with you, Poirot? First you will have it that Morley murdered and that it wasn't suicide. Then when I come and tell you you're inclined to come around to your own hem and haw and don't see like it."

"You really believe that Morley murdered by Frank Carter?"

"It fits. Carter had a grudge against Morley. He came to Queen Charlotte Street that morning—and he pretended afterward that he had come along to tell his young woman he'd got a job but we've now discovered that he'd got the job then. He didn't get later in the day. He admits that. So there's lie No. 1. He can't account for where he was at twenty-five twelve onward. Says he was waiting for her."

the Marylebone Road, but the first he can prove is having a drink in at five past one. And the barman he was in a regular state, his hand and his face as white as a sheet!"

Hercule Poirot sighed.

The door opened softly and George murmured deferentially, "Excuse me, but..."

He got no further. Miss Gladys Nevill thrust him aside and came agitatedly to the room. She was crying.

"Oh, M. Poirot—" she began.

"Here, I'll be off," said Japp hurriedly.

He left the room precipitately.

Gladys Nevill paid his back the tribute of a venomous look.

"That's the man—that horrid inspector from Scotland Yard—it's he who has picked up a whole case against poor Frank."

"Now, now, you must not agitate yourself."

But he has. First they pretend that they tried to murder this Mr. Blunt and are content with that they've accused him of murdering poor Mr. Morley."

Hercule Poirot coughed. He said, "I know, down there, you know, at Exsham, the shot was fired at Mr. Blunt."

"But even if Frank did—did do a horrible thing like that—and he was one of those Imperial Shirts, you know—"

"...march with banners and have a ridiculous salute rather like Heil Hitler, of course, I suppose Mr. Blunt's was a very notorious Jewess, and they just work up these poor young men—quite harmless ones like Frank—until they think they are doing something wonderful and patriotic."

"That Mr. Carter's defense?" asked Hercule Poirot.

"No, no. Frank just swears he didn't do anything and had never seen the man before. I haven't spoken to him, of course—they wouldn't let me—but I got a solicitor acting for him and he told me what Frank had said. Frank says it's all a frame-up."

POIROT murmured, "And the solicitor is of the opinion that his client had no other think of a more plausible story?"

"Lawyers are so difficult. They won't say anything straight out. But it's the other charge I'm worrying about. Oh! Poirot, I'm sure Frank couldn't have done it. Mr. Morley. I mean really—he has no reason to."

"It's true," said Poirot, "that when he came around that morning he had not got a job of any kind?"

"Well, really, M. Poirot, I don't see any difference that makes."

But his story was that he came to tell you about his good luck. Now, it seems, he had as yet had no luck. Why, then, did he come?"

"Well, M. Poirot, the poor boy was dispirited and upset, and to tell the truth I believe he'd been drinking a little. Poor Frank has rather a weak head—and the drink upset him and so he felt like—like making a row, and he came around to Queen Charlotte Street to have it out with Mr. Morley, because, you see, Frank is awfully sensitive and it had upset him a lot to feel that Mr. Morley disapproved of him, and was what he called poisoning my mind."

"So he conceived the idea of making a scene in business hours?"

"Well—yes—I suppose that was his idea. Of course, it was very wrong of Frank to think of such a thing."

Poirot looked thoughtfully at the tearful, blond young woman in front of him. He said, "Did you know that Frank Carter had a pistol—or a pair of pistols?"

"Oh, no, M. Poirot. I swear I didn't. And I don't believe it's true, either."

Poirot shook his head slowly in a perplexed manner.

"Oh! M. Poirot, do help us. If I could only feel that you were on our side—"

"I do not take sides. I am on the side only of the truth," Poirot said.

AFTER he had got rid of the girl, Poirot rang up Scotland Yard. Japp had not yet returned but Detective Sergeant Beddoes was obliging and informative.

The police had not as yet found any evidence to prove Frank Carter's possession of the pistol before the assault at Exsham.

Poirot hung up the receiver thoughtfully. It was a point in Carter's favor.

He had also learned from Beddoes a few more details as to the statement Frank Carter had made about his employment as gardener at Exsham. He stuck to his story of a secret-service job. He had been given money in advance and some testimonials as to his gardening abilities and had been told to apply to Mr. MacAlister, the head gardener, for the post. His instructions were to listen to the other gardeners' conversations and sound them as to their "red" tendencies, and to pretend to be a bit of a "red" himself. He had been interviewed and instructed in his task by a woman who had told him that she was known as Q.H.56 and that he had been recommended to her as a strong anti-Communist. She was a red-haired lady with a lot of make-up on.

Poirot groaned. He was tempted to consult Mr. Barnes on the subject.

The last post brought him something

LOWEST PRICES IN HISTORY ON STANDARD LINE
WESTINGHOUSE MAZDA LAMPS

15 watt size . . . . .	only 10¢
25 watt size . . . . .	only 10¢
40 watt size . . . . .	only 13¢
50 watt size . . . . .	only 13¢
60 watt size . . . . .	only 13¢
75 and 100 watt sizes	only 15¢

SILVERED BOWL MAZDA LAMPS

100 watt size . . . . .	only 25¢
150 watt size . . . . .	only 45¢

Longer nights—darker days—children kept indoors—all call for better light, and that means Westinghouse Mazda Lamps, the quality bulbs that give brighter light longer. And here's a tip: for low-cost modernization of home lighting, use light conditioners and Silvered Bowl lamps—Westinghouse Mazda Lamps, of course!

TUNE IN!

Westinghouse "Musical Americana" every Tuesday Night, NBC.

Westinghouse
MAZDA  LAMPS

"The senator feels it's a good way to sneak up on a crowd"

THURSTON GENTRY

KNOX announce

TAPESTRY TONES

Exclusive new Knox contra-color combinations of deep shades in Band and Felt.

Loomed hues of rare old Flemish tapestries inspire these deep harmonious contrasts, and create a new color-art in hats for men . . . soft, glowing tones of felt are heightened by richer warmth in differing keys of silk. The effects blend subtly with the favored colors of the new season.

In THE "FIFTH AVENUE SPECIAL", Tapestry Tones give special distinction to the last word in the vogue of the up-curved brim, with suavely tapered crown, shaped to a single centered crease . . .

$5

the hat styles for fall . . .

"FIFTH AVENUE" in Grotto Blue. Newest of the "Hat of the Avenue", with extra fore-shortened brim refined by exclusive Knox "Crest Edge". . . . $5

THE "OUTLOOK". Tapestry-toned. New brim-edge treatment with wide silk upper binding, gives special distinction to this informal felt for town . . . . $6

THE "SIRDAR". Luxuriously soft casual lightweight with smart narrow turned-under edge. Easily shaped to semi-telescope or conventionally creased crown . . . $7.50

CERTAIN men insist upon enjoying, each season, the selection of a hat that is truly fine and of a special distinction in fashion. . . . Every year more men turn to the smarter shops where they can find the new styles that bear the famous Seal of Knox. . . . They are discovering what thousands of experienced men already know—that if the label is "Knox", the hat is right.

KNOX HATS

KNOX THE HATTER • 452 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK

ING OFFERED BY THE KNOX DEALER IN YOUR COMMUNITY

THE "KING'S RANSOM". Distinguished new flare-brim with style-preserving Custom Edge*; of mellow hand-worked felt with lustrous silken finish. In rich mixed colors . . . $10

"SHAGABOND". Tapestry-toned. New distinctive color in this world-famous Knox hat; soft, casual, carelessly smart. . . . $5

THE "SHAGABOY". New all-weather topcoat-overcoat hat of comfortably soft, shaggy felt in countryside mixed colors; with harmonious mixed-color band . . . . $5

THE "TURRET TOP". Tapestry-toned. New young men's Semi-Sport, in natural-finish felt, with low, rakish telescope crown. Back-swing* brim; contrasting Puggree band. . . . $5 that disturbed him more still—a cheap envelope in an unformed handwriting, postmarked Hertfordshire. Poirot opened it and read:

Dear Sir:

Hoping as you will forgive me for troubling you, but I am very worried and do not know what to do. I do not want to be mixed up with the police in any way. I know that perhaps I ought to have told something I know before, but as they said the master had shot himself it was all right I thought. And I wouldn't have liked to get Miss Nevill's young man into trouble and never thought really for one moment as he had done it. But now I see he has been took up for shooting at a gentleman in the country and so perhaps he isn't quite all there and I ought to say but I thought I would write to you, you being a friend of the mistress, and asking me so particular the other day if there was anything and of course I wish now I had told you then. But I do hope it won't mean getting mixed up with the police because I shouldn't like that and my mother wouldn't like it either. She has always been most particular.

Yours respectfully,
AGNES FLETCHER.

Poirot murmured, "I always knew it was something to do with some man. I guessed the wrong man, that is all."

THE interview with Agnes Fletcher took place in Hertford, in a somewhat derelict teashop, for Agnes had been anxious not to tell her story under Miss Morley's critical eye.

The first quarter of an hour was taken up in listening to exactly how particular Agnes' mother had always been. And if Agnes, now, were to get mixed up with the police in any way, Mum and Dad would probably die of it, because as she'd been saying, they'd always held their heads high, and never had no trouble of any kind with the police.

After this had been repeated with various embellishments several times, Agnes drew a little nearer to the subject of the interview:

"I wouldn't like to say anything to Miss Morley, sir, because it might be, you see, that she'd say as how I ought to have said something before, but me and cook, we talked it over and we didn't see as it was any business of ours, because we'd read quite clear and plain in the paper as how the master had made a mistake in the drug he was giving and that he'd shot himself and the pistol was in his hands and everything, so it did seem quite clear, didn't it, sir?"

"When did you begin to feel different?" Poirot hoped to get a little nearer the promised revelation by an encouraging but not too direct question.

Agnes replied promptly:

"Seeing it in the paper about that Frank Carter—Miss Nevill's young man as was. When I read as he'd shot at that gentleman where he was gardener, well, I thought, it looks as if he might be queer in the head, because I do know there's people it takes like that, think they're being persecuted or something, and in the end it's dangerous to keep them at home and they have to be took away to the asylum. And I thought that maybe that Frank Carter was like that, because I did remember that he used to go on about Mr. Morley and say as Mr. Morley was against him and trying to separate him from Miss Nevill, but, of course, neither of us thought he'd really done anything to Mr. Morley. We just thought it was a bit queer if you know what I mean."

Poirot said, patiently, "What was queer?"

"It was that morning, sir, the morning Mr. Morley shot himself. I'd been wondering if I dared run down and get the post. I was expecting to hear from my gentleman friend who was just off to France. The postman had come but the Alfred hadn't brought up the letter, which he wouldn't do, not unless there was some for Miss Morley or Mr. Morley."

"So I went out on the landing and looked down over the stairs. Miss Morley didn't like us going down to the hall not during the master's business hours but I thought maybe as I'd see Alfred taking in a patient to the master and I'd call down to him as he came back."

Agnes gasped, took a deep breath and went on:

"And it was then I saw him—the Frank Carter, I mean. Halfway up the stairs he was—our stairs, I mean, above the master's floor. And he was standing there waiting and looking down—and I've come to feel more and more as though there was something queer about it. He seemed to be listening very intent, if you know what I mean."

"What time was this?"

"It must have been getting on for half past twelve, sir. And just as I was thinking: There now, it's Frank Carter, and Miss Nevill's away for the day and won't be disappointed, and I was wondering if I ought to run down and tell him because it looked as though that lump of an Alfred had forgot. And just as I was hesitating, Mr. Carter, he seemed to make up his mind, and he slipped down the stairs very quick and went along the passage toward the master's surgery, and I thought to myself the master won't like that, and I wondered if there was going to be a row, but just then Emma called me—said whatever was I up to?—and I went up again and then, afterward, I heard the master had shot himself and, of course, it was so awful it just drove everything out of my head."

"But later, when that police inspector had gone I said to Emma, I said, I didn't say anything about Mr. Carter having been up with the master this morning and she said was he? and I told her and she said well, perhaps I ought to tell, but anyway, I said I'd better wait a bit, and she agreed, because neither of us didn't want to get Frank Carter into trouble if we could help. And then when it came to the inquest and it came out that the master had made that mistake in a drug and really had got the wind-up and shot himself, quite natural like—well, then, of course, there was no call to say anything. But reading that piece in the paper two days ago oh! it did give me a turn! And I said to myself, 'If he's one of those loonies that thinks they're persecuted and go around shooting people, well, then, maybe he did shoot the master after all.'"

Her eyes, anxious and scared, looked hopefully at Hercule Poirot. He put much reassurance into his voice as he could.

"You may be sure that you have done absolutely the right thing in telling me, Agnes," he said.

"Well, I must say, sir, it does take a load off my mind. And then, you see, thought of getting mixed up with the police and what Mother would say. She's always been so particular about us all..."

"Yes, yes," said Hercule Poirot heartily. He had had, he felt, as much from Agnes' mother as he could stand for that afternoon.

POIROT called at Scotland Yard and asked for Japp. When he was taken up to the chief inspector's room: "I want to see Carter," said Hercule Poirot.

Japp shot him a quick, sideways glance. "What's the big idea?"

"You are unwilling?"

"Oh, all right, Poirot, I didn't mean it. What do you want to see Carter for?"

ask him whether he really murdered Morley?"

To Japp's surprise, Poirot nodded his head emphatically.

"Yes, my friend, that is exactly the reason."

"And I suppose you think he'll tell you if he did?"

Japp laughed as he spoke. But Hercule Poirot remained grave. He said, "He might tell me—yes."

Japp looked at him curiously. "You know, I've known you a long time—twenty years? Something like that. But you still don't always catch on to what you're driving at. I know you've got a key in your bonnet about young Frank Carter. For some reason or other, you don't want him to be guilty—"

Hercule Poirot shook his head energetically. "No, no, there you are wrong. It is the other way about—"

"I thought perhaps it was on account of that girl of his—the blond piece. You're a sentimental old buzzard in some ways—"

Poirot was immediately indignant.

"It is not I who am sentimental! That is an English failing! It is in England that they weep over young sweethearts and dying mothers and devoted children. Me, I am logical. If Frank Carter is a killer, then I am certainly not sentimental enough to wish to unite him in marriage to a nice but commonplace girl who, if he is hanged, will forget him in a year or two and find someone else."

"Then why don't you want to believe he is guilty?"

"I do want to believe he is guilty."

"I suppose you mean that you've got a hunch of something that more or less conclusively proves him to be innocent? Why hold it up, then? You ought to say fair with us, Poirot."

"I am playing fair with you. Presently, very shortly, I will give you the name and address of a witness who will be invaluable to you for the prosecution. Her evidence ought to clinch the case against him."

"But then— Oh! You've got me all tangled up. Why are you so anxious to see him?"

"To satisfy myself," said Hercule Poirot.

And he would say no more.

FRANK CARTER, haggard, white-faced, still feebly inclined to bluster, looked on his unexpected visitor with unconcealed disfavor. He said rudely, "So it's you, you little shrimp? What do you want?"

"I want to see you and talk to you."

"Well, you see me all right. But I won't talk. Not without my lawyer."

That's right, isn't it? You can't go against that. I've got the right to have my solicitor present before I say a word."

"Certainly you have. You can send for him if you like—but I should prefer that you did not."

"I dare say. Think you're going to trap me into making some damaging admissions, eh?"

"We are quite alone, remember."

"That's a bit unusual, isn't it? Got your police pals listening in, I've no doubt."

"You are wrong. This is a private interview between you and me."

Frank Carter laughed. He looked cunning and unpleasant.

"COME on!" he said. "You don't take me in with that old gag."

"Do you remember a girl called Agnes Fletcher?"

"Never heard of her."

"I think you will remember her, though you may never have taken much notice of her. She was house-parlor-maid at 58 Queen Charlotte Street."

"Well, what of it?"

"On the morning of the day that Mr. Morley was shot, this girl Agnes happened to look over the banisters from the top floor. She saw you on the stairs—waiting and listening. Presently she saw you go along to Mr. Morley's room. The time was then twenty-six minutes or thereabouts past twelve."

Frank Carter trembled violently. Sweat came out on his brow. He shouted angrily:

"It's a lie! It's a damned lie! You've paid her—the police have paid her—to say she saw me."

"At that time," said Hercule Poirot, "by your own account, you had left the house and were walking in the Marylebone Road."

"So I was. That girl's lying. She couldn't have seen me. It's a dirty plot. If it's true, why didn't she say so before?"

Hercule Poirot said quietly: "She did mention it at the time to her friend and colleague, the cook. They were worried and puzzled and didn't know what to do. When a verdict of suicide was brought in they were much relieved and decided that it wasn't necessary for them to say anything."

"I don't believe a word of it! They're in it together, that's all. A couple of dirty, lying little..."

He trailed off into furious profanity.

When Carter's voice at last ceased, Poirot spoke again, still in the same calm, measured voice:

"Anger and foolish abuse will not help

How to adjust yourself to a shirt

1. DO THIS five hours daily. It builds up shoulders to fit old-shape shirts. An easier way to neat fit is: wear Arrow Shirts, whose exclusive "Mitoga" figure-fit slopes with your shoulders.

2. PUMP YOURSELF FULL of air. This will give you the waist outline of old-shape shirts. A pleasanter way to better fit is: wear Arrow Shirts, the "Mitoga" figure-fit waist curves in, like your waist.

3. USE AN EVENER-UPPER to make arms uniform from shoulder to wrist, to fit the straight sleeves of some shirts. Better still: wear Arrow Shirts; their "Mitoga"-cut arms are tapered like yours.

4. SOLVE EVERYTHING with Arrow Shirts. They have smart Arrow collars, are Sanforized-Shrunk. Get Gordon (oxford) at $2, Hitt and Dale (with non-wilt collars) $2, $2.50. Others, $2 up.

ARROW SHIRTS

Made by Cluett, Peabody & Co., Inc.

Sanforized-Shrunk—a new shirt free if one ever shrinks out of fit

"What's become of my kind of bathing suit?"

HELEN HOKINSON

If You Want the BUY in AUTOMATIC HEATING

SEE YOUR

FAIRBANKS-MORSE DEALER

• Why are sales of Fairbanks-Morse Automatic Coal Burners increasing at a rate greater than almost all other stokers? Because Fairbanks-Morse is the BUY! Quality in every detail at a price much lower than you could expect. Clean, steady, healthful heat at lowest fuel cost. Most convenience—this stoker is so reliable that you almost forget you have a heating plant.

New!

Stok-o-Lite

MEANS
CAREFREE HEATING

The biggest stoker feature of the year. If for any reason an overload condition occurs, and the stoker is prevented from giving you heat, STOK-O-LITE, on the thermostat, instantly gives you a red warning light before the temperature drops. Only Fairbanks-Morse has STOK-O-LITE.

NO MONEY DOWN AS LONG AS 36 MONTHS
TO PAY

GET THE FACTS

Learn how little it costs to have automatic heating the Fairbanks-Morse way. Send for this information-filled booklet, "Live in Comfort." No obligation.

Fairbanks, Morse & Co.
Stoker Division, Dept. 4A9
600 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Please send, without obligation on my part,
FREE booklet on automatic coal burner heat
for my home

Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____

In Canada, address The Canadian Fairbanks-Morse
Company Ltd., Montreal

FAIRBANKS MORSE
Automatic Coal Burners

you. These girls are going to tell their story and it is going to be believed. Because, you see, they are telling the truth. The girl, Agnes Fletcher, did see you. You were there, on the stairs, at that time. You had not left the house. And you did go into Mr. Morley's room."

He paused and then asked quietly, "What happened then?"

"It's a lie, I tell you!"

Hercule Poirot felt very tired—very old. He did not like Frank Carter. He disliked him very much. In his opinion Frank Carter was a bully, a liar, a swindler—altogether the type of young man the world could well do without. He, Hercule Poirot, had only to stand back and let this young man persist in his lies and the world would be rid of one of its more unpleasant inhabitants. . . .

"I suggest that you tell me the truth . . ." he said.

He realized the issue very clearly. Frank Carter was stupid—but he wasn't so stupid as not to see that to persist in his denial was his best and safest course. Let him once admit that he had gone into that room at twenty-six minutes past twelve and he was taking a step into grave danger. For after that, any story he told would have a good chance of being considered a lie.

Let him persist in his denial, then. If so, Hercule Poirot's duty would be over.

Hercule Poirot had only to get up and go.

He leaned forward. He said—and his voice held all the compelling power of his powerful personality:

"I am not lying to you. I ask you to believe me. If you did not kill Morley your only hope is to tell me the exact truth of what happened that morning."

The mean, treacherous face looking at him wavered, became uncertain. Frank Carter pulled at his lip. His eyes went from side to side, terrified, frankly animal eyes.

It was touch and go now. . . .

Then suddenly, overborne by the strength of the personality confronting him, Frank Carter surrendered.

He said hoarsely, "All right then—I'll tell you. And you'd better not let me down now! I did go in. . . . I went up the stairs and waited till I could be sure of getting him alone. Waited there, up above Morley's landing. Then a man came out and went down—a fat man. I was just making up my mind to go—when another man came out of Morley's room and went down too. I knew I'd got to be quick. I went along and nipped into his room without knocking. I was all set to have it out with him. Mucking about, putting my girl against me—damn him—" He stopped.

"Yes?" said Hercule Poirot, and his voice was still urgent—compelling—

CARTER'S voice croaked uncertainly:

"And he was lying there—dead. It's true! I swear it's true! Lying just as they said at the inquest. I couldn't believe it at first. I stooped over him. But he was dead all right. His hand was stone cold and I saw the bullet hole in his head with a hard, black crust of blood around it. . . ."

At the memory of it, sweat broke out on his forehead again.

"I saw then I was in a jam. They'd go and say I'd done it. I hadn't touched anything except his hand and the door handle. I wiped that with my handkerchief, both sides, as I went out, and I stole downstairs as quickly as I could. There was nobody in the hall and I let myself out and went away as fast as I could. No wonder I felt queer."

He paused. His scared eyes went to Poirot.

"That's the truth. I swear that's the truth. . . . He was dead already. You've got to believe me!"

Poirot got up. He said—and his voice was tired and sad, "I believe you."

He moved toward the door. Frank Carter cried out: "They'll hang me—they'll hang me for sure if they know that I was in there."

Poirot said, "Your story has confirmed what I knew to be the truth. You can leave it now to me."

He went out.

He was not at all happy.

HE REACHED Mr. Barnes' house at Ealing at 6:45. He remembered that Mr. Barnes had called that a good time of day.

Mr. Barnes was at work in his garden.

He said by way of greeting, "We need rain, M. Poirot—need it badly."

He looked thoughtfully at his guest. He said, "You don't look very well, M. Poirot."

"Sometimes," said Hercule Poirot. "I do not like the things I have to do."

Mr. Barnes nodded his head sympathetically. "I know."

Hercule Poirot looked vaguely around at the neat arrangement of the small beds. "It is well planned, this garden. Everything is to scale. It is small but exact."

Mr. Barnes said, "When you have only a small place you've got to make the most of it. You can't afford to make mistakes in the planning."

Hercule Poirot nodded. Barnes went on: "I see you've got your man."

"Frank Carter?"

"Yes. I'm rather surprised, really."

"You did not think that it was, so to speak, a private murder?"

"No. Frankly I didn't. What with Amberiotis and Alistair Blunt—I made sure that it was one of these espionage or counterespionage mix-ups."

"That is the view you expounded to me at our first meeting."

"I know. I was quite sure of it at the time."

Poirot said slowly, "But you were wrong."

"Yes. Don't rub it in. The trouble is, one goes by one's own experience. I've been mixed up in that sort of thing so much I suppose I'm inclined to see it everywhere."

Poirot said, "You have observed in your time a conjurer offer a card, have you not? What is called—forcing a card?"

"Yes, of course."

"That is what was done here. Every time that one thinks of a private reason for Morley's death, hey presto—the card is forced on one. Amberiotis, Alistair Blunt, the unsettled state of the country—the war—" He shrugged his shoulders. "As for you, Mr. Barnes, you did more to mislead me than anybody."

"Oh, I say, Poirot, I'm sorry. I suppose that's true."

"You were in a position to know, you see. So your words carried weight."

"Well—I believed what I said. That's the only apology I can make."

He paused and sighed.

"And all the time, it was a purely private motive?"

"Exactly. It has taken me a long time to see the reason for the murder—although I had one very definite piece of luck."

"What was that?"

"A fragment of a conversation. Really a very illuminating fragment if only I had had the sense to realize its significance at the time."

MR. BARNES scratched his nose thoughtfully with the trowel. A small piece of earth adhered to the side of his nose.

"Being rather cryptic, aren't you?" he asked genially.

Hercule Poirot shrugged his shoulders. He said, "I am, perhaps, aggrieved that you were not more frank with me."

"I?"

"Yes."

"My dear fellow—I never had the least idea of Carter's guilt. As far as I knew, he'd left the house long before Morley was killed. I suppose now they've found he didn't leave when he said he did?"

Poirot said, "Carter was in the house at twenty-six minutes past twelve. He actually saw the murderer."

"Then Carter didn't—"

"Carter saw the murderer, I tell you!"

Mr. Barnes said, "Did—did he recognize him?"

Slowly Hercule Poirot shook his head. (To be concluded next week)

"May I ask how you heard of us?"

ROBERT DAY

How to get the "luxury comfort" of the New, Deeper Beautyrest... for only a penny a night!

A page full of truths about mattress-buying

1. "Looks" don't make comfort.

Every mattress looks nice and cozy when it's new. But don't judge a mattress on looks.

For comfort depends on the "insides" of a mattress—nothing else. The New, Deeper Beautyrest has a special kind of mattress construction.

It brings you supreme "luxury comfort"... so wonderfully restful, it thrills you just to lie there... every tired muscle relaxed... on the deepest Beautyrest Simmons ever made.

2. There are two main types of mattress construction.

In the ordinary mattress, the inner springs are tied together by wire. This means the springs can't act independently. As you press some down, others go down too—forming slopes and hollows.

In the radically different Beautyrest, each of the 837 springs yields separately to your hips, shoulders, legs.

Result: you get buoyant support instead of "sag" support. You get supreme comfort no other mattress gives. Know. We make both types: the luxurious Beautyrest and the "ordinary action" mattress.

3. How long should a mattress last?

You don't buy a mattress every day in the week. So you should be extra careful that your mattress keeps its original comfort.

Tests made at the United States Testing Co., Inc. (Certified Test No. 11760) proved that Beautyrest lasted 3 times longer than any of 17 different makes of mattress tested.

So it's no empty promise when we guarantee Beautyrest for 10 years' service.

Based on the tests, however, you can figure on Beautyrest's outlasting the guarantee.

4. Will it keep its shape?

Some mattresses look "down-at-the-heels" after a few years' use. Edges sag and buckle. The mattress never makes up "nice."

Beautyrest has a patented sag-proof edge that keeps the sides firm and resilient always! (Because Beautyrest doesn't "lump up," you need turn it far less. After the first few months, 4 or 5 turnings a year are plenty.)

5. Some mattresses ventilate—some don't.

Make sure the mattress you buy has genuine ventilators—not false ones. If you don't, your mattress may get musty and stale-smelling inside.

Beautyrest has 8 ventilators that really ventilate. They bring in fresh air, and circulate it through the entire mattress. So Beautyrest stays clean, dry, and sanitary.

6. How much should you pay for a mattress?

Yes, some mattresses have a "cheaper" price tag than the New Beautyrest. But if Beautyrest can outlast other mattresses in tests, isn't it likely to be the most economical mattress to buy?

Beautyrest sells for $39.50 (easy payment terms can be arranged). Based on our 10-year guarantee, the price comes down to a penny a night! A penny a night! A penny a night! See it today. And don't accept anything supposed to be as good. For no other mattress can give you all the advantages of Beautyrest.

Beautyrest Box Spring, for use with Beautyrest Mattress, $39.50. Or get the Ace Coil Spring, $19.75.

★ THE GOLD-AND-BLACK COLORS OF MAN O'WAR—ALL-TIME KENTUCKY CHAMPION—NOW STANDING AT FARAWAY FARM, LEXINGTON, KENTUCKY

Cream of Kentucky

THE "DOUBLE-RICH" BOURBON

★ Straight*—FROM THE HEART OF THE BLUEGRASS

Kentucky produces great horses and great whiskies. But only one "Double-Rich" Bourbon—Cream of Kentucky—the world's largest selling straight Bourbon. For "Double-Rich" pleasure, from "Double-Rich" drinks—enjoy this Cream of Kentucky.

Twice Dead

Continued from page 12

een giving the girl presents and Ber-and was sore about it."

The Berrands lived on the second oor. We talked with them. The boy as pleasing and frank-seeming and was out twenty years old. His mother was handsome woman.

"You see any stranger come to Gil-n's that afternoon he got killed?"
Malley asked her.

"I didn't."

"You didn't hear no disturbance?"

"No."

"Was that Gilvin a good neighbor?"

"He was until recently. He used to go it very little and nobody came there.
en, a few months ago, he became en-ely different. He gave noisy parties, d women came up there."

"What women?"

"Well, several. One lady is named rs. Jellis. She's a widow."

HE Nordils lived on the floor above.

The girl was sixteen and pretty.

"You hear any noise the afternoon of e murder?" O'Malley asked the other.

"No."

"Or you didn't see nobody?"

"No."

We knocked on other doors and asked the same questions. Everybody said the me thing. We went to Gilvin's apart-ent. It was two comfortable rooms.

"This guy," O'Malley remarked, "got led with a short piece of pipe. Cops und the pipe here. No fingerprints.
ere's pipe like it in the basement of ts building and in other buildings ound here too."

"O'Malley," I said, "do you appreci-the significance of these circumstances?"

"What?"

"No stranger can have come in here d killed this man," I declared. "He ouldn't have let a stranger behind him that fashion. Besides, consider the ghborhood. Ever since we stopped front of this building, we've been atched. These people are curious about angers. Whoever did this murder is so well known to them that his prese aroused no curiosity."

Yeah? Maybe, maybe not. If these ple knew something they wouldn't a cop. Well, we'll search this place in."

Ve did. Children were watching us
ough the open door.

here was a short shelf of books.
Malley opened one of the books and tter fell out. We read it.

Mr. Gilvin," it said, "you stay away n the girl or something will happen ou." It wasn't signed.

There's your evidence, O'Malley!" I laimed. "If this turns out to be Ber-d's handwriting!"

Yeah? You got a match?"

had one. He burned the paper up.
n the inspector and a couple of plainhes cops came in.

What's going on here?" the inspector
ed.

The cop burned a letter up!" one of children cried.

"What letter?" the inspector asked.

O'Malley explained to him. "The boy didn't kill him, boss," he said.

"No? So you destroy the evidence!
I'll have you put back in uniform."

"Not me. I don't go back into no uniform for any man. I'll quit first."

"That would be satisfactory."

O'Malley gave him his shield.

"O'Malley," I said, when we were in the street, "this is the most foolish thing I've ever known you to do."

"It's a hound's life. I want a drink."

There was a bar on the corner. A small man with eyes set close together was buying himself a drink.

"Have a drink," he invited us.

We had one.

"Have another," he said. He had a large roll of bills.

We sat down at a table.

"O'Malley," I urged, miserably, "don't do this. Go back and see the inspector."

"You tend to your business and I'll tend to mine."

I left him, but I went to headquarters next day to see how the matter stood.
They said he had resigned from the department, so I went looking for him. He was in the bar. He and the man with the close-set eyes and two others were playing cards. He introduced me to them.
The small man was named Eddersen. I talked with the bartender.

"Your friend got canned off the cops," the bartender remarked. "They tell me
he had a quarrel with some other cops.
Well, he was right. Everybody around here knows Jimmie Berrand didn't do no murder. We all like the lad."

I LEFT. But I went back there next day, and the next. O'Malley was always in the bar. Then I stopped going, but two days later he phoned me to meet him there.

"What's up?" I asked.

"Not much. I got tired of this place.
I thought we'd go to a picture. We're taking a lady."

We called for the lady. Her doorbell said "Mrs. Jellis," and she was ready to go with us. She was quite pretty and in her thirties. We went to the theater.
Some plain-clothes cops were in the theater entrance but they didn't speak to us. It was a good picture and there was a train wreck in it. The train went off a high trestle, the way they always do in a picture, and some cars burned.

"We'll go," O'Malley said suddenly.

"Can't we see the end of it?" Mrs. Jel-lis asked.

"Not this time, sister."

We got in a cab, but we didn't take Mrs. Jellis home. We took her to police headquarters. The plain-clothes cops I had seen at the theater were there, and a lot of other cops, and they had the little man Eddersen there and the building owner Averton.

"What's all this, O'Malley?" I demanded. "Are you still on the case?"

"You're dumb. I never got off it."

"Have you learned anything?"

"We got who knocked the guy off.
Averton did."

"Why?"

The Pick of NEW JERSEY

The Pick of PENNSYLVANIA

Copyright 1940 by Tide Water Associated Oil Company

Nature gave them both that EXTRA SOMETHING

LITTLE more need be said of a cranberry than "It comes from New Jersey!" . . . and of an oil "It comes from Pennsylvania!" One Pennsylvania crude oil is noted for an inherent richness of those qualities needed most in lubricating your modern motor. It is the Bradford-Pennsylvania crude from which Veedol Motor Oil is refined exclusively. This top-price Bradford crude imparts to the famous Veedol "Film of Protection"

. . . a tough body that resists break down or burn up from heat and friction . . . a flexible body that constantly seals the most minute clearances to prevent power and fuel waste . . . an economical body that means fewer quarts of oil per month, fewer gallons of gas per week, and fewer dollars of expense per season . . . Pick Veedol and you pick the pick of Pennsylvania!

Ask for VEEDOL Safety-check Lubrication

A PRODUCT OF TIDE WATER ASSOCIATED OIL COMPANY . . . MAKERS OF "FLYING A" GASOLINES

It's an Easy Walk

TO SCHOOL • TO TOWN IN UNIVERSITY STYLED BOSTONIANS

Notes for a Quiz

Q. This September, what's on a college man's mind besides his hat?
A. His Shoes. Being a fast stepper his shoes must fit and feel right.
Q. How does he keep his feet rarin' to go?

A. He wears University-styled Bostonians. They're Walk-Fitted to cushion every curve in action.

Q. What's "University-styled?"

A. When 293,147 college men in 729 schools say "I'll pick this pair"—that makes it an authentic university style.*

Q. Do only college men wear University styles?

A. What a question. They're tops in town, too. *National College Poll, 1940.

BOSTONIAN SHOES • WHITMAN, MASS.

At ease on rail:

PLATEAU (left) a No. 1 University style from Bowdoin to U. S. C. Soft, rugged tweed leather with rubber or leather soles. Plain-toe MARVEL (center) drapes your foot with the greatest of ease. Its Shetland leather accents shaggy fall fabrics. Campus-chosen KENWOOD (right) comes in bootmaker finish.

On the book is college-preferred BERWYN—a wing tip shoe in Bostonians' exclusive Tweed leather.

$7.85 to $11.00

WELLINGTON (left) introduces ox-blood to every Campus. Another Tweed triumph—Tweed GLENDAL (right) wins an "A" for action. Bootmaker finish.

Bostonians

IT RIGHT • FEEL RIGHT they're Walk-Fitted

"We ain't sure. I'll meet you tonight." I waited around and asked questions but I couldn't find out anything, so I left and met O'Malley that night.

"How was it?" I asked.

"We'll eat. Say!" he went on, when we were in the restaurant, "this is a funny one. This Averton that done the murder, and that Gilvin that got knocked off, was business partners. Gilvin's right name was Randers. They was in a real-estate business. About three years ago they got into business troubles and it looked like, without they could raise some more money, they was going to lose all they had. Gilvin knew some people out West that he thought maybe he could get some money from. So him and a guy named Lersing that worked for them went west, but they couldn't get no money.

"THEY were in Kansas City on their way back to New York and were ready to take a train, when Randers decided he'd see one more guy that he hadn't seen because the guy had moved to a little town. He gave Lersing one of his traveling bags to bring back to New York and took the other himself, and he went to that town, but it turned out there'd been a mistake and the guy didn't live there at all.

"So Randers was on his way back to New York, when he read in a newspaper that the train Lersing had took had been wrecked and some cars burned and Lersing and some other people was killed, and some people was burned so they wasn't recognizable. Randers' bag had been found in the wreck with papers in it and it was known him and Lersing were traveling together, and the newspaper said one of the burned-up guys was supposed to be Randers."

"So what?" I inquired.

"Plenty. When Averton and Randers had went into business together quite a few years before, they'd each one had his life insured in favor of the other, the way some partners do, each one for fifty thousand dollars. Randers seen that if the burned-up guy really had been him Averton would collect that money and it would save their business. He had registered at no hotel in the little town where he'd been or give his name to anybody. So when he got to New York, he went to a rooming house where he wasn't known and he give a false name and he called up his partner. He told him if nobody identified the burned-up guy as somebody else, maybe Averton could identify the guy as him and they could get the insurance."

"A strange affair!" I said.

"What's strange? Well, it turned the way they'd planned: Averton and identified the dead guy as Randers and after a while the insurance company paid the insurance. Meanwhile, Randers had went to the West Side and took a couple of rooms and called him Gilvin. He had to meet Averton sometimes to talk about business and it was dangerous to do that, so after a while Averton bought the building where Gilvin had his rooms. Then he could see Gilvin when he went there to collect rents without nobody thinking anything. So it worked out all right except for the thing."

"What thing?" I inquired.

"Gilvin had figured out how to keep dead, but he hadn't figured out how he could ever come alive again. After a while, he got tired of living that way. He began to go out and have a good time and he met Mrs. Jellis and wanted to marry her. He figured half the business belonged to him, and told Averton he had to find some way to give him half and of getting Gilvin out of the country, so him and Mrs. Jellis could go to South America. Averton claimed they tried to do that the whole time but it would be found out and they'd both be in Sing Sing for years to come. So they quarreled about it. Finally, it came to Averton the only solution of the thing was to knock Gilvin off."

"I see. How on earth did you find out?"

"You got a right to ask. There wasn't much clue to it, without we could find out who this Gilvin was. Whoever had killed him had beat him up so that it wasn't possible anyone could ever find

"I never rode a horse before today—or today either!"

GREGORY O'LEARY

Mr. W. Porter Ogelsby, Jr., and son, John, descendants of American Revolutionary heroes, visit Independence Hall, view famous Liberty Bell. Mr. Ogelsby says: "I like everything American, including American food. After a trip I can't wait to get back to a real American cup of coffee—Chase & Sanborn Dated Coffee—rich, delightfully stimulating, golden goodness—finest way to start the day!"

Temple University students visit ancient Betsy Ross House, are thrilled by replica of first American flag. Later at "dorms" they'll talk it all over, over an exciting cup of Chase & Sanborn Dated Drip Grind Coffee—Marvelous coffee... a wonderful college... a great country... they're glad they're American girls!

Chase & Sanborn's "friendly flavor" rings the bell in Philadelphia, "Cradle of Liberty"

Copyright, 1940, by Standard Brands Inc.

All afternoon Ann has watched Henry press buttons at The Franklin Institute... test planes. "Wish I could press a button and get a cup of Chase & Sanborn Dated Drip Grind Coffee"—Ann. "Place right around the corner"—Henry. "That's the kind of modern miracle we can both appreciate," Ann says—"Aroma straight from heaven... flavor that makes the sun shine on a rainy day... lead me to it!"

Large Washington's winter headquarters at Valley Forge are now popular wedding headquarters—312 couples last year. Beth and Albert Coleman are starting their married life on the All-American coffee—Early American house, Federal architecture, a famous American coffee, loved everywhere the United States for its glorious, warming flavor—Chase & Sanborn Dated Coffee—"Friendship in a cup"!

Devon Horse Show is one of most fashionable in country, is enthusiastically attended by all the Main Liners. Deborah Rood, owner of "Saldan" and "Silver Play" and winner of two coveted cups, joins a group of friends for a cup of coffee. What with 2 trophies, 27 ribbons and the delicious, thrilling, pungent tang of her favorite Chase & Sanborn Dated Drip Grind Coffee—Miss Rood's "cup is full"!

Sturdy Philadelphia sport is sculling on the Schuylkill River. Bill and George Pepper, of University Barge Club, have had a workout, are all set for "eats" and real he-man coffee—full-strength, full-flavored Chase & Sanborn Dated Drip Grind, rushed fresh from roasting ovens with date of delivery right on the money-saving package.

The Hammonds of Bryn Mawr appreciate the best. Fridays, enjoy famous Philadelphia Orchestra. Sundays, listen to Edgar Bergen's famous Charlie McCarthy, NBC Red Network, Chase & Sanborn program. Every day, serve one of world's finest mountain-grown coffees—Chase & Sanborn Dated Coffee, famous for flavor!

YOU HAVE A RIGHT TO KNOW THESE FACTS

BEFORE YOU BUY ANY ROOF!

HOW much is it going to cost? (Or, better yet, how little?) How long is it going to last? How quickly can it be put on? Will it be really beautiful? You've got to know the answers to these questions before you can be sure you've picked the right roof for your home.

NOTE THIS: Under the two-year F.H.A. plan a Barber Genasco Roof for the average-size home COSTS NO MORE per day than a package of cigarettes. A Barber Genasco Roof can be depended on to last for years because it is the only roof that is made with genuine Trinidad Native Lake Asphalt. This asphalt is Nature's own idea of a real weatherproofing material. And it's exclusive with Barber. Barber Roofings have been "color-styled" by one of America's leading color engineers. And they can usually be applied in a day's time — often right over your old roof!

FIND your local Barber roofer or dealer in the classified telephone directory. Call him. He will give you the real roofing information you need to make a wise selection. His consultation services are free.

BARBER ASPHALT CORPORATION

BARBER, NEW JERSEY

Barber Products include: Shingles, Sidings, Roll Roofings, Bonded and other types of Built-Up Roofings, Waterproofing Asphalts and Fabrics, Resurfacer, Asphalt Protective Products (Plastics and Liquids), Spandrel Beam Waterproofing (Spandrel Cloth and Cement).

BARBER

GENASCO QUALITY

means a good Roof

ognize him and it looked like he'd taken pains to do that."

"I saw that much," I said with pride.

"Yeah. Everybody that lived there claimed they hadn't seen nobody go to Gilvin's rooms, and we couldn't tell were they telling the truth, or if it just was they were people who wouldn't tell nothing to cops. We had to get some way to find that out and get people to talk, so I figured a way and I told the inspector."

"You mean the note that we found?"

"You got it! Everybody around there knew the first cops that come there suspected young Berrand. Them people all liked the boy. So I had a cop write that note like it might be from Berrand and put it in that book. Then I and you found it. Then the inspector come in and fired me because I'd burned it up. Then I sat in that bar. I figured people that wouldn't talk to a cop would talk to an ex-one, especially if the cop had got fired for protecting somebody they thought wasn't guilty."

I didn't say anything.

"I FOUND," he continued, "they didn't have nothing to tell. But I did get one thing: That little guy Eddersen hadn't ever had any money but now he had plenty. I told him not to spend so much, but he said he could get more. So then I hung out with him and I put together things that he said till I found out he got it from Averton."

"It turns out Eddersen seen Averton take a piece of pipe from the basement. After the murder he went to Averton and told him he'd seen him. Averton told him he hadn't done the murder and he'd got the pipe for something else; but he said it might make him trouble if the police knew about it, and he give Eddersen money not to tell."

"Of course that turned your attention to Averton," I said.

"Right. I found out he'd had a partner that got killed one time in a train wreck. Business guys that had known the partner give me a description of him, and it was something like Gilvin, but I saw we couldn't prove anything except from Averton himself."

"Then what?"

"We done that business at the picture theater. I looked around and it wasn't hard to find a picture that had a train wreck in it. Then I had a plain-clothes cop go and tell Averton that we wanted to see him at headquarters. He didn't mind going. He didn't know he was suspected. Well, they didn't go to headquarters. When they got out on the street a couple more plain-clothes men joined 'em, and later some more, and when they got to the theater still some more were waiting. Averton knew there was all cops because they had the shields pinned on their vests and even once in a while one of 'em let his coat fly open so he could see the shield."

"When they went into the theater Averton asked what they were going there for, and none of 'em answered him and whatever he said nobody answered. A guilty guy that a cop keeps with him and don't ask no questions gets thinking the cop must know all about it. He'd ask him something. These cops kept whispering to one another like they knew a lot, and Averton kept wondering what they was talking about. Then at once in the picture he seen the train wreck."

"I didn't know how much Eddersen really knew, so I had a couple of cops take him to the picture too; and I'd make that Mrs. Jellis and I and you took her along. I was wondering if Gilvin he ever told her anything. They was both innocent and the train wreck didn't mean nothing to 'em. But when the cops he'd been sitting with marched Averton out of the theater right after the train wreck, he was so sure they knew about it that he begun right away make 'em a statement that he'd killed Gilvin in self-defense. We can prove I didn't do that."

"All very clever," I told him grudgingly, "but you might have let me in on it. I've been wasting a lot of sympathy thinking you were no longer a cop."

"Say, you was my best helper! I was afraid them people wouldn't believe that piece of shenanigan, but when they see you believing it, it stopped all the doubt."

"All right."

"Sure it was all right. Of course, Averton lied when he said Gilvin paid him any rent. Before I knew that, do you know what I was thinking? I was thinking maybe this was the first time a landlord ever murdered a tenant that was prompt with his rent."

"The enlisting officer said I should come home and shave before I sign up"

FRED BALK

BUT WHY COURT-MARTIAL THE WHOLE REGIMENT?

There are bound to be one or two bad soldiers in every regiment. But why court-martial the whole regiment?

The same applies to beer and ale retailing. Out of hundreds of thousands of wholesome, law-abiding beer retailers, there is bound to be a small minority who disobey the law or permit anti-social conditions.

To protect your right to drink good beer and ale, the Brewing Industry wants even this small minority of undesirable retailers eliminated entirely. Beer is a refreshing, appetizing beverage—the beverage of moderation. We want every beer retail establishment to be as wholesome as beer itself.

To that end, we have instituted a “clean-up or close-up” program—now in operation in some states and being extended to others. We’d like to tell you about it in an interesting free booklet. Write:—United Brewers Industrial Foundation, Dept. B18, 21 E. 40th St., New York.

BEER AND ALE TAXES support schools, public health programs, care for aged. In many states, beer taxes are “earmarked” for socially beneficial purposes.

Beer’s taxes... federal, state, and local... are well over a million dollars a day.

MILD, WHOLESOME BEVERAGES FOR HOME ENTERTAINMENT. Always easy to serve, beer and ale are favored by many hosts and hostesses for home entertainment.

Tasty, mild and wholesome, they are ideal beverages for moderation parties.

BEER... A BEVERAGE OF MODERATION FOR THE NATION

VOTE FOR Crispness

...CRISPNESS THAT LASTS!

Delicious with fresh, frozen, cooked or canned fruits

● Winning new hosts of friends every day—this breakfast treat that's always crisp . . . always delicious! Kellogg's Rice Krispies have a way with sleepy appetites.

Rice Krispies boast a rich flavor and crispness that will amaze you. They're "popped" in ovens in a special way . . . then toasted gently to bring out the unique Kellogg flavor. They're so mouth-watering, so tantalizingly delicious, so lastingly crisp! You just can't resist them as they snap! crackle! pop! in milk or cream.

Don't miss out any longer. Make a date with Kellogg's Rice Krispies tomorrow morning. Only premium quality, American-grown "Blue Rose" rice is used in them. And you can be sure they'll reach you crisp. For they're packed in Kellogg's exclusive innerwrap—"Waxtite" heat-sealed at both top and bottom.

MADE BY KELLOGG'S IN BATTLE CREEK

Sensational offer! Attractive, nursery-rhyme wall plaques in gorgeous colors. Proper size for grouping. Six different subjects. See back of Rice Krispies package.

KELLOGG'S RICE KRISPIES

"OVEN-POPPED" Rice Krispies float for hours in milk or cream. The name "Rice Krispies" is Kellogg's trade-mark (Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.) for oven-popped rice.

What Happened to France

Continued from page 17

But England, which is slow by nature and by principle, was never more so than in this war. The trade unions did not lift their restrictions on work for several months, not until trade unionists had been admitted to the government. The businessmen were worried about keeping their export markets. Orders that should have been placed in America and Canada were not placed in sufficient quantity. The manufacture of airplanes did not proceed with real efficiency until that late day when it was entrusted to Lord Beaverbrook. In March, 1940, Raoul Dautry, French minister of armament, had been shocked to learn that the English experts were still wrangling over the type of tank they were going to put into mass production. About the same time General Billotte, commander of the group of armies of the north, said to me:

"The English? They have, I know, splendid qualities. They are soldiers that hold their ground well, and their leaders are men with experience in war, but they are maddeningly slow. Imagine, after eight months of war, they have ten divisions! With all the men they have conscripted they should have formed at least thirty! But they want to do things too well. They are finicky. The Germans, now, know the importance of the time factor. There are cases when it is better to have mediocre equipment in time than perfect equipment after the war."

THE chief of the general staff of the French mission of liaison, Colonel de Cardes, was also worried.

"I cannot secure precise information," he told me, "about the number of men the English are planning to send us in the course of the next few months. I need the figures in order to recruit my liaison officers. But no one seems to know. Sometimes they tell me four divisions between now and October; sometimes one. Sometimes they are going to form a second army, sometimes they decide not to. In any case we cannot count on anything of importance this summer. It's agonizing."

Nevertheless, despite prejudices and delays, German propaganda was far from having attained its goal in April, 1940. To be sure one met plenty of Anglophobes in France. There had always been Anglophobes and, for some of them, it was a profession. But between the general staffs of the two armies relations were good, better on the whole than in 1914. The two admiralities had no secrets from each other. The English told us of all their most recent discoveries and we opened all our files to them.

Fraternalization between the troops was not easy. Language constituted a barrier. But when occasion presented itself the men showed good will toward one another. All this was very cordial. Acute Anglophobia was to be found in the ruling classes rather than among the people.

It was the navy and the Royal Air Force that saved the fighting prestige of England in the eyes of many French civilians. The episodes of the Graf Spee and the Altmark and the battle of Narvik produced a great effect.

"All the same," even the most rebellious of the French said when they heard these accounts, "those English are some boys!"

The Royal Air Force was very popular with us. At the beginning of the war, when France herself had so few airplanes, the exploits of the British air force reassured our soldiers. The latter loved to see a Hurricane surge up against the Heinkels or Dorniers and with a single burst of fire from its eight machine guns bring down an enemy plane in flames.

THE English machines—both the Hurricane and Spitfire pursuits and later the Defiant as well as the Blenheim and Wellington bombers—were much admired by our experts. And the pilots were worthy of the planes. Enthusiastic young sportsmen, they were a delight to see in their blue-gray uniforms and they were as modest as they were brave.

"Is it hard to shoot down a German bomber?" I inquired one day from a boy of nineteen who already had several German planes to his credit.

"Hard?" he said. "No, it's not hard. All you have to do is to follow exactly the instructions given at the flying school. They told me there to follow the enemy plane, disregarding its fire, until it was about three hundred yards away, then to get it in the center of this little red circle that you see on my windshield. At that moment they said to press the button that controls all eight machine guns and the German would crash. I followed instructions. At three hundred yards I got the enemy machine in the center of my sights. I pressed the button and the German crashed. You see, it's not hard."

But if the machines and pilots were perfect, the organization of the Royal Air Force was too complicated. General Gort had under his command in the north a certain number of planes which constituted what was known as the Component Air Force. In Champagne there was another group that was known as the Advanced Striking Force and was composed chiefly of bombers. Finally a large number of machines remained in England to defend the English factories and villages.

A pursuit plane can stay in the air for about an hour and a half, and so the squadrons stationed in Great Britain could rarely be of service in France. They had fought at Dunkirk because the battle there had been very close to the English coast. They had arrived in a half-hour from their English air fields, had spent another half-hour fighting, which permitted them to do good work, and they had left a half-hour's supply of gasoline to take them back to their base. But the farther south the field of battle moved the less possible became this maneuver. It is this that explains the progressive diminution in numbers of the English squadrons engaged in the battle of Flanders and the growing discontent of the French command.

The battle of Flanders, like every defeat of a coalition, gave rise to mutual reproaches. Not that courage had been lacking. In the British army, as in the French army, many units conducted themselves admirably, but some explanation had to be found for the disaster.

"We were encircled," said the English, "and we lost our supplies and equipment because of an error in strategy which we did not commit."

"It is true," the French replied, "that mistakes have been made, but the first and most serious of them was not to have an adequate number of men and in that you bear a large share of the responsibility."

THE first reaction of Winston Churchill after the engagement at Sedan was to minimize the seriousness of the defeat. Arriving in Paris, on the fifteenth of May, he astonished and revitalized the supreme council by the vigor of his determination. Those who saw him that day were filled with admiration at his rage, which was like that of an old lion, and at the power of his eloquence. He was opposed to the idea of a retreat from Belgium and the abandonment of Louvain and Brussels. He wanted to fight the offensive by a counteroffensive.

But on the twenty-sixth of May, Reynaud in his turn went to London where he made a discouraging report and said that unless the English were capable of making a massive effort France would be forced to abandon the struggle. Two days later on the twenty-eighth of May the defection of the Belgian army precipitated the retreat to Dunkirk.

After Dunkirk there were eddies of public opinion in England. "Let us not send back to France," wrote certain journalists, "those divisions we have just saved at so great a cost. They will be useless to the French army, whose situation is hopeless, and they will be lost forever for the defense of the British Isles." Even those who did not share this insular egoism maintained that it would take at least three months to re-equip troops that had lost everything.

What remained in France to represent the British army at the time of the battle of the Somme? The Fifty-First Division had escaped the disaster of Flanders because it was in the Saar. It was sent to the region of Saint-Valery-en-Caux. A motorized division which was in process of debarkation and a few elements of a third division completed this tiny army. The Canadians crossed the Channel, but they arrived too late and re-embarked without fighting. Thus, at the moment when the greatest battle of the war was being fought, against more than a hundred and fifty German divisions there were in France barely three or four British divisions. For those who understood the circumstances, this was an inevitable consequence of the defeat in Flanders. But it is natural that the French army should have had at that time the feeling of carrying the whole weight of the war alone.

"The English?" the German radio commented suavely. "They know only one military operation—re-embarka-

DOES BOTH JOBS AT ONCE!

IT CLEANS
THE CAR

GIVES A WAX POLISH

DU PONT SPEEDY WAX

(LIQUID)

● Putting a wax polish on your car isn't the long, tough job it used to be. With Du Pont Speedy Wax, you can now clean the finish and give it a beautiful wax polish in one easy operation. You do both jobs at the same time. Speedy Wax is fine for all car finishes.

WANT A SAMPLE?

We will gladly send you a generous sample—enough Speedy Wax for fenders and hood. Just send 6¢, to help cover postage. Clip coupon below.

DUPONT, Chem. Spec. Div.
Dept. 8-B, Wilmington, Del.

Please send me a generous sample of Speedy Wax. I enclose 6 cents to help pay postage.

Name _____

Address _____

City & State _____

(Offer good in U. S. only)

SCRATCHED FENDERS can be made to look new. Use DU PONT TOUCH-UP BLACK. It is easy to apply with the brush in the can. Dries in 30 minutes.

That man who always lived in a new house, on the opposite page → knows that the

HOTEL PENNSYLVANIA

is the Statler Hotel
in New York

When you come to New York—on your World's Fair trip, for example—here's why we'd like to welcome you to our Hotel Pennsylvania. . .

We'd like you to know how spacious and comfortable and cheerful our newly decorated rooms are . . . how delicious (and reasonable) the meals are in all three Hotel Pennsylvania restaurants. Economical budget prices, in the gay, new Coffee Shop.

And that's not all! We want you to enjoy the grandest location in town—just a few steps through our passageway to Long Island Station, where special trains shuttle you to the Fair in 10 minutes, for 10 cents. Furthermore, to make all this doubly attractive, we haven't raised room rates one penny during the Fair!

James H. McCabe
General Manager

More for your money at Hotel Pennsylvania
NEW YORK
YOUR WORLD'S FAIR HEADQUARTERS
JAMES H. McCABE, General Manager

→ DON'T MISS OPPOSITE PAGE! →

tion. You will soon read in their newspapers triumphant communiqués announcing that His Majesty's navy has achieved a great success in re-embarking the last British soldiers without disorder or bloodshed."

Appearances gave support to these propaganda talks. The English generals, rendered distrustful by the battle of Flanders, were afraid of being encircled and, with instinctive impulse, tried to get their backs to the sea. The French command felt this uneasiness and feared its effects. The period of trustful collaboration was over.

At the beginning of June the state of mind in both armies seemed to me so disturbing that I emphatically called it to the attention of my superiors. It was then, as I have said, that I was assigned the mission of going to England to draw the attention, not of the government (which was well-informed) but of the English people to the desperate situation in France; and to say that Great Britain, giving no thought to her personal security, must send us her last airplane and last battalion.

I left from Buc near Versailles in one of the Royal Air Force planes.

From the Hendon airport I went straight to the French mission who took me to the British ministry of information. In this building I found I had a great many friends: the minister, Duff Cooper; his parliamentary secretary, Harold Nicolson (one of the best writers of our time); Ronald Tree; Lord Hood and a dozen others. I arrived at the exact moment when the daily press conference was meeting. Charles Peake of the foreign office, who was presiding, pushed me onto the platform and said, "Since your mission is to make known the situation in France, this is your chance. You will be talking to the whole British press."

I DID not know what I was going to say; I had not prepared anything and I am, in normal circumstances, completely unable to improvise in English. But on that day I was so moved by the misfortunes of France and by the frightful future opening before us that the words gushed out. When I had finished, to my great surprise, the three hundred journalists who were present got up and applauded for a long time. I don't believe anyone until then had told them with equal frankness the hideousness of France's position, the necessity of immediate help and the impossibility of our holding unless England had reinforcements to give us.

After this talk Nicolson and Peake took me to Duff Cooper. It was agreed with him that I should repeat on the radio what I had just said, in different terms, that same evening and that the British Broadcasting Company would give me its "best time," that is, the "Postscript to the News" at 9:15 P.M. I hastily composed a message which ended thus:

"It is not in 1941, it is not this autumn, it is not even next month that our friends can help us: it is now. We know how magnificently the British army and the Royal Air Force have fought, we know that they have done all that it was possible to do. The time has come to do what is impossible. We have complete trust in our British allies. We know they are ready to throw into this fight all they possess. What we ask them to realize is the importance of time. Remember what we might call the spirit of Dunkirk. Before Dunkirk it was thought impossible to evacuate in a few days, from a half-shattered harbor, more than 30,000 men. Wild optimists said 50,000. In fact, 335,000 were saved. How was it done? Who knows better than you do, you who have done it? . . . And if you show once more the spirit of Dunkirk you can also win this battle and the war. . . . For Dunkirk you gave every ship. Give now every plane, every man, every gun. Let us together ask America, now so ready to help us, to produce in one or two months what under general conditions would take years. It is impossible, all experts will say, to equip, to train and to send over in a few weeks a large army. That is true. It is impossible but it must be done, and it will be done. . . ."

THE British Broadcasting Company asked me to return at two o'clock in the morning to repeat the same message, this time in French, for the Province of Quebec and also to come back next day to talk to the English schools. I was in a state of extreme fatigue, not having slept for two nights, but I was happy to see how quickly the British public responded to my appeal. During the days that followed I received innumerable letters and many callers. All expressed the same desire: "We want to help France. What can we do?"

I got the impression that public opinion in England wanted the government to take stronger measures. But good will is no substitute for tanks or planes or rifles.

"These letters and visits," I said to my friends, "are touching. But actually what can you give us?"

Their faces became grave and distressed.

"Aside from the Canadian division which has just left," they replied, "we have no troops equipped for a war on the Continent. We haven't supplies to replace all we lost in Flanders. We shall certainly send several squadrons of airplanes but it is essential in our common interests that our aviation factories and our ports should remain well defended. If you can hold out until 1941 . . ."

Then I knew the game was lost and there was no more hope for France.

I said to the French ambassador, Charles Corbin, whose attitude through all this difficult period had been both courageous and high-minded: "After all, it is strange that in the tenth month of the war the English have no army!"

"Yes," he replied, "but we must be fair. They have kept to the letter the agreements they made. The dates were fixed for the formation of the British divisions; these dates have been met. The fault was not to have demanded of our allies as many divisions as in 1914, but it is a fact: we did not ask them for anything of the sort. The myth about the power of defense and about fortified lines blinded our general staff and our ministers."

On the morning of the 13th the newspapers announced the Germans were in front of Paris. As I was sadly reading the Times I was called to the telephone, and a lady in waiting informed me that the queen wished to see me at eleven o'clock in Buckingham Palace. I had been presented to Queen Elizabeth when she was Duchess of York; I had seen her again, as queen, in Paris, but I did not know to what I owed the honor of this audience. The palace with its tall footmen dressed in red, its innumerable commemorative pictures and its bamboo furniture, still appeared very Victorian. Sir Alexander Harding conducted me to the queen.

"Mr. Maurois," she said, "I wish to tell you that I feel great sorrow for Paris . . . and great sympathy for the French in their misfortune. . . . I love France so much. During our trip to Paris two years ago I felt the hearts of the women of France beating so close to mine. I am going to try to talk to them this evening over the radio and to tell them the simple truths that come straight from my heart."

She talked to me about this broadcast and then asked me about what I had seen and about my wife and children. I told her I had no news of them. Her soft eyes expressed so much human compassion that I was profoundly moved. When she had said, "I love France so much," I had felt that this was no official phrase but a cry brought forth by true emotion. The queen, like her people, wanted to do everything to aid us. But it was too late.

AFTER the fall of Paris, Winston Churchill went to Tours where he was horrified by the complete disorganization of the country. The airport at which he landed was deserted. No members of the government, no representative, came to meet him. The city was overcrowded with refugees and he had great difficulty in finding the government of France.

There, in a château on the Loire, the French premier told him that he, Reynaud, stood for continuing the struggle but that he might be forced to make way for another government which would ask for an armistice. In that case what would England say? Winston Churchill was not able to release France from her promise not to make a separate peace, but the British cabinet, I believe, let it be understood that there would be no vain recriminations and that the restoration of France to full independence would remain one of its war aims. This meeting between Reynaud and Churchill in Touraine was the last.

On the twenty-seventh of June I went to Wiltshire to see Sir Eric Phipps, former English ambassador to France,

ROBERT DAY

The man who always lived in a new house

"DO YOU KNOW the impression I get, every time I return to one of your Statler hotels?" asked the man who had just checked in at the room clerk's desk.

"It's an impression of newness," he exclaimed. "Of a bright, well-kept hotel that's as up-to-date and modern as the first time I visited it some years ago. Lobby, restaurants—everything in beautiful shape!"

"Why, even before I go up to it, I know my room will be fresh and inviting. Not simply clean, but looking as though the decorators had just finished a cracker-jack job. How do you do it?"

(Decorators are always busy in Statler hotels—carrying out a never ceasing program that keeps things modern. Leading designers make sure nothing gets old-fashioned at a Statler.)

"Another thing I've noticed," continued the man who appreciated a modern hotel, "is that the furniture, rugs, curtains, and other room equipment are continuously being renewed or replaced. It must cost you a fortune to keep things in perfect shape like that!"

(Each Statler has its own shops—carpenter, upholstery, electrical, paint, etc.—where maintenance jobs are attended to instantly. A routine room-inspection report covers 150 items!)

"Come to think of it," he concluded, "there's nothing old-fashioned about a Statler but the hospitality."

More for your money at a Statler

Attractive, up-to-date furnishings and decorations, the greater comfort of spacious rooms, scientific Certified Lighting, meticulous cleanliness, superlative Statler service, unusually fine food—these and many other Statler innovations give you, at Statlers, what we believe is the greatest hotel value in America.

STATLER OPERATED
HOTEL PENNSYLVANIA $3.50
NEW YORK
HOTEL WILLIAM PENN $3.50
PITTSBURGH

More for your money at a
Statler Hotel

HOTELS STATLER IN BOSTON . . . . $3.50
BUFFALO . . . . $3.00
CLEVELAND . . . $3.00
DETROIT . . . . $3.00
ST. LOUIS . . . . $2.50

DOWN COMES THE PRICE!

KOOLS NOW COST NO MORE
THAN OTHER
POPULAR BRANDS

And you get valuable golden coupons with KOOLS—America's finest mentholated cigarette.

New Low Cost AUTOMATIC HEAT

The "O.P." Coal Burning Winter Air Conditioner has revolutionized the burning of inexpensive fine-size bituminous coal. You can now have the heat you want the way you want it at a fraction of the cost.

NO COAL TO SHOVEL, NO CLINKERS TO DIG
The coal is piped automatically from bin to fire. The ashes are automatically removed and stored. No clinkers to dig. No ashes to remove. The comfort and convenience of truly automatic heat at a saving.

COMPLETE WINTER CONDITIONING
The air is heated, filtered, humidified and circulated. The thermostat controls the temperature. The Stoker-pilot controls the fire. Here is winter air conditioning at its best—the latest step in home heating comfort. It's new, it's modern, it's different.

BEAUTIFUL, THRIFTY, PROVEN
This modern, compact, streamlined unit is quiet as a mouse and thrifty as a Scot. Manufactured and guaranteed by one of the largest corporations in the stoker business and proven by years of successful performance. Dealers everywhere. Branches in principal cities.

EQUIP YOUR PRESENT FURNACE
This dependable mechanism can be installed in your present heating plant whether it be steam, hot water or warm air. Your furnace then becomes entirely automatic. Enthusiastic owners report low cost, complete dependability. For complete details use coupon now.

NO DOWN PAYMENT
36 MONTHS
TO PAY

POCAHONTAS FUEL CO. INC., Stoker Division
1180 East 152nd St., Cleveland, Ohio

Gentlemen: Please send information on "O.P." Air Cond. ☐
"O.P." Stoker ☐

Name _____
Address _____
City _____

and he invited me to listen to a French broadcast with him. The battle cry from the Marseillaise—"Citizens, to arms!"—brought tears to my eyes. It was then that I learned of the resignation of Paul Reynaud and the request for an armistice. I owe it to truth to say that my English friends, in these circumstances that were so painful, both for them and for me, conducted themselves with a decency and a generosity worthy of their noblest traditions. They recognized at once that the mistakes in this lamentable adventure had been made by both sides and that reproaches were useless. Sir Edward Grigg, undersecretary of state at the war office, sent for me.

"I simply want to tell you," he said, "that we understand and that we do not blame you. We have not been able to help you in time; you could not act otherwise."

Then he talked to me about the fleet. It was the one thing that worried all the English. In the days that followed the atmosphere became more stormy. The conditions of the armistice caused grave alarm. It was said that at Bordeaux the English ambassador, Sir Ronald Campbell, was no longer being informed of anything. Lord Lloyd and General Spears, sent to take part in the discussions, were said to have met with no better luck. In London, Corbin handed in his resignation saying he was unable to be the representative of a policy contrary to the one he had so long defended. Roger Cambon, who took his place, was not long in following his example and retiring in his turn.

AT THE last moment Winston Churchill had thought he could persuade the Reynaud cabinet to continue the fight by offering to unite the two empires under a single government presided over by a Frenchman. Every citizen of either country would have a double, Franco-British nationality. All resources would be held in common. It was an amazing offer and, had it been made a few weeks earlier, it would without a doubt have changed the course of the war. But it came at a moment when France was exhausted and wanted nothing but immediate succor: airplanes, tanks and cannon.

I have been told that General Weygand, in the course of this discussion, recalled an episode from the life of Winston Churchill. The latter, during the war in the Transvaal, had been captured as he was getting out of a train by two Boers who pointed their revolvers at him.

"If at that moment," General Weygand said, "someone in the train had said to Mr. Churchill: 'Resist them! At home I have immense resources. I shall put them at your disposal,' this offer would not have altered the situation. Such today is the case of France; guns are pointed at her heart; she is disarmed. She can only do what Mr. Churchill did: accept destiny."

I do not know whether this account is true; but, be that as it may, the analogy is exact. Winston Churchill, however, who believed he had made France a prodigious offer—so great a one that Parliament remained stupefied and even criticized him for having extended it—was sadly wounded to see his proposal of union received with indifference. Many Englishmen shared his regret, and the best friends of France were perhaps the bitterest because they had been the most enthusiastic.

"What a shame!" the great English critic Desmond MacCarthy said to me. "I should have been so happy to become a French citizen."

With him and with Raymond Mortimer, another very talented writer, I spent a melancholy but charming evening, the first for a long time during which I was able to rise above the terrible events of our time and talk of eternal things. It was a discussion such as must have been held sometimes in the fourth or fifth century, in the Gallo-Roman villages under the heel of the invasions, by the readers of Virgil and Horace. We talked about French poetry, which my hosts knew so well. We recited the verses of Mallarmé and Valéry and also those of Malherbe and Racine. Then Desmond said:

"We know that we are menaced by many things: first of all by death, which is not very important, but also by tyranny, and that is more serious. Our duty is to save a thing that can be saved and that depends only on us: the confidence we have in one another. To do that, two things are necessary: first, that we shall never forget the existence of our friends, their kindness and affection. Even if we do not see them for long years; even when the French are told that we English are monsters and when we are told that the French have betrayed us, let us remember certain Frenchmen and certain Englishmen who, we know, are incapable of any but noble and generous thoughts. And when we have the opportunity let us be very kind to one another, much kinder than usual. There is a great dearth of kindness in the world today. We must redress the balance."

That evening, as well as the time I spent at the home of the Phippses and with Maurice Baring, reawakened in my mind the image of a better England. But the difficulty of the situation was often brought home to me in painful fashion. Relations between the two countries were becoming more acrimonious. General de Gaulle, the great expert on tanks, had recruited a legion in London, and his plans created a distressing question of conscience for many Frenchmen. Some believed the thing to do, first of all, in the hour of our country's agony, was to maintain the unity of France; others refused to recognize the armistice and joined General de Gaulle.

There were recriminations by radio between London and Bordeaux, and I deplored the useless bitterness of these talks. I preached moderation, but without much success.

England now was thinking only of organizing her own defenses. In May she had lacked divisions well enough equipped to be sent to France; but in July she had more than a million soldiers adequately trained to defend her territory against an invading army. Canadians and Australians were going to fight for the first time in England. Everywhere along the roads and in the cities you saw fortified positions being constructed. Profiting by our cruel experience, the high command ordered the civil population to stay at home in case of attack, and announced that the roads would be kept clear by machine guns. In each village a corps of volunteers were recruited as defense against parachutists. Everywhere I found a spirit of resolution and desperate courage, which was new. England had received a terrible shock in the sudden discovery that the French army was not invincible and that she was no longer secure on her island. But as always in history she was not discouraged but strengthened by danger.

ON JULY 2d the French military mission demobilized me and since, for one thing, communications no longer existed between Great Britain and France and, for another, I had agreed to deliver the "Lowell Lectures" at Harvard a little later, I decided to leave for America. The boat on which I crossed was one of those in which England was sending children to Canada. The scene on deck was touching and amazing. A thousand children were at play in the sun around the guns that protected them. The cruiser Revenge and two destroyers escorted us. It was on this boat that I learned, from a bulletin stuck up in the 'tweendecks, the frightful news of the battle of Oran.

Of all the misfortunes that had been pursuing me for weeks this seemed the most terrible. A Frenchman first of all, but for twenty years a friend of England, I was like a child of divorced parents who stays with his mother but who suffers nevertheless. My heart said: "My country, right or wrong." My reason deplored this break between two peoples who have so much need of each other. Leaning against the rail, I looked for a long while at the sea marbled with foam and the great cruiser gliding silently at our side. My English shipmates, respecting my sorrow, passed close beside me without speaking. Suddenly I remembered what Desmond MacCarthy had said to me one evening, "Whatever happens, let us not forget that our friends have not changed," and I began unconsciously to murmur the old Scotch song: "Should auld acquaintance be forgot . . ." High up in a turret on the Revenge a light went on: luminous dots and dashes were communicating a mysterious message to us.

"Don't wait up for me, Hon . . . I might work late. It looks like a poifect night for a moider"

JAY IRVING

Sunday Pitch

Continued from page 24

ek, and it was Faith Jerrold. He felt popped and angry and very pleased. He was saying something in a swift lertone to Chelten, and Clint caught end of it. "... so we phoned rkey, and he says it's a deal. I'll e the papers ready for you tomor-"

Chelten looked pleased, and said, "ood girl," and went back to his argu- nt with Talbot. Clint thought, sur- ed, so she works here too! Then she ed to him. She was smiling a little, she said, "I'm glad to see you again. v's your hand?"

WAS a direct attack, and the nicest ossible way to do it. Clint laughed, ng her for it. He said, "My hand's ight. I guess it was my disposition as sour."

Was it because I said something id?"

Nothing like that," Clint said. "Let's it was because I was concentrating. k out the next inning."

He looked at him, her head tilted a e, her eyes friendly and interested. said, "It was more than that. I've e to games at home, when you were ing. You think way beyond the inning—all the time."

Clint looked at her, trying to figure out, feeling the old suspicious stiff-

Maybe she was just making talk, she was getting it very close to e. Too close. He said, "Out at the rch. I had you tagged for one of the rch. I guess I was wrong."

Faith Jerrold laughed. "Quite wrong. Mr. Chelten's secretary. He wants ravel with the club, and Chelten er wants him in the home office. I resent the compromise."

Clint said, "Some people might call it e advantage."

He laughed again. "You're a fine tier, but you throw a compliment -like a—"

Call it a cripple," Clint said. "A Sun- pitch. Like the one I threw up to om this afternoon. You can knock e far as you like."

He knew she was just trying to be e and he was fencing, holding her off.

Behind her shoulder, he could see ay Chelten slapping the table and llg what they were going to do when e won the pennant. Not if they won

When. It jangled Clint's nerves. An estra was playing on the porch be- the lounge. Clint said to Faith erld, "Maybe you'd risk a dance."

Se said, "I could bring myself to it."

Se got up, and Clint followed her.

On the porch, it was very nice. There e only three or four other couples ing, and there was a breeze from eake. Clint tried to dance easily, ne sheer pleasure of it, and he al- managed it. Faith Jerrold was light on his arm, and her hair ed his cheek. When the music ed, they walked over to the rail.

is said:

"don't dance very well."

Se said, "You don't dance very ao, either." She was silent a mo- ne, looking out toward the lake, and he said suddenly, without look- nt him, "You shouldn't be so bitter."

Clint said, "Bitter about what?"

Se said, "I don't know. That's what e've been wondering."

Clint leaned against the rail. He as't looking directly at her, but he as acutely conscious of everything about her.

He said, "There's no dark secret. When I got sore this afternoon—"

He paused, trying to find just the right words. Faith Jerrold said, "It was be- cause we were all fussing over your hand."

Clint said, "Something like that. I don't need to be told to take care of myself." He looked directly at her. "I'm a miner's kid. When I was ten years old, I was working on the break- ers, picking slate. When I was sixteen, my old man was killed in a blast. I was lucky at that. If it'd happened a year sooner, I wouldn't have known that I could play ball. I don't ever forget that."

She said, "I see. But you've got it. You've got what you want now."

"Sure," Clint said. "Now. But I'm no boy wonder. I spent ten years in the minors, learning the hard way. I'm hot stuff now. I don't blame Harry Chelten for not wanting me to get hurt. I know what my arm's worth to him. A pennant. Something he's wanted bad enough to spend fortunes on. But there are things I want too, and I have to get them for myself."

He stopped abruptly, then said, "I guess I am bitter. I'm sorry. But that's only part of it. When I spoke like that this afternoon, it wasn't because I didn't like you. It was because I did."

She said, "I guess that's not as com- plicated as it sounds."

"It's not complicated," Clint said. "I just felt something. I felt it again when we came out here. About you and Harry Chelten. The way he looked at us when we came out."

She stood with her hands on the rail, not looking at him, the breeze moving in her hair. Then she said, "You've got quick perceptions. He does like me a lot."

The band was playing again. Clint said, "He's a nice guy."

Faith Jerrold said, "He's a very nice guy. I like him. . . ."

THAT should have been the end of it.

Clint told himself it was the end. He just didn't think about it any more. He knew he'd come a long way since the early days, but not far enough to go up against a guy like Harry Chelten. Not far enough for that.

He was hot in Chicago. But he touched trouble in Pittsburgh. He was hit hard all through the late innings. He gave up three runs, but the Wasps got him four, and he got out of it. But it needed a hair-raising double play in the eighth, and in the ninth Sonny Whit- man had to scramble four feet up the right-field wire to rob Haley of a homer that would have meant the ball game.

Back in the dressing room, Talbot and Harry Chelten were waiting for him. Harry Chelten said, "How's the arm feel, Clint?"

Clint said, "It's all right. Don't worry about it."

Ben Talbot said bluntly, "Clint, you didn't have a thing out there today. If your arm feels dead, you should say so."

Clint said stubbornly, "My arm's all right. When it isn't, I'll holler."

Harry Chelten threw down a cigarette. He said, "Clint, you carry this team. We all know that. You're the meal ticket. But there are limits to what one man can do. Maybe you're working too often." He smiled. "You're the biggest asset we've got. We can't afford to take any chances."

Clint closed his eyes. He said, "Nuts. When I need rest, I'll yell for it. I'm not throwing my arm away. I need it to eat with."

He worked once more in Pittsburgh, in the last game there. Mose Flagley started for the Wasps, and went into the lived 60 million years ago while Nature was mellowing and filtering the crude oils used today in refining Sinclair lubricants. These oldest crudes make such fine lubricant that...

TRICERATOPS, THE DINOSAUR WITH PARROT-LIKE BEAK,

... SINCLAIR LUBRICANTS ARE USED BY CONTRACTORS

in building many famous projects — the Pennsylvania Super-Highway, Austin Dam and Seminole Dam. Sinclair products of this same high quality for your car are sold by your nearby Sinclair Dealer. Ask him for Opaline or Sinclair Pennsylvania Motor Oil. They last so long they save you money.

Pour GLENMORE ..you get more

GOLD LABEL
Bottled
in Bond
•
SILVER LABEL
This Whiskey is 4 Years Old 90 Proof

GLENMORE DISTILLERIES CO., INCORPORATED
Louisville — Owensboro, Ky.

FROM THE DISTILLERY WITH MORE THAN A MILLION BARRELS EXPERIENCE

eight with a four-run lead. Then Flagley blew up. He gave a hit, walked two men, and then hit the next batter to force over a run. Ben Talbot signaled him from the box and stood staring glumly out toward the bull pen. There was no one out there he could count on. Clint said, "I'm warmed up—"

Talbot said unhappily, "I don't want to work you out of turn, Clint. That first game Philly—"

Clint said, "What's two innings? And we'll find out about my arm."

He found out. The first batter hit on the ground, and the run was cut off at the plate. But on the next man, his control was bad. He got into the hole at three and one, and had to lay the ball across. He put all he had on the pitch, but it didn't break. A single slashed over first and two runs scored. The next man tripled into deep right, and the game was gone.

He was beaten again in Philadelphia. He gave up four runs in the third, and Talbot took him out. It was the first time all season that Clint hadn't finished his game. The Wasps dropped three out of four in Philadelphia, and staggered home for the final stand, their four-game lead cut exactly in half.

Those last three weeks were a nightmare to Clint.

He got through a game against New York on his nerve, and inspired fielding from the rest of the club. Then he lost to Boston, and the team began to come apart at the seams.

When he came out of the showers, after the Boston game, Harry Chelton was waiting for him in a corner of the locker room. Chelton said, "Sit down a minute, Clint. I want to talk to you."

Clint said, "Sure. Let me dress."

He pulled on his clothes and came back to Chelton. He sat down on the bench, and Chelton said, "Losing this afternoon doesn't mean anything, Clint. You're a great pitcher. You'll get right again. But you're all tightened up. You've got something on your mind."

Clint said, "Such as what?"

Chelton said slowly, "I wouldn't quite know. Maybe it's my fault. I've been talking pennant too much." He looked directly at Clint. "Let's get one thing straight. I've spent a lot of money on this club, and I'd feel pretty swell if we won the championship. But not because of the money. Because I like the game. For the fun of it."

Clint thought, the old line. The old college try. He won't ever know how a ballplayer feels if he buys himself a hundred pennants.

Chelton said, "So forget that part of it. I'm not going to show my face around here after today." He stood up. "The last four games are the pay-off. If we break even, we win. Talbot was only counting on you for one game, but I've talked him into giving you the first and fourth. You're strong enough, and you're good enough. I think you can do it."

Clint said dryly, "Thanks, Mr. Chelton. I'll give it all I've got."

Chelton started to go, and then stopped. There was a look on his face that Clint couldn't figure at all. He said, "Faith Jerrold was talking about you. She'd like to see you."

Clint looked at him, keeping his face perfectly expressionless. He said, "That's nice of her. I'll give her a ring."

BUT he didn't. It was one thing he couldn't take. He had enough to fight without that. With Talbot's permission, he got clean out of town for two days. He went out on the Cape and fished, with a bunch of Portuguese fishermen who didn't know a baseball from a haddock head. He came back to town Thursday morning feeling limber and physically rested, and completely dead inside.

In spite of it, he was great in that first game. His curve was breaking again, and his fast ball had the batters hitting late all the way. Dwyer socked one into the left-field bleachers for a Wasp run in the third, and in the sixth Sonny Whitman doubled with two on to send Clint into the seventh with a three-run lead. It was all he needed, and he could feel the team come alive behind him, vibrant and fighting.

He made Griscom pop up for the first out. Then he had Bud Morse, the right fielder. A big, slugging kid, the kind a pitcher can never outguess, because he's just in there swinging. Clint made him foul one off, and then missed the inside corner with a burning fast one. But he'd set up the change of pace. He pulled the string on the next pitch, and Morse broke his back trying to hit the ball before it got to him. Clint was down off the mound as the ball thumped into Dwyer's mitt, and he stood quite still, his feet spread, wondering if it had really happened.

INSIDE his arm, just above the elbow, that sharp, twisting pain. He lifted his arm and brought it forward gently, and the pain was still there. He took the throw-back from Dwyer, and went back to the rubber. He shook off Dwyer's signal, and gave his own sign for a pitch-out. Even through the mask, he could see the unbelief on Dwyer's face. He wound up smoothly, and pitched wide of the plate. The muscle in his arm kinked and hurt fiercely. When the ball came back to him, Clint threw it down on the rubber and walked off the field.

He could hear the quick murmur run over the stands. Ben Talbot came out of the dugout, his face a study in anguished apprehension. Clint said, "I've got a sore arm, Ben. You'll have to let Flagley finish it."

He knew what that meant. Talbot needed Flagley for the second game. But there was a three-run lead. If Flagley could save it, maybe Clint's arm would come around for the fourth game, the clincher. It was better than staying in there now. He could kill his arm forever that way. Anything was better than that. Talbot said, "Sure, Clint, sure. You beat it quick to Doc Fortson."

Clint bent his shoulders to take the jacket the bat boy was holding out. In spite of himself, he looked across the dugout roof toward the owner's box. Harry Chelton was there, of course, and three or four people who were just faces to Clint, and Faith Jerrold. Clint had known she would be there, but he hadn't known how she would look. She was smiling at him, a funny, sorry little smile that somehow hurt him worse than he'd ever been hurt before.

The game was tied up in the eighth, but Flagley saved it. But it stretched heartbreakingly through the twelfth before the Wasps could squeeze over the winning run. And those extra innings meant Flagley was through for the series.

Lying on the rubbing table, with Doc Fortson kneading his sore arm and clucking like a worried hen, Clint listened to the fierce surge and fall of noise from the stands, the roaring burst that greeted the Wasp run. Clint got into his clothes and left before the team came back. If his arm was shot, it was shot. He didn't want a lot of talk about it.

He spent the next two days with doctors and hot packs and violet rays. And the muscle stayed kinked. The Wasps lost the next two games. Everyone expected them to. Their pitching staff was frayed out in the fierce final drive to the pennant. With Flagley used up, there was no one who had a prayer in that last game but Clint. He knew it that Saturday, when Talbot sat down

WRINKLE-RESISTING
COHAMA
NECKWEAR
CRAVATS

Wrinkles ruin ties. But not Cohamas...because the wrinkles come out! Which means that you get fashions as soon as they're born—in fabric that will live a long, long time! $1
All at $1, all Cohama!

1412 BROADWAY, NEW YORK

side him in the dressing room, after the third game, which deadlocked the season and put everything on that last game. Talbot said soberly, "How about Clint?"

Clint said, "It's still sore."

Talbot said, "Maybe it'll come right tomorrow."

Clint said, "Sure. Maybe."

He knew what Talbot was thinking. With a sore arm, Clint was the only ace. But it might ruin his arm. It might wash him up for good. Talbot didn't ask for that. And Clint wasn't crying.

He spent next morning with a specialist who peered at his arm through a microscope, and pinched and pulled, ended up with nothing but a headache. Clint went back to his room at the hotel, and wrapped his arm in an electric heat pad. There was a knock on the door, and Clint said, "Come in."

It was Harry Chelton, and Faith Jerrold with him. Clint looked at them without getting up, without moving. He thought, this is one thing they can't pull. Nothing they've got no right to do.

Chelton said, "I promised I wouldn't kick my nose in any more, Clint. But there's something I want to tell you."

Clint thought, the old college spirit again. The old pat on the back. He said lightly, "That's all right."

Chelton said, "It's just this. If your arm's not right, I don't want you to pitch this afternoon. Get me right on it. I don't want you to."

Clint said, "If it's not right, I won't pitch."

He let it go at that. Faith Jerrold said, "Clint—"

When she stopped. Clint said, "Thanks for coming in. I appreciate it. I really

There was a small, uncomfortable silence. Chelton said, "You'll have to get out to the park. We'd better go. Don't forget what I said."

They went out. Clint closed his eyes. Maybe Chelton meant it, and maybe he didn't. Maybe it was just the old sport-gesture, given in the hope of getting him to return. Either way, it didn't make a difference. The door opened again, and Clint lifted his head quickly. Faith Jerrold was standing there. She said, "Clint, there was something I wanted to tell you too."

Clint didn't say anything. She said, "There's something you ought to understand, but you don't. It's just that whether or not you pitch this afternoon, it doesn't make any difference. Not any difference."

There was an odd note in her voice, Clint thought. She was asking for something. Something he couldn't give. Because he was too shut away from her.

Shut away from everybody, but from her most of all. His mouth was dry as he said, "Sure. I understand."

She said, "I'm awfully sorry, Clint." Then she went away.

CLINT went to the clubhouse early. He was stretched out on the dressing table, with Doc Fortson working on his arm, when Talbot and the rest of the team began straggling in to dress. The feeling of defeat was heavy. Talbot came over to the table and stood without speaking. Clint said simply, "It still hurts."

Talbot nodded and went away. Clint heard him tell Nixon to get ready to pitch. Clint was sorry for the kid. He was just six weeks up from the minors. They'd murder him. Clint stayed on the dressing table as the team straggled out for batting practice. Doc Fortson worked silently. The crowd sounds came mixed and jumbled. Suddenly Clint lifted his head. He moved his arm a little and said, "Try that again."

Doc's fingers were inside his elbow, using a lifting shove. Something in the knotted muscles had shifted. Now it shifted again. Back into place. The pain gone, his arm free again. The muscle kink had straightened out. Maybe it would come back, but at least he could start.

He dressed swiftly and went out on the field. He saw the unasked question in Talbot's eyes, said, "I think I'm ready. I'll know when I've warmed up."

He took a ball and went out in front of the dugout, throwing easily to Dwyer, hearing the quick, hopeful buzz run through the stands. His arm felt all right. He kept on throwing, putting on a little more pressure, trying out his stuff. Then Clint walked over to Talbot. He said, "I'm okay. I'll start."

His arm was all right. He had everything. Curve and fast ball, and no sign of hitch or strain. But the other pitcher was hot too. They battled through five innings without letting either team get a man past second. In the sixth, the Wasps got a run. A run that meant the pennant, if Clint could hold.

Going into the seventh, Clint's arm was still limber and strong. He got the first two men easily, and then had Galton for two and two. He knew he could waste one, and tried a sinker inside. It broke beautifully, but missed the corner, and Galton let it go by. Clint came up standing after the pitch, and he felt the sheath of sweat under his heavy shirt go suddenly clammy and cold.

He'd pulled his arm again. From elbow to shoulder, it was a shaft of jumping pain.

Clint waited for Dwyer to throw back the ball. He had that long to think. The

To Feel Really Fresh and Clear-Eyed Mornings:-

Try A Cup of New, Improved Ovaltine Before Going to Bed Tonight

DO YOU wake up feeling really fresh in the morning—brimming with energy, sparkling and "alive"?

Or do you frequently awaken feeling almost as tired as when you went to bed—with nerves on edge and your whole appearance reflecting the lack of sound, refreshing sleep?

Thousands who have had this trouble are now solving it in a very simple way—without medicine or risky sleep drugs.

They do it with the aid of new, improved Ovaltine. They take it regularly, night after night, at bedtime—not only to help them sleep more soundly—but to build them up for clear-eyed freshness in the morning.

How It Acts

First: When taken just before going to bed, Ovaltine helps the body relax normally. Relieves that feeling of "inner tension."

Second: It provides a specialized form of nourishment designed to prevent hunger pangs and digestive unrest. These conditions, medical authorities say, very frequently cause night-time tossing.

Third: The new, improved Ovaltine has recently been enriched with still greater amounts of protective minerals—and greater amounts of Vitamins A, B, and D. It also furnishes certain food elements to help replenish vitality while you sleep—helps rebuild worn-out muscle, nerve and body cells.

In other words, the new, improved Ovaltine is a scientific food-concentrate designed to accomplish specific nutritional results for those who sleep poorly—or who are run-down, nervous, or under par. Over 1,700 hospitals, in this country alone, serve it. Doctors approve its use.

Start Tonight

So for the sake of your health, your nerves, and particularly your appearance—try taking the new, improved Ovaltine regularly—begin tonight. See if it doesn't help you to wake up feeling far fresher in the mornings, clear-eyed, buoyant, and "alive"!

Phone your dealer for a can of Ovaltine. Or mail coupon for a generous sample.

Mail for Sample Tin

OVALTINE, Dept. S40-C-9

360 N. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Please send me your generous sample tin of Ovaltine. I enclose 10c to cover handling and mailing . . . (We send only 1 tin to a person. Offer not good in Canada.)

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

Ovaltine THE PROTECTING FOOD-DRINK

"Two"

ADOLPH SCHUS

In every Whisky Drink your own taste will confirm this Judgment of Generations

There is nothing better in the market

Famous
OLD FORESTER
America's Guest Whisky

BROWN-FORMAN DISTILLERY CO., INCORPORATED, At Louisville, In Kentucky, Since 1870

ball plumped into his glove, and for just a second more he stood there. Then he stepped back on the mound.

He shook off Dwyer's signal twice, then nodded, and wound up for the pitch. It was a high, hard one, and he put everything he had behind it. The ball was a streak of white, shoulder high on the batter, a perfect strike. And Clint's arm throbbed with agony.

He walked off the mound, his face impassive. If he gave any sign, had his arm rubbed between innings, they would know. They'd wait him out, foul off his pitches, do everything to make him throw and throw till his arm was gone. But he had them now, and there were only two innings to go.

He got through the eighth all right. His arm hurt fiercely, but he still had all his stuff.

GOING into the ninth, his curve ball was still breaking, but not enough, and his fast ball had no hop. He got the first man on pure headwork, out-guessing him, making him go after bad balls. The next man was cagier. He worked Clint for three and two, and then slapped a screaming drive into right. A foot higher and it would have been a triple. But Sonny Whitman went up three feet in the air for a stabbing one-hand catch and the second out. The next man up was Griscom. He waited Clint out, and at three and two Clint missed the corner by six inches, and Griscom walked.

Clint faced Bud Morse, feeling the pain in his arm, the cold sweat on his face. You just couldn't tell about Morse. You couldn't out-think him. Just a big dumb guy swinging from his heels, with a brain like a chicken and an eye like a hawk. Nothing but the raw stuff, a curve that broke a foot, was any good with a guy like that. The one thing Clint couldn't give, and had to.

He stopped thinking about his arm. If it hurt, he didn't know about it. He got over a burning fast one for a strike on the first pitch, and then made Morse go after a bad one for the second strike. He wasted three balls trying to get him to do it again. Three and two, and this was the pay-off.

Clint wound up and threw. It was a beautiful pitch, starting high and breaking down a foot from the plate. Clint saw the ball going in, breaking, falling away just where he wanted, and he saw the poised bat swinging, swinging back, falling to meet the curve, then smashing forward.

And then there was just the lashing smack of wood against leather, and Sonny Whitman racing back and back, stopping at the barrier, watching the ball fall away up in the silent, stricken stands.

It was all right after the game. They were all ballplayers. They knew had to laugh it off. Talbot came to Clint in the showers. He said, "It was tough luck, kid."

And beside him in the steam, Dwyer swore drippingly. "The big cluck just swinging with his eyes shut. It was a honey ball. It broke a foot. He had his eyes shut."

Chelten was waiting when Clint was to be rubbed down. Clint said, with face to the aromatic planks, "I'm so I gave it all I had."

Chelten said, "I know that, Clint. We'll get them next year." He waited a moment, then said, "I'm worried about your arm."

Clint looked at him. He said, "It's just a muscle kink. It'll be all right."

Chelten said, "I hope. I'd rather watch you work than anything I know."

He stood for a moment, and then said, with an odd awkwardness, "F. Jerrold wants to see you. She said to wait at the hotel."

Clint let his head drop down. So how, he didn't know how, it was right. He said, "I'll be there."

Chelten said, "Do that." There was still that odd hesitancy in his voice. "She's too good a girl to keep waiting."

He turned abruptly. Clint watched him, thinking, even with a copper nose you can't have everything.

FAITH was waiting for him in the lobby. Clint went to her and down. He put his hand out, and took it in both of hers. She said, "I dare ask how your arm is?"

Clint said, "Sure." Then he soberly, "We've got to understand something. I don't know why, but it's important. I didn't go in there with a sore arm."

Her fingers against his were firm and warm. She said, "I know why it's important. It's because nobody ever told you anything. Isn't that it?"

Clint said, "I guess that's it."

Faith said, "I was watching you know you hurt your arm again in the seventh inning, and I know you stood in. You'll have to tell me why you did that."

Clint looked down at her hand, holding it lightly. He said, "It wasn't for pennant. It wasn't for anything like that. No game could make me feel the way I did then." He waited for a moment, and then said, "I guess it was for you. For the way I feel about you."

She laughed, and put the palm of her hand and her fingers flat against his. She said, "Sometimes you just tell me without asking. Isn't that it?"

Clint said, "I guess that's it."

"He isn't very popular in this town. He always has to fight his way into the ring!"

Paint styling note: Contrasting shutters in slate blue enhance the sunny charm of the yellow sidewalls. Then a red door, with panels outlined in white—an accent of distinction.

AT LAST WE'RE LIVING IN A Home of Our Own

... LET'S KEEP IT A HOME TO BE PROUD OF!"

After we were married, Jim and I decided one of the things we wanted most in life was our own.

Spring we found just the place for us—a little house, shabby and run-down, but with lots of possibilities—at a price we could afford. In our painting, new paint worked wonders. We found lots of interesting painting ideas in a Dutch Boy book called So You're Going to Paint.*

Of course, beauty wasn't the only reason we chose Dutch Boy. Jim's father is a retired painting contractor. And he swears by Dutch Boy—says you can't beat it for economy.

"Don't let me catch you two using anything but Dutch Boy White-Lead," he told us. "It's more than just a long wearing paint—it's one that doesn't crack and scale. And that means a big saving at repaint time." (See photographs at right.)

NATIONAL LEAD COMPANY: 111 Broadway, New York; 116 Oak St., Buffalo; 900 West 18th St., Chicago; 659 Freeman Ave., Cincinnati; 1213 West Third St., Cleveland; 722 Chestnut St., St. Louis; 2240 24th St., San Francisco; National-Boston Lead Co., 800 Albany St., Boston; National Lead & Oil Co. of Penna., 1376 River Ave., Pittsburgh; John T. Lewis & Bros. Co., Widener Bldg., Philadelphia.

LOW-GRADE PAINT DUTCH BOY

"Quitting" already—after only a short period of service. Right after this picture was taken, the paint had to be burned off at a cost of $60. Owner was also forced to pay for a new priming coat. All this is expense he never figured on.

Four years old and still in excellent condition. House in same section as low-grade paint job. Not a sign of cracking and scaling. And at repaint time, there will be no expensive burning off and no new priming coat to pay for.

NATIONAL LEAD COMPANY
Dept. 345 (See list of branches at left)

Please send me your free booklet, So You're Going to Paint, containing color scheme suggestions and practical advice on interior and exterior painting. Also give me information on the Dutch Boy Easy Payment Plan with FHA terms.

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

The Dutch Boy Book, So You're Going to Paint, is yours for asking. Fifty-two illustrations in color show you what to do and what not to do. The coupon will bring you a free copy.

BETTER your drinks with BACARDI

YOU KNOW the incomparable BACARDI Cocktail.

But you're missing something if you haven't tried the BACARDI
Collins, Highball, Cuba Libre,
Old-Fashioned, or Sour.

Make them with BACARDI and taste the wonderful difference!

Use BACARDI Gold Label, from Cuba, the world's finest rum... or BACARDI Amber Label, the finest Puerto Rican Rum... at a popular price.

For the BACARDI or Bacardi-Daiquiri
Cocktail use BACARDI White Label, from Cuba, the world's finest rum... or BACARDI Silver Label, the finest Puerto Rican Rum... at a popular price.

THERE'S A DIFFERENCE WORTH KNOWING!

RUM 89 PROOF—Schenley Import Corp., N. Y. Copr. 1940

and fifty warriors armed with rifles. Howard had four hundred fighting men, nearly all of them Regular cavalry and mounted infantry, with a howitzer and two Gatling guns. Joseph's picturesque camp, with its tall, conelike tepees sheltering the women and children, was pitched beyond the Clearwater in a position well adapted for defense. But he had no intention of fighting a defensive battle. When Howard approached the Clearwater, Joseph led his warriors across the river and instantly attacked.

IT WOULD be hard to find in military history a bolder stroke or one more skillfully executed. Incredible as it seems, Joseph with his much smaller force held Howard in front and at the same time outflanked him, actually reaching his supply train in the rear, disabling some of its animals and very nearly capturing it. Equally incredible, he held his much stronger enemy completely on the defensive throughout a long day of hard fighting so that when night fell the troops occupied a circle with the Nez Percés all around them and with all their communications cut.

These were United States Regulars, brave men, fully equipped, adequately led. They had the advantage of both numbers and position. Yet, in this amazing Battle of the Clearwater, dawn of the second day found them actually besieged, busily strengthening their defenses, searching the horizon anxiously for help. If help had not come by a lucky accident, there is no telling what would have happened. Shortly after noon, a dust cloud was seen in the distance—a fresh column of cavalry coming from Fort Lapwai—and when this reinforcement reached the scene, Joseph broke off the battle.

Again the telegraph wires had a tale to tell, an astounding tale to those who could read between the lines. With a greatly inferior force Joseph had fought a brilliant offensive battle against Regulars supported by artillery and had come very near to accomplishing the impossible. It was a small affair, of course, measured by the number engaged, but for boldness of conception and for skill of execution Joseph's fight at the Clearwater has seldom been surpassed.

And yet he must have known—this Indian who had something of Bonaparte in him—that he had missed his aim. If he could have beaten Howard utterly on the Clearwater, he might conceivably have obtained for his valiant little band a peace that would have given them back their home. That probably was why he had risked a pitched battle against such enormous odds. He must have realized now that their Valley of Winding Waters was lost to his people forever.

He called a council of his lieutenants—Looking Glass, White Bird and Ollicot. He knew what the white man's telegraph was doing: every available military unit in the West was moving toward Idaho. They were coming from Montana, from Arizona, from California, even from faraway Atlanta. Sadly Joseph agreed that there was but one thing to do—retire across the Bitter Roots and across the Great Divide of the Rockies and try to reach Canada.

Then began the most astonishing chapter of all. Hemmed in by enemies outnumbering him at least eight to one—with Howard behind him, with Gibbon and Sturgis on his flanks, with Nelson Miles in front—his little army, burdened with more than 350 women and children, fought its way onward for ten weeks over a distance of nearly 1,500 miles with a dogged valor that few armies have ever equaled.

Again and again during that long agony Joseph displayed, in General Howard's phrase, a military genius "not often equaled in warfare." Again and again he turned on his pursuers and sent them staggering back. At Big Hole Pass, Gibbon, coming in from Montana, struck the sleeping Nez Percé camp at daybreak, pouring a destructive fire into the tepees, killing many women and children as well as men, including Chief Looking Glass. Joseph rallied his warriors, whirled on Gibbon, captured and dismantled his howitzer and might have annihilated his command but for Howard's approach.

NEAR Henry Lake he lashed back at Howard so effectively that the latter was paralyzed for three days because Joseph had captured most of the army's pack animals. Across the corner of Wyoming he went, releasing, unharmed, two white women who fell into his hands there, and on into Montana where Colonel Sturgis fell on him with a greatly superior force. In a hard two-day battle he beat off this foe, leaving Sturgis so shaken that he could pursue no farther.

Then, when his magnificent retreat of nearly 1,500 miles was all but accomplished, when he had beaten Howard and Gibbon and Sturgis and left them far behind, when the Canadian line was barely forty miles away, Fate turned against him. Nelson Miles struck him with a fresh force of Regulars more than double his own.

That morning he left his lodge and had gone with his twelve-year-old daughter to inspect the horseherd a short distance from camp. It was the last day of September, the ground white with snow, the air bitterly cold. Suddenly into the Nez Percé camp dashed Miles' cavalry, cutting off the horseherd from the tepees.

JOSEPH gave a rope to his daughter bidding her catch a pony and go with the others. He flung himself on a mustang and raced toward the camp. Bullets ripped his clothes and the horse was hit but miraculously he got through. Somehow—heaven knows how—he rallied his warriors; and somehow—again the thing seems a miracle—those weary men beat off that attack, beat it off with such heavy loss to the soldiers that Miles did not charge again.

There was no need to. Miles surrounded the position, brought up his cannon and began to shell the camp.

There was one hope for the trapped Joseph: that Sitting Bull and his Sioux refugeeing in Canada, might come to the rescue. But Sitting Bull did not come. Ollicot was killed. White Bird and a small party stole through the lines in the night and safely crossed the border. Joseph could have gone also, but he refused to abandon the women and children and the wounded.

For four days they held out, their number reduced now to eighty-seven men, forty of whom were wounded, guarding 331 women and children shielding them as best they could from the bursting shells, shivering in the awful cold, eating the flesh of dead horses. Howard joined Miles and the two white chiefs offered the red chiefs honorable terms—terms offered in good faith but afterward conveniently forgotten by those "higher up." On the fifth morning this Indian who had waged war as no Indian and few white men have ever waged it spoke these words to Howard's messenger:

"Tell General Howard I know his heart. I am tired of fighting. Our chiefs are killed. Looking Glass is dead. He who led the young men (Ollicot) is dead. It is cold and we have no blanket. The little children are freezing to death. Hear me, my chiefs! My heart is sick and sad. From where the sun now stands, I will fight no more forever."

"Sometimes I think there isn't much use clinging to the old homestead any longer, Pa"

BEAMER KELLER

WAR HAS STARTED IN South America

BUT THEY ARE FIGHTING WITH OILWELLS—NOT WITH GUNS

DREW THORPE had long suspected the Planet Export gang. Searching for new oil fields, even in South America, didn't need long-range radio stations nor an army of highly disciplined, heavily armed guards.

Nor did he like Franz Alter, Planet's manager, with his duel-scarred face and his bearing of a military commander rather than an "oil sniffer" out to locate new wells.

It all came clear when a party of "bandits" raided Drew's camp and left him for dead. In his struggle to escape to the coast, he discovered Alter's real purpose—not simply to smash a rival oil company but to dominate all of South America.

But there were patriots on Drew's side, like Gloria Diaz, lovely daughter of an old Castil-ian family and almost as American as girls he knew in the States. She was determined that European politics shouldn't bring hate and corruption to her country. But could she persuade her powerful father? Would Latin America see in time the deadly implications in this fight for her precious oil?

Tom Gill's new novel, starting in the October American Magazine, is a thrilling story of oil and international intrigue in South America. But "Wildcat 13" is far more than just an exciting adventure yarn. It is a true picture of economic invasion by a European power, based on first-hand observation by the author on his recent stay in the jungles of our great sister continent. As a forecast of tomorrow's events—as a tremendously exciting story today, don't miss it.

TOM GILL'S thrilling novel
of South America "WILDCAT 13"

MRS. HODZA MILED
very last good he townspeople
o befriend the
their hob-nailed ed over the cobbled streets. Everyone met with a stony silence and eyes that spoke contempt. Everyone in town but Mrs.
there was a stirring reason. Don't miss kins' timely short story of a feeble old out-hearted courage, "I Give My Life."

WHAT HAVE THEY GOT,
THAT I HAVEN'T?"

l a passion to get into shorts and cork Every suitor of the boss's daughter had been the rubber plantation in Pernambuco, so in her direction, too. But Sue had beaten punch. "The Suitors of Sue," by Helen one of eleven stories and novels in this American Magazine.

TO WIN YOU HAVE TO PASS THEM

The other drivers on the midget track were punks. But to beat them, you had to pass them and since the accident last summer George Lawson hadn't passed many drivers even on the five and dime tracks. Then, one night his wife decided that her man could win one more. "Tin Can Derby" by Eustace L. Adams.

WILL LITTLE ORPHAN ISLAND GET US INTO WAR?

In Guam, our tiny outpost in the Pacific, 21,000 loyal, brown-skinned people look to Uncle Sam for protection. Should we start to untie the strings that bind us to Guam as we have already with the Philippines? Or should we arm it as our first-line defense in the East? Here are the facts about this tiny outpost in the Pacific, 5,000 miles from California but only 40 miles from the Japanese controlled island of Rota.

FULL VALUE for DEFENSE DOLLARS

When aroused citizens decide to do something about taxes, they usually force politicians to trim their sails, Battleships or boondoggle? Airplanes or post offices? In "Pocketbook Rebellion" S. F. Porter presents the amazing facts behind a spreading tax revolt. How businessmen and housewives are using ballot, publicity and eternal vigilance to cut out non-essentials and get full value for every dollar spent.

Over 160 Page

TO ENJOY AND PROFIT BY

"Thank heavens this is my country! When you say these words, then The American Magazine is your magazine. For it is devoted to the people, the place, the problems, the sports, the movies, the notions and commotions that add up to the American way of living. Among the more than forty features in October you'll find:

MY BOSS, WENDELL WILLKIE

If you wanted to know what a presidential candidate was really like, who could tell you better than his secretary? And so we asked Miss Grace Grahm, secretary to Mr. Wendell Willkie for the past five years, to write this article. For unless a secretary is deaf, dumb and blind, she learns some things about her boss that others never know.

A MYSTERY NOVEL
COMPLETE IN THIS ISSUE

Gloria Prayne was an amazing creature. Perhaps most of the things the gossips said about her when they ruined her reputation was true. But who among her friends would want to see this wild and beautiful girl dead? Yet all evidence pointed to someone in her own smart New York crowd.

All the thrills of a $2 mystery novel in "Two Were Missing" by Hugh Pentecost.

WHY BATTING AVERAGES FALL

When the hecklers start to work on a player as he comes to bat in big league baseball, they display a knowledge of human nature that puts learned psychologists to shame. Frank Graham tells about it in "Big League Hot Foot."

A FORTY-FEATURE SHOW

For only 25 cents

You pay for only one magazine when you buy the big October American but you get many magazines in one. A leading fiction magazine, a magazine of fact and help that enables you to know America as few can, a magazine of entertainment for the entire family. It's a grand show every month and a grand bargain. Join the millions who have discovered how much fun 25 cents can buy. (30 cents in Canada.)

NOW ON SALE

The Hanging of Hassan Hangat

Continued from page 10

—SO I SWITCHED TO A
RUUD GAS
WATER HEATER WITH A
MONEL TANK!

Nobody but Mr. Soglow would suggest wearing an overcoat when your shower is too cold. Our suggestion is more practical. For plenty of hot water—hot enough to hop into on the chilliest morning—get a Ruud Automatic Gas Water Heater with a Monel Tank.

Your shower will not only be hot but CLEAN. For the tank of a Ruud Automatic Gas Water Heater is solid Monel, the miracle metal that can't rust and "dirty up" the water. That tank is Monel through and through—not plated, coated or clad. That's why it's guaranteed for 20 years against leaks or failure due to rust or corrosion.

Why delay? Today—see your gas company, plumber or dealer in bottled or tank gas, and see how easy it is to start Monel-protected Ruud Hot Water flowing from your faucets. And remember—Ruud Automatic Water Heaters burn gas, the modern economy fuel.

RUUD MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Pittsburgh, Pa.

a word. . . . Doc, I can't help thinking there must be something we missed or never found out. You know, Hassan had had a lot of trouble with that old ruffian uncle of his, the Penglima Hitam. They'd had a string of lawsuits, and Hassan always lost."

"What's that to do with the case?"

"Well, a man under a false accusation by his enemies would naturally speak up for himself, wouldn't he? All the witnesses against Hassan were members of his uncle's family; and he never gained one of them. Sat there all through the trial and heard the most damning testimony with no more change on his face than an old boot! . . . You call 'em a fighting race. Then, by gad, why should this fellow simply chuck in his hand and quit?"

"That's entirely Malay, too," observed the doctor. "It's their national trait—like a death adder: never so dangerous as when he's flattened out. That's when a Malay runs amok. Good thing Hassan never got the chance—innocent or guilty! . . . But see here, my lad, you mustn't let this gravel you. You did your duty, and your judgment was perfectly right, just and lawful, of course."

"IS IT soft of me to confess I've been rather praying? Imagine: to pray for a man's guilt! Or is it merely laughable?" asked Forsyte, creakily.

"Steady!" warned Doty. "Time's up; they're coming down the corridor. A stiff two fingers for you, my boy, and I'll join you. Come along!"

They went, together, into the execution courtyard where now began and proceeded the formal routine—quite as Malik had foreseen it—of the hanging of Hassan Hangat.

First, from the corridor with military precision entered the group of three and halted beside the scaffold steps. There the hangman was already waiting. The hangman was a muddy-skinned Chinaman without known identity, who only appeared, like a gnome from the earth, on these special occasions. The two Sikhs took one pace rear, bringing their rifles to parade. Then Tuan Doty took the "piece of pipe in his ears" and worked his "magic." And it was singular—if there had been anyone to note—how the good doctor as he listened with his stethoscope nodded absent-mindedly and gave a professional flicker of approval at the face of Hassan Hangat; having found such an amazing tale of inner calm and control to match its utter impassivity. . . . Thereafter Tuan Forsyte stood forward with the warrant, as stamped and sanctioned by government. He read it aloud in English, and again in Malay; and he read it firmly and well. But he need have felt no concern for its effect on Hassan Hangat.

That wiry, weakened, dried-up simulacrum of a man, that man of no account, never flinched at the dread words; never gave a sign of fear or distress. When the hangman touched his sleeve and beckoned, he required no help, but quietly mounted the nine fateful treads and moved to his proper place on the trap as if he had been drilled to it.

Through the slits like clerestory windows in the high wall, last rays from the west lent a dull, infernal ruddiness. The wind complained with its burden of the impending monsoon and brought no relief.

Forsyte and Doty had remained below with the two Sikhs, the only official attesting witnesses. Dr. Doty held his watch in his hand with steadfast attention. Doc Doty had figured out the exact astronomical second for the setting of the sun at Tembinok today. As carefully as a point on a fever chart: a carefully as if it had meant something really important. Though, of course, a Doc Doty did mean really was to lift the strain from Forsyte—a man so plainly overtaxed by his duties.

On the platform, in the interval, the Chinese hangman was going about his own duty; and quite methodically.

The hangman had a strip of red cloth which he folded into a headband, a fillet, such as Roman emperors used to wear and the common people still do. This he slipped deftly over the eyes of Hassan Hangat. Next, from the gallows beam he drew down the rope, already looped and knotted, and settled the noose of it around Hassan's neck. Last he was starting to tie Hassan's hands behind his back, when Hassan made a little interruption. . . .

Oh, just a slight delaying gesture; just a trifling movement inside his loose of silk jacket, with his palms and his fingers pressed together beneath his chin. Just a shrug of fleeting discomfort, might have been. Or possibly one more and one final private petition.

Until—to conclude his mortal life—everything was in readiness for the hanging of Hassan Hangat.

The hangman stepped aside against the wall and took hold of the lever, simple device to release the trigger of the trap. He looked down over the edge of the platform at Doc Doty. Doc Doty looked at his watch. While the closing daylight faded on Tembinok. . . .

Horror, a sense of horror in events had no form of words. As it happened in Tembinok jail, when the monstrous click of the deathtrap shocked through all the walls and timbers. When within the same click of time the body of Hassan Hangat pitched into emptiness—seemed to check with a snap in midair—and went plunging as a limp, helpless bundle on the hard floor of the yard below.

What was said, what was felt in the stricken instant could have had no coherence, could have left no record in any man to repeat. What every man saw and knew terribly was that the rope had snapped.

Forsyte's cry he himself never remembered; nor did anyone ever remember it against him. The one thing that everyone would remember, the thing that braced them all like a clarion call, was the blast of stout old Doty.

"Stead-dee, the company! Act front!" he roared. Straightway as if a firing line he knelt by the victim worked with swift skill and decision.

"Not dead. No, b' George. Man not dead: nor like to be. Quiet, please. . . . no bones broken. Just knocked out I'd say. Golly, yes—just got himself a bit of a knock. Must be made of wire. . . . Here, you two Sikh johnnies where's that doolie?"

HE MEANT the stick-and-string stretcher, which had been provided for a grimmer purpose. With sharp rapped orders he had the two guards convey the late hangee upon it. "Carry him back to his cell. He'll do well enough. If you see Malik the ward tell him I'll be there. . . .

"You!" He shook a menacing finger up at the clay-faced hangman. "You stay where you are—shabbee? Mask Till I get a chance to examine the rope. . . .

"And you," he added, grabbing an arm of Captain Forsyte. "Straight along with me, m' boy. Quick march!"

So, and in so brief a space, the vo-

WANT
This Juicer?

THIS polished aluminum juice extractor will not rust or corrode. Light and powerful, it strains the last drop of juice. Saves time and fruit!

IT'S YOURS for selling only two 1-year COLLIER'S subscriptions at $2.00 each to persons living outside your home. Offer good in U.S.A. only. Simply pin subscribers' names and addresses to this ad. Then, mail with check or money order for $4.00 to—

Independent Agency Division, Desk C-38
The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company
Springfield, Ohio

CORN SUFFERERS
should know these facts...

What causes corns—
How to get rid of them

Corns are caused by pressure and friction, become a hard plug (A) whose base presses on sensitive nerves (B). But now it's easy to remove corns. Blue-Jay pad (C) relieves pain by removing pressure. Special medication (D) acts on the corn—gently loosens it so it can be lifted right out (stubborn cases may require a second treatment). Then simply by avoiding the pressure and friction which caused your corns you can prevent their return. Get Blue-Jay Corn Plasters—25¢ for 6. Same price in Canada.

FREE OFFER: We will be glad to send one Blue-Jay absolutely free to anyone who has a corn, to prove that it relieves pain and removes the corn. Just send your name and address to Bauer & Black, Division of The Kendall Co., Dept. C-20, 2500 South Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill. Act quickly before this trial offer expires.

vigor of a single sturdy veteran preed: bringing command and sanity
n for everybody in Tembinok jail...
ybody, that is to say, except Malik warder.

le—obese and sweating, ignorant, satisfied with having earned his pay done his flag-wagging for the Pena Hitam—came climbing down from roof. It was dark now, or very erly, except for a tiny oil dish he had lighted in the death cell. He came, urse, to collect the rest of his "gift";
eg by item: a bowl, a betel box and a copy of the Surah on God's Ven-ence from the Koran. The whole th possibly ten Singapore cents in bazaar. Still, any squeeze was a eeze to Malik; therefore he came aring gently. . . .

until, at the door of the cell, he entered—full before him—the figure, apparition, of Hassan Hangat.

"Great King!" said Malik, and fell a: "How can I serve my lord?"

ne thing, the demon—whatever it seemed very little changed from
f. It was frail, and thin, and much a mummy draped in a threadbare ow old silken jacket. Malik would o have been surprised if it had outed a pair of horns; but the only parent addition it had gained in the rival was a filleted band, binding the a above the brows. It said nothing;
t last, nothing that Malik could hear.
about then the gathered storm had ut: the gigantic storm wind of the nox.

WHIRL of fetid air swept the corrilor: chased by a sudden chill and ap as tangible as smoke: the exploo of a deluge. Every ditch and gutter rawash at once; and the jail itself ammed and quivered like a beaten
nd. . . . Certainly, for a new member, Hassan Hangat had lost no time in raishell!

ad anyway and otherwise, Hassan gat had no need to speak. He merely rdered Malik from his hollow eye es with a spectral, a scornful gleam, appointed with one bony finger. He ited toward the bell gate, of which ak always kept the key. Malik was o condition to resist. He had only to e. And Malik did obey; mostly on ipelly. And when he managed to e the gate, the light blew out in d night and left him flat on his face.
ese were the pranks of the weather;
estrangeness continuing over Tem-ak as if some infernal intelligence ut certainly be directing it. This was ut quite apparent to the native mind on as the news came out, confirmed by the clangor of the alarm bell, summoning all true men to join the man hunt. A fact even more certain from the very lowliness of the creature concerned. What? A murderer miraculously reprieved—a prisoner mysteriously escaped: ya Allah! . . . And all this uproar on account of Hassan Hangat, a man of no account!

Then look you; whether he were really a hantu (spirit), or only orang jahat (a tough fellow), was no matter. In either case he would be an unchancey sort of fugitive to follow. No: here was a good time for all true men to stay at home and tend the fire, and let bewilderment take its course. Which left nothing much except Doc Doty's notes keeping touch with order and reality tonight.

AT 6:49 P. M., for instance, he carefully set down his clinical observations regarding the hangless hanging of Hassan Hangat.

At 7:04, after some persuasion on his part and some rather incoherent resistance from the patient, he was able to administer a certain sedative to Captain Forsyte—who, he diagnosed, had not slept for nearly three days.

At 7:10, Forsyte was sleeping.

At 7:15, taking a hurricane lantern and accompanied by the two Sikhs, Doc Doty returned to the execution courtyard, where he found the Chinese hangman still standing like a graven image.
Him, he banished to whence-ever he was sprung; meanwhile confiscating and taking along for evidence the noose of the broken rope.

Next moment he arrived at the death cell, where naturally he expected to treat a half-hanged, half-strangled and moribund victim. No such a thing—as he told Forsyte, later. No such a thing did he find! Only the bulk of Malik the warder collapsed on the floor.

"... Imagine! Man was like a jelly bag. And I'd no least idea what ailed him, at first. Not until he gasped out how the ghost of Hassan Hangat had just passed that way—walking right through him, and over him, and out of the gate! That was when I gave the alarm."

"What time was that?" demanded Forsyte.

"It's right here on my fever chart.
Let's see. Exactly seven-thirty P. M."

"And it's now ten-thirty!"

"I let you sleep," admitted Doty, coolly. "And it's done you a world of good," he added, noting with quiet satisfaction how Forsyte's haggard eyes had cleared, how firm was his fist on the desk. "You're in command again, of course. And there's nothing more to

GILBEY'S GIN must be Better..

The INTERNATIONAL GIN
distilled by GILBEY in the United States as well as in England, Australia, and Canada

90 Proof. Distilled from 100% grain neutral spirits.
National Distillers Products Corporation, New York City

"Major, I know you won't mind straddling the table leg"

RICHARD TAYLOR

feet soaked in perspiration

Cracks between your toes
WARN YOU

The fungi that cause painful Athlete's Foot grow twice as fast when they feed on stale perspiration and dead skin. Then, when cracks appear between the toes, they strike—through those cracks—and spread quickly. It's Athlete's Foot! Look between your toes tonight! Don't take chances. At the first sign of a crack, drench the entire foot with Absorbine Jr., full strength, night and morning.

1. Absorbine Jr. is a powerful fungicide. It kills the Athlete's Foot fungi on contact.
2. It dissolves the perspiration products on which Athlete's Foot fungi thrive.
3. It dries the skin between the toes.
4. It soothes and helps heal the broken tissues.
5. It relieves itching and pain of Athlete's Foot.

Guard against reinfection. Boil socks 15 minutes. Disinfect shoes. In advanced cases consult your doctor in addition to using Absorbine Jr.

Get a bottle today. At all druggists, $1.25 a bottle. FREE SAMPLE: Write W. F. Young, Inc., 201 U Lyman Street, Springfield, Massachusetts.

ABSORBINE JR.

Kills Athlete's Foot fungi on contact!

DURHAM BLADES
are tops in shaving!

Perhaps "bargain" blades or the wrong razor make your beard seem tougher than it really is. The hollow-ground blade and diagonal shaving stroke of Durham Duplex Safety Razor make the wiriest beards behave. With this razor you can't help shaving diagonally—the most comfortable way. While Durham is different, you'll get the knack quickly.

SHAVE KIT $1.00
Compact soft roll case with Durham Razor, pkg. 5 blades, stropping device. . . Money back guarantee. . . At dealers or order direct.

COMPARE!

Durham Blades are heaviest made (15/1000th gauge) selected Swedish steel. Hollow-ground. Leather-stropped. Hair tested. Rigorously inspected. Cost more per blade (5 for 50c) but less per shave. More shaves in every blade.

DURHAM DUPLEX RAZOR CO., Mystic, Conn.

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE—WITHOUT CALOMEL

—And You'll
Jump Out of Bed
in the Morning
Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pints of liquid bile onto the food you swallow every day. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food may not digest. You get constipated. You feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

It takes those good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these 2 pints of bile flowing freely to make you feel "up and up." Get a package today. Take as directed. Amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills. 10¢ and 25¢.

report since I sent out the searching parties. I organized everybody in the fort: like so many bloodhounds, b' George! All our Sikhs. And even your precious recruits."

"My recruits!"

"Of course! Tembinok jail has an escaped prisoner. I called out the whole blooming force to chase him down. Though I don't believe any of 'em are so awfully keen about it tonight. . . Who's going to catch a ghost in a tempest?"

"A ghost in a tempest." Forsyte nodded. "That's the situation, isn't it? But he's not, you know."

"Who, Hassan Hangat? No: he's not."

"No. He's an error. My error—with a broken rope to show there was something wrong, which I ought to have known and prevented. He's my responsibility, Doc." Forsyte stood up; a lean, bronzed specimen of young manhood without a quiver or a quaver about him. "And I'm going to go out and get him myself," he said.

It was Doty's turn to nod, with grim approval. "I hoped you'd take it that way. 'Smatter of fact, I knew you would. In view of which, m' gallant lad—take a look at this, will you?"

On the desk, under its light, he laid the open loop of the hangman's noose. "You see it?"

Forsyte blinked, uncomprehending.

"It never broke of itself," said Doty. "It was cut."

"Cut!"

"Not quite through. Just so the strands would snap."

"You're right!" said Forsyte; and the thing of itself was evident. "The Chink perhaps. What? D'you suppose he could have fixed it?"

"No. Nothing to do with the Chink; and you're doing great discredit to a very smart fellow not to think of it at once. And how he did it—very smart indeed!"

"Hassan! You mean the man himself! How could he? He wasn't armed!"

"Well, he's armed now."

"He hadn't even a knife."

"Well, he has something."

"But his hands were tied!"

"Ah-ha. But just before. 'Member that?"

"He was praying."

"Ah-ha. Inside his old silken jacket."

The two men looked at each other, and this time they both nodded, as they revised for themselves the unchanged hanging of Hassan Hangat. . .

Then Forsyte quietly buckled on tunic and belt, and took a rainproof topi from a nail and the hurricane lantern from the desk.

"If it's true, I'll know where to find him," was all he said.

AND it was fearsome weather; and it continued the whole night long, while the floods descended, and the winds came and beat about that ancient fortress of Tembinok. Old Doc Doty did not seem to mind. Casually, he looked to the reloading of his old automatic pistol.

Accurately, he arranged the light so that he sat in deep shadow between the two doors he had to watch; and sat, and dozed. And smoked a little. And dreamed lightly a little, too.

Dreams of work and of service: dull, hard, jungly work done in sweat and blood; and service slow, unseen, scantily rewarded. Not done altogether unselfishly, either, or from any high benevolent social theory. But on the whole, pretty decently done; with a normal respect for common human rights and common human progress. These were not conscious concepts of his mind: merely the tradition for which he had been trained and for which he had given his life. That was why he was able to doze so easily; not bothered much or much doubting his judgment of men, or events—or devils, either—while he still kept ward and governance at Tembinok through the hours.

. . . And that was why he only roused drowsily when he heard Captain Forsyte's return.

"Hello," he said. "Did you get him?"

Forsyte was removing his drenched garments, and belt and topi. "Did I get who, which or what?"

"I'm asking. Did you get Hassan Hangat?"

"Doctor Doty," said Forsyte, severely, "if you are referring to a late condemned criminal of that name, I can show you by your own notes," he picked up Doty's pad from the desk, "by your own notation, on what you call your 'fever chart', that man was duly hanged at—let's see—hanged at exactly 6:49 yesterday P. M. He was lawfully executed; and since you cannot execute one man twice, by any law, the government report will be properly signed and forwarded, if you please."

Doc Doty grinned at the crisp, official tone.

"All right. I'll attend to it. But I repeat, to ask, to know: What did you find?"

"AS TO that," answered Forsyte seriously, "I found quite a bloodthirsty case of amok up yonder, just over the hill. You know, that vicious old scoundrel the Penglima Hitam—he's led a career of successful crime for many a year. Land grabbing, extortion: even murder. We knew about him, but never could prove anything. The whole countryside knew, too. But native fashion; no Malay would tell or testify. . .

"Well—it seems that last night one of his family victims showed up unexpectedly. A nephew or a cousin or some relation he had horribly oppressed—whose wife he had actually murdered. I heard whispered. This man unknown came out of the storm like a demon. He fought with his hand to hand. And Hitam died of stab wounds in the front."

Doty reflected. "That's entirely Malay. . . No identification, of course. No evidence. No clue?"

"Only this." Out on the desk, for the doctor's inspection, he laid a singular object. A thing like a shard of ivory; delicately joined and cunningly carved; perhaps a foot and a half long; with a hooked handle.

Doty stared. "Why, it's a hairpin! It's one of those Ceramese hairpins made out of cassowary bone. . . But a man couldn't fight with this. How could a man fight with it? It won't cut anything!"

"A man will fight with anything, when it's all he has," returned Forsyte, with assured authority. "And notice this thin steel wire, almost invisible, inlaid inside the hook. . . That might cut something; like the round of a rope, for instance. . . It's rather a curio. Would you like to have it, Doc?"

Doc Doty saw that the thing was stained deep red in its substance from point to hilt. "I think not," he decided. "Better give it to Malik the warder, for a squeeze. . . Anything else?"

"Oh, yes—I meant to tell you!" cried Forsyte, bright-eyed. "I've all my recruits back. And a lot more, too! They're enlisting by bunches, down in the barracks. It seems the omens are good now—by their silly native superstition. All on account of a grand new corporal I found. Orang Jahat, they call him. That means 'a fighting fellow', y' know. . . I'll be marching this afternoon with maybe forty or fifty men for the Singapore defense force!"

Doc Doty nodded with an eye at peace toward the upper clerestory windows, through which he could see the clearing sky. "I told you they were a fighting race! Any race would be, with boys like you to lead 'em. . . Lead on, m' gallant lad!" He smiled; not grinning.

EVER TAKE A DARE
Just For The Fun of It

When you were a kid, you'd take a dare from most anybody.

Remember the tough kid? And the time "Skinny" dared you to slip up and whang him one? Your heart was in your mouth, but you did it!

Here's Cigarette Mildness
With Rich Pipe Flavor!

How about taking a dare to try Crosby Square? We'll take the risk. Smokers have discovered that this blend has what they've been looking for—the mildness of a cigarette with the full flavor of a real pipe tobacco. If you don't find that Crosby Square fills your "pipe-bill," you can get all your money back. AT YOU DEALER 15

"Take-a-Dare"

Offer

Send 6¢ in stamps to pay for packing and mailing and you'll get a generous sample. Write Crosby Square Div., 102 Delmar, St. Louis, Mo.

CHRISTIAN PEPER
Tobacco Co. Since 1852

Will their social acquaintances find her interesting, or mentally commonplace? Will business be impressed with his capacity to straight and talk well?

More than 400,000 families have found answer to these questions with the help of

Dr. Eliot's
Five-Foot Shelf
of Books
(The Harvard Classics)

Simply mail the coupon for the Free booklet "Fifteen Minutes a Day" which has brought happiness to thousands who have sent for it. Also, for limited time only, we will send "Men Behind the Classics" which contains biographies of men whose immortal writings appear in The Harvard Classics. A fine piece of literature. Both of these booklets will be sent free, postpaid and without obligation. Fill out and mail the coupon.

THIS COUPON ENTITLES YOU TO FREE BOOK!

P. F. Collier & Son Corporation
250 Park Avenue, New York City

I am interested in receiving by mail, free and without obligation, your valuable booklet, "Fifteen Minutes a Day," describing the famous library, Dr. Eliot's Five-Foot Shelf of Books (The Harvard Classics) and the beautiful book, the "Men Behind the Classics."

Mr. _____
Name Mrs. _____
Miss _____

Address: _____

Inside Willkie's Head

Continued from page 15

ed because of his religion; another persecuted because he believed in principles of the French Revolution; and still another was jailed for ining on the right of free speech. As a descendant I have fought from hood against all those restrictions, iminations and tyrannies. And I still fighting."

ear, fret, intolerance, vindictiveness most minds these occupy some n, and in many minds they occupy t of the room. They are no part of Willkie mental furniture.

e is classed a businessman, and e are those who say that this fact e condemns him to failure in the e House. "No businessman ever e a great national leader," they say. dwin of England, a businessman, a failure; Chamberlain, the busi- nan, failed, and Businessman Blum ed France toward the rocks. Busi- and politics are different worlds."

A Series of Paradoxes

ere may be something in that con- on. The average corporation ex- ve would be a failure as president remier. He moves in well-oiled ves, amid a relatively small group sociates; his outside contacts are vide, and are generally limited to of his own type. In his office, when akes a decision he has only to push tton and things fly. The President e United States faces a very differ- executive problem. He has 96 sen- each in his own heart believing elf as good as the President and e a little bit better, and 435 mem- of Congress, free and unfettered entatives of the sovereign Ameri- people. These cannot be ordered. must be led, persuaded, sold. Willkie might have difficulty if he were essentially the big business execu- tive. But here we come to a paradox, or a series of them. For seven years he has been president of a billion-dollar corporation, yet he does not conform to the role in appearance, or in actions or habits of thought. For eleven years he has lived in New York, yet at heart he has never left Indiana. His office is only a block away from Wall Street but Wall Street has never felt that he really be- longed.

Let us examine for a moment into each of these oddities.

Birth in Indiana is something from which a man seems never to recover. George Ade, Booth Tarkington, Meredith Nicholson, James Whitcomb Riley, Vice-President Marshall, and scores of others who might be named all achieved national reputations and friendships. But underneath they are or were Hoosiers, nothing else but Hoosiers, and shockingly proud of it. Willkie is of this clan. His heart is where his treasure is, and the treasure, the principal part of the family savings, are in the five "practical and typical hog farms" now so widely pictured. Over and over again in the hearings of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on the Holding Companies Bill, he explained that he had his office in New York not because he wanted it there but because New York is the money market. "That is why we are there," he said; "that is where we have to go to get the money for the development of any big enterprises."

Politically, also, Indiana is a land peculiar to itself. Youngsters reared there get politics with their mothers' milk. Boys grow up talking politics and social reform, practicing speeches on one another and rehearsing political stratagem even in Sunday School. They just can't help it. The state has always been "piv-

"See? They're not hostile any more"

IRVING ROIR

I HAD Spring Fervor!

AND WAS MY FACE RED--WITH KISS-SMEARED LIPSTICK! BUT KLEENEX CLEANED ME UP IN A JIFFY... LEFT NO TATTLE-TALE TRACES.

(from a letter by R. F., Covington, Va.)

"Tell me Another" says KLEENEX and win $5.00 for every "Kleenex True Confession" published. Mail to KLEENEX at 919 North Michigan Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

MAN-SIZED KLEENEX!

BOY, AM I GLAD TO FIND THAT KLEENEX COMES IN A DOUBLE-SIZE--EACH SHEET TWICE AS BIG AS REGULAR KLEENEX. AND IS IT SWELL FOR BIG JOBS!

(from a letter by J. G., San Diego, California)

BOY! DID I GET AN EYEFUL!

I GOT A CINDER IN MY EYE...BUT MY GAL POPPED UP WITH A NICE, SOFT KLEENEX AND HAD IT OUT IN A SECOND! NOW, THANKS TO KLEENEX, I NEVER LOSE SIGHT OF HER!

(from a letter by M. G., Halifax, N. S.)

SQUAW SQUAWKS

AN INDIAN SQUAW ASKED OUR GENERAL STORE CLERK FOR KLEENEX... WHEN HE TRIED TO SUBSTITUTE ANOTHER BRAND SHE SAID, "UGH, NO GOOD! WANTUM KLEENEX IN POP-UM-UP BOX!"

(from a letter by R. P., Chapleau Ont.)

THEY CALLED ME "MOPPIN' MAC"

THE WAY PERSPIRATION POURED OFF MY BALD PATE WAS ENOUGH TO DISCOURAGE THE FLOOD CONTROL BOARD... UNTIL I DISCOVERED THAT KLEENEX FOLDED UNDER THE INSIDE BAND OF MY HAT WAS A SURE CURE FOR "DEWY-DOME"

(from a letter by B. F. V., Stamford, Conn.)

Adopt the Kleenex Habit

KLEENEX* DISPOSABLE TISSUES (*Trade Mark Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.)

WHAT TAKES YOUR BREATH AWAY?

ADAMS CLOVE GUM

BY JOVE, BUY CLOVE

● It's a comfort to have a package of Adams Clove Gum in your pocket, ready to sweeten your breath on instant's notice before business conferences or social engagements. You couldn't ask a handier aid to pleasant breath.

And you never dreamed of more delicious, spicy flavor! It's unusual. Essence of tropic spice gardens, a keen delight to taste, and keenly refreshing. Notice how it freshens your mouth, even after smoking.

A FLAVOR FROM THE ISLES OF SPICE

otal." To think politically, which means in terms of people, is a normal part of every Hoosier's equipment. And, whether he elects literature or law or politics itself as his life activity, the training stands him in good stead.

There was a lot of Lincoln left in Elwood in the days of Willkie's youth. Boys believed that any lad had a right to hope for the presidency, and that the poorer they were the better the chance. The influence of William Jennings Bryan was strong. The "Great Commoner" packed them in at the Chautauqua and set youthful spirits on fire with the determination to correct social inequalities and make the game of life fairer. The pull of Wall Street had not yet begun to make itself felt. Boys had a sort of disdain for mere money success. Anyone could be a businessman. A real career was to be governor, or an eloquent pleader in the courts, or a university president.

Probably the most important influences in shaping the Willkie mind were his mother and father and Dr. William Lowe Bryan, president of Indiana University. The mother was a lawyer, the first woman to be admitted to the Indiana bar. The father, a crag of a man, was called "Hell Fire" Willkie by his pupils when he taught the Elwood school. He loved books and disputations. It is said that he called his children from their beds by shouting Shakespeare up the stairway; his sympathies were always on the side of the underdog. Some of the first cases Wendell helped his father prepare when they became partners were in defense of laboring men who found themselves in conflict with the owners of local tinplate mills.

Wendell Willkie Remembers

William Lowe Bryan was and is a hero and a saint. Talk with any man who passed through Indiana University in the days of the doctor's presidency and a brighter and a softer light flows into the old grad's eyes. He held up statesmanship, and social service, and a lively sense of noblesse oblige as the ideals worthy of an educated man.

When Wendell Willkie walked into his New York office in 1929 the first picture he hung on the empty walls was a photograph of his father; and when, eleven years later, he went back to Elwood to be formally notified of his nomination for the presidency of the United States he asked that the ceremonies be opened with prayer by President Emeritus William Lowe Bryan.

The friend who met Willkie at the train on his first arrival in New York has been his associate ever since. As the cab started away from the station Willkie looked out of the window and half to himself exclaimed: "My God, Herbert, there isn't a soul here I know." He added that in Akron, where his office had been more recently, he could not cross the street without knowing every man, woman and child. He knows plenty of people now in New York, but they are not all the kind of people that a big businessman is supposed to know. He turns up in queer places. At restaurants where intellectuals sit and argue all night, at talk parties in Greenwich Village, at lectures in Town Hall by unorthodox lecturers. New York tends to put a smooth, hard polish on its recruits from the provinces, but it has not polished Wendell. And while he likes money as well as the next man, he never has given it the place of power and worship in his mind to which Wall Street thinks it is royally entitled. Commonwealth and Southern paid him $75,000 a year. When offered three times that salary by another business, his answer was, "No, I'm doing an interesting job here and I'll go on with it."

But when someone said, "If you wouldn't leave for money, would you leave to become a college president?"

"Oh," said Wendell quickly, "that's another thing."

Wall Street could never understand that attitude. Indeed, it has never been able quite to make up its mind about Wendell. It criticized him as a utility president because he slashed the rates to the consumer (proving thereby that he could build up consumption and eventually show a better profit) and because he protested in the strategy meetings of the industry against any meddling with legislation, and demanded that first, last and all the time the stockholders and the public were entitled to the truth. The Great Insull in the only meeting the two ever had listened to his views impatiently and finally burst out, "Young man, when you are older you will know more."

The ideas for which he contended then are the professed creed of the industry now. But the men who once criticized him for being too much the reformer were the same men who later begged him to soft-pedal his attacks on the TVA. "You will get the New Deal sore," they said. "You will bring down reprisals on us all."

Wall Street could not awe him. At his first meeting with great bankers, called to fix the refunding price on an important issue of Commonwealth and Southern bonds, the stage was carefully set for the entrance of the young gentleman from Indiana. Around the table were gathered all the partners of two Wall Street houses, the old man at the head. Said the old man in solemn tones:

"Mr. Willkie, we have just been in telephone communication with Paris and London. The foreign situation is very critical. Hitler may move at any moment into Austria. There have been clashes between the Japanese and Russian troops in Manchukuo. The foreign-exchange market is badly unsettled."

Willkie listened gravely and then in a very small, mild voice inquired, "Mr. X, is there anything at all in the foreign situation that might possibly be favorable to our bond issue?"

The stuffed shirts deflated like pricked balloons.

No one can overawe him. Here are the opening words of his testimony before the august Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee when his company was fighting the death sentence.

THE CHAIRMAN: The committee will come to order. Mr. Willkie, will you qualify by telling who you are, and your position?

MR. WILLKIE: My name is Wendell L. Willkie. I live in New York City. I am president of the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation. In order to get the full advantages of diversity, I want to tell you that I was reared in Indiana and spent all of my business life, up to a few years ago, in Ohio.

MR. PETTENGILL: To what state do you attribute most of your virtues?

MR. WILLKIE: You have perhaps heard of the boy who was asked on examination to name the prophets of the Bible, and he named them, and then the next question was: "Divide them between the major and the minor prophets," and the boy wrote, "Far be it from me to discriminate between such eminent gentlemen."

The Committee is Impressed

Other utility executives, before the committee, did not flavor their solemn testimony with the spice of humor. They came in one after the other flanked by high-priced lawyers, and read long, prepared statements. Some of them thought that Willkie was not representing the industry with proper dignity, but I know—and any member of the House of Representatives, Republican or Democrat will tell you—that of all the businessmen who have ever appeared before congressional committees, Willkie created the most sympathetic atmosphere, was surest in his statistics and most adroit in rebuttal, and left behind him the best impression. A fact, by the way, that will not be forgotten by such members of Congress as happened to be delegates to the Philadelphia convention.

What kind of a President will he make? Of the men who have been President in my lifetime he is most like Theodore Roosevelt—like him, and unlike him too. Unlike him in that T. R. loved sports and outdoor exercise. Willkie seems to be one of those big-bodied individuals who require only five to

"That must be for the other Mr. Buck"

CHARLES PEARSON

QUALITY WRITING INSTRUMENTS SINCE 1858
Esterbrook
 RE-NEW-POINT
 FOUNTAIN PEN

at the thrill of perfect pen performance
Choose your pen
 by the point!

WHEN it comes to judging fountain pens, your hand is an expert. If the point is correct for your writing style, your hand will recognize instantly.

Our Choice of 18 Re-New-Point designs. Hands are highly individual. Esterbrook has developed 18 different Re-New-Point designs in order to completely cover all writing requirements.

Esterbrook Gives You Exclusive Features. No other maker has had so many years of experience. No other pen maker has Duracrome, the ideal pen point metal that permits accuracy in point grading never before possible.

For Life-Long Writing Satisfaction

Even if accident should overtake your Esterbrook, you can buy a duplicate Re-New-Point at any dealer's. No repair delays. Simply screw the new Re-New-Point into the barrel yourself. Try an Esterbrook Fountain Pen today. Esterbrook Pen Company, Camden, N. J., or The Brown Brothers, Limited, Toronto, Canada.

WITH ESTERBROOK —

It's a pipe to pick the point that pleases you precisely

Esterbrook PUSH PENCIL

To match your Esterbrook Pen $1.00

A push of the thumb feeds the lead. It is the only Push Pencil with the non-jamming continuous guide tube for lead, and the tip that grips the end of the writing point.

Complete
FOUNTAIN PENS $1.00
 Black or Colors and up

Esterbrook Re-New-Points fit every writing style and purpose
DURACROME RE-NEW-POINTS 25c
 Osmiridium-tipped 50c and 75c

(Price slightly higher in Canada)

Esterbrook FOUNTAIN PENS SOLD BY LEADING STATIONERS AND FOUNTAIN PEN DEALERS

For folks who love sharp flavour

Old English Process Cheddar Cheese

FOR THE FIRST TIME

—THE SHARPNESS OF RARE, AGED CHEDDARS IN A CHEESE WITH UNIFORM FLAVOR AND PERFECT COOKABILITY.
KRAFT MASTER BLENDEES

ACHIEVED IT!

SIZES: 2-POUND LOAF;
¼-POUND PACKAGE

BECOME AN EXPERT

ACCOUNTANT

Executive Accountants and C. P. A.'s earn $2,000 to $10,000 a year. Thousands of firms need them. About 20,000 Certified Public Accountants in the U. S. We train you thoroughly at home in spare time for C. P. A. examinations or executive accounting positions. Previous experience unnecessary. Personal training under supervision of staff of C. P. A.'s, including members of the American Institute of Accountants. Write for free book, "Accountancy, the Profession That Pays." LaSalle Extension University, Dept. 940-HA, Chicago A Correspondence Institution

Warning!

When You Say "Webster's Dictionary"
You MEAN the MERRIAM-Webster

Accept Nothing Less Than the "SUPREME Authority"

LOOK FOR THIS CIRCULAR TRADE-MARK AND THE "NW" MONOGRAM ON THE COVER

THROUGH four generations Webster's Dictionary has earned and maintained first place among reference books. When you are confronted with any question of fact, whenever you need to know, you think of Webster as the utmost in authority, the judge of judges, the court of last appeal. But that confidence is warranted only if you use the MERRIAM-Webster.

Look for the Merriam-Webster trade-mark when you buy a dictionary. The New Second Edition of Webster's New International (unabridged) is 20 years newer, contains 122,000 more entries than any similar dictionary. Provides information in all branches of knowledge. The authority in courts, colleges, newspapers. Prepared by 207 experts. 600,000 entries; 3,350 pages. 12,000 terms illustrated. Ask your bookdealer, or write for free booklet.

G. & C. Merriam Co., Dept. 486, Springfield, Mass.

hours of sleep and no exercise at all. A friend invited him one week end to a swanky Long Island golf club.

"In the whole round he made just one notable shot," the friend confided to me. "At the eighteenth green he was in a trap. He put those big shoulders into a mighty swing with his niblick and the ball shot out about a hundred and eighty yards and broke a clubhouse window." Outdoor sports are no part of his menu.

You remember how T. R. filled the White House with all sorts and conditions of people—travelers, explorers, social workers, authors, musicians, labor leaders, bishops and prize fighters, as well as the regular run of politicians, lawyers and businessmen. Willkie has the same catholic taste in friendships, the same insatiable curiosity about minds. Like T. R., too, he has a truly phenomenal memory.

A friend of T. R.'s once remarked: "If he is ever a witness in a lawsuit and says 'I can't remember,' he will be lying. It is physically impossible for his mind to forget any name or fact, no matter how old or how trivial." Willkie's memory is like that.

Coming away from the play Victoria Regina, he began talking about English history and presently named every king and queen of England in order, with the correct dates.

Some Things to Cling to

Like T. R., he appears to take in a whole page at a glance, and like T. R. also, he reads everything, but especially English and American history, biography and economics. Here are three quotations from his speeches:

Herbert Spencer: "The real issue is whether the lives of citizens are more interfered with than they were; not the nature of the agency which interferes with them. . . . If men use their liberty to surrender their liberty, are they thereafter any less slaves?"

Benjamin Franklin: "They that give up essential liberty to obtain a little temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety."

Ortega y Gasset: "Liberalism is the supreme form of generosity; it is the right the majority concedes to minorities, and hence it is the noblest cry that ever resounded on this planet. It announces the determination to share existence with the enemy."

It's a good thing to have in the White House a man who knows history as Willkie knows it. Events do not slip up on him unawares. He is forewarned by the experience of earlier people in other lands. He knows how many things that sound good are no good, how often they have been tried and have failed before. The quotations cited are especially significant. Again and again in his speeches Willkie comes back to his major theme—that the liberation of the human spirit is the only goal worthy of a man's lifetime effort—for the guardianship of human liberty governments are instituted—and to it the selfish ambitions of men and enterprises must be subordinate.

Well, what else is in the Willkie mind? Candor in the highest degree.

I do not believe it is within the scope of possibility for Willkie to tell a lie, or duck a direct question, or seek to mislead with a half-truth or with double-meaning words. I saw him put to the test in Philadelphia.

Some of the most powerful men in politics begged him to modify his public position on the Reciprocal Trade Treaties and thereby make it easier for groups of delegates from one section of the country to support him. "Surely you don't ask me to trim," he exclaimed. Hastily they assured him that they had no such thought. But if he could just tone it down a bit, just say that he had been partially misunderstood. He was not resentful of their attitude. He appreciated their friendly interest.

"But I wouldn't be true to myself if I trimmed," he said. And he could not be budged.

It was no mere rhetoric when he wrote in his now famous "We, The People," "I will not accept any position that will deprive me of the privilege of standing for what I believe."

With this loyalty to his convictions is linked what is almost an obsession that he must and will under all circumstances be himself. A few days after his nomination he received newspapermen and photographers in his office at Commonwealth and Southern. The photographers, seeking a "different" pose, suggested that he take out his handkerchief and mop his brow.

"I can't fake things," he answered. "I'd like to accommodate you, and I am willing to do anything that would be natural for me to do. It would not be natural for me to mop my brow when it is cool."

It would not be "natural" for him, as a presidential candidate, to milk a cow or ride a mowing machine, or pitch hay, which were things he never did before he became a candidate. Nor to put on funny hats, nor kiss babies, nor jump through any of the well-known and well-worn photographic hoops. Nor in his firm conviction would it be natural or even honest for him to let other men write or help to write his speeches.

Four or five individuals (of whom I was not one) saw his speech of acceptance before it was delivered, and certain suggestions as to phraseology or emphasis were made. But no hand but his own has ever written a line of his speeches.

Before we can complete our picture we must, of course, ask: What are his faults? His shortcomings? Wherein is he weak?

As the public has already discovered, he is not nearly as effective when he reads over the radio as when he speaks without manuscript. There are two reasons for this. His long experience as a trial lawyer accustomed him to finding his inspiration and measuring his effects by watching the eyes of his listeners. Also the technique of handling a dead mike successfully calls for a degree of histrionic talent. Only a consummate actor can give to a "fireside chat" the ring of authenticity. Willkie does not act. He cannot play any part except that part of Wendell L. Willkie. That he may handicap him if he continues to read his speeches; it may even drive him to the dangerous expedient of tossing aside his manuscript, as Al Smith did, and giving it to 'em straight.

Some people say he comments too freely, and that this outspokenness will get him into trouble. But I have watched him at press conferences. He does not hesitate to say, "I don't know" and when he does answer without seeming to think it is generally because he has thought. There are a lot of basic questions that he long ago decided he does not need or intend to reopen.

One great fault grows out of an attractive virtue, his liking for and interest in people. He makes himself accessible to too many people, and he lets them stay too long. This is not an incurable fault. He will have plenty of secretarial help in policing his schedule if he gets to Washington. And his moves, unless I miss my guess, will be in the direction of decentralizing the authority and activity of the White House. He will pick able men in the Cabinet and follow the sound business principle of not doing anything himself that a subordinate or associate can do as well. These Cabinet members and advisers, incidentally, are likely to be on the sunny side rather than the shady side of middle life. His interest in young folks is notable. Always in business he has insisted that higher positions should be filled by promotion from inside the organization. "I want every young fellow who works for us to know that he has a chance to move up."

The Spiritual Side

Finally, I come to the question of Willkie's religious faith. Does he experience religious feeling? Does he believe in God? I put the questions to a man who has probably been closer to any other to him the past ten years. Positively, promptly came the reply: "He is a man of deep religious convictions. As to any particular form of religion, I don't know. But he believes in God and all His workings, which are not as usual as it ought to be these days."

Willkie himself, speaking over the radio on February 18th of this year, on behalf of the Christian colleges, said:

"As a plain businessman, I have a special qualification for taking part in this Universal College Day of Prayer. I consented to do so only because of a deep conviction that this country is facing a spiritual depression as serious as the economic one. We shall not solve one depression without solving the other. Both of them today are based upon the same factor—namely, a lack of faith in the individual. . . . When Christianity was founded 2,000 years ago, it established a new and startling doctrine that every human life was of great value; that man was created in God's image, and that even the hairs of his head were numbered. . . . The Christian faith cannot be reconciled with a totalitarian state. Christianity, like democracy, believes that the individual is of first importance—that the individual is not the creation of government, but the government is the creation of the individual. . . . Christianity has no trade with the philosophy of defeat. Christianity is the faith for men who are foregoing trails to new achievements."

Words like these come from beyond reasoning. With Wendell Willkie it is not enough to look inside his head. What goes on there is conditioned by what is constantly in his heart. He is not afraid to have a heart.

Spare Wheel

Continued from page 22

They are the utility men, or "spare wheels," as the ballplayers call them. We mentioned Cleveland and young Oscar Grimes, but in the Cleveland game it's necessary to go even back to Mr. Grimes to a certain Mr. Bad News Hale, who's been spare-wheeling the Indians for approximately ten years. Odell Hale, Chief Hale, or Bad News Hale, as you will, originally came to Cleveland as a third-sacker, but in his decade of superservice to the Tribe he's played fine baseball at shortstop and second. And when in the game at short, second or third, he's been extremely valuable as an ace left-handed pinch hitter.

But Hale is getting along, and last year this young Mr. Grimes came up from Milwaukee, with a bright reputation as a third baseman, and a neat batting average of .307. With Ken Keltner close to the class of the league at first base, Manager Vitt needed another third-sacker about as seriously as he needed another neck. But second base didn't look too well staffed. About all there was the eldering Bad News Hale, of whom, as of most spare wheels, it almost be said "often a bridesmaid but never a bride," meaning they're always first-class replacements, never quite up to steady varsity status.

Name Your Position

Anyway, Mr. Vitt decided to try to convert the rookie, Grimes, into a first-string second baseman. It didn't work. Too fast, not quickly enough. The young man couldn't get the hang of the pivot, the final trick in second-basing. This was in spring training, and the season began with Bad News Hale, who'd seen half a dozen seasons any number of times lunge at that second-base job and short, securely planked upon that peculiar hassock.

Grimes was on the bench—but not for Jimmy Webb, the Indian shortstop, who was side-lined by injury shortly after the season got under way. Vitt, looking for a sub, took a chance on Oscar Grimes. That was the end of Webb. Grimes' play was sensational. He not only moved Webb completely out of the lineup but completely out of the town. Grimes' spare-wheeling this season for the Chicago White Sox. But, in course, with Cleveland last year, Grimes was the slugging first baseman, likewise injured. In the meantime, Boudreau, sensational young shortstop from Buffalo, had joined the club and was waiting for a chance to break in. Vitt moved Grimes to first base and promoted shortstop to Boudreau. Boudreau filled his assignment neatly, but Grimes was practically terrific at his new position of first base. Trosky returned in time, and by that portion of the season Bad News Hale had dropped out of those inexplicable slumps that plague all ballplayers. So Grimes moved down the base line to that spot he played a great second base for the rest of the year. That's the performance of a top-flight spare wheel.

You can sell or trade a star, because you can buy or swap for a star, but a fellow who can stand in acceptably for a star after another is something less valuable, but just possibly more valuable.

Grimes was dogged for the first half of his season by bad breaks. A knee operation in the spring kept him out of competition, and in the meantime young Ray Mack proved sensational at second base. And just as Grimes was getting out and about on his leg, a hard drive, batted by Manager Vitt in practice, smashed him full in the face and fractured some bones. But those healed, too, and there he sits, fit and ready to step in at any infield position any time he is needed.

The Detroit story, with Croucher, is much of the same. He's a little older, being twenty-six, is a Texan by birth, is five feet eleven inches tall, weighs 165 pounds, bats and throws right-handed. He started his spare-wheeling demonstration with Beaumont in the Texas League, where he played second, third and shortstop, starring in every position. His favorite spot, however, was second, and it seemed futile for Detroit to bring him in from the farm, for Charley Gehringer, the long-time second baseman of the Tigers, was still in top form.

But shortstop had been a soft spot in the Tiger infield for several years, and it was decided to give the young man a fling at that position. This move ran kerplunk into disaster when he suffered a broken leg. But things may work out perfectly for both Detroit and Croucher yet. Dick Bartell filled the short-stopping post in good shape this season. Croucher's leg is reported sound and strong again, and the veteran, Gehringer, is slowing noticeably from an ailing back that may end his career. Croucher stands ready to step in there if Gehringer has to fall out. Or at short, or at third. He can handle them all.

And so it goes with practically every club, the lowly as well as the mighty. Big reasons why Cincinnati won the National League pennant last year were a couple of spare wheels, Eddie Joost and Lew Riggs. The public heard about Walters and Derringer, Lombardi, McCormick, Frey, Myers and Werber, and they all did their bits, but here and there in the clutch when something went wrong in the infield, out from the bench trotted Joost, or Riggs, or both of them, and the machine kept rolling.

The Versatile Johnny Cooney

Perhaps the most remarkable of the lot is the aged Johnny Cooney of the Bees, who broke in twenty years ago as a pitcher. Because he still can play almost anywhere, well enough at least to hold the fort, he hung on on steady wages long after his pitching days were through. As an example of what these fellows must be prepared to do, a contribution of Cooney's in midseason at Boston will admirably suffice.

Brooklyn came to Boston for a Sunday double-header the first week in July barely ahead of Cincinnati in the National League leadership. The day was unusual for, among other things, more than 1,000 rabid Brooklyn rooters followed their team to Boston by special train, and the biggest Bees crowd of the season also came out to see the fun. The first game was airtight. Whit Wyatt was flinging a four-hitter at the Bostonians, but Manuel Salvo was shackling the Dodgers as they stepped up to the plate. In the fifth inning of the fast and scoreless ball game, Buddy Hassett and Dolph Camilli, the two rival first basemen, collided on a bunt Camilli had laid down and Hassett was trying to field. Both were injured and both were forced to leave the ball game.

Old Casey Stengel, the Bees manager, signaled Cooney to go in at first base for Hassett. Cooney, now listed as a player-coach, took over. The game was still scoreless in the bottom of the eighth. Miller led off for Boston and Over Hal, the girls would rave,

Except—he always needs a shave!
Like RUN-DOWN HEELS this habit spoils
Poor Harold's chances with the goils.

NATIONAL SHOE

"Check-Up"

DAYS

Sept. 9-14

Take the whole family's shoes to any good shoe-repairman — during National Shoe "Check-up" days — and get a free estimate on the cost of fixing them up like new! Save money!

If you're tired of rubber heels that run over lopsided after only a few weeks' wear—do this: Go to any good shoe repair shop and have a pair of handsome new Good-year Wingfoot Heels attached. They're made of live rubber so tough that they wear down evenly — so springy that you feel the difference with the very first soft-cushioned step! Get a pair today — only 50¢ at any good shoe repair shop.

Ladies: You can now buy thin lifts for high heels.

made by
GOOD YEAR
the greatest name in rubber

Wingfoot — T.M. The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company

WALK-OVER JODHPUR
Salute to a swell idea!

• This husky got its flying start from aviators. First with uniforms, then as a town shoe. Swank with top-rank ease. Waterproofed Saxon calf. Cordovan color that takes a deep polish. Double sole. Walk-Over prices $7.50 to $12.50. Higher west. Geo. E. Keith Company, Brockton, Mass.

Walk-Over natural fit for easier
walking

YOU can SEE a worn tire, but you can't see dangerously worn brake lining, unless a wheel is pulled. Every RAYBESTOS Service Man offers this safety inspection FREE. From laboratory and proving ground to your local service man, the RAYBESTOS organization and RAYBESTOS lining assure you safe, easier operating brakes.

Free For safety's sake, have a Raybestos Brake Service man pull a wheel every 2,500 miles and show you the actual condition of your brake lining. Takes only a few minutes and costs you nothing.

Raybestos
AMERICA'S BIGGEST SELLING
BRAKE LINING

"YOUR 2 BEST FRIENDS for HIGHWAY SAFETY"

BRAKE LINING, CLUTCH FACINGS, FAN BELTS, HOSE • FOR CARS, TRUCKS, BUSES

The Key to Success

"Books," said Dr. Eliot of Harvard, "are the most constant of friends, the wisest of counsellors, and the most patient of teachers. It is a mistake to suppose that a great deal of leisure is necessary. A few minutes a day, devoted affectionately to good books, will make all the difference."

All the difference! The difference between the plodding clerk and the clear-thinking executive. The difference between the deadly bore and the interesting talker. The difference between success and failure—in business and social life.

DR. ELIOT'S
FIVE-FOOT SHELF OF BOOKS
(The Harvard Classics)

Send for Free Booklets

P. F. Collier & Son Corp.

250 Park Avenue

New York City

By mail, free, send me the booklet that tells all about the most famous library in the world, describing Dr. Eliot's Five-Foot Shelf of Books, (The Harvard Classics), and the beautiful brochure, the "Men Behind the Classics." 450 HCF

Name ☐ Mr.
☐ Mrs.
☐ Miss

Address _____

BRENTWOOD
America's Newest Sweater Wonder
FOR MEN

MIRAPACA

AT BETTER DEALERS EVERYWHERE

ITCH STOPPED
in a Jiffy
-or Money Back

For quick relief from itching of eczema, pimples, athlete's foot, scales, scabies, rashes and other externally caused skin troubles, use world-famous, cooling, antiseptic, liquid D.D.D. Prescription. Greaseless, stainless. Soothes irritation and quickly stops intense itching. 35c trial bottle proves it, or money back. Ask your druggist today for D. D. D. PRESCRIPTION.

This Is Your Invitation

to get acquainted with our attractive money-making offer for taking care of subscriptions for COLLIER'S and the other popular Crowell-Collier Publications. Write to:

Independent Agency Division
The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company
250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Marlin
HIGH SPEED
BLADES
TWENTY FOR 25¢

SINGLE EDGE

15 FOR 25¢

GUARANTEED BY THE MARLIN FIREARMS CO.
NEW HAVEN, CONN.

FREE: Week's supply, double or single edge blades. Write MARLIN, 170 Willow St., New Haven, Conn.

drew a base on balls. Berres, the catcher, sacrificed him to second. Salvo, the pitcher, grounded out but the play was so fast Miller couldn't advance. Then up walked the aged Cooney, who until this season was practically a regular, although into and out of every one of the outfields, and he slapped a ringing single to right, bringing the agile Miller home.

That was the ball game—1 to 0, despite a four-hit performance by Wyatt. The second was just as tight. The score was 2-1, Boston winning. The Dodgers moved on, knocked out of first place. Hassett is practically a star for the Bees, but Cooney's play that day was just as good, or maybe better. And he'd have done just as well in right field or at third base.

Some Spare Wheels Move Up

Do spare wheels always stay spare wheels? Don't some of them develop into regulars?

A thin minority of them who prove to be consistent sluggers find their way to steady posts so their clubs can use their hitting. Rudy York, for instance, is a spare wheel in reverse. The big Detroit is a powerful slugger, and the Tigers had to have his hitting, but here it was practically an extended search to see where in the field he'd do the team the least harm. They tried the outfield. He was clumsy. They put him behind the plate. He was pretty bad. They finally solved it this season when Hank Greenberg volunteered to vacate first base for left field and let the big guy play there.

But mostly, men are spare wheels because they can't hit well enough to rate a regular post.

Sometimes they learn and the picture suddenly changes. One of the most remarkable instances of that is Lou Finney, the Red Sox outfielder, who's been one of the hitting sensations of the American League this season. Finney was a spare wheel with the Red Sox last year, and the final gate for him didn't seem too far away. A Buffalo, Alabama, boy, he joined the Athletics back in 1933, playing outfield and first base, which made him a spare wheel even then.

He didn't make any particular progress with the A's until 1936 when, still playing outfield and first base, he was in 152 games and hit .302. But he was strictly a chop hitter, using a choked bat and a quick swing, and the next year the outfielders merely moved up on him, and what had been hits in '36 were easy outs in '37. He didn't do much better in '38, and in May of '39 the A's asked waivers on him.

Believing he had spare-wheel value, and needing his sort, an outfielder who could likewise sub at first base, the Bosox, who had plenty of hitting strength anyhow, bought him for a little over the waiver price and brought him on to Boston. Although the A's had long since given up on his hitting, Finney, himself, had not. He knew something was wrong, but he couldn't figure what nor why.

Now it so chances that Boston still has actively on its roster as a coach a venerable holdover from baseball's real antiquity, Hugh Duffy. Ask almost anybody who the greatest batter in the history of baseball was, and they'll answer Babe Ruth, some few, perhaps, holding out for Ty Cobb. But if the official records are the measure, the champion batter of all baseball history was this same Hugh Duffy, a man well over seventy whose career dates all the way back to Pop Anson, Al Spalding and Old Hoss Radburn.

Forty-six years ago, six years before the American League was born, the still amazingly active Duffy, as a member of the Boston Nationals, hit the practically unbelievable figure of .438 for the season—that was the full and complete baseball season of 1894. No ballplayer in either league, not even Babe Ruth has ever even come close to that figure since.

That wasn't just a freak performance with him either. It was by far his top but the year before he hit .340, and from '93 to '98, inclusive, his official batting averages were: .378, .438, .35, .302, .341 and .319. For eleven consecutive seasons, he hit better than .300—all that, remember, with a that was mush compared to the present lively number.

And old Duffy can still hit. His for is beautiful, and his remarks are worth listening to. At least, one ball player thought so, and that ballplayer is Finney, who approached Duffy and said he'd appreciate any suggestions the veteran could make about improving his hitting.

First Duffy moved Finney's hands down to the end of the bat. He had him work on a quick snap of the wrists. I had him widen his stance a little, and then he told him to "snap his wrists the ball no matter where it is." I don't know what that means, but Finney seemed to. He told him not to try pull or push the ball to any field a while, but to try to hit every pitch straight back through the box.

That's the way they started, and after Lou got the feel of things old Duffy began to show him how to swing a little quicker to get a certain effect, or delay his swing a little to reach the opposite direction. Finney, who came to Boston tagged as a hitless wonder promptly became famous as one of the most dangerous pinch hitters in the American League.

This year, the spare wheel Finney got his chance when Dom DiMaggio, youngest of the DiMaggio tribe, bought by the Red Sox from the San Francisco Seals for $75,000 was injured in a practice game in Tampa during spring training. Spare Wheel Finney went in sub. Spare Wheel Finney promptly made his wheel to become the slugging sensation of the first half of the American League race, leading the league week after week, and finally dropping but staying well above .350, an extremely notable figure.

Finney gives Duffy full credit. "If I met him five years ago," he says, "I'd away up in the money."

Watch This Young Man

A spare wheel to watch for next year is a young man named Dick West. He is the property of Cincinnati and is currently with Indianapolis where he sees mostly to be serving as a catcher. The real baseball sharps say young West is probably the most remarkable proposition now in any club's flannels. He is the only player they know of, they say—player of major-league future, it means—who can pitch an accepted game one day, then go behind the plate and catch a grand game the next. In addition, he can play first, any position in the outfield and is a wicked pinch hitter. They've been experimenting more and more frantically in the minors to see what he does best, but he's a cinch for a spare-wheeling career even if they can't find out. It may be that he's another Jimmy Foxx with an ability to do it all well, but to play one particular position superbly.

But, if you're looking for tips as current teams go roaring down the stretch, don't overlook the spare wheel. Maybe their tires don't touch the very often, but how the rolling then just may make the vital difference. The lift that means the pennant is park mostly on the bench.

September 28, 1940

5¢ A COPY

Collier's

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY

Happier Hunting Grounds

By COREY FORD
and ALASTAIR MAC BAIN

THE HELL ON DEVIL'S ISLAND

By W. B. Courtney

Little stories about a common scalp condition

CHILDREN CAN BE BRUTES! The boys at school kidded my Jackie unmercifully about scratching his head! His scalp was inflamed and he refused to wear his new blue suit because "the dandruff shows on it!" I had to find some way to help him! . . .

THE MOTHER OF one of Jackie's school mates told me about Listerine. "My son," she said, "had a mean case of infectious dandruff which showed wonderful improvement in less than a month!"

JACKIE'S HIS OLD SELF thanks to Listerine's help! He actually loves giving his head a good work-out morning and evening with Listerine Antiseptic because "It feels so good, Mom!" . . . What's more, he's proudly wearing that blue suit he hated!

IT SNOWED DANDRUFF every time my fiance ran his hand through my hair! My heart almost stopped when I saw the look of surprise on his face! I didn't blame him. Dandruff is so annoying.

MY SISTER SAID, "I bet you have infectious dandruff—you have the symptoms!" Right then and there she insisted I give myself a Listerine Antiseptic massage. How my scalp tingled and glowed! I could feel those dandruff flakes disappearing.

IT'S WONDERFUL to have clean hair and scalp again, and to hear Joe's compliments. I'm giving all the credit in the world to Listerine Antiseptic for the job it did.

WHAT TO TRY NEXT? That dandruff was so unbelievably stubborn! I was sure upset—suppose this was infectious! When my wife suggested Listerine Antiseptic, I said, "First, I'll ask Doctor Joe!"

BOY! WAS I GLAD TO HEAR from the good old Doc that Listerine Antiseptic kills millions of germs associated with infectious dandruff! Hope at last! I'd try Listerine and massage. It helped other dandruff victims—would it help me? I could hardly wait to get started!

AFTER A WEEK I WAS CONVINCED! The itching let up—ugly scales began to go! . . . my scalp felt more vigorous and healthy. Take it from me, massaging with Listerine Antiseptic morning and night sure did a swell job for me.

If you have any of the symptoms of that common scalp condition, infectious dandruff—itching, inflammation, flakes, scales—don't neglect them. If you do, you may regret it. Start this very day with Listerine Antiseptic baths with Listerine Antiseptic.

KILLS "BOTTLE BACILLUS"

Listerine Antiseptic kills millions of germs associated with infectious-type dandruff. Yes—it not only destroys, on contact, hosts of the insidious "bottle bacillus" which leading specialists recognize as a causative agent of the condition.

Just look at the results of one of the clinical tests on men and women who used Listerine Antiseptic and massage twice a day . . . 76% of these sufferers showed either complete disappearance of or marked improvement in the symptoms of dandruff within 30 days.

If you have signs of a dandruff condition, it may be infectious, so get after them today with the treatment thousands follow.

LAMBERT PHARMACAL CO., St. Louis, Mo.

Don't let infectious dandruff get a head start:
USE LISTERINE
NOW!

WILLIAM L. CHENERY Editor
CHARLES COLEBAUGH Managing Editor
THOMAS H. BECK Editorial Director

WALTER DAVENPORT
AIMEE LARKIN
QUENTIN REYNOLDS
KYLE CRICHTON
KENNETH LITTAUER
JAMES N. YOUNG
MAX WILKINSON

Politics
Distrust
Sports
Screen and Theater
Fiction
Fiction
Fiction

WM. O. CHESSMAN
HENRY L. JACKSON
GURNEY WILLIAMS
DENVER LINDLEY
FRANK D. MORRIS
IFOR THOMAS
CLARENCE H. ROY

Art
Fine Feathers
Humor
Articles
Articles
Photographs
Syntax

W. B. COURTNEY
FRANK GERVAZI
MARTHA GELLHORN
JIM MARSHALL
WM. HILLMAN
ROBERT McCORMICK
JOHN T. FLYNN

Geography Medicine Scandals
The European Wash
Associate

THIS WEEK

SEPTEMBER 28, 1940

SHORT STORIES

MEYER LEVIN

Idea Man. Young man going nowhere meets girl. Page 10

ERNEST HAYCOX

The Claim Jumpers. Pioneer skulduggery. Page 13

HAGAR WILDE

Smarty. The people you meet on cruises! Page 21

PAUL DERESCO AUGSBURG

Five Minutes at Dawn. Why Britannia rules the waves. Page 68

THE SHORT SHORT STORY

Rose of His Heart, by Edward L. McKenna. Page 24

SERIAL STORIES

MARGERY ALLINGHAM

Traitor's Purse. The fourth of ten parts. Working in the dark. Page 20

AGATHA CHRISTIE

The Patriotic Murders. Conclusion. Here's the villain. Page 23

ARTICLES

W. B. COURTNEY

The Hell on Devil's Island. French Guiana's felons on the loose. Page 9

BOB CONSIDINE

One-Two Punch. Derringer and Walters, baseball's miracle men. Page 12

COREY FORD and ALASTAIR MacBAIN

Happier Hunting Grounds. What conservation can do—and, incidentally, some fine game-bird drawings. Page 14

OSWALD JACOBY

Hands Across the Table. How's your poker game? Page 22

FRELING FOSTER

Keep Up with the World. Page 6

EDITORIALS

Keeping Our Southern Customers.
From Geneva to Princeton.
Cancer and Common Sense. Page 86

COVER

LEMUEL PALMER

ANY WEEK

WE'RE not regarding our country's military future calmly, a bit of news we're offering both Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Willkie now, knowing that they'll find it out sooner or later anyway. Our pessimism was born of a conversation we had with an officer of the United States Army Quartermaster Corps. He not only showed us the field rations our soldiers are eating these days but gave us four tins of the stuff. When we asked what had become of the monkey meat we fed on when we were making the world safe for democracy in 1918 he gave us that withering sneer that only the fanatical dietitian can produce. He just about told us that had we been fed on the latest rations democracy would have been saved for all time and we shouldn't have been in the fix we find ourselves now. The first can he gave us was a meat-and-vegetable hash—potatoes, onions, beef and pork. We still have our doubts but we'll admit it smells better than monkey meat. The second can contained a meat-and-vegetable stew—carrots, beans, tomato juice and beef. Grudgingly we admit it's not bad but, unlike canned Willie, you taste it only once—when you eat it. The third was pretty tasty—a cunning arrangement of meat and beans. To be truthful about it, it's darned good.

Our quartermaster gave us a fourth can out of which we fished nine highly edible biscuits, three cubes of sugar and an ounce of soluble coffee. All of which was very fine, enormously nutritious and warranted to pack the warrior with vitamins and similar sustaining components. As food, the contents of those cans may be unbeatable but we persisted in thinking of 1918's monkey meat. These new containers are virtually self-opening. But monkey meat had to be attacked with a bayonet or a sharp rock. Sometimes we opened it with a .45. Moreover, when you opened your monkey meat you came first to an inch of good rancid grease that was fine for softening leather-goods, particularly hobnail brogues and mule harness. Once we coated the steps of the officers' mess shack with it and with satisfactorily disastrous results. And the monkey meat itself was wonderful rat bait. You didn't need a trap at all. The unhappy creatures died on the first nibble. To our jaundiced way of thinking we feel that there's something "shoppe" about this new army ration. Soldiers fed like this aren't going to be in a hurry to lick the enemy and go home.

NEVERTHELESS, these rations awoke our martial spirit. The only thing we could think of doing about it was to have our hair cut. We did so, marching to the barber's whistling God Bless America. We're glad we went. Mr. Ruvalo, the gentleman who does his share in the somewhat difficult process of keeping us neat, told us that while very few of his customers wear beards, unbarbered whiskers are by no means dead. He knows a shop, for example, where a large proportion of the customers are or have been bearded gentlemen. But the country's fifth-column scare is taking its hairy toll. "People are beginning to suspect guys with beards," Mr. Ruvalo said. "Never know whether they're real or phony. So up where my friend works the barbers are up to their knees in beards. Before Thanksgiving there won't be an honest beard in America at this rate."

MAYBE there are other ways of becoming a great bird artist; we only know about Lemuel Palmer. You meet Mr. Palmer's birds—on the cover and elsewhere in this issue—for the first time in any magazine, a fact Collier's mentions with satisfaction. Mr. Palmer himself has been a pomologist, map maker, bartender, tree surgeon and guard on a rumrunner. In 1935 he landed the hardest and least interesting job of his career. It was to make 300 pen-and-ink drawings of birds for a juvenile dictionary. That showed him how bad most bird drawings are, and he set out to do something about it in his spare time. His paintings of birds are now the best in the world. Their life, accuracy, character, exactness of color—oh, take a look for yourself.

FROM Mr. George B. MacThurne of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, we have another mild rebuke. But this time it was Mr. MacThurne's mistake, not ours. Mr. MacThurne is a successful engineer although there were days in his undergraduate years that it would have seemed foolhardy to bet that he'd make a go of it. And yet somehow he came through nicely. "Having read in your magazine what a 'Basic College Wardrobe' must consist of if a fellow's to get anywhere at all, it becomes perfectly clear to me why I had so much trouble making the grade. I had no opera hat. I was absolutely innocent of a camel's-hair polo coat or reversible balmacaan. I had no Norwegian peasant slippers and I haven't any yet. And I'll bet ten bucks that you haven't any. Miserable me, I had no tattersall waistcoat, pigskin gloves for town, tail coat, dinner jacket, club-striped belt, evening-wear suspenders, silk foulard handkerchief or black cummerbund. I had a cap—one of a few lids of any kind in my class. I had brogues, one pair, and they served for dancing and field work. And I had hickory shirts one of which I still have—almost good as new after twenty-two years. As I remember, it cost twenty-five cents and has been used for everything from a towel to a crack stopper. I have fought over and through that shirt, God bless it. But I'm much obliged to you, dressy Mr. Jackson, my fine-feathered birdie, has given me the answer to my oldest problem: What was wrong with me in college? I almost blamed the faculty."

WE HAVE just met a lady who is undergoing the rigors of being "retrained" by Hollywood as a future of almost unbearable magnitude was given a small part in a picture you'll see one of these days and well with it that Warner Brothers decided to build her part up—bigger, more impressive. Or her part consisted in standing behind a cigar counter and when Mr. Humphrey Bogart threw down fifteen cents and asked for a pack of cigarettes saying, "Sorry, they're two bits," several expensive writers were in to build up the part. After several weeks of grinding labor the scene was shot over. Now, built up, she says, "Pardon, they're twenty-five cents. They told us that it's terrific."

RIDING west determined to find out what the American electorate has to do about the presidency, we paused at a small but well-known establishment near Dallas, Texas, which restored some of our original faith. A large sign informed us: "Joe's Machine Shop. All Jobs Quick. Mr. Roosevelt, Our Favorite 149-J."

AS a fellow traveler we had met a beautiful young woman whose picture is broadcast to the profit of the manufacturer and the delight of the lions. She had a radio with it tuned in around the dial with unsatisfactory results. Suddenly she switched it off. "What's the use?" she sighed. Then, as an afterthought, "I'm not on tonight anyway."

SO WE were reconciled . . .

Vol. 106, No. 13. Entered as second-class matter at Post Office, Springfield, Ohio, U. S. A., under Act of March 3, 1879, and at Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, Springfield, Ohio. Publishers of Women's Home Companion, The American Magazine, Collier's. Copyright, 1940, The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, in the United States, Canada and Great Britain. Executive and Editorial Offices: 250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.; 6 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London. Published weekly at Springfield, Ohio, U. S. A. Joseph P. Knapp, Chairman of the Board; Thomas H. Beck, President; Albert E. Winger, Executive Vice President and Treasurer; Gertrude B. Lane, Vice President; John S. Brehm, Vice President; William P. Larkin, Vice President; J. A. Welch, Vice President; Denis O'Sullivan, Secretary. Manuscripts or art submitted to Collier's, The National Weekly, should be accompanied by addressed envelopes and sufficient postage for their return. The Publisher assumes no responsibility for return of unsolicited manuscripts or art. Price, 5 cents a copy in the U. S. $2.00 a year, $3.50 for two years, in the United States and Possessions: Argentina, Balearic Islands, Bolivia, Brazil, Canary Islands, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Labrador, Mexico, Newfoundland, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Puerto Rico, Uruguay and Venezuela. Price in Canada, 7 cents a copy; two years, $5.00; three years, $7.00. Foreign subscriptions include $5.50 a year to all other countries. Remit by postal or express money order. In United States funds to The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, Ohio. To avoid mistakes in delivery, subscribers should notify us of address five weeks in advance. Give both old and new addresses.

Be careful of that match!

FAMILIAR, helpful match can turn into a ferocious enemy.

Employed carelessly, discarded thoughtlessly, left within reach of children, the match ranks among the foremost causes of approximately 10,000 household fires which account for most of our country's 10,000 annual deaths from burns.

Naturally, the match isn't the only fire hazard we must guard against in our homes. Many other things we make use of every day are dangerous if misused.

In your home, for instance, are the following fire precautions strictly observed? . . .

Are you sure that all electrical appliances are equipped with only standard, approved connections and wiring, and are in good condition?

Do you avoid the use of gasoline and other flammable liquids for cleaning in the home? . . . the use of kerosene for lighting fires?

Do you keep your gas burners clear of grease which might catch fire? Are your burners regulated to prevent too high a flame—particularly when broiling or frying fats? Do you tie back curtains and other flammable material which might blow onto the flame?

► Is every stove, furnace, or hot pipe shielded adequately from wooden surfaces? . . . Are ashes placed only in metal containers?

These are just a few of the highly important safety measures which deserve your attention. There can be no doubt that, if more of us had a thorough understanding of the various fire hazards, of fire prevention, and of effective fire fighting, the annual toll of 10,000 lives would be reduced, and an enormous saving could be made in the nation's annual fire loss—a loss which last year was estimated at more than $313,000,000.

To help you safeguard your home and your family against fires and other accidents, Metropolitan offers a new, interesting, free booklet, "Home Safety Quiz." Co-operate with your local organizations during National Fire Prevention Week—beginning October 6th—by checking up on possible fire hazards in your home.

COPYRIGHT 1940—METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

Frederick H. Ecker, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD

Leroy A. Lincoln, PRESIDENT

1 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company
1 Madison Avenue, New York, Dept. 1040-C

Please send me a copy of your booklet, "Home Safety Quiz."

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

Plan to visit the Metropolitan's exhibits at the New York World's Fair and at the Golden Gate International Exposition in San Francisco

Your Florsheim Dealer

IS FEATURING

SADDLE STITCHING

Florsheim Dealers are quick to sense shoe styles that are bound to take hold. They sponsored Florsheim "Saddle Stitching" and already these shoes are high on the list of national best-sellers. Because he knows the style men want, as well as the comfort they need, your Florsheim Dealer has won the confidence of his customers and the leadership in his community.

Florsheim "Saddle Stitching" not only sews up the Fall style situation, but offers, at the same time, the season's most practical innovation in shoe making. Multiple rows of stitching, applied as only Florsheim skilled craftsmen know how, strengthen and reinforce the seams—giving new meaning to the famous Florsheim tradition of extra wear. Most Styles $8.95 and $10

THE Florsheim SHOE

THE FLORSHEIM SHOE COMPANY • MANUFACTURERS • CHICAGO • MAKERS OF FINE SHOES FOR MEN AND WOMEN

KEEP UP WITH THE WORLD

By Freling Foster

A peculiarity of gout is that its painful paroxysms almost always occur between two and three o'clock in the morning.—By Marion Signor, New York, New York.

Ordinary ice will not float in alcohol and ice made under high pressure will not float in ordinary water.—By Carl J. Likes, Charleston, South Carolina.

Many temples of worship, particularly those of Ethiopia, are still surmounted by a cross whose points are covered with ostrich eggs, symbolic of the ancient belief that the world was created from an egg.

The meadow lark is the only bird that enjoys the distinction of having been chosen out of a thousand different American species as the "official" bird of seven states.

A girl in the rural section of Korea rarely ever sees the man she is to marry until the day after the wedding. Her parents make all the arrangements with his parents and, throughout the wedding day and night, her eyelids are sealed together.

The discovery of America prior to the voyage of Columbus has been claimed by ten different peoples—the Arabians, Basques, Chinese, Danes, Dutch, Icelanders, Irish, Portuguese, Venetians and the Welsh.—By Evangeline Pugsley, Framingham, Massachusetts.

In a forty-volume Chinese dictionary now being compiled, each word will not only be defined, but also given in each compound word and every type of phrase in which it can be used. For instance, the word "yi" has 11,000 different listings. In order to use this dictionary, therefore, constant reference will have to be made to its four-volume index.

Chicago and St. Louis are the only cities in this country from which through passenger trains or through sleeping cars depart for all parts of the United States.—By Geoffrey Creyke, Washington, D. C.

One of the peculiarities of infrared or invisible light, now being used in factories to hasten the drying of painted and lacquered products, is that it makes the finishes dry from the bottom up instead of from the top down.

Among the many things that are found in their natural state in a variety of distinct colors are diamonds, gold, honey, icebergs, ivory, jade, lightning, pearls, rain, sand, snow and sponges.

In Arizona, a gun or other weapon that has been used to kill game unlawfully is confiscated by the state. But a weapon that has killed a person must be returned to the defendant, if unconvicted, or to an heir, if convicted, after the trial is over.—By Charles L. Ewing, Prescott, Arizona.

No law prohibits the total destruction of United States coins. But there is a federal statute against cleaning and polishing them because of the resultant abrasion and undue wear.—By Joe Sherman, Clemson, South Carolina.

The Hallelujah Chorus of Handel's Messiah is the most famous musical piece, excluding national anthems and hymns, that audiences honor by standing while it is played.—By Mrs. Harry A. Kidston, Centreville, Nova Scotia.

Not only do the animal stars in Hollywood receive much fan mail and many requests for their autographs (paw or nose prints), but they are also awarded trophies, or Oscars, for outstanding performances. Such silver cups are owned by Charmaine, the female donkey that won her laurels in The Fighting Sixty-ninth, and by Skippy, the male dog that became famous in the part of Asta in the Thin Man pictures.

Five dollars will be paid for each interesting or unusual fact accepted for this column. Contributions must be accompanied by satisfactory proof. Address Keep Up with the World, Collier's, 250 Park Avenue, New York City. This column is copyrighted by Collier's, The National Weekly. None of the items may be reproduced without express permission of the publisher.

As you read this, a fleet of cars is silently winging homeward across the continent . . . bringing, from a two-year test, records for performance that we predict will amaze everyone who owns an automobile.

Nash can state this now: the long-heralded day when a large car can do 25 to 30 miles to the gallon of gasoline—is here!

For something of startling import has been discovered by an independent company. Certain principles of the streamline train and stratosphere plane have been applied by Nash to the development of a new kind of automobile.

The size of it . . . the comfort of it . . . the price of it . . . and, above all, its revolutionary economy . . . will vitally interest everyone, for it will be available in price to every new car buyer in America.

Very soon you will be able to judge for yourself.

Look forward to the thrill of your whole car-owning experience when you take the wheel of a 1941 Nash Ambassador!

Nash Motors Div. of Nash-Kelvinator Corp., Detroit, Mich.
(A call to your Nash dealer now will assure an early demonstration)

A NEW KIND OF CAR . . . TO SAVE YOU MONEY EVERY MILE

New PHILCO Inventions bring you new delights in the enjoyment of Radio and Recorded Music!

New Radio Circuit... reduces noise and interference by 5 to 1. Brings in Europe 5 times stronger, 5 times easier to tune!

PHILCO 280X Radio Console (above). One of a wide selection of radio console designs. Powerful 8-tube circuit, new kind of Overseas Wave-Band that brings in Europe 5 times stronger and clearer, new Built-In American and Overseas Aerial System. Eight Electric Push Buttons. Large, impressive cabinet of highly figured Walnut. No installation; just plug in and play. Yours for only $6.95 down. Liberal trade-in allowance.

PHILCO 608P Radio-Phonograph (right). Philco's new, history-making achievements are yours at a popular price in this amazing 9-tube Philco Photo-Electric Radio-Phonograph. Plays any record on a beam of light. Floating, permanent jewel—no needles to change. Tilt-Front Cabinet, no lid to raise, no dark, awkward compartments. Automatic Record Changer for 12 records. American and Foreign radio reception with new kind of Overseas Wave-Band. Handsome cabinet of costly, hand-rubbed Walnut woods. A sensational value and yours for only $12.95 down. Liberal trade-in allowance.

PHILCO 255T (below). The finest table model radio money can buy. Powerful 9-tube circuit gives amazing sensitivity and selectivity. Lovely Walnut cabinet. Only $5.95 down.

Every 1941 Philco is Built to Receive Television Sound and Frequency Modulation . . . the Wireless Way when used with Philco Television Picture Receiver or FM Converter.

See and hear the new PHILCO Radios,
Radio-Phonographs and Auto Radios...FROM $9.95 to $395
...now on display at your nearest Philco dealer!

Whether you choose a radio or radio-phonograph, the Philco you buy today is a new kind of musical instrument . . . thanks to the genius of Philco engineers. Exclusive 1941 inventions have made tone more glorious, performance more thrilling and have brought you amazing improvements in use and convenience.

A brand-new radio circuit makes foreign reception five times stronger, clearer and easier to tune. Selectivity is doubled, noise and interference are reduced by 5 to 1. With more tubes, bigger speakers and lovely cabinet designs, the 1941 Philco excels in all that has made it America's Favorite Radio!

The new Philco Photo-Electric Radio-Phonograph plays any record on a BEAM OF LIGHT . . . a new miracle of radio science! The pointed, scraping needle is gone. Instead, a rounded jewel that never needs changing floats gently over the record grooves and reflects the music on a light beam from a tiny mirror to a photo-electric cell. Record life is increased by ten times . . . you can enjoy your valuable records for 700 playings without fear of wear! And never have you heard such glorious tone . . . rich, deep "lows," clear, brilliant "highs," unmarred by surface noise!

The Tilt-Front Cabinet gives you new convenience. No lid to raise, no need to remove decorations, no dark, unhandy compartments. Just tilt the grille forward and place your records . . . easily and without groping. Only Philco has it!

Make Your Own Records at Home. The Philco Home Recording Unit is optional equipment with every Philco Photo-Electric Radio-Phonograph. Record family voices, radio programs; many fascinating uses!

Music on a Beam of Light!

No needles to change..Records last 10 times longer!
New Purity of Tone!

When war broke out, the 10,000-ton German freighter Goslar was riddled by her crew on a sandbar in the Surinam River to hamper shipments of bauxite from Paramaribo. The crew was interned

THE HELL ON DEVIL'S ISLAND

By W. B. Courtney

THE last and most vicious and terrible story of Devil's Island today waits momentarily to be written in terms of murder and rape and pillage. More than a hundred and fifty thousand practically helpless people in Dutch Guiana—several thousand of them whites, gathered chiefly in the town of Paramaribo on the seaward edge of the jungle—live from noon to night to morning in fearful surmise.

Across the narrow and easily breached frontier set by the Maroni River is "La Guyane"—French Guiana, scene of Cayenne and Ile du Diable, of Kourou and St. Laurent and all the other inhuman hellspots of the penal colony that for generations have been for South America the only visible at-hand example and monument of France's democracy. Here thousands of embittered and hunger-maddened convicts, the most depraved scum of France's underworld, lurk restlessly. Their guards are deserting and fleeing. In a single week of August forty-five skipped: a third of the nondeportee wardens.

The starving criminals, deserted by

Collier's staff writer, reporting from the scene, tells you about Devil's Island and the worst criminals on earth—15,000 desperate men, who, abandoned by a defeated France, threaten the anxious people of Dutch Guiana their home government, detested by the officials of their broken-down local government who for one reason or another have not been able to leave, feared by the native blacks who know full well they will commit murder—and have often done so—for a rag of clothing or a hunk of meat, now heft the machetes and the picks and shovels with which they have contributed, driven by whips, to France's wealth—and glare covetously across into Dutch Guiana. It is readily accessible by riverways and highways to its very heart. It offers none of the lurid and incredible hardships of travel that fiction writers have over-painted. In years past hundreds of escapees have got jobs there in the bauxite and gold camps and sugar plantations—often in Paramaribo itself. Only Holland's modern extradition treaty with France quite lately put a stop to this easy out. Thus, co-operation is expected on the other side: the criminals have their Fifth Column of old pals. So the desperate men of French Guiana look to Dutch Guiana for loot and food.

Of loot there is abundance. There are few lands naturally richer: no equatorial towns prettier or better furnished.

But there is no food in Dutch Guiana, which right up to spring of this year made enormous offerings to the personal treasure chest of the Queen of the Netherlands, and the bank accounts of their absentee speculators. Every day in Paramaribo you can see the police ration out handfuls of rice to the lucky who are in the forefront of the mob and can pay for it—then beat away with rubber bludgeons the bewildered, wailing late-comers and leftovers, and the penniless.

Meanwhile, in French Guiana, no one, including the governor, knows exact figures of that colony—either census, or

(Continued on page 35)

The author talks with Bush Negroes, descendants of escaped slaves and the only people in Dutch Guiana who need not fear an uprising of felons. They can live safely in remote jungles. Even these illiterates would prefer rule by the U. S.

PHOTOGRAPHS FOR COLLIER'S BY GEORGE DE ZAYAS

He sprang toward the machine. "Look! I just had an idea! How does this sound—"

Idea Man

By Meyer Levin

ILLUSTRATED BY EARL BLOSSOM

The pursuit of success, like happiness, is a business requiring the right sort of girl

FOR a time, this fellow had Angela fooled. He looked just like the others. Round-point collars on his shirts. And tweedy. There was confident informality in his manner. Besides, Mr. Nate was immediately willing to see him, and presently they emerged from Mr. Nate's office, evidently bound for a bar, with this fellow talking a streak.

And yet there was something about him that was not like the others. Mr. Nate and his crowd had a pulsating quality; live wires. Looking at any one of them, you could practically see the current charging through the wire. When Mr. Nate passed through a room he seemed to drain it of energy. Now, this fellow was equally full-charged. Yet he did not seem to drain his surroundings, as did those others. Perhaps, instead, he left something. She could not quite tell.

At first she had figured he was one of them, an idea man full of projects, promotion stunts, advertising tricks for taking a nothing item and ballooning it into millions. Like Mr. Nate had done with energy tablets, with reducing juices, with nail dress. Then she figured this fellow was some sort of consultant, maybe a money-wise man. Next, she decided he was just a personal friend, though Mr. Nate scarcely knew any men who might be put in such a category.

Finally, she decided this Mr. Garland was on the other side: trying to sell something. That was one day when Mr.

Nate had her make Mr. Garland sit. For the first time Angela got the idea that Mr. Garland was perhaps putting up a front. And glad of a chance to relax under it. For he did not sit with the irked condescension of a Mr. Nate. He sat with the ease of a man who is not unused to being kept waiting.

GARLAND had been parked there for a good while; Angela happened to be changing her typewriter ribbon when she felt that he was watching her more than casually. She must be a comedy all right. Always got black from head to foot when she tangled with a ribbon. Probably had a carbon smudge on her nose by now.

"What do you pay for that ribbon?" he asked.

So that was all he was interested in. The ribbon. "I don't know," she said. The office boy or somebody bought them by the box. Probably about fifty cents apiece. Nobody in this joint would bother to get a quantity reduction.

"How often do you change it?"

At that moment she had a couple yards of the old ribbon looped over her knees. "Too often!" Angela growled.

"Once every few weeks, I suppose," he speculated. "And there must be at least twenty machines in this office—"

Angela cracked her nail trying to get the ribbon through the guides; she leaned back, exasperated, exhausted. He continued, "And I suppose you need a new manicure every time you—"

"Yes!" she snapped. "And a baboon. At least the baboon might offer to help."

He sprang toward the machine. "Look! I just had an idea! How does this sound—suppose there was a way to re-ink the old ribbon, automatically, right on the machine—" he was inventing it on the spot. A gadget to be ned where the ribbon came from the pol. A tiny inking pad. As the ramifications and possibilities of the device came sparking out of him, he was exactly like Mr. Nate in the throes of a brain storm. Ribbon would always be black. Save money. Save time.

Save annoyance.

"It does sound practical," Angela admitted. "Why don't you get it patented?"

"Kid, if it comes through, I'll make vice-president! What's your name?"
he told him. He squeezed her hand.
"Angela, it's a deal. And I will always be your inspiration!"

Just then she caught a look at herself in the mirror she kept in the top drawer. They laughed together. Her nose and chin were a black exclamation point.

MR. NATE buzzed for her to admit Mr. Garland. The fellow bounced to the door; of course he would try to sell Mr.
Nate on the new idea. And now she knew just what he was. He wasn't what they were—Mr. Nate and the crowd—he was just trying to be what they were.
This ribbon idea was a good idea, and seemed practical, and yet it suddenly seemed pitiful to her; Angela felt concerned for the man.

This time Mr. Nate emerged with
Mr. Garland, seeing him to the outer door.
The friendly rush-out. Angela caught the words, "Listen Nate, there was another idea I wanted to tell you about—"

At the door, Mr. Nate said, "Sure, drop in any day." And as the boss passed her, returning to his private domain, Angela half expected the instruction to give that fellow the out-of-town business hereafter. Mr. Nate paused, looked at her typewriter, pushed down one of the keys, speculatively. "Angela, how often do you have to change the ribbon?" he asked.

She smiled, and told him, adding,
"That sounded like a pretty good idea of Mr. Garland's."

"Oh, he tell you about it? Yah.
Sounded like it might work. But you know—" Mr. Nate shook his head, dismissing the whole thing. "Aw, it's piddling. If a business is solvent, they're not going to worry about saving a dime on a typewriter ribbon. Naw. Not for me. That's the trouble with Gar, always something piddling about those million-dollar ideas of his."

"What does he do?" she asked.

"Do? Guess he's floating, just now.
We used to be at Levering's, in the old days. When I started up here I had him on as a salesman, for a while, but—" he shook his head again. "Not Gar."

"What's the matter with him?" she asked, sensing that something not so white had happened, back there. Maybe Mr. Nate had caused Garland to leave a good job, and then dropped him.
"Can't he sell?"

Mr. Nate laughed. "You can't sell advertising if you're always figuring out how to save the customer money. But Gar's got a good head on him. I suppose he'll hit something sometime. Hit the jack pot and he'll be all right."

THE man was certainly trying hard enough. He was Hydra-headed with ideas; knock one down and up would pop three more. He seemed even worse than the boss, who was always in a ferment with new stunts.

And Garland took to telling her his ideas, as the waits in Mr. Nate's reception room grew longer. It was difficult to say just what was off about his projects; maybe there was nothing wrong with them, maybe it was just that they came from him, and you had the feeling that Garland was not precisely intended to be an idea man. Some of his projects sounded just about like dozens of stunts she had seen successfully carried through by Mr. Nate. There was the radio program with a week in Washington as a prize, for advertising books;
but, as Mr. Nate pointed out, publishers just wouldn't buy big time. Then Garland had a kind of Information Please idea that didn't quite click, and then, as he grew more desperate, some of his ideas grew utterly fantastic.

Like, one day he came in bursting with a plan about midgets. While she tried to keep a straight face, he elaborated: the World's Fair was closing and what would all the midgets do in winter? His idea was to set up a midget village in the court of Radio City, a permanent midget capital of the world!

Think of the contrast, the tiny village among the mightiest skyscrapers! And did she know how many visitors passed through New York every month? And if each paid twenty-five cents—! Moreover, the midgets could be set up in a souvenir-toy industry, so they would have security instead of starving between occasional show jobs—

"You don't realize what those poor creatures have to go through!" he said;
and suddenly, ridiculous as the whole project was, she got it his way. She knew what had started him on it. Not so much the million-dollar dream. But the need to fix a dislocation, to help people—little folk who, he thought, were more distressed than himself. Midgets.
She could look directly into his earnest eyes, without the least desire to laugh.

And yet, in these tough circles, a lamb like Mr. Garland was without a chance.
He'd never get anywhere. And only one thing might wake him out of his illusion. A stinging smack.

"You know, Mr. Garland," Angela said, "this is just typical of all your ideas. Midgets. Big ideas! Imagine suggesting that to Mr. Nate!" She gave it to him directly, including the laugh.
"Midgets!"

His eyes hardened; and for the first time, Angela knew he was focusing on
(Continued on page 27)

It was pitch or get out of baseball for Bucky Walters (above) and Paul Derringer. Result: 52 games and a pennant for the Reds last season

One-Two Punch

By Bob Considine

Bucky Walters and Paul Derringer, pitching pride and joy of the Cincinnati Reds, are the greatest double act in baseball. And both of them were considered failures a few years ago

THEY say there is nothing new under the baseball sun, except petitions against managers. But how about this: a broken-down third baseman and a fifth-rate catcher have become—in the evening of their careers—one of the greatest pitching combinations in diamond history.

William Henry Walters, known to the craft as Bucky, was about to evaporate from the big-league scene as a frustrated third baseman when his manager, Jimmy Wilson, kindled a dormant pitching genius in him. Walters stood on the brink of failure. The Phillies were giving up on him.

Paul Derringer, known on the Cincinnati bench as Duke, peeled off the armor of his chosen career one day—the armor being a catcher's equipment—and strode out to the mound to pitch the last few innings of a game in Springfield, Kentucky, his native clime. Every other pitcher on the team had been battered into helplessness, and, if that had not been so, Derringer might have disappeared a few years ago as an obscure catcher in an obscure league.

Today the two made-over ballplayers have vitalized and propelled a team from last place in the National League in 1937 to first place in 1939; from the red ink to a $400,000 profit in two years. The Reds drew one million cash customers in 1939, an all-time record for a town of less than 500,000 a fact that enabled the National League to outdraw the American for one of the few times in the last twenty years. Thanks to Walters and Derringer the Reds will draw another million this year.

A Place with the Immortals

Without this pair the Reds would have finished armpit-deep in the second division of the league last season. Between them they won fifty-two games, and lost only eighteen. This season Cincinnati's One-Two Punch was still so potent that the Reds soared into August with a fat nine-game lead over the second-place Dodgers. Every other day either Walters or Derringer was in there firing. And if one failed, the other came through.

The Walters-Derringer combine will go down in diamond history along with the immortal pitching teammates of old. In 1904 Christy Mathewson and Iron Man McGinnity won a total of 68 games for the Giants. Matty and Rube Marquard won 50 for the Giants in 1911. Rudolph and James won 53 for the 1914 Braves; and Alexander and Rixey 55 for the 1916 Phillies. Vance and Grimes of the Dodgers, Grove and Earnshaw of the Athletics and the Brothers Dean of the Cardinals were other deathless duos. But these men were born pitchers, great hurlers fulfilling their destiny. Walters and Derringer are ersatz.

Ballplayers have shifted position before this, and will again. But most of the versatile athletes step down to easier tasks. Babe Ruth went from the anguish of the pitcher's box to the pastoral quiet of the outfield. Hank Greenberg found the same sanctuary after an active career around first base. Roger Bresnahan gave up pitching to become a great catcher. What Walters and Derringer did, in effect, was to stop digging ditches to take a chance on making their livings as watchmakers.

Walters was forced to make the leap. Derringer did it accidentally. But once they were pitchers each was faced with backbreaking work. They had to feel their way along. Each scraped bottom. In 1933 Derringer came close to setting a new record for futility by losing twenty-seven games. Three years later Walters lost twenty-one games. Both marks led the major in sheer frustration.

A Literal Flop

The first day Walters pitched in the big leagues he walked four men, hit two others and gave up a bundle of assorted hits in the same inning before being led away by the hand, his livelihood strictly in peril. When Derringer was given his first pitching assignment for the Cardinals at spring training camp he strode to the mound with jaunt, grimly determined to impress his elders. He cocked his left leg high in the air, the way he believed the big leaguers did, and, to his horror and the eternal delight of the critical Cardinals, his spikes somehow became impaled in the webbing of his glove. As when he swung his leg down to the ground he pulled himself into a somewhat of a somersault.

Derringer became a pitcher because he didn't want to miss a fishing trip. He was catching a listless game in Springfield when he realized that the game would make him late for the catch that was taking him on the fishing trip. His team's pitchers were taking a fierce beating when Paul called time, took off his mask, went over to the manager and said, "Lemme pitch, will you? I can get this game over with. He did, too, by dint of a whistling fastball that mowed down the other side through the last four innings. Paul went on the fishing trip, and when he got back another fellow had his catching job. "You're a pitcher now," the manager told him.

Walters started in 1929 with High Point of the Piedmont League. During that season he played every position except behind the plate, and the only reason he didn't catch was that the team's masks wouldn't fit his broad, high-cheekboned face. He even pitched winning five games and losing six.

(Continued on page 65)

He lifted the stove into the wagon. She heard him say, "Nine o'clock now"

The Claim Jumpers

By Ernest Haycox

The surest way to remember the hurt a woman has done is to try too hard to forget it

ILLUSTRATED BY HARRY MORSE MEYERS

NEAR this warm day's end the sun turned the western world afire with its last burst of flame. Blue-low smoke covered the land and hing stirred abroad and the silence
s a thousand miles deep.

Elizabeth Marsh sat in Curtis Kilrain's shanty beside the bed on which newspaperman Barney McNair lay. Moisture made an oil film on her face and the air was so thin that she could draw enough of it into her lungs. Utely uncomfortable, she nevertheless held away the reflection of it from young Barney who watched her with his exhausted eyes. He was a long, extremely thin man who, having come to the prairie for his health, now had lost ground and no longer seemed to care. He said: "Go out and get a breath of air. Don't bother about being kind."

He lay quiet, studying her with a sick man's incurious way. She was one of many people who, from diverse motives, had joined the land rush and had a quarter section in the drawing; she was an alien to this land in every respect—a really beautiful woman, yet thirty, who reminded him of rolling silks and champagne suppers at Cherry's.

Curtis Kilrain came into the cabin with a stone jug. "I had this water heated overnight in the ground. It's pretty cool."

Elizabeth Marsh rose to fill a tin cup. She came to the bed with it and slid behind Barney McNair's back and boosted him upright for his drink. Curtis Kilrain, who had a cynic's sharp observation, noticed that although she didn't smile—she had never smiled since he had met her the first day of the rush—a gentleness moved across her lips. Barney McNair dropped back on the bed with a shallow sigh.

"The sand just runs out. Why do you bother with me, Curtis?"

"Where else would you go?"

"Throw me out into the dust. That's where I'll soon be."

"Meanwhile," said Kilrain indifferently, "you keep me company, which saves me the discomfort of living with myself." He was brusque and impatient with Barney McNair. "If life was so damned important to you when you first got here why isn't it now?"

"Just tired of holding on," murmured Barney McNair.

Elizabeth Marsh said: "Was there a girl, Barney?"

"Was," he said, and moved his head on the bed. "What could I mean to a woman now?"

KILRAIN turned, hearing a horse move up from the prairie. Ingrid Berg's calm voice said, "Hello," and she came to the doorway, her hair burning out its pale flax yellow under the sun. She was sixteen, tall and robust with a round face, solemn and sweet and quite pretty. She had a jar in her hand and came to Barney McNair's bed with it. This is beef broth for you."

"Thanks," said Barney.

She was unsmiling but seemed to smile. Her arms were round, and turned amber by the sun; her body was straight and filled out. She put a hand on his cheek. "It is the heat. Wait until cool fall comes." Moving to the table, she left her jar of broth and went away. Elizabeth Marsh noticed the faint flare of confidence show itself in Barney McNair's eyes. She followed Kilrain outside and these two walked on until they were well away from the shanty.

"Make him want to live, Curtis."

"Sleep is better than misery. There's nothing precious about life."

"He's very young and he's terribly afraid. Help him."

"How can I do that?"

She said a thing to him then that rang odd in his mind. "You have deliberately buried your gifts, Curtis. One of those gifts could make him live." She turned, walking out across the prairie, a straight, rebellious shape in the day. The sun, suddenly, was gone from the earth and a blue light flowed beautifully all around and the stillness was greater than before. From a shanty half a mile away Mrs. Ellis, who had been watching through her window for a steady hour, watched Elizabeth leave Kilrain's. Mrs. Ellis moved her lips, murmuring, "Ah."

The moon was a thin red rind in the night black when Kilrain helped Barney McNair into the wagon bed and rode across the quarter section to pick up Elizabeth Marsh. Two miles west the lights of Harriet Rand's hotel winked out, and toward these lights people drifted, drawn by the need of neighborliness. Faint night wind drifted from the south to cut the clinging heat and to stir the strong earth incense. Kilrain stopped at Brewerton's for a supply of staples and found nobody at home, and drove on to the hotel.

Adam and Mrs. Brewerton and the Bergs and Websters were here, and Andy Pierce who ran the Wagonwheel cattle outfit, and Clyde Jacks. The elderly Jackson couple sat placidly back in the shadows near the Ellis family. The Zimmermans came in and the Maddens appeared. Tom Kertcher moved up from the prairie, walking beside Letty Brewerton. Women drifted into groups, softly catching up the day's gossip, and men squatted on the earth, their voices weary-drawling. Mrs. Rand said, "I have made some cold tea, as cold as it would get," and came over to the wagon, a small woman with great eyes in a soft, serious face and a voice that made its gentle melody. "Get down, Elizabeth."

KILRAIN listened to the way the talk of the other women in this yard faded into a silence that made a barrier against Elizabeth Marsh. She heard it as well and understood it and sat rigid and friendless and scornful on the wagon's seat, touched by the hotel's lamplight. "No," she murmured. "We're not staying long."

Tom Kertcher's voice moved into the awkward silence. "We've got a town started here. What we need next is a post office."

Brewerton said: "What's the name of this town going to be?"

An unknown man's voice came out of the farther shadows: "New York."

Andy Pierce drawled: "That would be (Continued on page 52)"

Happier Hunting Grounds

By Corey Ford and Alastair MacBain

DRAWINGS BY LEMUEL PALMER

The hunter and the farmer, enemies for years, are now real pals. A law passed by Congress brought them together and, working side by side to their mutual advantage and profit, they are doing a fine job of restoring our depleted wild life by providing it with food and shelter. The man with the gun is proving himself the best friend wild life ever had

MALLARD DUCKS

YOU can hardly believe your eyes, as the flat-bottomed boat pokes its nose at last out of the reed-bordered ditch and starts across the riffled waters of Mattamuskeet Lake, on the eastern shore of North Carolina, and for the first time in years, black-silhouetted against the dawn: birds, birds and more birds by the thousands and tens of thousands, rising off the marshes in a cloud, soaring in V formation toward the horizon.

All last night, tossing restlessly and dreaming you had slept through an alarm clock, you could hear the quacking and strident above the steady wind. Still, you could not have been prepared for this sight that greets you. Your gun across your knees, you lean over the bow as the guide poles the lean craft over the lake toward the designated blind, and gaze is mouthed at the show. The squadrons of Canada gray geese, fast-climbing teal, the plump wading grebes, the pintails—most numerous—all—and the mallard and black ducks, streaking past like feathered balls, the heads and ruddy ducks. The canvasbacks and hooded mergansers. The serene white swans, and wheeling like baby carriages over the burnished surface of the lake.

"Reckon they'd be better'n a thousand waterfowl here no more," the guide replies to your question. February, at height of the season, got that many o' geese alone."

He steadies the boat as you climb the sunken box, screened by a willow branches stuck into the bottom. The average depth of the lake, you are surprised to learn, is only four feet; though Mattamuskeet itself covers over fifty thousand acres. Mattamuskeet was taken over in 1934 by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and the Bureau of Biological Resources with funds allotted by the National Waterfowl Act. Today Mattamuskeet's water level carefully controlled, its marshlands cultivated for ducks is one of the finest winter quarters in America for migratory waterfowl.

"Course, they only allow shooting about a fifth of the area at a time," the guide explains, biting a cud of tobacco as you rack your shells in front of you and finger your gun nervously. "Two persons to a blind, a hundred guns a day during the season. That means about three thousand ducks killed a year, and maybe four thousand ducks—less'n a tenth of the total birds, and the shootin' birds and pays for protection for all the birds. Which is a pretty fair proposition around." He glances at the watch strapped to his shaggy wrist. "Get your gun set, mister. It's fifteen seconds of seven o'clock."

To your right, just around the bend, comes the first salvo: the whop! whop! of a nitro load, the dots of sound in the white mist. Your pulse leaps. Beyond the mist somewhere an automatic cuts the

ATE

SHOVELER

WIDGEON

TECKED DUCK

DUCK

GED

GREEN-WINGED TEAL

GREATER SCAUP

LESSER SCAUP

BLUE GOOSE

Migratory Game Birds

Waterfowl shooting—for ducks and geese—is usually done from a sunken blind, located at the edge of a lake or bay and screened from sight by branches and tall grass. Wooden decoys (live decoys and baiting are now forbidden by law) bob on the water before the blind, to lure the birds within gun range. Sometimes waterfowlers resort to pass shooting, a highly sporty kind of gunning that picks off the speeding birds as they flip over a concealed cover on their flights between feeding ground and roost. Of the ducks that may be taken legally during the season—a number of species of ducks, as well as wood ducks, curlews, plover and swan, are protected by law the year round—by far the most popular are the pintail and the mallard, although from an epicure's standpoint the sine qua non is the canvasback which, in the East, disdains fish and feeds almost entirely on wild celery in the Chesapeake, Currituck and Potomac basins. (As a rule, shallow-water ducks, or puddlers, feed on grain and vegetation; the deep-water ducks—such as mergansers and scoters—subsist largely on fish and are pretty unpalatable.) Another popular migratory game bird, the mourning dove, feeds in cornfields through the South; and the dove shooters crouch in makeshift blinds around the edge of the field, while for twenty-five cents a little colored boy keeps the birds milling in circles by wandering up and down the corn rows, whacking the ground with a dry stalk and shouting: "Gahn, y'all, git up an' fly to' de gen'lemen. . . ." C. F. and A. M.

PINTAIL DUCKS

REDHEADED DUCK

CANVASBACK D

CANADA GOOSE

LESSER SNOW G

WILSON'S SNIPE

GADWALL

PINTAIL

three well-spaced shots, in confident rhythm: a seasoned old waterfowler, you assume, a veteran of the marshes. A pause, a single shot as he picks up a cripple. Now a wedge of geese comes out of the silver glare across the lake, and runs the gantlet of the blinds, and you hear the heavy boom-boomp! of a magnum ten, the crack-crack-crack of some enthusiast with a 20-gauge slide action, the twin detonations of a pair of double-barrels letting go. Your heart is pounding; the guns are opening up on all sides of you; the speeding birds cross the sky into the sun.

"Yonder come a couple," your guide whispers sharply. "Stand up an' take 'em, mister!"

The sun mounts higher, your bag is approaching its limit in the bottom of the blind; the little wavelets lap against the sunken boards, and your feet are chunks of ice; and still the guns sound, still the birds come rapidly, endlessly. Is there no end to them? you wonder.

"Why, bless your heart, mister, they's more birds here every year," the guide smiles, biting another hunk of cut plug. "The geese have better'n doubled since this refuge started, while the ducks have increased some five or six times over. It's a funny thing," he ponders, "but it seems the more guns, the more game. . . ."

And that is the thing that is hardest to believe of all. For it is a fact—and the ever-mounting number of birds at Mattamuskeet offers a striking example—that hunting the game is actually the best way of insuring the supply. The increase of sportsmen in this country—paradoxical as it seems—has meant a corresponding increase in the wild life itself.

For years, of course, the sportsman has taken it on the chin. Whenever the game supply has dwindled, it has invariably been the hunter who has gotten the blame. Let the birds begin to fall off, and at once the sentimentalists and restrictionists, pointing accusing fingers at the gunners, demand a national closed season as the cure-all to bring back our vanishing wild life. Everything from the disappearance of the buffalo to the passing of the late-lamented heath hen is laid to the guy with the gun.

But give the guy a break. Look for a moment at the facts. Out of every hundred birds killed in a year, according to statistics, the much-maligned hunter accounts for less than five. Fifty birds a year—half the birds killed annually in this country—are the victims of wild life's dreaded fuehrer, the prowling domestic house cat. Another twenty per cent is destroyed by a sort of wild-life fifth column of predatory foxes, hawks, crows and weasels and skunks. The remainder are victims of forest fire and disease and miscellaneous causes. And the sportsman, in exchange for his modest annual toll of five birds, is wild life's most loyal year-round ally in its fight against all its other enemies.

The sportsman does it for a selfish motive, of course. He wants to increase the supply for his personal pleasure. He has a sizable investment in firearms, equipment and dogs; hunting is his recreation; he has to have something to hunt. And so, if the game grows scarce, he takes steps to do something about it—and when six or eight million sportsmen take steps, they cover a lot of ground. He plants feed patches, and provides cover for nesting birds, and destroys the house cats and other predators that would destroy the young. He raises the cash—twelve million dollars in annual license fees, another three million in excise taxes, untold sums in local fish-and-game club dues—to purchase new breeding areas and refuges. (Mattamuskeet was paid for largely by duck-stamp funds.) In winter, he pulls on his leaky rubber boots—look at your newspaper pictures of last January and see who was risking double pneumonia, wading around out there in the icy salt marshes—and scatters grain in emergency feeding stations to offset the ravages of famine and cold.

SAGE HEN

BLUE GROUSE

HUNGARIAN PARTRIDGE

BOBWHITE QUAIL

MOURNING DOVE

WOODCOCK

WILD TURKEY

The sportsman has changed, you see. No longer is he the pothunter and game hog you used to know ten years ago, who measured his day's success by the size of his bag. No longer do you hear him brag at night: "Got my limit every day this week; yes, sir, got so many hanging out there in the woodshed now I can't even give 'em away. . . ." Perhaps it is because the increasing state restrictions have made getting one's limit no longer much of a feat. Or, perhaps, the sportsman himself has come to see things in a different light. Perhaps he has come to realize that there are other things to bring home at night: memory of the October hills, for example, the sumac bursting out of the gray mist in spurts of flame, the frosty ground crunching under his heavy boots as he sets out at dawn. The unforgettable hunting smell—burnt powder and gun oil and frost grapes and sweat. The hunting sounds—the double plop of ejected shells, the metallic thump of new loads dropping into the barrels, the crisp snap of the locking action as the gun is lifted for the next twisting timber-doodle coming out of the alders. The hunting feel—the car heading home at dusk, the shocks of corn ghostly in the twilight, the dogs panting and lapping themselves contentedly on the back seat. . . .

For the sportsman has a new ally now, curled asleep on his hunting coat in the corner, or sprawled before the fire with a wet muzzle resting across the instep of his outstretched hunting boot. Now you hear, not "How many did you get?" but "How did the new pup work?" The increasing use of the bird dog has not only saved game by retrieving cripples that might otherwise be lost; it has given the sportsman a new goal that has nothing to do with the size of the take. "I only took one out of the covey and let the rest go. I wanted to save 'em to work the pups on sometime." Now, when he goes hunting, he has something more engrossing than the number of birds he kills: the making of a dog, a puppy steady on his first point, a neat bit of work in close cover.

The sportsman has changed; and one of the first signs to notice the change is his ancient enemy, the farmer. For generations, it seems, the farmer and the sportsman had been at swords' points. You could not really blame the farmer. He had seen careless sportsmen break down his fences, and leave hobnailed boot marks over his spruce bed, and neglect to replace his pasture bars, and take pot shots at his pet heifer. Up went his bars and his barbed wire. Up went his ubiquitous sign with the S upside down and the S's backward. "No Hunting Allowed. This Means You."

The farmer closed his land; but he closed it to protect the land, not the game. He had neither time nor money to spend on wild life. He had no idea game was worth fussing over, for that matter. Oh, a mess of quail for Sunday dinner, sure, or maybe a wild turkey for Christmas, but as for leaving hedgerows uncut, or planting in patches, or spending his hard-earned cash to fence nesting areas—don't make him laugh. What was in it for him? What could he get out of it?

And so the predators increased, safe from the sportsmen's guns. And so the breeding grounds were buried over or trampled out by cattle, the winter-feed along the edges of the fields was hacked out with a brush hog, even the protective fence corners were plowed up to get an extra bushel of corn. And so—because nine tenths of our game today is on private farm land—the national supply began to dwindle fast.

That was when the State stepped in. The wiser game

RING-NECKED PHEASANT

MOUNTAIN QUAIL

RUFFED GROUSE

Upland Game Birds

You can argue with a sportsman about religion or politics but not about his favorite form of upland game. Your partridge hunter will insist there is no adversary to match that wise king of game birds, the ruffed grouse, which explodes out of an old apple tree, or a thicket of young beech or pine, at the very moment when you are halfway across a crumbling stone wall with a piece of barbed wire caught in your pants. Your woodcock hunter will claim that the grouselike timberdoodle outranks all the rest. Your quail hunter holds for the ubiquitous bobwhite—principal upland game bird of this country—that feeds in a covey at the edge of a cornfield and, as you walk past your pointing dog, bursts upward all at once like feathered shrapnel under your very nose. All the turkey hunter asks is to scatter a drove of roosting turkeys at night, and call them in at dawn with a chalk-coated cedar box and a piece of slate, picking off an inquisitive twenty-pound gobbler as he pokes his wary head around a stump. Your pheasant hunter, your prairie-chicken hunter, your sportsman who travels a thousand miles to hunt the fast-flying Hungarian partridge—all of them agree on just one thing: There's no other sport in the world to match upland game shooting.

C. F. and A. M.

PRAIRIE CHICKEN

tioners—John D. Chalk of North for example, whose efficient ing commission is an acknowlodel today for other states to ealized that there was only one asically interested in preservlife, and that was the man who ct. So Commissioner Chalk took er by the arm, and marched him
e front door of the farmhouse.
Farmer," he said rapidly, as ed the menacing look in the er's eye, "meet Brother Sports-No, don't kick him out. He's a of yours. He wants to buy a you don't even know you can wants to help you raise that ol, when the time comes, he'll do esting himself, and pay you for takes. I think it's high time gentlemen got together."

ledy this national policy of portsman co-operation—for Game Management in one form oter has spread to every state in in today—has brought our wild bat, in an astonishingly short time. Excellent jobs are bein Pennsylvania, Missouri,
New York, Iowa, Oregon,
Texas, California and Wisconsin.
erving commendation for their
(continued on page 70)

Traitor's Purse

By Margery Allingham

ILLUSTRATED BY ELMORE BROWN

IV

The Story Thus Far:

WAKING in a hospital room, Albert Campion is bewildered—he has no idea of his identity, or of the reason for his presence in the hospital! He hears himself accused of seriously injuring a policeman, and determines to flee until his confused mind is able to straighten out the facts. Undetected, he starts down the hospital corridor, resorting to a fireman's costume, found in a closet, as disguise. In taking the costume, however, he sets off the fire-alarm system. He is enabled to flee the building in the resulting confusion, but is halted momentarily by an attractive girl, whom he manages to elude.

He speeds down the highway in a coupé, but is followed and eventually overtaken by a pursuing car, in which the two occupants—an elderly Mr. Anscombe and the attractive girl in the hospital corridor!—seem to know him very well. From the girl, he learns that he is Albert Campion, and is accompanying her to dinner! On the way, they drop Mr. Anscombe off at his home, where Campion, discovering that the old gentleman has forgotten a package—leaves it for him on his doorstep—to avoid detection of his own disguise.

Later, when they arrive at the home of Aubrey Lee, their host, Campion makes one clear discovery, at least. He loves the girl Amanda—and she belongs somewhere in his life. He also discovers, from a letter saved for him, that he is entrusted with a highly important and secretive mission, by Scotland Yard! Just before dinner, the police arrive at Lee's. They announce that Anscombe has been found murdered, in his garden. And Albert and Amanda are the last two people known to have seen him alive!

Feeling his way cautiously through the interview, Campion is helped somewhat by a newcomer, Mr. Pyne—who, however, disappears at the conclusion of the questioning. Campion finds, however, that he himself has a clear and accurate knowledge of the method of murder—and faces the harrowing thought that he himself may be the murderer! He returns to his host's home, and there finds that he has some vague recollections of Amanda being in danger, but the memory will not come clearly to him.

Late that night, Campion is summoned secretly by Superintendent Hutch, and together they explore an old fortress in the town, which currently is used as the meeting place of the Town Masters, a mysterious and all-powerful local group. Campion gathers that he is on some phase of the mission entrusted to him, and is about to confess his loss of memory to Hutch, when he makes a fortunate discovery of documents that pull at some obscure recollection. They decide to investigate the place further. They are making their way through the deserted building, pursuing the search, when Campion stops Hutch. "Listen—" he whispers, his ears straining at some new sound.

HUTCH became a rock. He had extinguished his torch and now both men waited in the suffocating darkness that filled the world about them like black wool.

"What was it, sir?" The superintendent's agonized demand was only just audible.

"A petrol engine. Listen."

Very faint, so muffled that it was more of a sensation than a sound, the throbbing reached them.

"It's beneath us," said Campion briefly. "Come on."

"Sir . . ." Hutch was a good man and he knew his duty, but there is one state department that does not recognize its servants if they make mistakes. He did not belong to it and thirty years' blameless record was at stake.

"Give me the torches. You stay where you are." It occurred to Campion briefly that it was odd that he should issue orders so naturally and should be so certain that they would be unquestioningly obeyed. He went on alone, moving like a wraith but very quickly, with a sure-footed stealth that betrayed long practice.

He did not see the second iron ladder until he was almost upon it, and he paused with his heart in his mouth, peering down into the abyss.

The throbbing had ceased but in the cold, underground air there was a slight but unmistakable breath of exhaust. He went down the ladder for what seemed a very long way and found himself in a passage no wider than his outstretched arms.

He pressed on and came out suddenly into what felt like a vast open space. The air smelled like a garage and his tiny ray of light suddenly lengthened as the path ended in a yawning hole before his feet. He paused, breathless, and switched off the light.

There was no sound, no sign of life, nothing except the strong reek of gasoline. He took the superintendent's larger torch in his left hand and, holding it at arm's length so that the beam should arise a good three feet away from him on the wrong side, switched it on.

What he saw was so unexpected he almost dropped the torch. He was on a narrow ledge, high up on the wall of a cave which could only be reached by the superintendent's descent, for it stretched away to a narrow, railed opening far away in the distance. This in itself was not altogether unexpected, but what was extraordinary was that directly below him, hidden from the entrance by a natural partition that jutted out into the main body of the cave, was a large pocket or alcove, snug and secret, which housed at the moment something under three hundred three-ton lorries of varying types and ages, but all clearly in good running order and ready for the road.

Campion swung the torch over his head and the finger of light rested on bonnets and cabs, on yawning bodies and spoked wheels. The narrow shaft of light went up one row and down the next, waving dangerously and swept on again.

Campion forced himself to finish his inspection, but that single glimpse of the end of the row had been enough. He had seen the face of the man, crouching back in the shelter of an overhanging cab. It had been a white face in the bright light and it had been familiar. It had flashed into his vision bringing a name with it, a name and a deep feeling of no enthusiasm as so one once said so expressively.

"Weaver Bea."

As he repeated it under his breath it sounded absurd and unlikely and in all the turmoil in his mind it remained familiar and unpleasant.

It was at this point that the full realization of his own utter inefficiency came home to him. The curious sense of purpose that had hitherto characterized his condition was weakened and he began to take a more normal view of the situation in which he found himself, inasmuch as he began to expect himself at every step. He

(Continued on page 42)

He had seen the face of the crouching back in the shelter of the overhanging cab. It had been familiar.

SMARTY

By Hagar Wilde

ILLUSTRATED BY EARL CORDREY

First dispatches from the war between Max Sanders and that girl with the serpent's tongue

THERE was nobody to see Max Sanders off on the S.S. Venida, bound for the Canal Zone and points south, because nobody knew he was going. He did nothing to do but watch the faces at the dock, the faces coming up the gangplank and the faces kissing other faces. He sighed. The law of the sea was that when the visitors-ashore signal sounded all the attractive people now lining about would get off leaving their attractive friends and relatives to

But fifteen minutes before sailing a face arrived which was crowned with yellow hair; not the metallic sort that bounces sunlight off as though it were a rival but a soft, soothing yellow with tricky lights buried in it. Max had an excellent view of her hair because she carried her hat, a confection in felt that must have cost a pretty penny. Her retinue looked expensive, too.

There were four men. The first, dark and serious, probably spent his waking hours in a brokerage office. The orchids she carried in a cellophane box had been sent by the second man. He was older than the girl by eight or ten years and had had as good a view of the world as one can get through the windows of foreign barrooms. The third man had come for the champagne. Bringing up the rear was good Charley.

Charley was the young-bachelor type who stays the young-bachelor type until he falls apart. He carried the hamper, in all probability, contained the champagne.

The girl was leggy and walked as though she knew where she was going. When she gained the deck she said, "I'm 21. Giggi, find the room steward and tell him I want six champagne glasses. Don't take any arguments and don't get lost."

So Charley's name was Giggi and there was champagne in the hamper. About the time they got the glasses filled the visitors-ashore signal would sound and they'd troop off leaving half-empty glasses and a litter in her cabin. She would come up to wave goodbye and they'd shout things from the dock to the deck about being good and taking care of herself and being sure to write. Then, in a body, they'd go somewhere and drink to her gravely.

Presently, absently watching the dock, Max saw Stacey Maxwell come aboard frowning. The girl with Stacey had been crying. When he came abreast Max lifted his hat and said, "Hello, Stacey."

"Sailing?" Stacey said.

"Yes."

"I'm in 15B. Come on down."

"Later."

Max watched the visitors stream ashore, the gangplank raised and the distance between deck and dock widen. The smarty hadn't come above to wave. He became aware of a presence at his elbow and turned to stare into a pair of large blue eyes that had read not wisely but too well the advertisement saying, "Bring out the natural beauty of your eyes. Use Cambellis." The black spikes rising from her eyelids bore no resemblance to eyelashes. They seemed, rather, to be belligerently guarding the portals of vision. She was big. A revoltingly new steamer coat, tightly belted at the waist, hid her figure and with it she wore patent-leather, round-toed pumps with four-inch spike heels. "I hope we have nice weather," she said in a voice as pleasant as a fingernail scratching a calcimined wall. "This is my first trip on a boat."

"A sea voyage is very relaxing," Max said.

Her shrill laugh sent shivers down his spine. "I need to relax, all right. My name is Mildred Corrigan. What is yours?"

(Continued on page 59)

not rich," Max said, "but I'm poor. I've only just got divorced. Does any of it interest you?" "Not remotely," Garda said

Hands Across the Table

By Oswald Jacoby

ILLUSTRATED BY GLUYAS WILLIAMS

Poker has come out of the back room and into the parlor. Here's an expert cardsman's advice on playing the streamlined versions that make the game more interesting and more profitable than ever

When you lose, pay up. It's bad form to be caught without funds

The man who never bluffs never wins, because no one ever calls him

Bookkeeping errors always lead to a certain amount of unpleasantness

THERE is a popular misconception that since poker is a gambling game it is pure luck. Actually nothing could be farther from the fact. Poker is the one game where a player may hold bad cards all evening and still come out a winner.

Poker is a game of money management—not card management. It is a game where the best hand need not win. It may be bluffed out. The good poker player must bluff on occasion. The man who never bluffs never wins, because, like the tight player, no one ever calls him.

This fine American game has always been popular among men. In late years women have taken it up also, and today it is played almost as much, if not as much, as bridge; and all this popularity in spite of the fact that the game operates under local rules that are varied from time to time as new situations arise.

True, there are so-called laws of poker, but these are antiquated and in no sense cover the modern streamlined game.

As long as people gamble there will be both losers and winners; and whatever the game—be it bingo, bridge or poker—and whatever the stakes, some of the losers will be losing more than they really can afford. In the old days this was particularly true of poker, which is one reason why, until recently, the game was held in considerable disrepute. Old-fashioned poker—i.e., straight, stud and draw—were essentially tough games in which the only amusement was obtained through the gambling element. Today the new games suggested in this article are sufficiently interesting to be played for nominal stakes. However, even though the stakes are nominal, people will still get hurt if certain rules aren't adhered to.

First there is the matter of stakes. In this connection our recommendation is to set the stake at as small a figure as you can without boring the players. And once the stake has been set, adhere to it rigidly. In particular it is inadvisable toward the close of a game to raise the limit or the ante. Remember, the stake you have set is always one the players can afford. When you raise the ante or the limit you are increasing the size of the game and someone may get hurt.

Second, set a quitting time. When play begins everyone is exactly even—there are no winners and no losers. The players should know when they want to stop and should set a time for this. Once this stopping time is set, it should be adhered to rigidly. In particular the habit of playing even an extra half-hour should be discouraged.

Let us consider a typical mixed poker game. Two or three married couples and perhaps a couple of bachelors get together to play one or two evenings a week. Everyone has to get up the next morning, and accordingly twelve is fixed as the stopping time. As they adhere to this time rigidly, no harm is done. True, the players will be the least bit tired the next morning, but they are not so tired as to interfere with their efficiency.

However, suppose they once play overtime, even half an hour. Let us see what happens. The next time they play, some loser is sure to say at twelve-thirty: "You know last time we played till one. We ought to do it again tonight." No one can make any objection now, and instead of a twelve-thirty game it has become a one-o'clock game.

This extra half-hour doesn't seem much but it does represent trouble. It causes pretty soon we will find the game stopping at one-thirty, then at two-thirty, and finally we will have a night session, with the men going home at seven in the morning and getting to the office in no condition of any value to themselves or else.

The next time the game is played everyone will resolve to quit early. They probably will—at, say, five o'clock—not much before. The game, which has previously been a relaxation, becomes a serious event. One couple decides they won't play any more after a while it becomes impossible to get up any game whatever.

"Let's Raise the Stakes"

All the above assumes that the game will remain the same even though it continues all night. Actually, once play starts, there is a tendency to raise the stakes. For instance, at twelve-thirty it is decided to play another hour. A player who is out of a hundred chips says, "Let's double the limit for the extra hour. I want to get even." The other player agrees. As a result, at one-thirty the second quitting time, a player who was a big winner at half-past twelve is now a big loser. He says, "You have to give me a chance. Let's play another hour and double the limit."

When the game finally breaks up at seven in the morning it is discovered the big loser is now out over a hundred chips, to say nothing of a night's sleep. If the chips have a value of a dime, that means ten dollars instead of one dollar; if the chips have a value of a penny, it means one hundred dollars instead of ten—in either case under the circumstances more than the evening's entertainment could possibly be worth to him.

A third point, which may sound a little sordid, is just as essential to the enjoyment of every game. Don't start an evening with: "I haven't got to play with me now. I'll pay you next day."

In order to make a poker game interesting it is a good idea to have a certain number of chips in play at all times. In other words, a game where the limit is a hundred chips worth a penny is much more fun than a game where the limit is ten chips worth ten cents. And incidentally, the game where the limit is a hundred penny chips, while nominally the same size as the game where the limit is ten-cent chips, actually is substantially smaller, the reason being that a player is much more cautious about playing one hundred penny chips in the pocket than he would be with ten ten-cent chips.

In my opinion it is inadvisable to play with chips nominally worth more than a penny. But for those who insist on a penny ante, a simple way of covering the ante is to play with penny chips. If you come to settle the game at five or ten cents on the dollar, the losses are not so great.

A nice variation if you want to keep the losses is to play so-called "penny" poker. Suppose it is decided to play one or two evenings a week.

You're starting trouble by asking for another hour of play

(Continued on page 31)

The Patriotic Murders

by Agatha Christie

ILLUSTRATED BY MARIO COOPER

The Story Thus Far:

HERCULE POIROT, noted Belgian detective, leaves the office of Henry Morley, a London dentist. Shortly after, Inspector Japp, Scotland Yard, telephones him to say that Morley has committed suicide.

A skeptical person, Poirot does not accept Japp's verdict. He believes Morley, healthy, happy and prosperous, was shot to death. He starts an investigation. Suspect No. 1 is Amiotis, a wealthy Greek—patient of Morley's—but before he can be interviewed, he is found dead of an overdose of dental drugs! The inference is obvious; having killed the Greek accidentally, Morley, in remorse, had killed himself. But Poirot does not accept this theory, nor does Mr. Barnes, an ex-secretary, to whom the Belgian goes for advice. His theory is that a band of conspirators had killed Morley because he interfered with their plans to kill Alistair Blunt, financier.

Another problem appears when Miss Margaret Sainsbury Seale, also a patient of Morley's, mysteriously disappears. And Poirot, investigating various persons—Howard Jones, young radical from America; Frank Carter, fiancé of Morley's secretary; Mr. Japp; Jane Olivera, Blunt's niece, in love with Raikes; and others—cannot fathom Miss Seale's disappearance.

At first, a body found in the apartment of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Chapman seems to be that of Miss Seale. Further investigation reveals, however, the victim to be Mrs. Chapman—but disguised as Miss Seale! Immediately, the search for Miss Seale is mysteriously postponed by the foreign office.

Later, Poirot receives a warning by telephone to keep out of the investigation, or he will meet harm!

Poirot accepts a week-end invitation to Morley's manor. There, in the garden, an assailant makes a shot at Blunt. Either of two men—Amiotis, or Frank Carter, (disguised as a new neighbor)—could be guilty. Poirot questions a list of suspects—and slowly a pattern of the murder begins to form for him. Carter is arrested. Frantic, he confesses to the Belgian that he was present, perhaps at the time of the murder—but that he saw the murderer disappearing when he discovered the body.

Conclusion

ON THE following day Hercule Poirot spent some hours with a theatrical agent of his acquaintance. In the afternoon he went to Oxford. On the day after that he drove to the country—it was late when he returned.

He had telephoned before he left to cancel an appointment with Mr. Alistair Blunt for that same evening.

It was half past nine when he reached Gothic House.

Alistair Blunt was alone in his library. Poirot was shown in.

He looked an eager question at his visitor as he shook hands. He said, "Well?"

Slowly, Hercule Poirot nodded his head.

Blunt looked at him in almost incredulous appreciation.

"Have you found her?"

(Continued on page 78)

Frank Carter did not recognize you. He only saw you from above"

She had her own weakness—she loved flowers. Whenever Joe won he used to bring flowers for her

Rose of His Heart

By Edward L. McKenna

THIS is about a fellow who never amounted to a great deal, and about his wife, who was much more important, as these things go. Call them Joe and Agnes.

Joe was a horse player. Besides that, he liked his liquor. He lost plenty of jobs through his drinking, and the horses kept him broke most of the time. He was a competent man, in his line: he was a good mechanic, when his hands were steady. He could always get another job, he said, and it wasn't quite a delusion, for he always went and got one; good mechanics are scarce enough, and the town is wide.

Agnes—well, Agnes was just another horse player's wife, long-suffering, and sweet, and beautiful enough to catch at a gambler's heart, because gamblers always are looking for something they used to see dimly in the spring dusk, when life still lay before them.

They didn't have any children. Maybe that was just as well, for any woman had trouble enough if she had Joe.

She had her own weakness—she loved flowers. Whenever Joe won, he used to bring flowers home for her, and lots of other times he brought them, even if he spent his last quarter.

Don't think they didn't get along all right, most of the time. Agnes was deceitful to him, in this: she saved out money on him; she got money out of him, when he had it, and then claimed that she had spent it, or that he had borrowed it back again from her. He'd nod, and never question nor complain.

That was how they got a little house, first payment down, and a car for which there never could be but one payment, so old it was and broken down. Joe fixed it so it wasn't bad. He was always tinkering with it.

One day, this day it was, Agnes was out buying the groceries, and she was wearing her four-dollar dress and the faint and distant smile of a happy woman. She was driving her car, their car, and she saw Joe.

He was walking along the street, and carrying a big bunch of flowers. He wasn't going too steady, but he was giving everybody in the world a great big smile.

"He's home early," Agnes said. "He wants to get home early, and surprise me. I won't pick him up. He wants me to be surprised."

She was surprised, all right. Still smiling foolishly, he turned down the wrong street.

"Well. Well, the big dope," said Agnes, and fear clutched at her heart. She was thirty-four years old; Joe was thirty-eight or so.

"Where's he going? Where's he going, with those flowers?" she said.

She bought her groceries, and her rack of lamb, purposely delaying, sniffing, arguing about the quality of carrots and asparagus and peas. "He'll be home. Let him get a chance to get home," she was thinking. "Let him put the roses in the big vase."

BUT she was home before him, so long before him. Maybe it was fifteen minutes, maybe it was five, maybe it was half an hour. No time is short when your heart is standing still.

In he came, at last. "He's sober. He's cold sober," she said to herself.

He had no flowers.

"Hello, Agnes. Hya, kid?" he said.

"Hello Joe." She sat there. "Where you been?" she said.

"I been places. I been places," he said, and beamed at her.

"That's the old line," said Agnes to herself. "He's gonna kid me along."

"You're looking all right, kid," said Joe.

"You had a few drinks," said Agnes. She tried to make her voice sound cold and harsh, and not full of despair. Well, it's okay. It's okay, she was thinking. I had a lot of fun with Joe. He gave me a lot of happy years.

"Sure, I had a few drinks. Certainly I had a few drinks. Not many, not many, just a couple. Guess what? I got something to tell you. Guess what?"

"I—I don't know."

"I got something to tell you. Then I got something to ask you."

"I'd do any—anything you asked me. And you—you don't have to tell me—you don't—you don't have to. . ."

"Yeah? Yeah? Well lookit here, old lady. Lookit here."

He took a big, thick roll of dirty bills out of his pocket and threw it in her lap.

"You count that. It's all there, every nickel of it. Listen. There was a dog in the third, at Suffolk Downs. A guy gives me this dog, a week ago. I said I wasn't gonna bet no more. The way you cried, the last time, and all. But listen. The name of this dog is Rose of My Heart. Rose of My Heart, can you feature that? I kept saying to myself, you know how it is with a hunch, 'My wife likes roses, my wife likes roses.' I couldn't do anything else. Today is payday, I held out five bucks, I put thirty-two on this Rose of My Heart. Pays sixteen-sixty. You count it."

"I—I don't want to count it."

"So I get out of that drum, the one on Fifty-second, yeah, and I got the car to Sixtieth. You know the guy at Sixtieth, the one who sells the flowers."

"Yes. Yes?" she said.

"I bought every rose he had. I give him the five, and my change—I had my transfer, and he gives me every rose he got. I can hardly carry them. I never saw such a bunch of roses."

"Didn't I? Oh, didn't I?" said Agnes to herself.

"So I got off at the avenue, and started to walk up. Then I got another hunch. I said to myself, you get a break, you give somebody else a break. I turned around. I walk over to the M. ericordia Hospital. Poor sick people."

"That's—that's quite a walk." But she was up that way, up the way he was going.

"IT'S eighteen blocks. It's more than that."

"Why'n't you take a cab?"

"I didn't want to spoil the roll. ten. The Sister up there, she give me a holy medal. Look. You take it."

"No. You keep it. Keep it for good luck." Both of them knocked on the door sharply, and simultaneously.

"Now listen. You count that roll, then you give me ten bucks. What we got for supper, throw it out. Walk out, and on the way back, I buy you ten bucks' worth of roses. What do you say?"

"Twenty, forty, fifty, fifty-five," said Agnes. He beamed at her. More nothing to a gambler but something to count, and to have briefly.

"He'll never—he'll never get where," she was thinking. "He'll never change. Oh, anyhow, he'll never change." "How much you say he paid?" she said.

"Sixteen-sixty."

"They gyped you two bucks."

"Don't you think you got to give a runner anything?" he said, indignantly. She smiled at him.

"Here, runner," she said, and handed him ten dollars. "Now wait till I get my hat and powder my nose."

"Don't be long," he said.

How I made the Farmer's Boy yell "Hooray!"

My husband is a city man now, but he was born and raised on a truck farm. And one of his pet peeves used to be that we never could get vegetables that had the same flavor and tenderness as "fresh-picked" ones . . .

2. So you should have seen my grumble-boy that night I first served him Birds Eye Quick-Frozen Asparagus Tips. One of those rapt, man-enjoying-food smiles spread over his face. "Hooray," he yelled. "Farm flavor at last! And in September, at that! How'd you do it?"

"Quite easy," said I, looking very superior. "The Birds Eye people take the grandest, tenderest asparagus that can be raised, cut off the tips and Quick-Freeze them within 4 hours after picking. That completely seals in the garden-freshness and the flavor. And the vitamins, too. You don't ask me how . . .

4. "And furthermore, Handsome . . . Birds Eye Asparagus Tips are all cleaned for me. I merely take them out of a neat package and drop them directly into the pot. Saves me over 25 minutes' kitchen work. Not that you'd care about that. But I do!"

5. Goodness knows, you can't get garden-fresh asparagus like Birds Eye anywhere else this time of year. And the big joy is that you can buy it at an in-season price! One box of all-green Birds Eye Asparagus Tips is equal to two medium-sized bunches and serves 4!

5. I leaned over and gave me a squeeze. "Honey," he said, "the way I've fussed about food, I don't deserve your trying to please me. And saving us money in the long run! You're grand . . ." That's all, except that we are now actually live on Birds Eye Foods now. And Bill's not grumbling any more.

7. Where can you buy these marvelous foods? . . . You may not always find a Birds Eye dealer right around the corner. For all stores do not yet have these grand foods. But it will be worth your while to look for one. Finding it, can bring you the food thrill of your life. Remember, Birds Eye represents only the top quality in Quick-Frozen Foods. Therefore, be sure you look for the Birds Eye in the window, and the Birds Eye on the package.

Order Today From This List—Save Money!

Green Asparagus Cuts
String Beans—three kinds!
Peas—shelled for cooking
Broilers—dressed, drawn Ocean-fresh Haddock Fillets

Serve Succotash Tonight
—made from tender, golden Birds Eye Cut Corn and garden-fresh Birds Eye Baby Lima Beans!
Serve with plenty of fresh, creamy butter. It's grand!

And there are more than 50 other Birds Eye Foods . . . all cleaned, trimmed, ready to cook or serve. Get a box today!

FARM-FRESH FOODS—IN PACKAGES

For more information, write Frosted Foods Sales Corp., 250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Copyright, 1940, General Foods Corp.

For 1941... A New
MORE BEAUTIFUL
Chrysler

New
AIRFLOW Bodies

NOW

Fluid Drive
 WITH
AUTOMATIC SAFETY CONTROL

FOR 1941, Chrysler combines Fluid Drive with new Automatic Safety Control! Jerks and labors of gear shifting become a mere memory. The car takes off with the smoothness of a liner... suits its gear ratios to every normal driving condition... floats effortlessly along... but is always under positive control.

Fluid Drive was introduced by Chrysler in 1938. It has behind it millions of miles and many thousands of delighted owners. Fluid Drive with Automatic Safety Control is available on all 1941 Chryslers, optional on some.

The 1941 Chryslers have 108 and 135 horsepower engines which have all vital metal parts Superfinished so you may drive as you desire from the first mile. Dozens of other engineering advancements. You are cordially invited to try them!

builder's have you had such an opportunity to select a car to suit your taste, your preferences, your individuality.

Beneath those deep, wider seats, the softest Airfoam! The button-tufted upholstery is real, not just ornamental. Every fitting bespeaks real quality! Never before has so much sheer quality been built into cars of moderate price. Your Chrysler dealer invites you to see for yourself!

Wider, Lower,
 space-flared bodies
 ... 5-foot cushions ...
 Added elbow room!

New Airflow bodies... wider... lower! New radiator design. New, longer hood. New sharp backward rake to the windshield which has 676 sq. inches of glass area... thinner door posts... bigger curved rear window... the unbroken vision of an observation car! Bodies belled out at the window line... for beauty, for room, for distinction! Lines all sweeping back to a new and graceful rear... large luggage locker.

The last word in roominess... any more would seem a waste! Five-foot cushions... extra elbow room... doors wider than most house doors... extra leg room. Lower center of gravity... lower roof and floor. Lower, stronger, double-channel, welded frame with new hydraulic shock absorbers provides a still safer Floating Ride.

The nation which acclaimed the beauty of the 1940 Chryslers will vote the brilliant, new 1941 beauties the smartest Chryslers in history!

Tailored to Taste
 Individualized interiors
 ... Richer fabrics ...
 Harmonizing plastic

Inside and out, the 1941 Chryslers are a symphony of color... and tailored to your taste! The exquisite new instrument panels have insets of colorful plastic... matching plastic door panels. Upholstery fabrics to suit your individual taste in color and texture!

A wide selection of rich broadcloth, pile fabrics, Bedford cords, novel new materials... harmonizing two-tones and beautiful leathers. Never before, except at a custom coach-

Be Modern — BUY CHRYSLER

Idea Man

Continued from page 11

her, considering what she, as a person, was doing to him. She had to follow with the second slap. "Anyway," she said, "Mr. Nate is out to lunch."

He nodded, and arose. "Okay." His smile was small and tight. "Guess I'll get some lunch myself."

She knew he wouldn't come back. Not that he could ever have got anywhere with Mr. Nate. But suddenly Angela felt there were things she ought to tell him. It was only fair that she let him know what they thought of him.

Grabbing her hat, Angela ran out. "Wait for me!" she yelled, and Jim the elevator man held the door open. Mr. Garland stepped back in the car to make room for her. He evidently was not going to speak, so she had to start it. "You know, I eat too," she said. He gave her that same examining look. Then he smiled.

"How about eating with me?" he came through. "If you haven't got a date."

"Okay. Guess I've got one now."

AS THEY emerged from the elevator, she thought of a way to make it simpler for him, if he was really low on money. "Look, of course you always lunch with the crowd at the Lohengrin," Angela said, "but—well, I don't like those people to think I go out with the clients—and you don't want them to think you're polishing up to Nate's secretary, so—" she steered him into a French place on 49th, where there was a good lunch for fifty cents, and if he could afford to be expensive, he could show it on wine.

He ordered easily, without the fluster or bluster that even a big shot like Mr. Nate exhibited; more and more, Angela began to feel her instinct had been right, about him.

There was a music box in the place, but instead of being loaded with hot numbers it was stocked with classical recordings. Garland turned his ear, appreciatively. "Sibelius. I think that's the London Philharmonic. Like it?"

Before they were through the hors d'oeuvres they had matched tastes in music and come out pretty nicely. He had even asked her to the concert that night, and had been chagrined and kind of curious at her having a previous date.

Angela could just imagine Mr. Nate or Pat Daly or any of that crowd knowing, or caring, about the difference between a London and a Boston recording of Sibelius.

So then she thought she might lead the talk back to the office. She mentioned Nate's having said he and Garland had worked together, at the Levering Agency.

Sure, gosh, those were the days! The talk of music had excited him, and now these memories brought exhilaration to his cheeks. What a brilliant gang! Pat Daly, and Nate, and Crossman—why, everybody that had worked at Levering's in those days was out on his own doing big things now. "That seems to happen every once in a while—a bunch of brilliant men drift together in one place," he said. "We had it in college in my year too." Explorers, authors, actors—he named the celebrities who had been his classmates. "Nate and I used to run the paper, he was advertising manager and I was business manager. Why, we practically ran all the local newspapers out of existence; they sure were glad to see us graduate. You know Nate and his brain storms!"

So now she knew what it was, with him. The others had all cashed in, each had made his flash. And Garland, who had been one of the crowd, a college chum, a desk neighbor at Levering's, Garland still had to crash through with a million-dollar idea.

He told her more about that crowd. Pat Daly, with his audacity—like the time he had cabled Mahatma Gandhi for his endorsement of goat-milk. And about Nate's craze for long-distance telephone calls—

"You're telling me!" Angela related how Nate and his salesmen would hold two-hour transcontinental conversations, just telling each other Confucius Says. And presently they were laughing together at those other people, at the antics of a childish and irresponsible crowd.

So then she said, "You know, Mr. Garland, if you don't mind my butting in—one thing that puzzles me is why a man like you—well, why you want to get hooked up with Nate, why you keep trying to do something together with him. You're exact opposites."

He took it right. Almost impersonally. He wanted her to explain what

How's your "Pep Appeal"?

—by Williamson

Gran'ma: Fiddlesticks to "glamor"! What you need is some pep appeal!

Cinderella: What the dickens is "pep appeal," Gran'ma?

Gran'ma: It's "oomph" and zest and zip-zip! You haven't any! You don't eat right. Don't get your vitamins. You come with me and we'll make a start right now.

Gran'ma: Now remember this! We can't have pep without vitamins. And one of the best ways to get two of the important vitamins (B<sub>1</sub> and D) is right in that delicious cereal, KELLOGG'S PEP.

Cinderella: Never mind your old vitamins, Gran'ma. Your PEP tastes delicious! So crisp and flaky and full of flavor! I'm going to have it every breakfast!

Cinderella: (sometime later) I'll see tonight if your idea works.

Gran'ma: Where there's pep there's hope!

Vitamins for pep! Kellogg's Pep for vitamins!

Pep contains per serving: 4/5 to 1/5 the minimum daily need of vitamin B<sub>1</sub>, according to age; 1/2 the daily need of vitamin D. For sources of other vitamins, see the Pep package.

MADE BY KELLOGG'S IN BATTLE CREEK

COPYRIGHT, 1940, BY KELLOGG COMPANY

"The War Department discovered that Wilkins' house occupies a strategically important spot"

CARL ROSE

OL' JUDGE ROBBINS

IN RECENT LABORATORY
"SMOKING BOWL" TESTS, PRINCE ALBERT BURNED

86 DEGREES COOLER

THAN THE AVERAGE OF
THE 30 OTHER OF THE LARGEST-SELLING BRANDS TESTED — COOLEST OF ALL!

HIT THE HAPPY TRAIL

TO Smoother Smokes

50 pipefuls of fragrant tobacco in every handy

tin of Prince Albert

Copyright, 1940
R. J. Reynolds
Tobacco Company
Winston-Salem,
North Carolina

PRINCE ALBERT

THE NATIONAL JOY SMOKE

made her think that way. "Well," she said, "like the ideas you have, compared to the ideas Nate and his crowd put over. Every idea you have, I've noticed, is to save something, to give people something for their money. But Nate and Daly and those boys never think of things that way. All they think of are stunts that are perfectly useless, or wasteful, or just silly. Like, well, take way at the beginning, that jigsaw craze Mr. Nate started with—you would never dream of putting over a silly thing like jigsaws. Your mind doesn't work their way, it seems to me."

His face had utterly changed. He had become serious. "That jigsaw stunt came in while Nate and I were at Levering's. A fellow was peddling the idea and I talked to him first. Didn't sound like much to me; but Nate chased him up, afterward, and made a million on it."

Then that was his shame. And that was why he had to prove he could do it, now. She wanted to reach her hand out.

HALF under his breath, Garland was saying, rather finally, "There must be something wrong with me. I have to admit, I've had the same breaks as the rest of those boys. I guess my ideas just aren't any good."

He was speaking mostly to himself, and yet she was included. Angela tried not to believe it meant anything that he made his admission to her. He just had to say it to someone. It was kind of weak of him, and yet it was honest.

And that was when she knew he'd got her. Perhaps, to him, she was just a girl across the table, someone who didn't matter, so he could let down the bars on his pride, and talk. She would have to reach him, too. She would have to make him see what she was, what she could be, for him.

He had pulled himself straight, and was saying, toughened, but ruefully, "I guess I'm not as smart as they are."

"No. You're not as smart," she said. "You're probably more intelligent, but not as smart. So why don't you stop chasing them? Why don't you do things your own way? Things you can do."

There; she had slapped him again. And it hadn't worked. He was drawing away, into himself, putting on the shell.

She might have done it the other way. She could have made him feel superior, just by telling him what was happening in the office—how even at this moment Mr. Nate's lopsided pyramid was ready to topple at a single blow. Instead, she drove in deeper.

"Look," Angela said, "this may lose me your friendship, but I'll tell you what that crowd thinks of you. They think you missed the boat. Mr. Nate was talking about you to Pat Daly the other day. He said every idea you have is for saving pennies on something, so you must be broke." His color was rising; she wondered if she should even insist on paying for her own lunch. "One thing they know about their kind of business, and you don't, is that even in these times you can make a fortune selling nonsense, but you can't sell people sense. You're not dumb enough or cynical enough for their game, Mr. Garland. That's what people like Nate have that you don't have, contempt for the world."

"Thanks," he said. "Then you think I'm wasting my time?"

"Yes," she said honestly. "You're wasting your time."

"You've been very kind," he said. "You've made my deficiencies seem so noble."

Then he stayed away. Every time the door opened, Angela found herself looking for him, expecting the assault of his breezy and yet somehow imitation confidence, and the subdued agony it gave her: as of watching an amateur tightrope walker.

By the end of the week, she was wondering if he might be contacting Mr. Nate outside the office, avoiding her because of that talk. Well, if that was all he was, it was just as well that nothing had really started between them. Still, she found herself looking for him, at the symphony. Perhaps he was even too broke to buy tickets.

She planned to make some casual inquiry about Mr. Garland, some day, of Mr. Nate. Just to get the man settled and out of her mind. But the right opportunity didn't come; Mr. Nate was too snappish, these days. Nate's latest brain storm, an attempt to revive the jigsaw puzzles as war maps, wasn't going over at all. In fact there had been a succession of failures, from the parlor pin games on, and the tension in the office was becoming unbearable. Oh, sure, one fine morning Lucas would call up from Toledo or Seattle with a thousand-dollar-a-week newspaper hookup for the jigsaw war map, or maybe a big advertising contract would fly in through the transom, but meanwhile she happened to know that Nate was even running up a bill with his barber. So she didn't bother Nate about Mr. Garland.

And then he did call. She recognized his voice and was about to give him Nate but he said no, he didn't want to talk to Nate. He was calling her. Would she come and hear Hubermann, with him? It was a kind of celebration. New job. And in a way he owed it to her.

The date was all right. It was really swell. They went dancing after the concert. He had lost that air of pressure; maybe because it was just an evening date. He hadn't yet told her about the job.

After the second Scotch and soda, Angela thought she might dare touch the old wound: to see if it had healed. "You know, I was afraid you had crossed me off your list," she said.

"Why?"

"All that uncalled-for advice."

"Uncalled-for advice is often the best," he said.

"Where is the job?" she plunged. She hadn't heard of his being at any of the agencies.

HE GRINNED. "Acme Company. Paper boxes. Containers."

Containers? Some new idea?

Oh, no. Quite an old idea, he assured her. People had been packing things in boxes for years. In fact this was one of the oldest firms in the field. "But I'm just a sort of glorified bookkeeper," he said. He was getting onto the business. Right now he was studying shipping. There were economies to be found, in various shipping routes—

He talked almost as an expert. Costs of shipping boxes by truck, by rail; he even had funny little stories about shipments that had made complete circles in the old routing. She got the picture. The firm was sprawly, disorganized. Hadn't been making money these last years. His real job would be to pull it together, if he could rise to district manager, to supervisor...

"Nothing spectacular," he said. But, with steady plugging, he figured the container field could be developed, more people would be employed—

It was all right. It was regularly to

POSTAL UNION
NC 56 NEW YORK NY ACME NUTS AND BOLTS 4 WEST ST.
PLEASE SHIP ONE THOUSAND CASES NUTS AND BOLTS NUMBER 16A AT ONCE ANXIOUS

"As if you gotta string o'comets by the tail!"

Out at the General Motors Proving Ground they judge an automobile by what's under the hood and not by the bright shining paint.

So straight from that plain-talking hard-testing bunch we bring the picture of this new Buick, as you'll get it once you take it out on the road.

THEY liked the size of this SPECIAL, because those trail-wise drivers know that roadweight means road steadiness.

They liked the room, the softer, steadier ride, the Permi-firm steering—because like you these boys value comfort on the road.

But what they went for was the FIREBALL Eight.

The new engine under that broad bonnet, still smooth as the down on the pussywillow buds because each is micropoise-balanced after assembly—but now a sockdolagin' son-of-a-sea-cook for wallop.

"It's as if you gotta string o'comets by the tail," they said—and that's more than just a word-picture.

For in each flame-packed cylinder there is a comet—a twisting, whirling, flaring ball of fire touched off with every spark plug flash.

Fuel in this engine is compacted to higher-than-ever compressions, cupped into a flattened ball by new piston-face contours.

Massed around the spark, this fuel is fired from its very heart, burns with sudden, swift completeness that develops 115 horsepower from the same-size engine that last year could give only 107.

It gives you more power when you need it—at low speed or high—and it uses any gasoline of 75 octane rating or better, fuel now available at standard gasoline prices!

You get this FIREBALL Eight in every '41 Buick, whatever its price.

But you can also get it stepped up still more in power and thrift by Compound Carburetion, which gets as much as twenty miles an hour more emergency speed from the same fuel rationing—gives road performance and brilliance far beyond dynamometer power ratings—so increases efficiency that at 40 miles an hour, your engine has more than 85% of its power in reserve.

So do you wonder test drivers talk about comets? And don't you think you ought to find out about the FIREBALL Eight on general principles?

We do—in fact, we wonder how you can wait!

THE FIREBALL* DOES IT

Modern gasolines have high octane ratings to permit higher compressions without "ping." Note how this piston, which can be used only in valve-in-head engines, rolls the fuel charge into the shape of a flattened ball that centers around the new, smaller, racing-car type spark plug.

Fired at its very heart, this more highly compressed fuel lets go with such full-forced "ping-free" wallop that any gasoline of 75 octane rating (now available at standard-fuel prices) may be used in the 115-hp. engine. Any fuel of 80 octane rating serves in the 125- and 165-hp. engines.

*According to the Encyclopaedia Britannica, a super meteor which travels with a series of explosions like the shock waves of a great projectile is called a "FIREBALL."

WHEN BETTER AUTOMOBILES ARE BUILT BUICK WILL BUILD THEM

"Best Buick Yet"

Broiling Sun and Drenching Water

spell ruin for your Hair!

Scorching sun parches hair ... makes it dry and lifeless.

Water increases harm, washes away remaining scalp oils.

Protect your hair with VITALIS and the "60-Second Workout"

NO time like summer for fun and healthful exercise. Swimming, tennis, golf, or just loafing on the beach under the summer sun does wonders for your health.

But remember that same summer sun can raise havoc with your hair—dries it out, makes it brittle, lifeless. And then your shower or swim adds to the damage by washing away remaining scalp oils.

Take care of your hair! Massage your scalp with Vitalis. Feel the tingle of awakening circulation. The pure vegetable oils of Vitalis bring needed aid to your hair by supplementing the natural scalp oils. Your hair is easy to comb, has a natural lustre—but none of that objectionable "patent-leather" look.

Get a bottle of Vitalis today. Start now to protect your hair against broiling sun and drenching water with Vitalis and the "60-Second Workout."

Ask Your Barber

He's an expert on the care of scalp and hair. For your protection in the barber shop—genuine Vitalis comes only in sanitary, individual Seal tubes. Next time you go to the barber's insist on Vitalis Seal tubes.

1 50 Seconds to Rub—Circulation quickens—flow of necessary oil is increased—hair has a chance!

2 10 Seconds to Comb and Brush—Hair has a lustre—no objectionable "patent-leather" look.

VITALIS

HELPS KEEP HAIR HEALTHY AND HANDSOME!

the Philharmonic, and maybe a movie or play in the middle of the week; and when he got his first raise they celebrated with a bottle of champagne, and he passed dark hints about when he got the next raise he would ask her something. Darling; he was really old-fashioned.

That was about the time the crisis came at the office. The last blow was when the Cold-It people, Nate's bread-and-butter account, decided to go off the air. Angela was three weeks behind in salary. Nate's blondes no longer phoned, one every five minutes. He had pulled out of his gambling phase, trying to recoup at the races, and was now working like fury, on the phone all the time, up all night thinking of new stunts. But word had gone the rounds that Nate Goodwin was slipping.

The fatal day came, with the delegation of moguls. The bankers had brought Pat Daly along as an expert. She heard it all. They tried to put Nate on the pan. One of the bankers fumed and blew! The crazy way the business had been run! Hundred-dollar phone bills on fifty-dollar orders! Salesmen enough for a firm ten times the size! Crazy, wild projects. "This isn't a business, it's a gambling house!" he sputtered.

That was where Mr. Nate snapped back. "Sure," he said. "This kind of business is a gamble. If you hit with an idea, you clean up. But you have to play the game. You don't kick about a few bucks for a phone bill!"

And Pat Daly backed him up. "Sure," Pat said. This was high-powered gambling. Promotion. Ideas. "But the fact is," he said, "ideas run in cycles. Sometimes one man is hot, sometimes another. One thing you can't do is repeat yourself. You've got to have something new, something fresh all the time."

And if his advice as an expert was to be asked, he said, the trouble was not in the setup, or in the field. The trouble was, Nate had had a run of bad luck on ideas. What the firm needed just now was a fresh mind, a man with new ideas, someone to work along with Nate and give him a new slant—

This was Gar's chance, Angela knew. And if she didn't tell him of this opening, he'd be bound to hear about it, perhaps after someone else had the job. She'd have to tell him, right away.

Maybe she ought to feel excited.

Maybe it would be a good thing for him, a great opportunity to show the old crowd.

They were to have dinner. She called for him at his office; he was working late, getting up a set of regional charts. He had a plan for redistricting the warehouses.

They went to a little Italian place on Third Avenue; it had an old-fashioned back room, a swell dollar dinner, wine, noise, even slot machines for atmosphere.

She told him.

As Gar listened, Angela watched it happening to him: the old excitement rising in his eyes; she could see all those old wild projects thronging into his mind.

"So," she concluded, "what they want is an idea man, and I guess you could get the job, if you tried."

She waited.

HE WAS looking past her. Just then she heard a familiar whirring sound, a tinkle, then a whoop. Somebody at the slot machine had just hit the jack pot.

Maybe it was an omen. Why wasn't she glad?

"I made it!" the player yelled, scooping up the quarters.

"Sign of good luck," Angela ventured, searching Gar's face.

He reached for her hand. "It was swell of you to tell me, Angela."

"I guess you'd better see them in the morning, huh?" she said.

"You know, there's a funny thing about the jack pot," Gar remarked. "You either put the quarters right back into the machine, or drink them up."

At last she dared look into his eyes. It was going to be all right. His eyes were clearing, focusing again. He was no longer like a man under a drug stimulant. "Know what I was thinking of?" Gar asked.

She shook her head, and waited for him to tell her.

"Midgets," he said. And they both laughed. Their hands held tight. He was safe. She could even call him at his office, tomorrow, and gossip about all the big-talkers who would show up, trying to get that job.

The guy with the pile of quarters had moved to the next machine, and was feeding them into the slot, doggedly, his smile going into grimness, a fever coming over his eyes.

"If I were six months younger, I'd go for her myself!"

JOHN RUGE

Hands Across the Table

Continued from page 22

advance that no one should lose more than a dollar. Each person takes a dollar's worth of chips at the start, and the limit is so arranged that this dollar's worth of chips should last a long time, even with tough luck. However, if a person does lose all his dollar's worth of chips he gets another dollar's worth free and continues to play without any additional cash liability. If he loses the second dollar's worth he is to stop. And if he wins he must make good both dollars before he can make a profit. At the end of the game, if any player has lost more than a dollar's worth of chips, the winners are charged the excess difference.

Bookkeeping errors are all too frequent in many poker games and, when they occur, always lead to a certain amount of unpleasantness. The first cause of bookkeeping errors is due to mistakes in counting chips. For instance, in giving out a stack the banker will give one or two chips too many or too few. These errors are of relative importance since the amount involved is very small. However, I have seen games where the error might run into several stacks. This usually occurs when there are not enough chips and, as a result, the players in the game buy back and forth from one another. Then the banker, who is busy playing the game, enters the transactions incorrectly, and at the end the books are far out of balance.

How to Avoid Errors

Theoretically, when a bookkeeping error occurs all players in the game should be equally responsible whether they win or lose. Actually, however, it is customary and I believe reasonably proper, in the event the bookkeeping error results in a profit, to credit the profit to the losers; while if the bookkeeping error results in a loss, it is charged against the winners.

However, the best thing is not to have bookkeeping errors, and this can be pretty well taken care of if the following rules are used:

First: the bookkeeping unit will always be one stack, and under no circumstances should transactions involving a fraction of a stack go on the books. Second: all transactions should be between a player and the banker—never between two players.

Third: transactions should be restricted to a minimum. This can usually be done by use of markers. These markers may consist of chips of a special color, mah-jongg counters or even matchsticks. The marker should have a value equal to one stack, and when a player enters the game he should be given one stack of red chips and several markers. Then, as he loses chips, he may trade in a marker for a stack of chips at any time without any bookkeeping being involved at all.

Fourth: the banker should enter each player's name on a sheet of paper with several columns after the name. He writes the number of stacks given the player initially in the first column. If the player takes more stacks later, he writes the accumulation in the second column. The next chips sold put the player in the third column, etc.

Finally: in order to avoid argument in this method is used it is a good plan for the player to put his initials in the column opposite the number of chips he has received so that there will be no question at the end of the game. This last system of bookkeeping may cause resentment. I can just hear someone say, "What sort of game is it where the banker cannot be trusted to write down how many chips he gives the various players?" The answer to that is that, irrespective of how honest and ethical people are, they can and do make mistakes. In particular I have heard more withering arguments between people of the highest probity as to whether or not John Smith has taken eight stacks or seven stacks than I care to remember. But when Smith has to sign for the stacks he receives there are no arguments at all and everybody is happy.

Dealer's Option

If you want to sit down for an evening of serious poker, you probably will want to stick to one game all evening, maybe draw, stud or some high-low game. But for real fun, I would suggest dealer's option. In this game the dealer has the right to name the conditions of play. In playing Dealer's Option the following points should be kept in mind:

1. The dealer's option should be restricted to not more than seven or eight games. Otherwise the players simply vie with one another in seeing what absurdities they can concoct.

For instance, I know one man who claimed he had a sure-fire system of winning. When asked what it was he explained, "Whenever I deal, I deal a hand of straight Draw Poker with the deuces, threes and fours wild and the further provision that the high hand and the dealer split the pot!"

2. Every time a new game is played it has the same effect as an increase in stakes, the reason being that at first the players have a distinct tendency to overvalue their hands and hence bet more proportionately than they would in a familiar game.

3. The factor of skill is increased and the element of luck decreased. A lot of people are going to disagree with this statement, but there is a distinct reason for it. If only one or two games are played, after a while even the poorest players obtain a pretty good idea of what a hand is worth and how to play it. But when each deal presents something entirely new it takes an expert to know what is going on.

The following games all possess distinct merit and are well worth trying.

Spit-in-the-Ocean

Each player is dealt four cards and one card is faced up in the center. This card and all like it are wild and it is counted as part of your hand. Otherwise the conditions of the game are the same as in Draw, and after a round of betting the players draw to their hands and bet again.

In playing this game you should bear in mind that every player starts with one joker and that there are three more jokers in the deck. If you haven't got them, someone else almost surely has. As a result, nothing less than four of a kind is likely to win any pot, and even a small straight flush is nothing to get too excited about although it is a fairly good hand.

There is no point whatsoever in staying with a pat straight or flush, much less trying to make one. In deciding whether to stay, a joker in your hand is much more valuable than a pair. I would suggest the following minimum requirements for staying in the pot: (a) a joker; (b) a pair of aces or kings; (c) two pairs, jacks up or better.

With the last hand, if there is a raise before the draw, either drop out or dis-

Big Load of Flavor
and never a kick!

VELVET... just tamp 'er down and bang away... stays cool under steady firing. It's Kentucky's finest Burley tobacco... aged longer... mellowed with real maple sugar. The mildest makin's for a pipe or cigarette.

Velvet
the Right Word for Smooth Smoking

MILD and COOL
Positively NO "BITE"

SUE SANG BEFORE SEVEN

BUT CRIED BEFORE ELEVEN!

card your small pair since your full house is not going to win the pot.

Spit-in-the-Ocean is also frequently played with three cards in the center and four in each player's hand. The cards are turned up one at a time, each exposure being followed by a round of betting, after which there is a draw and a final round. In this game, even though no cards are wild, you should not expect ever to win a pot with less than a high flush.

Cincinnati

In this game there are five cards in your hand and five in the center. Nothing is wild and there is no draw, but there are five rounds of betting, one round following the turning up of each of the center cards. A straight may win a pot and a big flush has about an even chance of standing up.

If as many as three cards in one suit turn up it is almost a certainty that some player will have a flush, while if a pair turns up someone is pretty sure to have a full house. As a matter of fact, even without a pair turning up, full houses occur with considerable frequency. On the other hand, any four of a kind is a very good hand and will win more than nine pots out of ten.

Cincinnati Liz

In this variation of Cincinnati the lowest card in the center and all like it are wild.

Practically the smallest hand that ever wins a pot is a large four of a kind. Straight flushes stand up on occasion, but the only really good hand is five aces.

High-Low Cincinnati

This is really a fine game. With five cards in the center and five cards in the hand there is plenty of opportunity for a player to win a pot both ways. Furthermore, in the event that two or three low cards show up in the center, it is not odd to find that two players tie for low.

Assuming the betting starts before a card is faced up, I stay if (a) I have three cards that fit into the perfect low, or any four fairly low cards (this hand presents distinct possibilities for low); (b) I have a pair of aces, two pairs, a four flush or three cards of the same suit including an ace (these hands present possibilities for high); (c) I have a holding that suggests possibilities for either high or low, such as a fairly high pair and three low cards.

I pay no attention whatsoever to straights since, even if made, the chances are greatly against my straight winning high.

My subsequent procedure is now based on how the cards that appear in the center match my hand. Thus, if I am playing for low and a high card appears in the center, I say to myself "Here is one card that did no one any good as regards my half of the pot." If a low card turns up which happens to pair one of my own, I say, "This did me no good at all but surely helped someone else," and I am inclined to get right out unless my hand already is very good; while if a low card that helps my hand appears, I am greatly encouraged.

If I am trying for high, with a holding such as a pair of aces, and if the first card doesn't happen to be either a three ace or a pair for one of my cards, I am inclined to get out, the reason being that I still need two cards to make my full house and must get those two out of the four cards remaining.

If I happen to have a small full house and a pair higher in value than my set of threes appears in the center, I realize the distinct likelihood that that gives someone else a higher full house and either drop out or at least stop raising.

If I have a small flush and three cards in some other suit appear in the center I am likewise discouraged. In fact two cards of another suit act as a distinct warning to me.

Finally, I try to pay attention to the betting. In particular, if one or two players show great strength in the early rounds, I realize that the eventual winning hands will have to be pretty good and drop out unless I have possibilities of making something very good. On the other hand, when no one shows strength I will trail along with only fair possibilities.

Shotgun

I imagine this game, which is a cross between Draw and Stud, derives its name from the fact that the beginner has less chance to escape with his whole skin than at almost any other game. The rules are as follows:

Each player is dealt three cards, and following a round of betting those remaining in the pot receive a fourth card. Then there is a second round of betting, a fifth card is dealt, followed by a third round of betting and a draw. Following the draw there is a fourth and final round of betting.

Like all games with several rounds of

... a man set apart by pride and temper

... a girl who braved risks no man would face

... a savage fight for the golden land of the Old West

These are some of the things that make Ernest Haycox's new novel memorable

THE DRIFTER

BEGINS IN NEXT WEEK'S COLLIER'S

$100
 TURNED A BRIGHT IDEA INTO A Great Discovery

FOR many years Charles Goodyear put all his time and money into experiments to discover a method by which rubber could be made to stand extremes of temperature and thus be fashioned into useful articles.

Willingly he sacrificed all life's luxuries to the search. Finally, however, he reached the point where his money was gone and he lacked the means of obtaining even the simplest necessities of life.

Goodyear was on the verge of abandoning his efforts when his brother-in-law advanced him one hundred dollars. This financial help, received at a critical time, enabled him to carry on to his great discovery of a process for vulcanizing rubber.

Courage Is Not Enough

As Charles Goodyear learned, vision and courage are not always enough when there is a serious problem to be solved. Even the bravest and most resourceful need money to see them through a difficult period.

If your dependents should ever have to go along without you, they would face a problem of readjustment which could be solved only in part by their spirit and intelligence. For a little while at least, they would need income to cover essential expenses while making plans for the future.

The John Hancock Readjustment Income Plan meets this special situation in a special way by supplying ready cash to cover family expenses during the period of readjustment. How such a plan is being applied to an average family in moderate circumstances is told in our interesting booklet, "Two Lives." For your copy write Department C-6, John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company, 197 Clarendon Street, Boston, Massachusetts.

John Hancock
 LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS
 GUY W. COX, President

[ In 1839, after years of experimentation, Charles Goodyear dropped a mixture of rubber and sulphur on a hot stove and accidentally discovered the process of vulcanizing rubber. ]

"MY JOB'S A PICNIC..

All I do is remind you...
there's a vital difference that makes you want PHILIP MORRIS"

YES... a vital difference in manufacture... brings to you a vital difference, of smoking enjoyment without smoking penalties. For, as a group of distinguished doctors found*

—WHEN SMOKERS CHANGED TO PHILIP MORRIS, EVERY CASE OF IRRITATION OF THE NOSE OR THROAT—DUE TO SMOKING—CLEARED COMPLETELY, OR DEFINITELY IMPROVED.

*Reported in authoritative medical journals

CALL FOR PHILIP MORRIS

America's FINEST Cigarette

CREATORS OF FAMOUS CIGARETTES FOR 92 YEARS, ALWAYS UNDER THE PHILIP MORRIS NAME

betting, the first thing to learn is to drop out on the first card if you have nothing. In particular I would recommend dropping unless you have either a pair or three cards of the same suit. If you want to waste a few chips you may also stay on three cards in sequence, but this latter is not recommended.

If after receiving the fourth card someone bets, you should drop unless you have a fair-sized pair, a four flush or an open-end straight. After getting a fifth card you should value your hand about the same as you would in Draw Poker, except that you must modify your valuation to allow for the way the betting has gone.

Incidentally, in this game, for simplicity sake it is customary for the player nearest the dealer's left to bet first on every round. This, of course, makes the dealer the last man and gives him a slight advantage.

Double-Barreled Shotgun (Sometimes called Texas Tech)

This game is simply Shotgun plus two additional features. First, the high and the low hands divide; second, there are four rounds of betting after the draw instead of one, these four rounds occurring as follows:

After the draw each player exposes one card. There is a round of betting. A second card is exposed and there is a second round of betting. A third card is exposed, followed by a third round of betting. Finally a fourth card is exposed, followed by the final round. The order of betting is the same as in Stud (i.e., the player who shows the highest card or cards on the table bets first).

Following the last round of betting each player remaining in the pot places a chip in his hand—one color meaning he is trying for high, another color meaning he is trying for low. The hands then open simultaneously.

The division of the pot is now accomplished as follows: The highest hand of all those declaring for high wins high; the lowest hand for all those declaring for low wins low. Thus, if only one player declares for high, he wins that half of the pot even though he may not actually have the highest hand.

Frequently there is a great deal of skill involved in deciding which way to declare in this game. As an example, you're in the pot with but one opponent. You show a two, a three, a four and a seven and have a seven concealed. He shows a two, a five, an eight and a jack. You have been betting very strongly, and your opponent is going to assume that you have an "immortal" low against him. Hence, irrespective of what his hole card is, he will declare for high. Therefore, if you want to play safe you may declare for low and be perfectly sure of splitting the pot. However, if you want to gamble you may declare high also. Now unless he has an eight or jack in the hole you will win the entire pot. However, if he does have an eight or a jack in the hole, you will lose it all.

Pistol or Hole-Card Stud

In this game of Five-Card Stud the betting starts after each player is dealt his hole card. Hence, there is one additional round of betting.

Unless this game is played in a liberal fashion it is no fun at all, since otherwise only those players fortunate enough to get an ace, king, queen or jack dealt to them stay in the pot at all. When played liberally it is fun, since you have the spectacle of players raising with a very low card on the theory that if the next card pairs them no one will suspect what they have. However, even in that type game there is still a great weakness—namely, that the player who sits back and waits for ace will eventually wind up with the money.

Mexican Five-Card Stud

In this game each card is dealt face down and before each round of betting starts each player decides which card he will keep for his hole card. There is a natural presumption that a player will conceal as much of his strength as possible. In turn this allows for some very interesting bluffs. For example, a player starts with an ace and a deuce and naturally turns up the deuce. He now gets a three-spot, turns up the ace and proceeds to bet exactly as if he had a pair of aces.

Joker Poker

In this game the joker is added to the regular pack of fifty-two cards and a player may count it as any card he desires—even one in his own hand. The player with four of a kind and the joker has five of a kind—a new category which beats any other. Or a player with the joker, the ace of hearts and three other hearts has a double-ace flush, which beats any other flush.

The purpose of playing with a joker, of course, is to improve the hands. Hence, theoretically, since the hands are better there will be more action and in Draw Poker it does work out that way to some extent, although once a group becomes accustomed to the addition of the joker they all increase the minimum requirements for opening, staying, raising, etc., so that there is little if any change effected in the game.

In Five-Card Stud, strangely enough, putting a joker in the pack greatly increases the amount of action, since the joker appears face up, anyone who does not have a high pair immediately drops out; while if it does appear, any player who takes any strong action is immediately suspected of having the joker in the hole.

The Bug

In this variation the joker may count only as an ace or to fill a straight or flush. Thus a pair of aces and the Bug are three aces; a pair of kings and the Bug count as a pair with an ace kicker.

Strangely enough, the use of the Bug livens up Draw Poker more than the joker, the reason being that since it is not completely wild the fact that a player does not hold the Bug himself does not stop him from betting. Thus, since there are now five aces in the deck the number of times someone holds a pair of aces is greatly increased. Furthermore, the chance of getting a third ace in the draw to a pair of aces becomes about fifty per cent better than straight poker.

Then the Bug fits in with all types of straight combinations. Thus, if you draw to a seven, eight, nine and the Bug any jack, ten, six or five (one of six cards) gives you your straight, while you draw to a nine, eight, six and the Bug, you have twelve chances for success.

Then when we come to Stud Poker the Bug merely increases the value of all the other aces, since if you do have an ace your chance of pairing it is greatly increased. However, a word to the wise: In playing Stud Poker with the Bug do not get too enthusiastic about having a king in the hole. Remember there are five aces in the pack and only four kings.

Finally, in playing dealer's option, it is permissible to select either straight stud or draw, the two old reliables.

Another article on modern poker will appear in an early issue.

The Hell on Devil's Island

Continued from page 9

any other kind. It is certain there are at least 15,000 convicts, divided between two political classes: "liberes" and "deportes." The liberes have served their term in colony prisons and must remain here for years equal in number to their original confinement periods before they can return to France. They are free to roam at will and get jobs within the colony.

Not one in a thousand can "take it" long enough to return to France. The deportees are those still in pens, including lifers. Socially, liberes and deportees are of but one class—bad to begin with, toughened by their treatment into the worst men on earth.

More than 4,000 murderers are in the pen of St. Laurent, about 100 miles from Cayenne, right on the border river of Albino in Dutch Guiana. About 100 more, thieves and other habitual offenders, are in St. Jean prison, also in the Maroni, a short row or rafting from Dutch territory. Others are in the outlying work camps.

Starvation Means Trouble

Potentially these 15,000 violent men, fed by terrain and environment and circumstance, would comprise the most formidable force in history.

Here is no fancy, but stark facts that make the Guianas terror-stricken. When people talk to you on the streets or in the homes of Paramaribo, even white people, it is with preoccupied and worried lights in their eyes. For the Dutch especially, trapped in their century-old Guiana, is the nightmare prospect of 15,000 brutalized men in a berserk exhibition.

For the convicts of French Guiana are hungry.

Virtually left now to their own resources, they had in late August enough food for only a couple of weeks of thinning. No prospect exists of getting more over customary lines of communication and supply which fell apart with the defeat of France. That is why the guards are deserting. That is why the Bush Negroes are quitting the penitentiaries of pens and prison camps and are eating deep into the interior. Convicts won't starve long before they tear down stockades and walls.

Driven to band together by a singleness of purpose and wickedness, possessing all the criminal-gang knowledge of the advantages of organization and the strength of unity, armed with guns seized from wardens and with the terrifying work weapon, the machete, hardened by ever scanty rations and lack of human comfort or care, they are more dangerous than the wild beasts and poisonous insects and snakes of the jungles around them, because their human intelligence is added to base cunning.

Everyone here knows it is to Dutch Guiana that the criminal horde will turn. So the Dutch stand to: and talk and think of little else. Light-draught ships would probably get up the Surinam River to embark the whites if Paramaribo should be overrun. There are only 400 soldiers, Dutch white and native colored, scattered throughout the colony—an area as large as Wisconsin. Sixty troopers keep watch across the Maroni from the murderers' pen at St. Laurent. Fifty white Dutch marines came by destroyer from Curaçao while I was in Paramaribo; there were rumors of 50 more to follow.

On Princess Irene's birthday in August there was a review of Paramaribo's garrison: the marines, plus two squads of sailors and a company of spindly, undernourished green native volunteers. It made you sad to see this brave little show, and the worried faces around.

Because of emphasis on news from more important places, attention focused on air raids in the Old World and conferences in the New, this desperate plight of the Guianas has developed without the outside world being aware. Also, colonial officials here have reasons we shall presently examine for keeping truth from the United States particularly. George De Zayas and I are the only foreign journalists who have investigated conditions here at first-hand since war on the Western front began.

You find good people of your own political and social faiths, sad and heavy

Birds of America

THE CROW. May be recognized by oily, over-greased, plastered-down plumage. Lady birds question his sartorial good taste for using goo instead of Kreml.

THE WET HEN. The other extreme. Characterized by dry, stiff, unruly feathers. Result of soaking in water, which washes away natural oils. Kreml needed.

THE BALD EAGLE. Loss of top-feathers usually due to neglect. Use of Kreml in time helps check excessive falling hair, removes dandruff scales, feels refreshing.

HE DOESN'T GET THE "BIRD", thanks to Kreml Hair Tonic. Kreml keeps hair perfectly groomed — looking its natural best. Neat, lustrous, never sticky or oily.

Kreml, the famous tonic dressing, is neither sticky nor greasy. Keeps hair lustrous, in perfect order. Checks excessive falling hair, removes dandruff scales, relieves itching scalp.

Women tell us Kreml puts their hair in splendid condition for permanents — makes permanents look lovelier.

Ask for Kreml at your drugstore or barber shop.

Kreml Shampoo is a splendid ally of Kreml Hair Tonic. Made from an 80% olive oil base, it cleanses thoroughly, rinses out quickly, leaves hair soft and easy to manage.

KREML

REMOVES DANDRUFF SCALES — CHECKS EXCESSIVE FALLING HAIR
NOT GREASY — MAKES THE HAIR BEHAVE

FRED BALK

SIMONIZ

Your Car

Gives You a New-Looking Car Again

How does your car look after vacation and summer driving . . . dull, travel-worn? Go to the rescue of the finish with the wonderful Simoniz Kleener. Do it now, before it's too late! Simoniz Kleener does more than just make cars sparkle. It revives the lacquer or enamel, bringing back all the brilliance and color the finish had when new. Then apply Simoniz, if you want your car to stay beautiful. And has anybody told you about the new quick way to Simoniz . . . easy as here-today-gone-tomorrow polishing! Even tho it wasn't, you'd say, "It's worth it—Simoniz lasts!" Month after month, it protects and preserves the finish. So, always insist on the world-famous Simoniz and Simoniz Kleener for your car. There's nothing else like them!

MOTORISTS WISE
SIMONIZ
MAKES CARS STAY BEAUTIFUL

THE SIMONIZ COMPANY • CHICAGO, U. S. A.

with the conviction that if Europe's fury reaches into the Western Hemisphere primary bloodshed will come not from the fair contact of their armed forces with ours, but from the decaying pains of imperialism—from visitation for the sins of a great nation which carried a medieval form of penal banishment into modern days; and from the short vision of empire leaders who still thought of colonies merely as dividend factories with no self-help for their people nor provision or plan for their food sufficiency in time of emergency.

You find, while great Western capitals hum with talk of "hemisphere solidarity," human beings in Dutch and French Guianas eating garbage to keep from starving.

You find, while statesmen North and South utter lofty ideals, neglected people breaking out with sores, ravaged by disease, their always-anemic line of resistance now dissolved entirely by lack of food, shortage of doctors and no money from homelands to provide.

America's Real Danger Spot

You find, too, eyes and minds and hearts turned for a brief moment of hope toward the United States. This was when Secretary Hull, best-known and most-beloved man among these peoples, was in Havana. Remember, there is not here the same facility or capacity for understanding current matters as with us at home. In all foreign-held American lands there is heavy, stubborn censorship; and, among the blacks, almost complete illiteracy.

Thus, misconception of an issue at Havana spread through foreign possessions like a brush fire in a Sierra wind. People thought it was as simple as this: all they had to do was vote on the question of shedding old masters, coming into the possession or protection of the United States. In cabs, stores, on streets in Trinidad, natives would stop you and ask: "When do we vote? Let us vote." One man, who confessed schooling up to his 12th year, said: "I have worked under both American and English foremen in the oil fields here, on banana plantations in Jamaica. I have compared their ways, so have my mates. We prefer to be with you."

In the Guianas it was more poignant: there immediate fear sharpened this wistfulness.

Invariably Puerto Rico was quoted for an example of how the United States handles its possessions better; with roads, schools, higher standard of living, and no draining for benefit of home treasuries. The idea of new allegiance, or independence, excited European America for a nine-day wonder. Then despair closed down again.

The real trouble zone in the Americas, the powder keg closest to open flame, is the Guianas. When you fly over these pestilential lands with their thousands of square miles of manless and never-explored swamps and jungles and open savannahs alternately grilled by the Line sun and steamed by tropical rains you wonder why anyone should want them. But down here lie fabled riches—resources and opportunities for which nations have always fought. The Guianas lie just north of the Equator, an hour east of New York, between the 62d and 52d west meridians, on the bridge of the long nose that South America pokes toward Africa. First British, larger than Great Britain itself, with a population about equal to Atlanta's; then Dutch, three times larger than all Holland, with a population less than Hartford's; last French, of a size with Alabama, but with fewer inhabitants than Phoenix, Arizona.

French Guiana, always the unhappiest spot on earth, is now the most disordered and despairing: an ulcer that has opened. The local government apparently is anti-Vichy. The Washington embassy of the French government has been forced to wash its hands of Guiana: a cablegram from them to the governor for a visa in our behalf was ignored. The legation at Caracas, Venezuela, nearest French diplomatic post, knows absolutely nothing and can give no advices through. Even the French consul at Paramaribo, next door to Cayenne, has neither authority nor instructions nor information from the French government.

French Guiana is virtually isolated from the world. There is only an occasional tramp ship; and the "local" mail plane on the Pan American main line, which comes down at a float on the Cayenne River for gas, and flies on soon as possible. Mariners and pilots alike have always considered Cayenne the filthiest plague spot in their route. Some news comes out by ship or plane; but the festering within Guiana is chiefly estimated by native contact with the interior along the frontier river.

Even from the clear, fine air of 10,000 feet when you look down upon French Guiana oppression knots your stomach. A few prison camps are the only breaks in the malignant green hide of the jungles. Narrow riverways are the only means of travel, but from your plane you cannot make them out in the mat of treetops. Veteran P.A.A. pilots, in early morning hours, can trace the rivers, however, by the veins of mud that are drawn like skeined wool over the dank wilderness. Jungles and rivers alike are infested by venomous creatures: piranhas, the man-eating fish; caymans, an evil alligator; bushmaster snakes and fer-de-lances among the snakes; tarantulas. A plane over French Guiana affords you the most unsavory view in the world.

The Cry for Gold

The colony has never grown food sufficient for a thousandth of its population. It has lived baldly as an incorrigible penitentiary, the slave camp and chain gang of the tropics, with degraded and sinning humans producing wealth for the society that punished them. Gold is the principal natural resource; there is iron, too, and much chicle, and rubber. But the cry of the men with the lashes and the government with the long arm has always been "Gold! More gold!" The entire food, such as it was, of the convicts has customarily been fetched by ships coming from France for gold. Now the food does not come there is no French merchant marine.

It is in the Dutch Guiana, most troubled and yet most accessible of the Guianas, thanks to the obstinate liberality of the Hollanders, that you are able to collect the whole foreground detail and the back shadows and overtones of the picture of Guiana blues.

Dutch Guiana shares one distinct thing with its sisters: geographical anonymity. Few people can pronounce it; fewer spell it; scarcely any of us know where it is—confuse it with Guinea in Africa, New Guinea in the Orient. But Dutch Guiana alone owns the fame of Consul Lawton.

He is the local representative of the United States government, a rotund, colorful character who might have stepped, as he stands, from his whites and umbrella and sun helmet, from the mingled pages of O. Henry and Somerset Maugham. If you think of American consuls as wo-

BEST News YOUR FACE EVER HAD!

FIRST FLASH ABOUT A BRAND-NEW SHAVER! HERE'S THE 1941 SCHICK WITH THE 2M HEAD, HOLLOW-GROUND
TO GIVE 30% QUICKER, EASIER, BETTER SHAVES!

ET ready, gentlemen, to change your shaving habits for the better!

whether you use a blade razor or electric shaver, here's the whiskeropping whizzer you're going to come sooner or later—so why delay?

by Schick—which tells a lot in it-since Schick started the whole electric shaver business.

for you—with the quick-and-easy, k-and-nickless workability you've needed for.

ve all—made to give close shaves—quicker, easier, better because of Schick's new exclusive Hollow-Ground
Head.

ated bars on the face plate guide every whisker into cutting slots—no missed or cut bristles.

the hollow-ground, concave surface the face plate feeds each whisker into for the cleanest possible cutting—down to the base!

what a cinch that makes of shaving!
hold the head flat against the face—ly stretch the skin as your barber —shave against the grain—and in a give yourself the smoothest shave you had—and no scrape, no burn, no pull!

are are we that you'll never go back to

NEW SCHICK COLONEL

styled by Raymond Loewy, executed in rich ivory plastic with gold-colored Whisk-Its. Built-in radio static suppressor. Complete with simulated alligator tuck-away case, $15.00. (Or, packed in de luxe Dress-Kit, $17.50.)
Companion to the COLONEL is the new FLYER, in burgundy with silver-colored Whisk-Its. Complete with new 2-M Head and genuine leather case, $12.50.

any other shaver or shaving method after trying the new 2-M Schick that we make this standing offer!

Try a New Schick for 30 days. If you're not getting the best shaves ever by the end of that time, say so—and your dealer will refund every penny you paid.

So why not trial-buy your New Schick today? Schick Shaver can be bought on easy terms most everywhere.

Walk in, get yours and start being kind to your face!

SCHICK DRY SHAVER, INC., STAMFORD, CONN., U.S.A.

★ This is Schick's 10th Anniversary Year! ★

Only Schick Offers These Whisk-Its! Shave anywhere, any time, dressed or undressed!
These new Whisk-Its catch all beard clippings, empty in a jiffy after each shave.

$9.95
Schick prices begin as low as for the popular Schick CAPTAIN with straight Speed King Head and Whisk-Its.
Many Dealers Offer Easy Payment Terms.

ENTION, SCHICK OWNERS! Get this
2-M Head for your shaver

We made this marvelous new 2-M Head so that it can be used on any of the 2,500,000
Schick Shavers now in service!

$3.00 brings your present Schick right up to the minute. You get the new head expert-

lyd. and the whole shaver inspected, cleaned, oiled, and adjusted free of charge. Simply send your shaver to your nearest dealer—or send it to the factory in Stamford—or take it to a Schick Shaver Service Office (listed at right).

nothing Quicker nothing Slicker

NEW SCHICK SUPER SLICK SHAVES

ALBANY
938 Natl. Sav. B'k Bldg.
ATLANTA
603 Rhodes-Haverty Bldg.
BALTIMORE
406 Katz Bldg.
BOSTON
630 Boston C. of C. Bldg.
BROOKLYN
1007 Fox Bldg.
BUFFALO
553 Andrews Bldg.
CHICAGO
212 Palmer House

CINCINNATI
814 Schmidt Bldg.
CLEVELAND
301 Swedland Bldg.
COLUMBUS, O.
1033 Hunt'gton B'k Bldg.
DALLAS
611 Southland Life Bldg.
DENVER
501 Colorado Bldg.
DES MOINES
413 Fleming Bldg.
DETROIT
906 Industrial B'k Bldg.
HARTFORD, CONN.
1202 American Ind't'l Bldg.

HOUSTON
521 Shell Bldg.
INDIANAPOLIS
703 Merchants B'k Bldg.
KANSAS CITY, MO.
702 Fidelity B'k Bldg.
LOS ANGELES
401 RKO Hillstreet Bldg.
MIAMI
218 Shoreland Arcade
MILWAUKEE
152 W. Wisconsin Ave.
MINNEAPOLIS
624 Andrus Bldg.
NEW ORLEANS
1801 Canal Bldg.

NEW YORK
17 East 42nd St.
NEWARK, N. J.
810 Raymond-Com. Bldg.
OKLAHOMA CITY
619 Hightower Bldg.
OMAHA
647 Omaha N'U'l B'k Bldg.
PHILADELPHIA
1001 Chestnut St.
PITTSBURGH
908 Investment Bldg.
PORTLAND, ME.
210 Bank of Com. Bldg.
PORTLAND, ORE.
1415 American B'k Bldg.

PROVIDENCE
506 Turks Head Bldg.
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
705 Temple Bldg.
ST. LOUIS
575-7 Arcade Bldg.
SAN FRANCISCO
787 Monadnock Bldg.
SEATTLE
701 Republic Bldg.
STAMFORD, CONN.
45 Garden St.
WASHINGTON, D. C.
521 Bond Bldg.

SOME SMOKERS THINK IT'S FIERCE!

Others know there's no tobacco on earth that equals this truly AROMATIC pipe mixture

Some people don't like anything that's new.

Here's such a new, different smoking-experience that some men don't like it. But thousands of smokers won't touch any tobacco
but Bond Street.

Bond Street's like expensive custom-blends in flavor, fragrance and bite-free coolness. Contains rare aromatic tobacco never before used in a popular price mixture.
Even women approve Bond Street's aroma.

In fairness to yourself, spend 15¢
for a generous pocket-tin of Bond Street today!

Today—try a tin of

BOND STREET
Pipe Tobacco

A Product of PHILIP MORRIS

ing in pompous, officious circumstances, with adding machines and handsome native typists, you should visit Jim as he sits alone in his one-man office, giving on a main street of Paramaribo. You should see his scarred desk, his single open shelf of dusty statistical manuals.

Consul Jim has been here almost thirty years; and it's more than twenty since he made a trip home to the States.

Holland in Holland is quaint and clean. Holland in the West Indies is quaint and filthy. Holland in Guianas is quaint and so-so. You wish they would get over the use of wooden beds near the equator. Giant cockroaches follow you like pet dogs, and seem to wear wooden shoes. The prim, gabled houses, sanded wide streets, washed doorsteps and front-yard gardens and the spire-flanked village green lend Paramaribo startling resemblance to a New England village.

Peacefulness is on the surface. Underneath lies bitterness, much unhappiness. Foremost, the fear of starved convict invaders from French Guiana. Internally, rebelliousness, unrest, hunger, a sickening depression and no way out in sight. Since May's tempestuous first week more drama and tension have been packed into each day's life here than the colony ever before knew.

On a back-country lane a drawn-faced woman shook an empty basket at us. "Look," she cried, "you rich white people have all the rice in town. Out here our children are starving!" In a hut not half an hour's walk from the governor's palace we saw utter destitution among Javanese coolie families who had been employed on the colony experimental farm. More than two months ago that was abandoned when the subsidy from the home government was cut off. Now weakened people sit quietly, fatalistically on their straw mats; babies have hunger-bloated stomachs; youngsters prowl in the back yards and ditches of Paramaribo and pick over garbage for scraps of food to carry home.

There are no official funds for relief here; only the haphazard charity of the whites, many of whom are little better off. Depression has struck all Dutch-owned industries. Formerly the entire coffee crop was taken by Norway. Twenty thousand Javanese coolies worked on the plantations. That market is gone; none has replaced it. Efforts to interest United States buyers have failed; the bitter Guiana coffee is not to our taste. England has taken the current sugar crop. No more white public health doctors come from Holland; each of the few left, because of the great expanse of his beat, can seldom give more than half an hour to eighty or one hundred patients as he makes settlement rounds.

Why Guiana Must Starve

But why should famine stalk this lush country? Especially under the Dutch, who are widely conceded to be the best colonizers? Colony officials are sorrowful and taciturn. They have been told by the colonial minister, who fled to London with the queen, the colony must shift for itself; that the customary annual subsidy of three million guilders can no longer be forthcoming "until the war is over." Whites of other nationalities are inclined to mind their own business. But unofficial Dutchmen will talk, acidly.

Their candid general feeling is that the "milk cow" theory of colonial operations has been outmoded by modern democratic international morals and economy. Guiana has been run for the benefit of distant people who perhaps don't know or care precisely where or what it is. There has been little understanding of native problems. Officials are capable and efficient, but are professional yes-men for absentee speculators in sugar and coffee and have a steady eye toward the pension that rewards "faithful" and fretless colonial service. As an instance of retardment there are old-fashioned gas lamps that keep the streets of Paramaribo dim although electric power is obtainable and cheap here. Not long ago a former governor signed on behalf of the colony a 25-year contract with the gas company in Holland and there can be no electric street lighting until it runs out.

Failure to levy fair source percentages on homeland corporations that benefit here and high salaries of officials are quoted as part of the trouble. The governor gets 40,000 guilders, more than $20,000 U. S. at present exchange, a year in salary besides perquisites of servants, car, keep, palatial quarters and a "reception allowance," which is his whether or not he spends it for its avowed purpose of entertaining the foreign colony, consuls, official visitors and the natives on fete days. Compare this with the $10,000 for the United States High Commissioner of the Philippines.

A Man-Made Famine

The rice crisis is another example of callous management, antiquated thinking. Most workers in Dutch Guiana are Javanese and British East Indian coolies. These represent the world's cheapest labor. The Dutch, unwilling to pay the higher wage standards of emancipated Negro workmen in the Americas, introduced coolie labor. The pay is 6 cents a day U. S. Even so, this is higher than in the Orient, where the coolie average is an American penny a day. Governor Kielstra had a plan, halted by the war, of importing 100,000 more Javanese at a rate of 10,000 a year to dilate existing plantations.

Coolies subsist almost exclusively on rice. Normally the colony grows enough to feed them. When its subsidy was cut off this year the colony got the idea of selling and exporting a large part of its rice crop in order to obtain foreign credits; even in the face of a threatened poor crop. When the harvest proved worse than expectations—the foreign commitments were maintained, and the local share pinched. Alarmed by mutterings and fights, the colony turned in panic to Brazil, nearest source, to buy rice—but then only 2,000 bags. Now people are hungry and infuriated and riot daily with the police, who had to take over the job of rationing and selling the available supply.

One businessman expressed the whole pattern of local thought we had been digging piecemeal from his fellow Guianans:

"I'm a Hollander, but second generation here, and I think what's going on is proof you can't run on 18th-century Old World methods and ideas a section of a New World that is exposed to the methods and ideas and opportunities of that New World. What this colony needs is American businessmen instead of European. It is a rich land. Not all is known of just how much and what we do have. Of course, it is not fantastically wealthy in natural resources and opportunities like Brazil. It is a field rather for moderate capitalists: extension of your home industries.

"I mean, like citrus fruits. They grow wonderfully here. I know they should not be thrown into competition in your markets with Florida and California products. But your big fruit growers could establish orange and other juice canneries here without disturbing fresh fruit balances at home. Palm and coconut oils could be developed against a day when your Pacific supplies might be cut off. The colony is virtually one

Increase Efficiency Stimulate Sales with

ARCTIC DAYLIGHT

*ARCTIC DAYLIGHT: The coldest, brilliant, non-glaring, shadow-free light produced with GUTH Fluorescent Fixtures.

Guth

FLU-O-FLECTOR and TRU-CO-LITE

Fluorescent Lighting at Peak Efficiency

For Stores, Factories Offices, Etc.

GUTH FLU-O-FLECTOR and TRU-CO-LITE Fixtures, scientifically designed and enhanced by the famous ALZAK Process, give you much more illumination—much better illumination of a daylight quality. Stores, factories and offices everywhere are using GUTH FLU-O-FLECTORS and TRU-CO-LITES to help speed work and boost sales. Your business, too, needs the modern, efficient equipment.

"P-F-C's" Plastic Diffuser

For maximum satisfaction with any make of Fluorescent Lamps, use the new GUTH "P-F-C's". These Plastic Diffusers snap on and off the lamp easily—reduce the glare of the bare lamp—give a soft, pleasing illumination that's extra easy on the eyes. Available in 5 colors, "P-F-C's" are decorative as well as scientifically practical.

Write for Detailed Lighting Plan

We will gladly prepare a lighting plan for your business without obligation. For full information, write us on your business stationery, stating whether you are interested in Fluorescent Lighting for Office, Store, or Factory.

THE EDWIN F. GUTH COMPANY
2615 Washington Blvd.
St. Louis, Mo.
Leaders in Lighting Since 1902

Guth

hardwood tree—yet practically the cutting is done by Bush Negroes, who float half a dozen logs down at a time. Lumber could be exploited. Your Standard Oil people have prospected the colony and they want to be operations. If they do, prosperity of the kind we've never known will come. The old Dutch slowness holds matters. The governor insists Standard employ Dutch engineers and he keeps the right to cancel leases at will if he thinks any statutes infringed. No big oil company could afford to start fields, never rich, under such restrictions. Moreover, there aren't any Dutch engineers to come from Holland now." Here De Zayas and I remembered our conversation with Governor J. C. Kierulff, formerly a university professor of culture in Holland, and a Far East man. He said the colony welcomed American business: "Your capital would be very good for the colony." Then he added, in afterthought: "Maybe it would be good for America, too!"

Why America is Popular

But our business informant was gone. When we say bauxite company we mean, of course, the Aluminum Corporation of America. Bauxite is the ore in which aluminum is made, and that is what you call a critical raw material these times of war preparedness. You find some fields in the States, in Arkansas and Tennessee, but they were in danger of running out so your government encourages use of foreign sources. But here in Dutch Guiana is the largest deposit of high-grade ore on earth. It is why you see good roads; they use bauxite clay, which is the only use made of it before the Americans came. The bauxite gets first processing here. It is loaded onto steamers as a fine white powder. It goes to New Orleans, is transshipped up the Mississippi to East St. Louis, where it is then worked, and then sent to Pittsburgh and elsewhere. Even the Americans cannot pay wages as they would like. You have a construction gang down from the States now on a contract job. They told me they have trained eight or ten natives to climb scaffolding and rivet just like themselves and they would be considered full workmen in the States with the good steelman's pay. But our governor tells the Americans they cannot pay the native workmen more than 1 guilder 75, which is less than one American dollar a day.

"The truth is everybody here likes Americans, and American methods and pay, and thinks the colony would be better off to belong to the States. Only the governor and his staff are opposed. It is because they are afraid they will lose their jobs, also the possibility of getting their pensions. So they scare native government employees by telling them they will lose their jobs if the United States comes. One policeman said to me yesterday: 'Is this true? I hear that in Puerto Rico the United States employs local people and lets them run their own business much. But our captain told us no, we'd all be sacked. Who can we believe?'"

"So I will tell you this. Every thought and move of officials here short of actually letting us all be killed if the convicts invade is calculated against possible intervention by the United States. They don't want it to be necessary for you to save us. That is part of the reason the marines were brought down from Curaçao. To suggest we could take care of ourselves. That, plus fear of rice uprisings against the governor; and always the horror of having the attack from French Guiana.

"No, the Germans here were not behind any of this trouble. Of course, the war is to blame some; but this trouble was coming. Less than 100 Germans lived here, and some of them were second and third generations and good folks. But we jailed them all pretty quick, even the Jews, when war came."

The dealings of Dutch Guiana with its German residents have been indeed curious, and somewhat of a local scandal. In September the German freighter "Turn on the radio, Tom . . . or is it on?"

LOUIS JAMME

Life begins with

VITAMINS

PLUS...

$2.75
for a 36 days' supply

Tiny, magical vitamins . . . how essential they are to vitality, sound nerves, good appetite, skin, eyes and hair, and a general sense of well-being.

So be scientific in this age of science . . . take certain care of your daily vitamin needs by taking VITAMINS Plus . . . the streamlined, different vitamin preparation that gives you all these vitamins: A, B, C, D and G, with liver concentrate and iron.

It's a better world, and you're a better, happier person, if you don't lack vitamins. So take VITAMINS Plus - to be sure. 72 capsules - 36 days' supply - 2.75

"SPARKS OF LIFE"

Just as the spark is necessary to ignite your car's gasoline, Vitamin B<sub>1</sub> is necessary to metabolize food. In every black capsule of VITAMINS Plus there are 600 Sherman Units of Vitamin B<sub>1</sub>—more than an average adult's full daily requirement.

VITAMINS PLUS, INC., 370 LEXINGTON AVE., N.Y.C.

☐ Herewith is $1.50 for the Special Size Vitamins Plus (18 days' supply) ☐ Please send me your booklet, "Life Begins With Vitamins Plus"

☐ Send my Vitamins Plus C. O. D.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____ STATE _____

C-9-28

Feel fresh

as a wind-whipped white cap

a cool, clean, brisk sensation...every time you brush your teeth.

Yes, your mouth can feel fresher any time you choose. Try brushing your teeth with Squibb Tooth Powder. You'll be amazed at the exhilarating sensation...at the way it refreshes and revives a feeling of well-being.

And while it stimulates—it cleans! Its content of acid-neutralizing Squibb Magnesium Hydrate* forms part of a cool, tangy bath—neither sweet nor soapy—that gets right down around your gums at the gum line...as you brush away stale deposits.

You can use Squibb Tooth Powder for quick refreshment as often as you please...it was developed by the Squibb Laboratories in cooperation with members of the dental and medical professions to produce the best possible home aid in the preservation of teeth and prevention of decay. Why not start using Squibb Tooth Powder today?

*Squibb Dental Cream has the same acid-neutralizing action as Squibb Tooth Powder—a safe and refreshing cleanser.

SQUIBB TOOTH POWDER

Taste and feel the refreshing difference!

Goslar, 10,000 tons, under Captain Karl Berghoff, a first World War aviator, ran up the Surinam River to Paramaribo to escape British raiders off Brazil. There is a bar at the mouth of the river that excludes all ships of more than 17-foot draft. The colony government considered the bar a protection, and would never permit dredging.

The officers and crew of the Goslar became part of the local German group, great friends with some officials, notably Police Commissioner Van Beek. Three days before the invasion of Holland it was observed the Goslar had steam up, and the crew remained aboard. Later it became known she had orders to drop, on signal, to the bar and scuttle broadside thereon in order to keep shipping, especially the American bauxite vessels, out of Paramaribo. A broken radio tube prevented Captain Berghoff from getting his signal from home.

On the evening of May 10th there was nothing for Police Commissioner Van Beek to do but go aboard and seize her. The native population, bewildered and angered by the outbreak of war, was demonstrating in the streets.

Scuttling with a Purpose

Van Beek politely told his friends they were Dutch prisoners, their ship a prize, and would they please come ashore with him. The chief engineer said excuse me while I go down for my coat. Van Beek waited, and the chief engineer went below and opened one of the seacocks. Even then, while the ship only listed, the capable Dutchmen if ordered could have lashed and warped her to prevent sinking. But nothing was done. The Goslar finally settled on her side in the river directly opposite the town docks, where she affects the current for more than a mile. She is called "Van Beek's Island."

The governor, under local pressure, removed Van Beek as police commissioner, but made him chief censor of the colony.

Resentment against Germany seems to exist among the natives more than among the white Dutchmen, who are constrained by thoughts of loved ones at home. The natives tell you it is not so much Germany but the idea of Germany or any other European nation taking over the colony that they abhor. They are fed up with Europe and its wars and ways.

The local Germans, together with Goslar men, were first concentrated in quarters near the center of town. There was little supervision. They used to stand at the fence, bid the time of day with passing friends. They demanded and got many things, including a ping pong table. A native delegation forced the governor to move the prisoners to barracks outside Paramaribo.

Thus affairs stand with the Germans in Dutch Guiana; all are in strict custody.

An uneasiness permeates all sections of Dutch Guiana's confused and temperamental races.

Far up country are the shy, wild Bush Negroes, descendants of escaped slaves who live in the heart of the Guianas as their ancestors lived in darkest Africa. We pushed, first by car to where all roads stopped, then by launch on the narrowing Saramacca River, at last on foot through the mud and the flies, to visit a tribe. The old chief has leprosy. You've got to put him in good humor with a gift of medicine. He doesn't consider medicine good if it lacks high color or foul taste. A mixed handful of green vitamin tablets, white aspirin and red Spanish peanuts were properly inviting, and he chewed it while telling his view of things. He understands about Americans because of visits of anthropologists, medical researchers, movie explorers and prospecting engineers. Occasionally he paddles downstream in his dugout to chat with Javanese farmers or outlying Dutch friends. He warns us:

"If any other country except the United States takes over this land, I and my people will move into the very back country. We shall disappear and no one will ever see us again. We can live in peace. But can the white folks and the foreigners on the coast?"

Which caused a Dutch friend in town when we related this to him, to comment: "He is lucky. I have to live where my wife and child are. These Bush Negroes are the only ones who will escape the terror if the convicts come. You are lucky, too. You go away tomorrow. But maybe next day, maybe next week maybe next month, you and all the world will hear of this disaster that will shock it. Still I am Dutch but I know my safety and future do not lie any more with Holland or any other European nation. It can only be helped if the Western countries stop talking and do something. The world has gone to pieces and we Dutchmen here in Guiana feel that it is for the United States to pick up those pieces which have fallen around her feet."

"Sometimes I get the feeling that this house is too colonial!"

GEORGE WOLFE

What to do about the money that slips through your fingers

IF YOU'RE average and human, there's a hole in your pocket.

Through it, day by day, slip pennies, nickels, quarters . . . money spent for inconsequential trifles. You rarely have anything to show for it and you never know where it goes.

At the time you never miss it. Yet, as time goes on, comes this disquieting thought: "I have earned, in all," you will say, "a sizeable sum. More than enough for my daily bread . . . yes, more . . ."

"I have already earned enough for the start of a backlog for the future—a backlog against those inevitable leaner years. Yet thus far, I have set aside nothing. Where has my money gone?" When you have asked this one question of yourself, soberly, thoughtfully, you will have reached the stepping-stone to a more successful future.

*** The First Step ***

For Investors Syndicate, through many, many years of experience in helping people accumulate money, has learned this first, this vital truth about saving: To make the most of your income—the first step is to find out where your money goes.

If you want to accumulate a substantial sum for your future—if you make a regular and adequate income yet still find yourself unable to lay anything aside—let Investors Syndicate help you.

To help you take the first, the most important step toward accumulating money, Investors Syndicate offers, without obligation, a booklet "Living" Expenses . . . a simple, easy way to find out where your money goes. This is not a budget book. For your copy, mail the coupon to Investors Syndicate today. Enclose 10c in coin or stamps to cover handling and mailing. Do it now!

Home Office, Minneapolis, Minn. Affiliates:
Investors Syndicate Title & Guaranty Co.,
New York; Investors Syndicate, Limited, Canada

Investors Syndicate
Dept. CW-90, Minneapolis, Minn.

Please send me your new booklet "Living" Expenses.
Enclosed is 10c to cover cost of handling and mailing.

Name.....Age.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

INVESTORS SYNDICATE LIVING PROTECTION ESTABLISHED 1894

TRUCK-TRAILERS

are Easy to Handle

IN "TIGHT SPOTS!"

CITY TRAFFIC...

need not deprive you of Truck-Trailer savings. The Fruehauf "Flyer" is designed for such conditions—it cuts city delivery costs as much as 40%.

NARROW ALLEYS

present no problem. A Truck-Trailer—because it is a "jointed" unit—is far more easily maneuvered in tight spots.

CRAMPED QUARTERS

call for the "hinged-in-the-middle" feature of Truck-Trailers. The power unit turns at right angles to the truck, the Trailer wheels cut in—the unit gets into places which are inaccessible to a truck with equal load space.

You are probably familiar with the economies of Truck-Trailer operation—the lower investment; the savings in fuel, maintenance, and depreciation; the "shuttle" system which means no time out for loading. But did you know a Truck-Trailer actually turns shorter, is more flexible and easier to handle than a truck of equal load capacity? Or, if you use small trucks, did you know that one Truck-Trailer will handle the same load as three of your present units—and get around just as easily? Write on your business letterhead for case-histories of companies like your own—actual examples of concerns similar to yours who are using Truck-Trailers to cut their haulage costs.

Oldest and Largest Manufacturers of Truck-Trailers • Sales and Service in Principal Cities
FRUEHAUF TRAILER COMPANY • DETROIT

FRUEHAUF TRAILERS

"Engineered Transportation"

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

MORE FRUEHAUF TRAILERS ON THE ROAD THAN ANY OTHER MAKE

Traitor's Purse

Continued from page 20

himself making mountains out of molehills, and, what was even worse, pitfalls into mere depressions. Moreover, the physical effect of the experience had begun to tell on him again. His head ached maddeningly and he was not too certain of his legs.

He crept back the way he had come but, although he paused to listen when he reached the right-angle bend, there was still no sound from the great hidden garage he had left.

As he felt his way up the narrow iron ladder he tried to assimilate what he had seen since entering the Nag. It was both tantalizing and alarming. He had the uncomfortable feeling that it might all be very ordinary if seen with the clear eyes of a normally informed person.

Any municipal stronghold of great antiquity could probably appear fantastic to the completely ignorant. Yet, on the other hand, every half-observed aspect of the place might well possess some all-important significance that he ought to recognize at once. There was the number 15 on the agenda—that must be of interest. And the man he had just seen—if his presence was normal why had he hidden?

HE STRUGGLED on and by the time he heard the superintendent's heavy breathing just ahead of him he had made up his mind. There was only one course open to him that was not criminally negligent. He must get in touch with Oates at once.

Here he was, stumbling about in the dark, seeing monsters where there were bushes, and innocent shadows where there might be deathtraps; and all the time the precious hours were racing past. He was a lunatic, very possibly a dangerous lunatic. Mercifully he was gradually getting the intelligence to recognize the fact.

The superintendent was eager for news but even more eager to get out of his highly compromising position. He led the way back with alacrity and they passed across the council chamber like a couple of homing foxes.

"Lorries?" he said in astonishment when Campion had replied to his question. "How many?"

"Several." Campion could not explain his own urge toward caution.

Hutch shook his head. "I don't know anything about them," he said. "In this government work, I expect. They're doing a lot of experiments with synthetic juice up at the Institute—at least that's the gossip. The Masters own the Institute, and, come to think of it, the Trough wouldn't be a bad place to hide a lorry or two. You're suddenly in great hurry, sir. You weren't seen, were you?"

"No," said Campion truthfully, "but I've got to get a move on now."

The superintendent opened his mouth to make an inquiry but the experience of long service saved him the indiscretion. Moreover, they were approaching the storeroom behind the shop again.

They got out without incident but Hutch was not pleased to find it almost dawn. Fortunately it was misty and two men plunged into the chilling vapors as thankfully as if it had been a smokescreen especially provided for the benefit.

As they passed down the broad highway of the Nag's Pykle, Campion found himself definitely ill. His head was throbbing and his body ached. However, he knew what he had to do. Amanda was in the card. Amanda must take him to Oates. It was odd that the very recollection of Amanda should wrap such comfort around him. He must get out of there he supposed, if she had made up her mind, and yet... it was absurd. That was ridiculous. Amanda was not only his: she was himself. Amanda, oh, he couldn't be bothered to work out. He must get to her... get to her... get... to... her.

Hutch caught him as he stumbled, and as they stood swaying together on the cobbles.

The superintendent said:

"Alfred is about to leave, Pa. He's checking up on his loose change"

TONY BARLOW

RAILWAY EXPRESS - SYMBOL OF DEPENDABLE SERVICE...

CHAMPION SPARK PLUGS!

ES DEPENDABLE

IN CITIES AND TOWNS all over the United States, the familiar Railway Express truck is a symbol of dependable, speedy, safe delivery. Over 12,000 of these trucks are constantly on the go regardless of weather. Dependability is the watchword.

This giant fleet has used Champion Spark Plugs for years. Here is just one more outstanding proof that Champions make every engine a better performing engine—one more sound reason for you to insist on dependable Champion Spark Plugs for your car.

Champion's sensational Sillment* seal brings extra performance to every engine. Since even one "leaker" in a set will cause rough, uneven, wasteful engine operation, it is obvious that Champion's leak-proof qualities are necessary to maximum performance and economy.

Profit by the experience of Railway Express and most of the nation's largest and most efficient fleets—of the world's racing champions on land, water and in the air—by insisting on Champions for your car.

"PICK UP AND GO" WITH NEW CHAMPION SPARK PLUGS

in the past decade Railway Express trucks, equipped with Champion Spark Plugs, have traveled hundreds of millions of miles. Another example of "pick up and go" service made with the "Pick Up and Go" dependable Champion Spark Plugs.

HUDSON FOR 1941 PRESENTS A BIG

IN THE LOWEST PRICE FIELD . . . NEW HUDSON SIX

One of many beautiful tone combinations made available by Symphonic Styling. Note the rich harmony of exterior and interior coloring. Illustrated here . . . the new 116-inch wheelbase, 92-horsepower Hudson Six.

AND PRICED JUST ABOVE THE LOWEST . . . NEW HUDSON SUPER-SIX

New Hudson Super-Six, with 121-inch wheelbase and 102 horsepower, offering a still wider choice of new color harmonies. A bigger, roomier car with distinguishing luxury touches everywhere.

TO OWNERS OF THE "OTHER THREE": Straight through the new 1941 Hudson Six and Super-Six, you will find extra values not obtainable in other cars in the lowest and low price fields. Symphonic Styling is just one of the ways in which Hudson gives you more for your money, in every popular price class.

IN THE brilliant new 1941 Hudsons, you will find scores of other examples of this same engineering leadership . . . leadership that isn't content with what others may consider "good enough for the money." If there's something better to be had, Hudson gives it to you.

Safest Cars Are Safer Still

Your safety . . . the safety of those you love . . . can't be measured in dollars and cents! But, if it could, think of the cash value of the extra safety you get in every 1941 Hudson . . . America's Safest Car.

You'll find in every Hudson the best hydraulic brakes built . . . better still for 1941. But Hudson goes beyond that! You get the only hydraulics with an added mechanical safeguard, working from the same foot pedal, to protect you against brake failure, in case hydraulic fluid should leak away through accident or service neglect. This can happen in any car, but only in a Hudson can you push farther on the same brake pedal . . . and STOP!

Another priceless safeguard which only Hudson gives you is Patented Auto-Poise Control. It helps keep front wheels on their true course automatically . . . even if a tire blows. And with it, True Center-Point Steering, the finest known. (A type used in only two other cars, both costing over $1500.)

New Riding Ease . . . New Silent Shifting

To make your ride not merely smooth, but smoothest, Hudson developed a type of Independent Front Wheel Coil Springing that improves on that used in other cars priced high above any Hudson. Yet you get this great feature in a 1941 Hudson Six, one of the lowest priced cars built today. More for your money!

Take silent shifting. Even in its lowest priced 1941 models, Hudson gives you a new synchromesh transmission that is actually an improvement on the kind you find in the most expensive cars. Again, more value per dollar!

Economy Without Compromise

Operating and upkeep cost are important, too. And, here again, Hudson engineering leadership scores a big advantage for you. With the most efficient motor in any car built today, as official ratings prove, Hudson need not ask you to sacrifice size, room and luxury for the sake of economy. The "Hudson way" gives you both topflight gas mileage and a big, roomy, luxurious car economy without compromise.

Before you choose your new car, see everything else that is new in Hudson for 1941—visit the nearest Hudson showroom. Find out how much more your money will buy there.

NEW STYLE IDEA...

Symphonic Styling

...and in every 1941 Hudson...

BRILLIANT NEW DESIGN!

LONGER WHEELBASES! ★ ROOMIER BODIES!

NEW RIDING AND DRIVING EASE!

NEW SYNCHROMESH TRANSMISSION!

...and with all this...

SAFETY YOU CAN'T GET IN ANY OTHER CAR

AMERICA'S SAFEST CAR

Safest brakes, safest steering
...features that "think" for you when there's no time to think!

For the First Time in Low Priced Cars, a Wide Choice of Interior Color Combinations That Harmonize With Exterior Colors, AT NO EXTRA COST

SYMPHONIC STYLING begins with brilliantly modern new design... bodies that are 5½ inches longer, full two inches lower, and roomier than ever... with lines that flow in unbroken harmony from front to modish new rear.

But the crowning triumph of Symphonic Styling is that it makes available a wide selection of interior color combinations that harmonize with the exterior colors... at no extra cost!

In automobiles, up to now, one upholstery color has usually done duty with every body color. Carpets, floor mats, steering wheels and trim have introduced still other assorted colors and tones.

Now Hudson's Symphonic Styling gives you, in your 1941 car, the kind of color harmony throughout that you want and expect in other fine things you buy. A car that is truly a symphony of line and color.

It has never been possible for any other automobile company to offer anything like this in regular, standard production. But Hudson, over a long period of years, has developed highly specialized methods that permit a wide variation in the details and equipment of each individual car, without interfering with orderly, efficient mass production. Symphonic Styling is the climax of this long-time development!

Here is another Hudson "first"... beauty new to the automobile... harmony of which you will never tire... yours in 1941 Hudsons at prices starting among today's lowest!

AMERICA'S LOWEST PRICED FINE CARS... NEW HUDSON COMMODORE SERIES

Here, Symphonic Styling reaches its richest beauty, in a wide range of superb exterior-interior color harmonies, one of which is pictured in the accompanying illustrations. These are cars of superlative luxury... including the 128-horsepower, 121-inch wheelbase Eight shown here; a companion Six; a Custom Club Coupe; and lavishly equipped Custom Sedans on 128-inch wheelbase. Airfoam Seat Cushions are standard in all Commodore models, and available at small cost in all other 1941 Hudsons.

(Two-tone exteriors available without added cost in Hudson Commodore Custom models; optional at moderate extra cost in other 1941 Hudsons. White sidewall tires extra.)

Just off the Plane from HAVANA

J. P. McEVoy, playwright, humorist and regular contributor to magazines—is known as a “chain cigar smoker” who carries his cigars in his pants pockets!

“BELIEVE IT OR NOT—I find carrying cigars in my trousers’ pocket keeps me from breaking them—” says J. P. McEvoy. Well—we don’t know. Maybe it works.

“HOW DO I WRITE?” Mr. McEvoy went on. “I dictate as I smoke and must have strained a million words through White Owl Cigars in the last ten years.”

J. P. McEvoy ENDORSES NEW WHITE OWLS’ HAVANA FLAVOR

OWL: Hi there—Mr. McEvoy! How did you find Havana?

J. P. McEVoy: I peered through a cloud of fragrant cigar smoke and there it was!

OWL: Did you go to get some new ideas?

J. P. McEVoy: No, I went to get rid of some old ones.

OWL: Not smoking, surely?

J. P. McEVoy: On the contrary, I expect to go right on smoking here—and hereafter.

OWL: Well, light up this new White Owl and tell us if it’s got real Havana flavor.

J. P. McEVoy: Sure enough! Milder than the Cuban all-Havana cigar—but definitely it has the real Havana flavor!

NOW BLENDED
WITH HAVANA!

Try a

J. P. McEVoy, Saturday Evening Post author, is back from an airplane jaunt to Havana. We interviewed him when he arrived in New York.

Mr. McEvoy’s friends will tell you he’s a veteran cigar smoker from way back. Because of his great fondness for Cuban cigars, he really knows the luxury taste of real Havana tobacco.

When connoisseurs such as J. P. McEvoy approve the new Blended-with-Havana White Owl for its real Havana taste—you know this new cigar is a smoke to get excited about. Thousands have discovered the Havana flavor of the new White Owl... why don’t you?

NEW WHITE OWL—Today 5¢

New White Owls are made in U.S.A. only—see how at New York World’s Fair, 1940

Copyright, 1940, by General Cigar Co., Inc.

"You've overdone it, sir, that's what you've done. We're just by the station. You'll have to sit down. You can't go on forever without sleeping or eating; no one can."

The tone was plaintive and gently nagging.

"You'll go sick on your feet, and then where shall we be?"

He was leading his charge all the time with the firm efficiency of long practice and they advanced upon the unexpectedly modern police station, set among the Tudor scenery, in spite of his companion's incoherent protests.

A police sergeant met them on the doorstep, and there was a muttered conference between him and his chief.

"Is there?" Hutch said at last. "I see. Yes. Yes, of course. Put it through at once. We'll take it in the charge room." He turned to Campion anxiously. "There's a personal call waiting for you, sir," he said. "It's from headquarters. Can you manage it? Are you all right?"

Campion had no clear impression of his passage through the station. He came back to himself as he sat staring into the mouthpiece of the telephone. "Yeo here, Mr. Campion," said a voice in his ear. It was so small and quiet that it might have been the whisper of conscience. "Yeo. Have you got the chief with you?"

"Oates?" Campion's own voice was strong and apprehensive. It seemed to him that he was shouting.

"Yes sir. He's gone. We can't find him. He left his room here in the small hours of yesterday morning and hasn't been heard of since. Is he with you?"

"No, he's not here."

THERE was a long pause. It seemed to stretch into centuries.

The faraway voice spoke again:

"Then it's you alone now, sir. You're the only one now who can do anything. None of the rest of us here even know the full strength. I don't know if you think that's wise, sir. The chief was in sole control of his agents."

Campion could not reply and after a pause the little voice came again:

"Any . . . luck, sir?"

Campion closed his eyes and opened them again as the secret reserve that lies in every human body was pumped up into his veins.

"Not yet," he said distinctly, "but there's still an hour or two."

Then he slipped forward across the table, his head in his arms.

He woke holding Amanda's hand. He was so relieved to find it there, so comforted to see her, alive, friendly and gloriously intelligent, that for a blessed moment he remained mindless and content. He lay looking at her with placid, stupid eyes.

"You're ill," she said, her clear, immature voice frankly anxious. "I've been trying to wake you for hours. What shall I do? Phone Oates?"

That did it. That brought him back to the situation with a rush.

"No," he said, struggling into a sitting position, while the whole top of his head seemed to slide backward sickeningly. "No, that's no good. I mean don't do that. I'll get up at once."

"All right," she agreed, and he looked at her with deep affection. The reflection that he had probably lost her forever was such an incredible disaster that he put it away from him, unconsidered, and tightened his grip on her hand childishly.

"How late am I?"

"About an hour." She released herself gently. "You start the tour of inspection at ten. I'll run you a bath and then go down and get you some breakfast. You've twenty minutes before you leave the house."

"Tour of inspection?" he said dubiously. "What—er—what do I wear?"

He had hoped for a clue but for once she was unobliging.

"Oh, just the simple uniform of an admiral of the fleet, I should think, don't you?"

Her voice floating back from the other room was followed by the roar of his bath water.

"Or you might stick to the old fireman's outfit, of course. That's bright and cheerful without being vulgar. I say," she added as she came in again, "what about those things? The servants here look as though they take a valet's interest in one's wardrobe. It'll look so bad if you come in and find them neatly laid out on the bed. Shall I take them down and stuff them in the toolbox of the car?"

"I wish you would. They're in the cupboard," he said. "You're very helpful, Amanda."

She did not answer for a moment but when she emerged from the armoire with her arms full of oilskins her cheeks were bright.

"I'm still the lieutenant," she said, facing him squarely. "You get up and see to that bath or we'll have a flood. Time's very short."

Short! As the door closed behind him

Squadron Leaders!

...IN THE GREAT NEW FLIGHT

TO SMARTER, MORE ORIGINAL HAT STYLES

Berg FLYING CADET Sta-Scope Crown

Men who take off in this hat reach new altitudes in better dress!...For Berg introduces "Contrabands"...a new exclusive color note. Blue on brown as illustrated—and half a dozen other smart combinations.

$395. $500

Berg ROAMER

Breezy good looks combined with breezy lightness! Wherever you navigate in this hat you have the carefree ease of being better-dressed plus true comfort...Burgess Blue illustrated.

$395

CAMPUS
KHAKI
$5 LEADING COLLEGE STYLE

Berg-Hats

BERG HATS
$5
WITH NEW TRU-SIZE
ADJUSTABLE FEATURE

"It follows the book rather closely"

LEO GARRELL

CAUTION!! BEWARE OF BLEEDING GUMS GINGIVITIS

ATTACKING THOUSANDS 4 OUT OF 5 MAY HAVE IT!

If your gums ever bleed and are sore, tender—read every word! Gingivitis, an inflammation where gums join the teeth, is so common today 4 out of 5—even young folks—may be victims.

If neglected—Gingivitis is often a start of Pyorrhea with its shrinking gums and loosened teeth. Only your dentist can help Pyorrhea. Wise folks go every three months for gum inspection. Then at home help guard against Gingivitis.

How 95% Cases Improved in 30 Days

Brush your teeth and massage your gums twice daily with Forhan's Toothpaste. Clinical investigation shows 95% Gingivitis cases improved in 30 days by following this easy method.

Forhan's is the formula of Dr. R. J. Forhan for cleaning dull teeth to their "natural" lustre—for massaging gums to help them be firmer and more able to ward off infection. Also helps remove acid film that often starts tooth decay. Start using Forhan's TODAY. At drug and department stores. Weekend size at 10¢ stores.

he realized how short time was and cursed himself for sleeping. He could only just remember the later events of the morning. Hutch had brought him home in a car and had put him to bed like a mother. Mercifully they had not given him alcohol at the police station. That might well have killed him with his head in its present condition.

By the time he staggered downstairs he was fairly clear about his immediate plan of campaign. The Masters were his best bet. They knew the secret of 15 if anyone did, since they were making it their main business of the evening. Lee Aubrey must be persuaded to tell him all there was to be known about the Masters.

He found Aubrey waiting for him in a brown-and-yellow morning room. He was standing by the window, looking with tragedian eyes at Amanda who sat behind the silver. His greeting was gravely commiserating, as though he knew that lesser men had weaknesses and he could be tolerant and even a little envious of them.

Campion, watching him with his new child's eyes, saw what Amanda liked in him and sized it up like a general inspecting enemy fortifications before the commencement of hostilities.

He made a hurried breakfast and, only halfway through the meal, realized that it was Lee who was waiting for him.

"It's too bad we can't take you with us," Aubrey spoke to the girl with a frankness of regret that was almost indecent. "But I'm afraid it's impossible. We're not exactly wedded to the government but we're rather definitely under its protection in the eighteenth-century sense, and my instructions only apply to Campion. It's all quite mad, of course. I sometimes wonder if the fellows who set out these restrictions aren't using a little too broad a rule. There's not enough brains to go around, you know. That's the fundamental weakness in the government and everywhere else."

"Oh, that's all right," said Amanda cheerfully. "I don't want to see your old Institute. The whole show sounds like a municipal school of conjuring to me."

LEE hesitated and it was only after a moment that his charming smile spread over his large, curling features.

"You shocked me," he said with disarming naïvete. "I get very parochial down here. One does. To hear the Masters called 'municipal' gives me a sacrilegious thrill."

"They achieve almost international status, financially at any rate, don't they?" Campion's thought was running on spice islands and he spoke unguardedly.

Lee raised his head and gave him one of his surprisingly intelligent stares.

"They're very wealthy, of course," he said primly.

"Yes, well, there you are. A penny here and a penny there, it all mounts up over a period of years." Campion had intended to sound ignorant, but even he was unprepared for the degree of fatuous idiocy he managed to present.

Lee looked genuinely embarrassed and glanced at Amanda apologetically.

"When you're ready, we'll go," he said, and later, as he and Campion walked across the turf together, he took it upon himself to explain gently, choosing his words carefully as though talking to a child. "Historically the Masters are amazingly interesting," he began, reproof in his pleasant voice. "The family that was the leading spirit at their foundation never completely rotted away. The Letts have never produced any great men, nor have they had any downright wrong uns, and there's always been one moderately intelligent businessman in every generation. The present fellow, Peter Lett, is just a good, sound, average brain like his uncle before him, and his grandfather and great-grandfathers before that. They've all been religious, respectable and very parochial, while, of course, the curious hereditary and semisecret structure of the society has been a tremendous safeguard. Financially the Masters have had their bad periods but they've never gone quite under. Their basic line is so good."

"What's that?"

AUBREY seemed astounded. "Patents, of course," he said.

"Patents?"

"Well," he was laughing a little, "it was monopolies to begin with, naturally. Queen Elizabeth gave them their first big break. One of the kids in the little charity school they started up turned out to be the great Ralph Godlee, who invented the Godlee loom. The Masters got a monopoly on the manufacture of the things from the queen and it revolutionized the wool-weaving industry over here, speeding up the production by about five hundred per cent and making the town's fortune. The word 'abridged' comes from it. It shortened the process. But you know all this as well as I do."

Campion coughed. "At the moment there are gaps in my education," he admitted modestly. "Do go on. I find this fascinating. They've continued like this, have they?—first educating and then fleecing the inventor?"

Lee made a deprecatory grimace and quite openly thought for a moment or so. He was extraordinarily unself-conscious in that one way. His thinking was obvious, almost pantomimic.

"That's not quite true," he said at last. "One must be fair. Let's say that instead of patronizing the arts they've always gone in for science and have been lucky in having been able to produce a few valuable inventors who have always made their own fortunes as well as adding to the general fund. The Masters had their great successes in the Victorian industrial age, naturally. It's only comparatively recently that they've become so very wealthy. They bought very sensibly at that time, always going for overseas property, tea plantations and so on."

"At the moment I think the Institute gives more than value for money every time. Look at the facilities the chosen inventor gets here. Once his idea is approved, every mortal thing he needs is given to him gratis. His patents are acquired for him, and he hands out a percentage. Just now things are more than booming, naturally. The Carter cheap process for extracting gasoline from coal is going to be an enormous thing, and we've one or two pleasant little explosives on the carpet. The whisky bottle you can't refill is another one of ours, too; that's a great money-maker."

Campion listened to him fascinated. He knew it, he had heard it all before, he was sure of that, and vaguely it was all coming back to him.

"I don't approve of the Masters in principle," Lee was saying pedantically. "I don't like pockets of wealth like that in the country. But, to do these fellows justice, their little constitution does good work. The Ceremony of the Bale of Straw is a nice archaic idea, for instance. All the mummery of the fraternity is connected with the Nag, you know, and they have a ruling that at every half-yearly meeting, the Masters shall 'put down a bale of straw in the Nag's stable'; that is to say they shall do something to improve the amenities of the town of Bridge. That's why the place is so luxuriously drained, watered and lit. There's not a scrap of slum property in the area. Fortunes are being spent on the place and the rates are

Here's a Bargain for Your
"Noggin"

JERIS

1¢ Sale

75¢ SIZE
HAIR TONIC

60¢ SIZE
HAIR OIL

both for 76¢

Treat your scalp and hair to the benefits of these dependable hair preparations! Use Jeris Antiseptic Hair Tonic for invigorating massage, and to remove loose dandruff. Use Jeris Hair Oil to avoid dry scalp, and keep your hair immaculately groomed.

AT ALL DRUG STORES AND BARBER SHOPS

OTIS

HEALTHWEIGHT UNDERWEAR

Warmth without bulk, for the man who wants the fit and support of knit underwear

Short sleeve or sleeveless shirts. Mid-thigh or ankle shorts, with double front, support feature.

OTIS

HEALTHWEIGHT UNDERWEAR

"Warmth without Bulk"

Otis Underwear, 57 Worth St., New York

negligible. Here we are. See the sentry? That's what working for the war house does for you."

They had come up over the ridge of high ground that stretched up behind the poplar trees and had reached the private road leading to the Institute, a cluster of roofs surrounded by a high, moss-grown wall.

The original building was now no more than a museum, but all around it clustered other houses, workshops and laboratories, representing every phase of British architecture.

A soldier with fixed bayonet stood on guard before the ornamental iron gates. Lee Aubrey smiled at the man as they passed.

"Gloriously mad, isn't it?" he murmured. "There's something rather sweet and childlike about the modern world, don't you think? 'Halt! Give the countersign. Pass friend. Eena-deena-ina-do, you're a spy.' It's so monstrously young."

"Childish, perhaps, but hardly sweet," said Campion absently. "Where do we go first?"

"My dear fellow, that's entirely up to you. My instructions are that I'm to show you anything that you care to see. Make your choice. On your left you have the bad-tempered but otherwise wholly delightful Carter working with his team of galley slaves. They'll be polite because I'm by way of being the headmaster, but they won't be hospitable."

AUBREY was enjoying himself. He was exaggeratedly proud of the place and its magnificent organization.

"On your extreme right, in that depressing building which looks like a Methodist chapel, is poor old Burgess. He'll talk all night. He's having trouble with his reaper. The last trials were nothing less than a fiasco and he may have struck a serious snag. Before you enter the library, the office, the filing department and the drafting rooms. And right over there, as comfortably distant as space will permit, is the star turn of the moment, the war house's little white-headed boy, our young Master Butcher, playing about with Anderton's latest variety of potted hell-fire. I have to keep an eye on him and see he controls his quantities. It's incredible stuff. Half a teaspoonful can make as much mess as a bucketful of T.N.T. Hence the sentry on the door."

He paused expectantly and Campion stood irresolute. This was a continuation of the frustration dream of the night before. As far as he could see, the whole thing was being handed to him on a plate and yet he could not put his finger on it.

"It's almost an embarrassment of riches," he said aloud, and added hastily, "what's in the dovecot?"

The building so unkindly described had caught his attention because of a certain amount of life going on before it. A lorry loading sacks was drawn up in front of the door.

Lee frowned and the man at his side was aware of the wave of irritation that passed over him. It was a physical thing, as if his personal magnetism had been switched off and on again.

"You've got a nose, haven't you?" he said, half laughing. "You're one of those people who always move the chair that covers the hole in the carpet and go straight to the cupboard where the dirty washing-up has been hidden. I offer you the exciting drawing-room exhibits and you go direct to the one blot on our dignity. We've been compelled to shelter fifty beastly little amateur workers simply because we happen to have a lot of room. Think of it! In that sacred building Richardson perfected his adding machine, and now half a hundred little girls who can hardly write are addressing envelopes there for the ministry of health. As if there weren't five million other places in England that would do quite as well!"

They had reached the building by this time and through the long windows Campion could see rows of bent heads and piles of government envelopes. It looked to be dull work, but in his present mood highly preferable to his own, and he envied them.

As they skirted the lorry, a woman with untidy white hair came out of the arched doorway. She was faintly familiar and he recognized her at last as one of Aubrey's dinner guests of the night before. She was startled to see them and came up with that half-hesi-

These new features make REGENT the finest cigarette you ever smoked

- MULTIPLE-BLEND ...Regent's exclusive Multiple-Blend combines an unusual number of choice tobaccos in entirely new proportions, giving you exceptional mildness and a better-tasting cigarette.
- KING SIZE ...Regents are over 20% longer, allowing the smoke more time to cool. The result is a natural coolness you notice as soon as you take your first puff. And this extra length also means more fine tobacco for your money.
- OVAL SHAPE ...Regent's oval shape not only adds distinction to this extra long cigarette, but makes Regents easier to hold and more comfortable to smoke.
- CRUSH-PROOF BOX ...So that every Regent you smoke will be in perfect smoking condition, Regents are packed in a crush-proof box...the only satisfactory container for a King-size cigarette.

BOX OF TWENTY 15¢

"THE FINEST CIGARETTE YOU EVER SMOKED"

"Ouch!"

REAMER KELLER

FREE Meals FOR YOUR DOG

Every Other Day, Starting Today!

Here's your chance to make your dog food money go twice as far—with guaranteed nutritional safety! And because we're eager to have you take advantage of this outstanding opportunity, we want to start you off with a FREE supply! Simply mail the coupon for a generous sample of GAINES Dog Food.

New Feeding Method Cuts Cost in Half!

GAINES DOG FOOD gives your pet a "nutritional bonus"! Made with vitamins A, B, D, E, G, minerals and energy-yielding, body-building nutrients, it's all food. Surplus water has been removed—and you save 50% to 60% by adding the water yourself! Let your own experience show you why thousands upon thousands are turning to GAINES, the dog food chosen by the U. S. Antarctic Expedition. Send for your free sample. Get started on GAINES DOG FOOD—today!

Fill in the Coupon Below—NOW!

It will bring you a liberal trial supply of GAINES MEAL and GAINES KRUNCHON (Gaines Meal in pellet form).

And with your free sample of these foods you'll receive a colorful, comprehensive, 68-page booklet you'll find invaluable. It tells you everything you need know about the feeding of dogs and puppies. In addition, you'll be sent a 30-day, money-back guarantee, effective when you start feeding GAINES DOG FOOD regularly. Yes, the coupon below entitles you to all this—free! Act at once on this generous offer. Fill in coupon and mail today!

Free!

GAINES FOOD CO. INC.
Box C-9, Sherburne, N. Y.

☐ I'm interested in feeding ☐ adult dogs;
☐ breeding stock; ☐ puppies.
☐ I'd like to take advantage of your FREE offer!

☐ I enclose $1 for a 10-lb. bag of GAINES ☐ MEAL
or ☐ KRUNCHON.

Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____

tant, half-eager humility, which is commoner in far younger women.

"We're getting on very nicely, Mr. Aubrey," she said appealingly, and blushed.

Campion was surprised. Missing on four out of five cylinders though he was, he could still recognize those symptoms when he saw them, and she was not that kind of woman. A great many ladies who are old enough to know better frequently become hopelessly infatuated with brilliant, middle-aged bachelors, but they are seldom of the experienced, intelligent type of gentlewoman he saw before him. He recollected that she had been very interested in Amanda the last time he had seen her. He glanced at Aubrey, to find him frigid.

"Splendid, Mrs. Ericson," he said briefly, and passed on, leaving a flavor of distaste in the air. "Patriotic voluntary work," he murmured under his breath to Campion as they turned the corner. "Intense stuff."

"She looked intelligent," said Campion, and Lee considered the matter.

"Oh, she is," he agreed brightly. "She's a widow of the late holder of one of the Masters' minor offices and quite a power in the town. Very well read, you know—nice, educated, but emotionally unstable, I fancy. Now this is Butcher's domain, which I take it is your main interest. I say, I admire your magnificent reticence, Campion. It's impressive."

The final observation was made impulsively and as if he meant it.

Campion said nothing and hoped that his silence might pass for modest appreciation.

It was a longish walk to the square concrete tower at the far end of the Institute grounds, and when they reached it their inspection was not illuminating. Butcher himself turned out to be a cheerful youngster with the face of a plowboy and thick, pebbled glasses. He had a youthful respect for Aubrey, whom he clearly admired, and was pleased to show his laboratories and workshops.

"These are the best of the bunch," he said, diving into a rough cupboard in a corner of the main room on the ground floor, which had been deserted and open to the path as they came up. "I keep them in their racks because they really are pretty sensational. We call 'em Phoenix Eggs. Don't drop it, old man, will you? It's quite safe unless you dig that pin out, of course, but it's as well not to bounce it about because it's only a specimen and you never know."

CAMPION looked down at the metal egg so suddenly thrust in his hand. It was little larger than a hen's and unexpectedly light. Butcher was fondling another, fitting it lovingly into the hollow under his thumb.

"It's important to be able to chuck it a decent distance," he explained. "It's pretty powerful. The blast is colossal and they even make quite a crater. It's wonderful really."

He retrieved Campion's specimen, juggled with the two of them absently, and replaced them in their nests.

"They're putting up the machines for these now," he said. "I've got some nice little aero models coming along in the basement, but we're still working on the detonators. Anything else in particular that you'd like to see?"

"No, I won't keep you from your work. You've given me more than fifteen minutes already."

The young man's expression did not change, and Campion shook hands and turned away. A sixth sense, or rather that mysterious body-mind that so often seems to take charge when one's normal brain goes back on one, was looking after him. His reserve and non-committal tone was far more impressive than any show of appreciation could ever have been, and young Butcher retired to his underground laboratory wondering if the authorities really put quite the trust in him that their behavior so far had caused him to suspect.

It was Campion who led Aubrey out into the sun again. He had listened to a quantity of technical detail from Butcher, all of which might be important to an enemy but was not to him. Whatever Butcher knew was also known already, presumably, by the war office and was, therefore, none of Campion's business. What he must be looking for was something that was hitherto unknown to them. Fifteen? He must keep his mind clear and hang on to that. Fifteen: that was still his only definite clue. Fifteen, and the people who knew what it meant. Butcher was evidently not one of them, but there was someone else who was.

As he raised his eyes and looked down the narrow concrete path which ran like a chalk line across the green turf, he saw the man he was thinking about.

He appeared so quickly that it was difficult to say whether thought or vision came first. His jaunty roundness was recognizable at a tremendous distance and he came bouncing along toward them without haste.

"THAT fellow Pyne," said Campion. "Really?" Aubrey's distinctive face clouded. "What on earth is the man doing wandering around here alone like this? They've let him in to look for me, I suppose. They mustn't do that, as they very well know. He's talked his way in, you see. How extraordinary these fellows are! I'm quite prepared to like him but he mustn't make himself a nuisance. I loathe having to tell a man to clear out."

"Who is he?"

"Pyne? Oh, rather an interesting bird. Remarkably intelligent in his own way. Probably dishonest. Works like a fiend." Lee had dropped into his objective mood again. His remarks were quite free from affectation and he spoke with the judicial simplicity of an admittedly superior being. "He's evacuated his office down here. It's an amusing little organization and he makes a very good thing out of it. He calls it Surveys Limited. I suppose you've heard of it?"

"It's faintly familiar," said Campion not untruthfully. "What do they do? Arrange one's life for one?"

Lee laughed. "Only in part," he murmured. "They're an advice-and-information bureau. If you want to build a factory or start up a business in an unknown locality they'll get out all the dope on the place for you. They're remarkably thorough. Apart from all the usual stuff, they tabulate the most intimate details, including some very shrewd work on public opinion and estimates of local wealth. In fact, they'll sound every possible depth for you in strictest confidence. Pyne told me once that he had ten thousand agents all over England. That probably means that he's employed about half that number at some time or other during his career."

Pyne was almost upon them.

By morning light he did not look quite so amiable and easygoing. He was still hearty but now there was suppressed anxiety and a touch of antagonism there as well. He greeted them without preliminaries.

"Any developments?" he demanded as soon as he was within speaking distance.

"In which direction?" Campion was relieved to find that his own powers of controlling both his face and voice were considerable.

"Well, what about last night? What about Anscombe?" Pyne was keyed up

Savage Arms Corporation
Dept. 2100, Utica, N. Y.
Kindly send free catalog and price list.

Name _____

Address _____

DON'T MISS!

NORTH CAROLINA THIS FALL

HUNTING... FISHING... GOLF

LISTEN! Golden Autumn Days are calling you... to outdoor recreation and sport in North Carolina. It's open season... Hunting, Fishing, Golf... FUN in an exhilarating climate that makes you live each thrilling moment with Gun, Rod, or Club. Scenic Highways of surpassing beauty... the Great Smokies... Pack up your gear and come now... Good food, excellent accommodations at reasonable costs. Good companionship... for sportsmen love this land. Mail Coupon Today.

Governor's Hospitality Committee, 2622 Dept. of Conservation and Development,
Raleigh, North Carolina
Gentlemen: Please send illustrated booklet,
"OUTDOORS IN NORTH CAROLINA"

Name _____

Address _____

and his round eyes were as shifty and inquisitive as a sparrow's.

A thin trickle of fear dribbled down Campion's spine. Until that moment he had entirely forgotten the incident. The enormity of the omission appalled him. Anscombe and his disturbing manner of dying had gone clean out of his mind. If he had forgotten that, what else had he overlooked? To his relief Lee looked faintly shamefaced also.

"Oh, Lord! Miss Anscombe!" he said. "I must go down to see her. It's early yet, but what a merciful chance you reminded me. Once one gets behind this wall one passes into another world, you know. Don't you feel it, Campion? The mind simply settles down to consider ideas and their technical development. Poor old Anscombe. I knew him reasonably well, but in here and at the moment he's absolutely remote."

Pyne wiped his forehead. "You're lucky," he said dryly. "I've been thinking of him all night. I don't like the look of that death. If the police are satisfied, of course, it's nothing to do with me, but I rather wondered if they were?"

There was a question in his last remark, and Campion, who recollected just in time that no one present knew of his late night meeting with Hutch, ignored it. Lee Aubrey was less cautious.

"Anscombe was of the type who never commit suicide," he said didactically.

Pyne glanced at Campion.

"Murder was the thought in my mind," he said.

LEE coughed and moved on up the path. He was offended. His mouth was pursed and he looked shocked.

"My dear chap," he protested, giving the reproach just sufficient reproach to make it also a rebuke, "hysteria at this time in the morning is inexcusable. And there's one other thing while I think of it, Pyne: You really must not come in here unless I bring you personally. It's simply not allowed. The British government has put its foot down on the subject. I don't want to know how you got yourself admitted, because I don't want to have to report the poor beast on the gate, but for heaven's sake, don't do it again."

It was as near a schoolmaster's scolding as Campion had ever heard administered to a grown man. Pyne gave no sign that he had heard. He remained round, pink and dangerously suspicious.

"There's been a man hunt all over this district for the last twelve hours at least," he remarked presently as they walked on. "A fellow wanted by the police escaped from St. Jude's Hospital in Coachingford last night. He pinched an old car, abandoned it at the watersplash on the lower Bridge road, and disappeared. They're still searching for him. Doesn't that strike you as suspicious?"

Lee burst out laughing, an almost feminine spitefulness in his amusement.

"Oh, come," he said, "that's abominable thinking. Some wretched man is escaping from the police and therefore it's only natural to suppose that the first thing he does is to sneak into a garden and murder old Anscombe, who happened to be there. It's childish, Pyne. It won't wash. You're upset, my dear chap. That obtrusive stomach of yours is out of order."

The little fat man jerked in his belly, but his eyes did not lose their alarming shrewdness.

"I was thinking, Campion," he began, "you must have come over from Coachingford about the right time. You didn't see anything of this man, did you?"

"No," said Campion. His tone was mild, he noticed.

Lee sighed with exasperation. "My good Pyne," he said, taking the other man's arm with a weary familiarity which had in it the very essence of condescension, "you're making an ass of yourself."

"I don't believe I am, Aubrey."

"Then you must take my word for it." Lee was smiling dangerously. "Campion is personally known to me and I give you my word that (a) he gave no lift to any escaping suspect, and (b) that suspect did not reward him by bumping off poor old Anscombe in his own front yard. Moreover, that suggestion is ridiculous, it's absurd, it's mad, it's nuts. Forget it, and let the police do their own chores."

(To be continued next week)

"Staticless" Radio... CRITICS AND EXPERTS AGREE!

Noted conductors, musicians and radio experts, who have listened to the new "staticless" FM broadcasts, agree that in tonal perfection, as well as in freedom from static and interference, no other radio reception can compare.

FM

Armstrong System

Stromberg-Carlson

BRINGS YOU THE UTMOST OF RADIO'S GREATEST ADVANCE

Listeners say that the new Stromberg-Carlson FM radios offer almost incredible tonal fidelity. They do more than just add FM reception to the broadcasts you are used to hearing... they have the patented Labyrinth which assures fundamental bass tones otherwise lost, and the Carpinchoe Leather Speaker which delivers more accurate treble tones than ever before. Together these form an exclusive Stromberg-Carlson FM audio system that captures, as nothing else can, the utmost of "staticless" radio's extended musical range.

"STATICLESS"
NO STATION INTERFERENCE INCREASED DYNAMIC RANGE

Frequency Modulation Broadcasting and the new Stromberg-Carlson FM radios bring you reception freed from static and interference, within the service range of FM stations. Electrical disturbances, both man-made and natural, are virtually eliminated. Interference from other radio stations need no longer spoil your enjoyment.

In the complete line of table models, consoles and radio-phonographs are unmatched values, ranging from $24.95 to $395.00.* See them at your nearest dealer's, whose name is listed in your classified telephone directory—or mail coupon.

*Prices slightly higher in the Southeast and west of the Mississippi.

Stromberg-Carlson Telephone Mfg. Co.
277 Carlson Road, Rochester, N. Y.

Gentlemen:

Please send me complete information about the advantages of FM Radio.

Name _____

Street _____

City and State _____

No. 535-PS Automatic Radio-Phonograph with FM band—$265*
No. 535-M Radio with FM band. (at top) $199.50*

All Stromberg-Carlson FM Receivers are licensed under Armstrong Wide-Swing Frequency Modulation patents.

"THERE IS NOTHING FINER THAN A STROMBERG-CARLSON"

"The enemy have revolutionized it again, sir. They now fire the scrap metal directly, without first converting it into munitions!"

AL ROSS

The Claim Jumpers

Continued from page 13

I'LL TAKE THE WHITE ONE EVERY TIME

#2

ALWAYS EASY TO READ

Easy to read—easy to clean—unconditionally guaranteed. The crack-proof white surface is bonded to the steel—protects it from rust... Favorite Wyteface Tapes (moderately priced) are sold by hardware, building material and mill supply dealers everywhere. Ask your dealer—or mail coupon for free sample of the line and an illustrated folder, with prices.

WYTEFACE
K & E STEEL MEASURING TAPES

KEUFFEL & ESSER CO. • Est. 1867 • Dept. 122, Hoboken, N. J.

Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____
Occupation _____

FOR EVERY

Outdoor Sport

Alligator Sportswear

Keeps You Dry

Freedom For Action!

Experts in every line of sport have helped design freedom for action into Alligator sportswear. When you wear a genuine Alligator there's no binding or cramping your style. You can be dry and comfortable and active all at the same time. Specially adapted models for hunting, fishing, golfing, riding, skeet shooting, skiing, yachting, etc. Keep dry in an Alligator! Insist on the genuine!

At Better Dealers Everywhere

THE ALLIGATOR COMPANY, St. Louis • New York • Los Angeles

ALLIGATOR

RAINCOATS and SPORTSWEAR

because... IT'S SURE TO RAIN!

kinda confusin'. How about Rand?" "Fauntleroy," suggested a woman. Clyde Jacks said: "Rattlesnake Flats." Ben Lowe, who had a shiftless man's conceit, spoke up: "It ought to be named after one of us. My place is as close to this town as any and I don't care if you want to name it Lowe."

Barney McNair sat in the bed of the wagon with his arms hooked over its side. His glance went toward the women and stopped there. "Ingrid," he said.

Ingrid Berg moved slowly away but somebody said, "Wait," and took her arm. She stood against the light, her yellow hair shining and her face slowly turning rose-red. Brewerton said: "Ingrid, that's a good name."

"Ingrid, then," said George Webster. A man came out of Harriet Rand's hotel followed by a smaller one and these two listened to the talk until the talk ceased and then they passed on to the road and disappeared in the dark. Kilrain said: "Who's that?"

"Strangers," murmured Brewerton. Kertcher struck a match to his cigarette, quietly adding: "There's four or five families who haven't moved onto their land yet. If they don't show up by midnight day after tomorrow their claims are open to whoever squats on 'em."

"Those two fellows claim jumpers?" "They been looking around."

A HORSE came down the road at a steady gait and a gaunt rider slipped slowly from the saddle, holding one hand before him carefully. As soon as he noticed Kilrain he said: "I wish you'd look at this finger. I ain't slept for three nights."

Kilrain's voice hit him the sharpest blow. "Why should I look at it?"

The newcomer gave Kilrain an affronted stare and anger turned his mouth into a small button. But pain was stronger than his pride and he held out his hand, saying nothing. Kilrain took it and slowly turned it to the light. His fingers moved over it—all these people watching—with a soft, practiced touch. "A felon. Not ready yet. Soak it in hot water tonight."

"Then what'll I do?"

"There's a doctor in Virgil," said Kilrain, and stepped up to his wagon's seat, driving away.

The newcomer said in a half-furious voice: "Nobody's got the right to hold back a gift when it's needed."

"How you know he's a doctor?" asked Andy Pierce.

Mrs. Ellis said: "It sticks out—just the way he looked at that finger." Then she added in her shaded, significant way: "A lot of things stick out in people, like in the proud lady who sat on that seat and was too good for us."

Letty Brewerton said instantly: "I like her."

"Ah," said Mrs. Ellis, "what is she and where did she come from?"

Mrs. Jackson gave Mrs. Ellis an old woman's raking glance and said: "Mighty odd to me how some people have so much time for other people's business. Come, Will."

From the doorway of the hotel Mrs. Rand watched these people move away into the dark and heard their voices echoing across the stillness. The two strangers moved in from the road and entered the hotel. When she turned back she found them seated at the table with a map spread between them. One was heavy, with the soft grease of a townsman padding his bones; the other was old and leathery and sly. The big man said: "That empty quarter section south of Kilrain's—says on the plat Sarah and Lou Colpitt. They here?"

"I don't know," said Harriet Rand.

The big man nodded at his partner. "You go to town tomorrow and bring out a tent and supplies."

AT NOON Elizabeth Marsh brought a cold lunch to Barney McNair and found him too weary to eat. She put her smooth, light hand on his chest, saying, "Don't give up," and saw his faint nod. Curtis Kilrain stood outside the door and shook his head. When she went out he walked into the prairie with her.

"Never mind," he said. "He's decided to die."

She said: "Could he live, if he really wanted to?"

"Maybe." He reached out and squared her before him. He was a man on whose face lay the most graphic pessimism she had ever seen. He was in the early thirties, keen and morose, and his eyes had tremendous power. "Elizabeth, why bother?"

"He's a little boy begging us to help him. I'm going to Madden's for milk."

He stood in the yellow-white flare of the sun, his fingers automatically rolling a cigarette while he watched her cross to her shanty and step inside. In another moment she came out with a bucket and went on toward Madden's house. He had known her since the land rush had brought them together, one month before—a single woman obviously running from some kind of past that had been miserable or tragic or humiliating; and this was the first interest she had displayed.

A single rider slowly cruised around the Colpitt quarter southward at the same time a rig came along the road from Ingrid and wheeled in to Kilrain's shanty. The driver was a spy, small man with a gray tuft of goatee on his chin and a hurried manner. He said: "I'm Doctor Springer, from Virgil. Was out this way and heard you had a sick man. You're Kilrain."

"Come in."

Doctor Springer left the rig and followed Kilrain into the cabin. He came by Barney McNair's bed and said, "Hello, son," and gave McNair one cool look, at once reaching for his satchel. He took up his stethoscope and looped it against his ears.

When he had finished his examination he looked long and directly into Barney McNair's eyes. Curtis Kilrain stepped forward and reached for the boy's arm; and Doctor Springer noted how Kilrain's fingers stopped on Barney McNair's wrist.

What the doctor saw in that idle gesture interested him, confirming rumors he had heard. He got up, closing his satchel. He said: "You've been sick, son." Barney McNair's glance clung to Doctor Springer with faint hope. The doctor said: "Main thing is to rest and roll with the tide. And, son—be cheerful." He went out to his rig and tossed his satchel into it. Not looking at Kilrain who had followed him, he asked a very casual question: "What do you think?"

"Pretty far along," Kilrain said. Then he caught himself and showed irritation. "How would I know?"

"You shouldn't be sleeping in there near him."

"I've survived worse exposures."

Springer got into the rig. He slapped the team with the reins and moved off.

Around four o'clock Elizabeth Marsh appeared with a bucket of milk. She supported Barney McNair with her arms while he half-heartedly tried to drink a cup of milk. "Never mind," he sighed, and lay back in bed.

Elizabeth moved to the room's end. She stood still, with her back to Kilrain, who had come to the doorway; suddenly she turned and the indifference was gone from her face. She walked to him and touched his arm, silently begging him.

"Barney," he said, "you want to live or die?"

The boy lay motionless, his eyes closed. "Why should I live?"

Kilrain's voice grew rough and unsympathetic.

"Listen, Barney. What have you

Here's how Ernest Wendt, parachute jumper, of 7531 12th Avenue S. W., Seattle, Washington, figures it:

"When I buy whiskey I always call for TEN HIGH. My taste says it's the richest, smoothest bourbon of them all!"

After 5 years I'm sold more than ever on TEN HIGH

Here's the verdict of Ward B. Richie, candid camera fan, of 506 N. Main St., Rockford, Illinois.

"For 5 years TEN HIGH has satisfied my taste for real old-fashioned bourbon."

Here's inside information from The "5-year Club"

Kermit A. Scheer, real estate salesman, of 3312 Redman Avenue, Omaha, Nebraska, "talks turkey" about his favorite bourbon!

Some people switch around from one whiskey to another but you'll never find one as smooth and satisfying as TEN HIGH."

I've saved plenty in the 5 years I've been drinking TEN HIGH

Says Jim Backus, radio announcer, of 10400 Brighton Road, Cleveland, Ohio.

Double your enjoyment with—

The whiskey with "no rough edges"

All over America, men just like these you meet here, discovered the deliciousness of TEN HIGH 5 years ago. This rich whiskey satisfies the old taste-spot all ways—in highball, cocktail, or "neat"!

It's so smooth there's not a "rough edge" in a barrelful. Its "easy-to-take" price Doubles Your Enjoyment when you ask for TEN HIGH at your liquor store or bar!

TEN HIGH

STRAIGHT BOURBON WHISKEY STRAIGHT RYE WHISKEY

The Outdoor Pipe that operates perfectly

This is one you've just got to have—unless you're a bookish fellow given to staying indoors. The "watch-case" top on this pipe keeps the wind from tearing into the pipe-bowl and "emptying" it. Protects the briar (and that new tweed outfit of yours) from burning. The slotted grill controls the draft perfectly, and slides back sideways for filling and emptying. The whole pipe is trim as a watch and tight as a clam—makes all other covered pipes look like the Gay Nineties. It's the smartest thing that's come through our doors in many years—you'll agree as soon as you see one. Shown above, No. 04.

Yours for the asking: Pipe-Smoker's Almanac
21 interesting facts about pipes

KAYWOODIE COMPANY

Makers of Fine Pipes since 1851

New York and London

In New York, Rockefeller Center, Fifth Avenue

COPY, 1940. KAYWOODIE COMPANY had? Strength and a lot of pride and ambition, but the damned beast of a world knocked it all out of you and this is what it made you. Curl up and die if you want. Sneak out the same piece of nothingness you were when you came in. Or can you beat this damned dismal universe? Not for love or fame or posterity. Just for yourself—to show yourself you were a man."

Barney McNair's lips drew tight, his fists slowly came together and stuck. He let out a dragging breath and rolled his head aside. Kilrain turned abruptly from the shanty into the late-slanting sunlight. Rolling a cigarette, he watched the solitary rider move forward from the empty quarter section in the south. Elizabeth Marsh came out. She said: "It may help him."

"All a lie. Nothing's worth fighting for."

"I know you better now." She watched the single rider move forward, and said, "That's the claim jumper," and stepped into the house, out of sight.

Visibly suffering from heat, the claim jumper rode into the yard. His round cheeks were congested scarlet and his eyes were bloodshot. His voice clacked: "That quarter back there—supposed to be filed on by Lou and Sarah Colpitt. They ain't here yet?"

"Get off my place," said Kilrain.

The big man's eyes flared wide and drew together. "You damned home-steaders are a tight lot," he grumbled, and moved away.

After he was well down the road Elizabeth Marsh came from the shanty and walked on to her own place a quarter mile distant. The sun dropped behind its own smoke and fury and blue shadows ran like water across the heated earth. Kilrain cooked supper on the stove in the yard and made up Barney McNair's plate but when he entered the shanty he found the boy sound asleep, both arms flung up over his head like a relaxed child. Full dark moved over the prairie. Kilrain took a bottle of whisky from a shelf, extinguished the lamp and walked to Elizabeth's. She was in the shanty, and he waited outside, as he had always done, until she asked him to enter. He stepped in and took the whisky bottle from his pocket. "I can't drink alone."

SHE reached to a cupboard and put a china cup on the table. He poured the cup half full. He looked down at it, every embittered memory passing out through his eyes. "To all the pleasures and conventions," he said, "to all dreams and aspirations and beautiful fictions, and to hell with them," and emptied the cup at a single deep drink.

"I don't remember the Colpitts," she said. "They must have gone back east to get their belongings. If they don't come by midnight tomorrow they'll lose the land. That claim jumper will move on the moment midnight comes. It is too bad one of us isn't eligible to file on it for the Colpitts."

He said: "When you look at Barney pity softens you and betrays you. I have never asked you any questions, have I?"

"Your eyes have cut everything you wanted to know out of me."

"Have I been rude?"

"A doctor's impersonal curiosity. You were a doctor once, Curtis."

"I did not mean to be rude," he said, and refilled the cup. "The surface of a gentleman remains, long after the core has died."

"If you had ceased being a gentleman you wouldn't be so bitter now. Nothing in you has changed. You are your own worst enemy."

"We all are." He made a small gesture, he drew a breath and spoke in a way that was hard-pressed by some deep longing: "You are the form of beauty a man never ceases to seek, in mouth and breast and body. You are a fire that never grows dim as long as man lives. You are the vigor he needs and the acid, the goodness and the badness, the temptation and resistance and the surrender and the giving."

The table lamp made clear-burning images in her eyes; her broad mouth stirred and the stillness of her face broke and left her uncertain and insecure, and her glance dropped from him. Suddenly she took the cup from his hands and touched her lips to the whisky and gave it back; and she met his eyes again, waiting for him.

He put the cup on the table. "You're lonely and hungry, and afraid."

"Yes," she whispered. "All of those things."

HE CIRCLED the table. She turned at his coming and put up her arms, wide and willing. He had the smell of her hair and he had the soft wall of her body close upon him as he kissed her, and into that softness he sank, toward the never-ending man and woman mystery, into its layers of sweetness and its incompleteness. The pressure of her hands forced him back. Her eyes had changed and now seemed to hate him, and sultry distrust had come again to her face, and her voice was old and angry: "Once before a man said those things to me."

He pulled himself away from everything this moment had been. He stood still, making his hard struggle, and said in a humiliated voice: "You have seen what I am."

"Whatever I did wrong in the past—it wasn't cheap. It wasn't, Curtis."

"A man?" he asked.

"Yes."

"And he let you slip away. The man was a fool, Elizabeth. Good night."

Tom Kertcher came down the road next morning on his big bay gelding. Kilrain stopped work on his fence and Elizabeth Marsh stepped out of the shanty. Kertcher, being the best-mannered of men, removed his hat; and since he liked her he gave her his big, friendly smile. "How's Barney?"

"Better, I think."

Kertcher nodded at the empty quarter section in the south. "If the Colpitts don't get on that by twelve o'clock tonight they'll lose it. Those two claim jumpers stayin' at Harriet's hotel have got a wagon and a camp outfit. They'll move on the claim the moment the time's up."

Kilrain said: "I don't remember the Colpitts."

"Man and wife, about forty. Three children, all towheaded. They went back to Iowa to bring their stuff here. They've got to reach Virgil on the noon train, if they're going to get here at all, though it is slightly possible they're driving through by wagon. Andy Pierce went to Virgil this morning to see if they're on the train."

"Why bother?" asked Kilrain in his skeptical voice.

Kertcher gave Kilrain a long, calm stare. "That claim is worth three or four thousand. Neighbors have to stick together. We're all in the same boat."

Elizabeth Marsh said: "Isn't there any way of getting rid of those two men?"

Kertcher chuckled. "Andy and me have discussed that. Seems no way. It is a free country." He wheeled around and cantered toward Ingrid.

Kilrain moved into the shanty with Elizabeth and stood by Barney McNair's bed. He looked closely at the boy's eyes and slid his fingers against his wrist. Barney murmured: "I'm kind of tired, Curtis. But I don't feel bad. I'm not discouraged."

Kilrain said: "I believe I'll give you a shave."

Elizabeth said: "I'm going over to Mrs. Madden's for some milk."

Smith

STYLE with a bonus of comfort

You have always had fine leathers, expert craftsmanship, longer wear and smarter style in Smith shoes. . . . Now you receive an added dividend. Every Smith shoe has an inbuilt flexible construction feature that assures you of greater comfort. Ask your dealer to show you these Smith flexible shoes.

1514 FAIRWAY THE CADET—a military favorite. Black Alpine, double sole, also in tan Alpine antiqued 1614

7068 KENT Expert craftsmanship is revealed in every line of this shoe. Double sole, tan antiqued hickory grain

6051 COLLEGE A sturdy model—a leader for fall. Double sole, tan hickory grain antiqued, also in Black 6251

Write for New Fall Style Book
J. P. Smith Shoe Company, Chicago

You Can't Wear Out Their Looks

Smith
SHOES

Free Fall
Catalog

Just Off the Press

Showing Hunting Foot-wear, Clothing and fifty other leather and canvas specialties of our own manufacture for campers and hunters.

L. L. Bean, Inc.
292 Main Street
Freeport, Maine

Original
CHIPPEWA
BOOTS FOR EVERY PURPOSE

AMERICA'S GREATEST FOOTWEAR VALUES

Hunter's Special One of the many popular styles in the great Original Chippewa line is this all purpose Hunter's Special light weight with stitched pac toe and sure-foot corded sole and heel. All sizes and styles. Get Original Chippewa from your dealer, or write for illustrated catalog.

Look for the Original Chippewa Label on Every Pair

It was then near noon. A little after lunch Mrs. Ellis saw Elizabeth cross the prairie toward Mrs. Madden's. Mrs. Ellis was, at the time, washing dishes when she abandoned the job and brought her chair to the window and sat before it, her face tight and her eyes as luminous as a cat's eyes. She watched Elizabeth enter Madden's and later come out. She followed Elizabeth Marsh with her glance, her breathing quick and shallow, and when Elizabeth reached the Kilrain shanty, Mrs. Ellis said, "Ah," in a kind of pained ecstasy, reached for her sunnnet, and made her way to Mrs. Madden's.

"She was here, buying milk again?" Mrs. Madden said: "For the sick one for Barney."

Mrs. Ellis gave Mrs. Madden a frighted glance. "It does give her chance to be in Kilrain's cabin a lot of time, doesn't it? She was there five times yesterday. Last night he was in her shanty for an hour. Then the light went out." She turned back to the road, touring to reach the Jackson house, and as she walked she held her head down and her lips moved and her thoughts made a gray moist shine in her eyes. At Mrs. Jackson's she repeated in silence what she had observed and returned to her own shanty and took up her place at the window again to watch Kilrain's.

ALL the prairie had filled with its thick yellow-blue haze and heat grew rank and the thin air made breathing a labor. Mrs. Jackson went about her household chores, growing more and more disturbed; and in the middle of the afternoon, noting that Elizabeth Marsh crossed to her own shanty, she smoothed her dress and put on her hat and set out to pay a call with a jar of mustard pickles.

Elizabeth was inside the shanty mending a dress when Mrs. Jackson appeared. Mrs. Jackson said: "I really wanted you to try these pickles. If you like them I'll give you the recipe." Upon invitation Mrs. Jackson entered and took a chair. She removed her hat with a great sigh and put her hands neatly on her lap. "When you get to be sixty this heat just warms a body's cold old bones. Young as you are though, and warm by nature, it must plague you."

"People grow to stand anything."

"Yes," said Mrs. Jackson, "they do," and gave Elizabeth a close look. But she didn't immediately press the talk. She ran idly on, speaking of Jackson who was her husband—Jackson was a restless man—and of her beginnings in Missouri—"I knew the Jameses and the Youngers very well." And somehow the conversation eventually got around to Mrs. Ellis. "A gossip," observed Mrs. Jackson, "is like one bad apple in a barrel. It is a pity people listen to scandal. But then, it is human. I imagine you get lonely."

"Sometimes," said Elizabeth.

"Of course. You are young and one of the prettiest women I ever saw. You don't like people too well, do you? No use pretendin' love or charity if you don't feel it. Come and see me if you have the notion." Mrs. Jackson rose and went to the door, giving the Kilrain shanty a careless glance, and said in a mild voice: "It is nice to have a neighbor that near." Then she looked squarely at Elizabeth. "But maybe it would be the sensible thing not to give Mrs. Ellis too much room to talk." With that she went away, leaving behind her an atmosphere cleansed by the vinegar briskness of her presence.

Through the doorway Elizabeth watched the two claim jumpers move along the Colpitt claim.

Later on, she made her quick supper and left the shanty. Andy Pierce and Tom Kertcher had ridden into Kilrain's yard and she arrived to hear Pierce say:

"Colpitts weren't on the train. Maybe they're comin' through by wagon, along the river. They got just six hours to be here. I think I'll go that way and have a look." The two of them turned off. Doctor Springer's light rig came rutting along the road, into the yard. He got down with his satchel, saying, "I had to come back to see that woman with the

Slow but Sure!

● There's no hurry in the life of Black & White. It takes the long, slow road to satisfaction. And every step of its path is carefully guarded to insure its fine Character... for Character is the goal of this great Scotch. And it's a goal worth the patience—for the reward is magnificent flavor and exquisite bouquet. So ask for Black & White and take your own sweet time enjoying it.

EIGHT YEARS OLD

"BLACK & WHITE"

BLENDED SCOTCH WHISKY • 86.8 PROOF

The Scotch with Character

COPYRIGHT 1940, THE FLEISCHMANN DISTILLING CORPORATION, NEW YORK, N. Y., SOLE DISTRIBUTORS

"I hardly know whether to call the artist or the contractor"

D. HUFFINE

It's hard to propose with a cold in the nose

Keep Up Your Resistance Wear Jockey Longs

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

Two-piece
75¢ and up, per garment

He's the only one who wonders why romance passes him by. The fact is he has no more resistance than a Pekingese. At the first touch of cold weather he ceases to be a good sport and becomes a watery-eyed invalid. Why doesn't he get smart to the things that will keep his resistance up . . . among them Jockey Longs. Plenty of other men have. They wear Jockey Longs because this new garment for winter wear provides warmth without bulk, bind or buttons. Because its patented Y-Front construction gives restful, squirm-free support and because its conveniently angled opening won't gap. In cotton and various wool mixtures. Children's sizes down to six years. See them at your dealer's today. It won't be long before you'll need them! (Also available: Jockey Over-Knee—"long shorts" that lessen chills!)

EASY TO REMEMBER Jockey

Insist on Jockey and look for the name on the garment. No other underwear can have the patented construction features which have made Jockey famous. Remember, it isn't Jockey without the Jockey label. If your dealer can't supply you, write us.

Coopers INC.
KENOSHA WISCONSIN

NEW YORK CHICAGO LOS ANGELES SAN FRANCISCO SEATTLE

Made and distributed in Canada by Moodies, Hamilton, Ont.; In Australia by MacRae Knitting Mills, Sydney; In British Isles by Lyle & Scott, Ideal House, London; In New Zealand by Lane-Walker-Rudkin, Ltd., Christchurch, S 1

Warming to Hunters

To take the chill out of a duck blind, a deer stand or a field trial, just remember that one layer of protection next your skin equals an overcoat . . . particularly when it consists of 100% spun wool Jockey Longs and a matching long sleeved shirt. At $3.00 per, it's a buy. See it at your dealer's or write us!

COPYRIGHT 1940 BY COOPERS, INC.

baby. Thought I'd stop in a moment." He went into the shanty, Kilrain and Elizabeth following, and sat on the bed, looking down at Barney McNair, his finger seeking out the boy's pulse. He said: "Tired, son?"

"Disgusted," murmured Barney McNair. "Maybe I got talked out of dyin'."

"Been known to happen," said Springer, and left the cabin. Kilrain went with him and the two men stood in the yard, talking. Elizabeth heard Springer say: "When I first came here there were just a few people. Now my territory is two hundred miles square. I'm a little old for all of that."

Elizabeth moved to the doorway. Standing in it, she looked into the room and saw Springer's satchel lying on the table, and she said: "Doctor, you're—"

HE WAS near the buggy. He turned, cutting into her talk at once. "No," he said, "I'll eat at Mrs. Rand's," and when he got to the buggy seat he lifted a black satchel from the floor of the buggy and made a point of setting it beside him. "Another day," he said, and drove into the quick-falling dark.

Elizabeth returned to the shanty and stood against the wall so that she might see Kilrain's face; when he came in, his eyes struck the satchel and narrowed and grew black. Barney McNair said: "He forgot his tool kit."

"No," said Kilrain, "he didn't forget anything." He stepped to the table, opening the satchel. He looked down into it with the driest expression, but Elizabeth saw the motion of his eyes as he studied the instruments there. Turning, she left the shanty.

He came out a little later, rolling a smoke and not speaking. Elizabeth said: "I want you to hitch up and pile some camp things in the wagon. We're going down to the Colpitts' quarter. If they haven't arrived by midnight, I'm going to be Mrs. Colpitt. The claim jumpers haven't ever seen me."

"You might make that stick until morning. Then if the Colpitts haven't arrived the claim jumpers will know you fooled them—and they'll be back."

"We've got until morning."

He said: "Playing God for somebody else."

"Please, Curtis."

She took her place on the wagon seat watching him move over the yard to hitch up. Afterward he collected a few tools and lifted the stove into the wagon. He got the bedding from his bunk and a lantern and his gun. She heard him say: "Nine o'clock now." They rode south three quarters of a mile along the line of Kilrain's fence posts and swung east. As soon as they struck the tall, uncut hay of Colpitt's section Kilrain halted and unloaded and laid out the bedding. This golden, high grass ran away, faintly shining against the black, and a soft wind began to ruffle and sigh through it. "I'll have to make this look logical," he said, and drove straight east through the uncut hay to make a track through it. Half an hour later he came back, not bothering to unhitch.

The earth's heat began to thin. She dropped on the unrolled bedding and, lying full length, watched the sky. Kilrain stood at the wagon, silent and apart from her.

"Come here, Curtis."

He moved toward her, dropping to his heels by the bedding. He looked down at the round, vague glow of her face. She reached out to touch him. Deep in the distance a coyote broke the still dark, in a wild, forlorn half howl, half bark. "There's your world, Elizabeth," said Kilrain. "An empty sound in emptiness." Long afterward he took out his watch and brought the tip of a cigarette close to it. "Not long now. Those fellows know I'm not Colpitt. I'll step back when they come."

"Doctor Springer is a little like you, Curtis. He has the same eyes. They saw through you as you see through me. That's why he left the satchel."

"Take your arm away, Elizabeth."

Her face moved and came nearer. "Why?"

"It puts you too close to me."

Her tone was small and inexpressibly sad: "You're not disillusioned, Curtis. You believed in some woman and she broke your heart. But you still look for that kind of woman. If I only were—"

He said: "I love you."

Sound came out of the east and a lantern made a jiggling wake in the black. Kilrain rose. "I'll be near," he said, and disappeared. She got up and moved to the wagon, now hearing voices run the night. The shadow of horses and wagon appeared and a voice called: "Who's that there?" The wagon stopped and a man strode forward with the lantern. When he got nearer she saw it to be the fat claim jumper who had been at

"And to think I joined the tank corps because I hated the air service!"

THURSTON GENTRY

First YearSecond YearThird YearFourth YearFifth YearTenth YearFifteenth YearTwentieth Year

Which of their Years are the "Most Important"?

As you watch your children growing up, it no longer has occurred to you that each year brings its own problems . . . every year is important. While children are young, they need their mother's love and guidance. You also want to give them a good education. A father naturally wants his children to have these advantages . . . even if he were "no longer here" to provide the income for necessary expenses.

If you wish to make certain that your wife will have a regular income, at least until your children were able to face the world alone, you will be interested in learning about the actual type of protection offered by the New York Life's Family Income Policy.

This plan, with its very attractive premium rate, has been designed primarily to give young fathers of moderate means the protection they need and want: a monthly income until the children are grown . . . continued protection for the wife . . . a retirement income for themselves. For example:

Suppose a young father takes a $10,000 (face amount) Family Income Policy with a "20-year period". If he died during the "20-year period", $100 a month would be paid throughout the remainder of the "period" and then, in addition, the full face amount of the policy, $10,000, would be payable.

Thus, if death occurred immediately after the policy was issued, the total guaranteed payments would be $34,000. If he died, say, at the end of the tenth year, the total guaranteed payments would be $22,000.

If he died after the "20-year period", the face amount of $10,000 would be payable.

If he lived to retirement age, as so many men do, he could use the cash surrender value of his policy to obtain an income for life.

Think of what it would mean to you and your family if you owned one of these policies! Wouldn't it really make you feel more secure?

Ask a New York Life representative to tell you about this policy. Or, if you prefer, mail the coupon below.

NEW YORK LIFE

INSURANCE

COMPANY

A Mutual Company Founded on April 12, 1845 • 51 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Security is always the first consideration . . . Nothing else is so important

CLIP—FILL IN—MAIL TODAY

NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY
51 Madison Avenue, New York City

Without obligation on my part, please send me your booklet, "Peace of Mind," describing New York Life Family Income Policies.

I have _____ children.

My youngest child is _____ years old.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY & STATE _____

MY DATE OF BIRTH _____

COL 9-28

WHAT EVERY MOTHER KNOWS
—ABOUT WORMS!

I don't try to fool myself — every litter's going to get worms sooner or later. And it's no joke — they carry off too many pups! Of course, I'm wormed with Sergeant's SURE-SHOT CAPSULES before the pups arrive. Then we worm the pups at six weeks with PUPPY CAPSULES — and keep on watching them for new signs.

That's the system the Master learned from the Sergeant's DOG BOOK. Says he wouldn't have a dog if he couldn't have a DOG BOOK too. Get your free copy at a drug or pet store (they have SURE-SHOT and PUPPY CAPSULES too) — or use this coupon.

Sergeant's DOG MEDICINES

FREE Polk Miller Products Corp.
Dept. 2-1, Richmond, Va.
Please send a free Sergeant's DOG BOOK to:
Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____

THEY FIT WHERE SHIRTS NEVER FIT BEFORE . . .

because they're Figurized***

- Can't wrinkle across bosom—Smooth from armpit to collar
- Can't bulge under arms
- Can't overlap at shoulders

*Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

There's nothing smarter than
FRUIT OF THE LOOM SHIRTS

only $1.65 at better men's wear shops
Eclipse Needles Co., Phila., Pa.

Harriet Rand's hotel. He flung the lantern overhead so that its beam hit her face. "Who're you?"

"I'm Sarah Colpitt."

He reached for his watch and his head bowed over it. "You're too late. It's after midnight."

"We were here before. You can see our wagon trail through the grass."

"Where's your man?"

"Down at the river for water."

He said: "You can't prove you got here on time. Tink, bring up the wagon."

She stepped to the bedding and reached down to seize Kilrain's shotgun. She came back against the big man, aiming the gun on him, making him give ground. His voice, half angered and half afraid, rushed at her: "You don't try—"

"Get off this claim or my husband will kill you!"

South of her somewhere she heard the slow, dry groaning of another wagon. The big man, also hearing it, said: "What's that?"

"My husband. You get out."

The second man's voice came from the background. "Come on, Bill. No use for a shootin' scrape," and the big one wheeled and went away. Elizabeth waited in fear; for if the Colpitts arrived too soon these land jumpers would see the deception. The big man was back at the wagon, swearing at her. Kilrain came from the dark, moving fast. He rolled up the bedding and lifted the stove into the wagon. A single rider scudded up through the grass and a voice—Andy Pierce's voice—cut forward, very harsh: "What the hell you doin' here?"

"It's all right, Andy. But you're a little late."

Andy Pierce got down from his horse and moved in. "I thought you were those claim jumpers. I rode along the river and found the Colpitts. They're coming up." Then he paused to think of this and stepped close to Elizabeth. "You pulled a foxy one on 'em?"

"She was Mrs. Colpitt," said Kilrain.

"They didn't know her. She bluffed them off."

"Wait till I tell this," said Andy Pierce.

"No," said Elizabeth, "you can't. It was illegal, wasn't it? If the claim jumpers find out the Colpitts got here too late they'll contest the claim. Don't tell it." She was in the wagon, gently calling back: "Just tell the Colpitts so they'll understand. Come on, Curtis."

Kilrain moved the team away in a circle. The claim jumpers were down the Ingrid road, the creak of their wagon dying, and the Colpitts were halted somewhere southward on their own claim, their lantern swinging yellow arcs in the black. Kilrain came across Elizabeth Marsh's quarter to her shanty and stopped.

SHE sat beside him, her shoulder a weight on his arm; he looked down and saw her face swing to him and he heard her voice lift, so slow and so clear: "I must not step inside your shanty again, Curtis. There's talk of it going around."

"Does it matter?"

"It didn't, but it does now. I want these peoples' respect. And I want yours."

"You have mine."

She dropped from the wagon. She was a shadow in the dark. "Perhaps you meant what you told me a little while ago. But we are so much alike in the things that have happened to us and it is not quite the same as though we were first in love, with no doubt and no bad memories. Love can't ever be something free, for us. We'll have to work for it."

He sat still, dark on the wagon seat, lost in his thoughts.

"Curtis," she whispered, "I want your respect. If you want mine take the satchel Doctor Springer left for you."

He said: "If it means that much to you, I will. Good night."

"Good night," she murmured, and watched him drive away.

"Have you a tray to match? He always has breakfast in bed"

CARBARA SHERMUND

I MADE IT STICK WITH CASCO

No. 24

SAVE THE COST OF A NEW KITCHEN TABLE

Modernize your kitchen! Fasten new, attractive linoleum to that old wood table-top—with Casco Glue. It's easy to use. No mess. Just add Casco Powdered Casein Glue to water—and mix. Makes a strong, permanent, water-resistant bond. It's the glue used by famous cabinet-makers—the standard glue for heavy-duty wood gluing.

AND FOR ODD JOBS IN HOME, SCHOOL, OFFICE

Use Casco Flexible Cement. Contains casein for strength—rubber for flexibility. Absorbs shocks. Sticks to everything but your fingers.

CASEIN COMPANY OF AMERICA
350 Madison Avenue New York City

CASCO AT ALL
HARDWARE STORES

CASEIN GLUE • IN CANS • 10¢ TO 65¢
FLEXIBLE CEMENT • IN TUBES • 25¢

STORE Hunting Equipment
Safely

• New Lyon Steel Gun Cabinet provides safe storage for guns, ammunition, clothing. Grooved wood support for four guns. Corrugated rubber pad on floor gives non-slip support for gun stocks. Flat key lock and padlock attachment. Heavy steel construction. Attractive appearance. Write for attractive low price and we will refer you to nearest dealer.

LYON METAL PRODUCTS,
INCORPORATED
1309 River Street, Aurora, Ill.

GREATEST DOG BOOK Ever Written!

Second Edition—Fifth Printing
How to Train Your Bird Dog
By HORACE LYTLE

Ten pages of wonderful illustrations. 256 pages of practical information. Bound in cloth. Brand new PROLOGUE (reprinted from The Saturday Evening Post by special permission); important new and longer foreword; an entirely new chapter—valuable as information and as fascinating story of actual training as you've ever read.

The author is internationally known as Gun Dog Editor. FIELD & STREAM. Mr. Lytle's method of teaching different types of dogs to point game is entirely original. He outlines a plan for each type of dog character.

Get this great new book and you can accomplish wonders training your own gun dogs. Or, even if you have them trained for you, this book will help you to get most out of them in the hunting field.

Helpful in care and discipline of any dog. Don't delay. Order today. ONLY $2 POSTPAID.

A. F. HOCHWALT CO., Publishers
544 Forest Avenue Dayton, Ohio

Smarty

Continued from page 21

Sanders." Pleased to meet you," Mildred said. "I hope there's a nice, friendly crowd aboard, don't you?" Max mumbled something and sought sanctuary in Stacey Maxwell's cabin. Stacey, sitting on the edge of his bed with an open whisky bottle in one hand and a glass in the other said, "I hear you got a divorce." "My wife got a divorce," Max said. "Where are you bound for?" "San Francisco. They're trying my case out on the coast."

"Is it good?" "No," Stacey said. He sighed and ordered himself another drink.

Max checked out a few minutes later, went up on deck for some air before going in. Corrigan was nowhere in sight but the yellow-haired one was leaning over the rail staring at the water. As Max took his place beside her he was conscious of faint regret that it wasn't five years ago. Then he hadn't known the pattern. There would have been a lift, something coming alive in the beginning of the game. He kicked the first ball: "I watched you play aboard." She turned slowly as though she was doing it because she had nothing better to do. "I made a bet on myself that you've traveled this far before and that you know the captain."

"You win," she said. "Pay yourself." Max went back to looking at the water. "You don't want to talk to me, do you?" Max said.

"Not very much." "When I'll say good night. My name is Sanders and I'm very tired." He smiled as he went below. He knew the pattern too. The lady spider sits on her web and waits.

He went to bed and fell asleep feeling sorry that he and Cora hadn't made out it was a gentle regret and nothing that tore him inside. He wanted something to tear him inside so that he'd be inside was still there.

Garda Standish (he found out her name from the passenger list) spun her inside her cabin and stayed there four days. Max ambled about avoiding the ubiquitous Mildred Corrigan, sprang from odd corners at all hours of day. All her clothes were new. Her outfit was worse than the last. She fled from her and she was finally in to conversing with the stewards in the smoke room.

WHEN Garda did appear on the fifth day a teamlike spirit sprang up between Max and Stacey. Each presented a report at mealtime. On the seventh all scores were in Garda's favor. He maintained the stolid attitude that Max and Stacey were not aboard.

Stacey said at lunch, "Something is going on with that girl. She's suffering from something."

"Maybe," Max said. He broke a corn on the cob and buttered the half he received.

"I think it's you she doesn't trust," Stacey said then.

Max grinned. "Why should she? For no matter, why should she trust you?" "Her lip doesn't curl quite as much as she looks at me."

Max swallowed the last of his muffin. "Who gets the deck chair this afternoon?" "The deck chair was, by carelessness, the one next Garda's."

"Do."

"You do not. You had it this morning."

"He didn't come on deck this morning."

"That," said Max, "isn't my fault. That might be called the fortunes of war."

"Take the deck chair," Stacey said. "She'll just sit and curl her lip."

Garda did nothing so unbecoming as to curl her lip. She simply sat down and closed her eyes. While Max was thinking up something startling to say such as, "I wonder if they'll be able to put out that fire on the boat deck," he was assailed by a familiar voice at his left. "Hello," Mildred Corrigan said, settling.

Garda opened her eyes quickly, as though she'd been stung, and looked. After a moment of pained regard she closed them again.

"It's beautiful, isn't it?" Mildred said. "I'm beginning to relax already."

SITTING on the edge of the deck chair, leaning forward, her hands clasped tensely in her lap, she was so relaxed it hurt. One had to know, looking at her, that as she walked around the deck alone, seeking friends, a panic rose in her. In her cabin, ready to come above, she looked beautiful to herself. Once on deck everything changed. She stood apart, no part of anything, with nobody to take the friendship she offered. One knew, too, that she didn't want much. Just to have people say hello, or to wave. Max felt a grinding discomfort in his middle. It wasn't right for anybody to be so friendless, so pushed out.

She said, with a desperate kind of brightness, "I hope you won't think I'm funny but would you like to have a drink with me? A glass of beer or something?"

Max said gently: "You're very kind but I rarely drink before six-thirty."

"Maybe at six-thirty?" she said.

"I'm afraid . . . you see I've made another engagement."

A cool, cultured, devilish voice beside him said, "I am sorry not to have told you before but I have to break our engagement. I'd promised to have cocktails with the captain. I'm glad to know you'll have other company."

Max turned a full, withering look upon her but she wasn't withered. She was blandly grinning. It was the first time he'd seen Gardia Standish having a really good time. Mildred Corrigan pinned him down before he had the strength to wriggle. "Then you can," she said happily. "That's wonderful." Drunk with success, she yammered at Gardia, "Maybe you'll have a drink with me tomorrow night." She wanted lots and lots of friends, all liking her.

Garda removed herself, without moving, from Mildred's world. "I'll have to let you know tomorrow." It was a neat dismissal. Mildred got to her feet with an awkward, uncertain lunge and steadied herself against the roll of the ship. "Well, I guess you two want to be alone. Me butting in this way, imagine." She looked at Max. "I'll see you in the smoke room at six-thirty."

They sat for quite some time while Gardia laughed happily. Then Max got up and said viciously, "I'm a mining engineer. Does that interest you?"

"No," Gardia said.

"I'm not rich," Max said, "but I'm not poor. I'm thirty, I've only just got divorced from my wife and it occurs to me that you're just a little too smart. Does any of it interest you?"

"Not remotely," Gardia said.

"You've let me in for a fine half-hour this afternoon."

"That interests me," said Gardia. "I'll be there. At the captain's table."

Max stalked away.

At six-thirty, when he saw La Corrigan waiting outside the smoke-room

OLD CROW

A Truly Great Name
AMONG AMERICA'S GREAT WHISKIES

Famous for generations as a whiskey of superlative quality, Old Crow today is winning new fame as an outstanding value, because of its ATTRACTIVE PRICE.

BOTTLED IN BOND

Kentucky Straight Whiskey

Great trees enhance the beauty of the grounds at the Old Crow distillery—trees that were saplings 70 years ago when James Crow began distilling the whiskey that was to perpetuate his name.

Pat. No. 2,166,537

If you're discriminating about tobacco flavor, you really don't know what you're missing until you've tried the SMOKEMASTER Pipe. A few days with this pipe, and you'll get a new idea of smoking pleasure.

An ordinary pipe cleaner in the SMOKEMASTER stem draws moisture away from the tube through which smoke passes. This leaves a clean, dry passage at all times—smoke never passes through a saturated filter. No rank moisture—you get only pure tobacco flavor . . . Genuine old briar.

$1.00 at dealers. Complete range of models. Write for literature.

Briarcraft, Inc., 347 Fifth Ave., New York

Briarcraft Smokemaster

Your dog needs sufficient food, of course, but, far more important, he needs the right kind of food. Give him the nourishment he needs in Spratt's Meat-Fibrine Biscuit Foods—the choice of experts for over 75 years. One pound is equal in feeding value to two pounds of lean meat. Spratt's contain wheat for stamina, meat for energy, and are crisp-baked to safeguard teeth and digestion. Spratt's are economical, too, for they contain a minimum of moisture—you pay for food.

Ask for Spratt's FIBO (granulated), SPIX (bone size), OVALS or ASSORTED BISCUITS. Try Spratt's and watch results.

door he knew that the three braces he'd taken hadn't been enough. She wore an unbelievable creation of white satin, cut too low, and over it an Oriental shawl embroidered in the most hideous of colored silks. Her make-up was thicker than ever.

As they entered the smoke room Max had ample opportunity to see Garda, her nice square shoulders covered by a thin film of black net, sitting at the captain's table. She held a champagne glass with gentle consideration by the stem while she watched, with equally gentle gravity, their entrance. A curious little quirk came at the corner of her mouth but it was nothing so overt as a smile.

Mildred chose a table right out in the center of the room and consulted the wine card with awful concentration. "I don't know what I'm going to have," she announced. Her voice had a remarkable carrying quality. "What are you going to have?"

"A double Scotch," Max said morosely.

"Oh, I want that too. A straight double Scotch. That'll be just fine."

The smoke-room door opened to admit Stacey. He made for the captain's table. Max saw him bend over Garda's hand and take the chair nearest her. Mildred was twitching at his sleeve. "Tell me all about yourself, Mr. Sanders. I just know you do something terribly interesting."

"I'm a mining engineer," Max said sullenly.

"Oh, how interesting." Mildred drank most of her Scotch as though a train she wanted to catch was getting up steam. "My husband's a Navy man. Not an officer."

"Your husband?" Had somebody actually married her?

A queer, uncertain expression flitted across her face. After a moment it was replaced by the desperate brightness he had come to recognize. "He's stationed on shore in Panama now," she said. "I figure that we can have a home and kids and everything. When they get stationed on shore they can have a home, you know. He's attached to the airport."

SHE regarded her empty glass. Max called the steward. The steward brought another. She took a cigarette and as he lit it for her he noticed that her hand shook.

"I cabled him before I got on the boat," she said, "but he hasn't answered. I kind of expected I'd have a cable back before now but I guess cable service in tropical countries is kind of slow sometimes, isn't it?"

"Sometimes," he said.

"I haven't had a card from him in an awful long time," she said. "A friend of his told me about his being stationed on shore. He isn't much for writing. So I just decided I'd come down and we'd be together like married people should. Don't you think I was right?"

"Married people should certainly live together," Max said.

She said worriedly, "I spent all my money to come. Is it very expensive to live in Panama? I mean if he's not there or something . . . could I get work? I can do most anything."

He had a quick vision of her adrift in Panama, stumbling around the cafés looking for friends, for something to belong to, something to believe and build on. He said gently, "Things will work out, I'm sure. You look as though some fresh air would be welcome. Shall we go out on deck?" She lurched obediently to her feet and Max signed the check.

He left her at the door of the dining saloon when the dinner gong sounded. He didn't want any dinner. He went to his cabin and lay there thinking about how men and women kill each other and don't care because while you're killing you're not being killed and what isn't happening to you doesn't hurt. It wasn't just Mildred Corrigan stumbling around trying to find somebody to believe and cling to, it was everybody. Everybody in the world. For a while you'd have new hope and then you'd find out suddenly that everybody was the same. When the moment comes they run and you're alone.

Nobody knows what the moment is going to be. It may not be death or sickness or pain but just a time when you need help. And then when they're not there it hurts. If you could just once see somebody come through, stand steadfast, not wanting or gaining anything for himself. Just fighting for you. But people weren't like that. That was the way it was and the way you had to take it.

HE LAY there until eleven-thirty and then Stacey pounded on the door. He had news. "You know that Standish girl," he said. "I had a long talk with her tonight. She's wonderful."

"Yeah?" Max said.

"You'd think, to look at her, that she'd been brought up in the lap of luxury, wouldn't you?"

"And?" Max said.

"She's a coal miner's daughter. She told me all about her childhood, how they starved during the strikes and she worked in a mill nine hours a day when she was ten years old. Then she decided to better herself and she—"

Max said in a kind of agonized way, "Go away, Stacey."

"What's the matter now?"

"You, you consummate jackass," Max said. "You're the matter. Get out of here."

Stacey left in a hurt and dignified silence. Max got up, straightened his tie, put on his coat and went looking for her. He went straight up to the boat deck. There she was, wearing a little black velvet wrap, smoking and leaning over the rail looking at the water again. "So you're a miner's daughter," Max said savagely. "So you had a horrible childhood, filled with toil."

Her smile was gentle and grave. "Isn't the drum system wonderful," she said. "From hill to hill, tribe to tribe. It makes one wonder if the telephone was such a great invention after all."

"Why do you always talk as though you were going to a fight?"

"Why do I always find one?" she said.

"What are you defending that you have to be so smart and so hard? What's the percentage in making fools of people?"

"The mothers of most people saved me the trouble," Garda said.

"You're not so much smarter than anybody else."

"Yes I am," said Garda. "Look." She thrust a piece of paper into his hand. On it was written, in a large, childlike scrawl, "Mr. Sanders will be on deck between eleven and eleven-thirty re miner's daughter."

Max crumpled it and threw it overboard. Then, with unabated savagery he put his arms around her and kissed her hard. Putting her back with a thump he said, "It's like kissing a hunk of steel."

She said, "What did you expect, mush?"

"Nothing inside," Max said. "Ready to take but not ready to give. I know your kind."

"I know your kind too," said Garda.

"Let's go down and have a nightcap. This isn't getting either of us anywhere."

She laughed. "I didn't expect to get anywhere. That's where I'm smarter than you are."

Over his brandy Max said, "I don't know why I can't stop thinking about

Your Choice

Without Expense

GET either of these fine rewards by selling only three 1-year COLLIERS' subscriptions $2.00 each to persons living outside your home. Offer good U. S. A. only. Simply pin subscribers' names and addresses coupon with check or money order.

Independent Agency Division, Desk C The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company Springfield, Ohio

I have sold these subscriptions at the usual price and am remitting in full. Please send my . . . . .

Name . . . . .

Address . . . . .

Town . . . . .

State . . . . .

and following you around all the time. Maybe it's because you've made me mad." "Maybe it's lahve," Garda said with a gleam. "How did you get on the American tragedy?" "At least she's a woman," Max said. "At least she's had the guts to take a chance and go looking for the man she longs to." "You?" said Garda. "My husband."

"Oh, she has a husband," Garda said. "I don't want to talk about it," said Max. "They separated at the head of the case. He went to his cabin and at the night arguing with himself. Should he be in love? Why, he doesn't even know the girl. She had yellow hair and no heart, that was all he knew."

After that, when he saw her he made things worse between them. Because he much wanted to say, "I love you," because he was afraid he would say it and take refuge in cruelty. Once, after having her brutally, he said, "You'll be an old woman and alone. You know I don't you?" "You're not there I'll manage," she said. "Thank you for worrying about me."

He had an effortless, maddening way of catching the barbs and returning them to him point-first.

THE last day out Stacey announced triumphantly that she had decided to dine with them that night. While he changed just before dinner, Max thought about things. Garda and Stacey were a sailboat looking up at the sky, with the same spray in their faces. Garda was waiting, indolent and happy, where in a house. Any kind of house. This was the last night. In the morning she would say, detached and calm, "Goodbye Mr. Sanders. It's been a long and move off on some aimless, serious mission of her own. He realized with a shock, even before she was going. At dinner he asked her, "I haven't made up mind," she said. "I'm getting off at Panama to decide." When they went for a walk on deck, Max passed the smoke room. Max noticed that Mildred Corrigan was sitting alone at a table in the far corner. He deliberately kept his eyes turned toward her to forestall that preliminary, eager and her subsequent descent upon him.

They walked slowly. Max was sitting. He knew that even if Stacey left alone with Garda he'd still just walk out saying what was pounding at the back of his head. If she'd given the gift of mind reading how would he laugh! Garda waiting, in a house. Any kind of house. A being warm and sweet with his hands. He laughed aloud. She looked at him and said, "What?" "I'm just thinking foolish things," he replied. "I don't want to hear them too?"

"I don't want to hear them too?"

"My foolish thoughts are for my own ears," Max said.

They were passing the smoke room again. Suddenly they were halted by an awful sound coming through the open window. There was no mistaking that voice. The Corrigan was giving tongue. Moving closer they ranged along the window and peered in. Mildred was standing by a coldly infuriated group of bridge players. She must have fastened on them, and they must have said something horrible to dislodge her. She was crying: not nicely, not quietly, but bellowing like a calf that's lost its mother. While she bellowed she was giving them a piece of her mind. You couldn't have heard an anvil drop. "Who do you think you are? What right have you got to treat me like I was poison? You stuck-up, rotten, awful old louse!"

"Ouch," Garda said.

"I'm just as good as you are! All I said was he had a lot of diamonds! That's all I said! All I wanted was to be nice and talk, that's all I wanted! I even asked you to have a drink with me and I'll bet you've got thousands and thousands of dollars, too! You're a—"

Stacey said, "Let's get away from here!"

"I'm just as good as you are! I've worked hard all my life and I'll bet that's more than you can say, you old hag! I'll bet you couldn't iron a shirt if you had to. Well, I can! I get paid for it!"

Max knew he should go in and help her. She was fighting alone, fighting stupidly perhaps, but openly and honestly. He hadn't the courage to go in. What did she mean to him? Nothing. Here it was, the penalty for letting people know what you felt. You're ridiculous and people turn their heads away, leaving you alone in your fright and misery. He ought to help her. It wasn't right not to help her. While he was hating himself for his cowardice and nervously himself to take the step he heard Garda say, "Excuse me." She moved toward the smoke-room door and opened it.

Standing there in the doorway she called clear across the room so everybody could hear her, "Mildred! We've been looking all over for you! Come out and join us on deck!"

Somehow, Mildred Corrigan got to her, stumbling blindly, ashamed now, reaching out for refuge and friendship. She found it in the circle of Garda's arm. Garda drew her out on deck and closed the door, saying, "It's all right. It's going to be all right, really it is." To Max and Stacey she said, "Mildred and I are going below, to my cabin." Mildred, sobbing convulsively against Garda's shoulder, said, "I didn't mean to. I don't know what happened to me. I didn't mean to."

"Nothing happened that couldn't happen to any of us," Garda said.

Max went sick and weak with pride. He leaned, with his head against the bulkhead, watching them go. Stacey said, "What's the matter with you?"

"What's the matter with me?" Max

A good Pointer on better gin drinks

11½" x 8" full color reproduction, without advertising, sent for 10¢. Write Box A.J., address below.

Q. Why will a pointer—even as a puppy—"freeze" on game?

A. Because that characteristic has been developed in him.

Q. Why is Fleischmann's—the first American gin—so smooth-mixing in gin drinks?

A. Because that characteristic has been developed in Fleischmann's for generations. Every ingredient used in its distilling is selected for the purpose.

Q. What's the best time to try this "pedigreed" gin?

A. Right now!

Would you like a reputation for prize-winning drinks? See your dealer for "The Mixer's Manual" or write Box A.J., The Fleischmann Distilling Corp., Peekskill, N. Y.

Fleischmann's Gin

A PEDIGREED GIN FOR PRIZE-WINNING DRINKS

Distilled from American Grain. 90 Proof.

Copyright 1940, The Fleischmann Distilling Corporation, Peekskill, New York

Snub

CROCKETT JOHNSON

Not a cannon, but the 130,000-pound shaft for a great electric generator being built by General Electric

America's First Line of Defense

AMERICA'S first line of defense is American industry. It is to industry that the nation looks today for the armaments to protect America's high living standards, to defend the American way of life.

In the last two generations American industry has built a great nation. Its workmen, scientists, and engineers have given us electric lights in 24 million American homes and electric refrigerators in 13 million—conveniences which represent the highest standard of living in the world. And the manpower, the inventive and manufacturing genius, the experience, the daring to tackle difficult tasks—assets which have helped to produce for us this high standard of living—are among America's strongest resources today.

Industry today undertakes the task of building, not only armaments, but, equally important, the machines to manufacture these armaments. And General Electric, which for more than 60 years has been putting electricity to work in America's peacetime pursuits, is today applying it to the new job—the job of defending the benefits electricity has helped to create.

G-E research and engineering have saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar they have earned for General Electric

GENERAL ELECTRIC

952-77M5

Newer, Whiter Skin by using Mercolized Wax Cream

Try this famous Skin Bleach and Beautifier, Mercolized Wax Cream. Its effective ingredients hasten the natural activity of the skin in flaking off lifeless, dull or darkened surface skin in tiny, invisible particles. This complexion lightener used as directed reveals the newer, fairer, lovelier underskin. SAXOLITE ASTRINGENT tightens loose surface skin. Gives a delightful sense of freshness. Reduces excess surface oil. Dissolve Saxolite Astringent in one-half pint witch hazel and use this tingling face lotion daily. PHELACTINE DEPILATORY removes superfluous facial hair quickly. Easy to use. No unpleasant odor.

SENSATIONAL DISCOVERY!

For 12 years, L. B. HAIR OIL has been a treasured secret of Hollywood to give hair instant lustre and beauty! Makes it look "alive"! Abundant! L. B. relieves dryness...itching, checks dandruff. Helps combat external causes of falling hair and BALDNESS! Now available at your favorite Barber & Beauty Shops, Drug, Department & Chain Stores...10¢, 25¢, 50¢, $1.00.

If they don't have it, write direct to
L. B. LABORATORIES, INC., Hollywood

MAKE MONEY SPARE TIME Sell Christmas Cards. Amazing values! Just show these "50 for $1" Personal Christmas Cards and take plenty of orders. Make good profit. Our $1 Box 21 Christmas Folders is also a money-maker for you. Many other $1 sellers. Get samples on approval. WALTHAM ART PUBLISHERS
160 N. Washington St., Dept. 353, Boston, Mass.

50 FOR $1
WITH NAME ON

said. "I'm a fool, that's what's the matter with me. I'm blind and deaf and a little bit crazy, that's what's the matter with me." He left Stacey abruptly and went to the radio room. Leaning on the counter he said to the radio operator, "Know a man named Corrigan in Panama? Attached to the airport station?"

"Little guy?" the operator said. "Always getting into fights?"

"I shouldn't wonder."

"Yes, I know him."

"Send him a message and tell him to meet the Venida tomorrow morning. I've got a present for him." He dropped a bill on the counter and started out.

"What'll I sign it?" the operator said.

"Sign your name."

"Where's the package?"

"I'll deliver the package," Max said.

He went down and knocked on Garda's door. She came with a wet towel in one hand and some ice in the other. Max said, "I love you. I love you more than I've ever loved anything or anybody. Does that interest you?"

Her smile was warm and real and interested. "I'm busy," Garda said. "Can't you see?"

"I can wait," Max said. "But while I'm waiting I'll still be loving you unbearably." He went away and waited and loved her unbearably for almost an hour. Then she appeared and leaned against the rail beside him. "What were you saying?" she said. "With a handful of ice it's hard to concentrate."

THE following morning long before they docked Mildred was hanging over the rail trying to see a familiar figure waiting.

"She picked him up on the water front," Garda said, "sick. She nursed him all one winter and worked in a laundry to support him. She had a baby and it died. People go through things, don't they?" She added viciously: "He'd better be waiting for her. If he isn't, I'll find him."

Max laughed. Garda said, "You think it's funny?"

"I think it would be funny if you found him," Max said. "I'd like to see it."

"He wouldn't," said Garda.

"I know," Max said.

Mildred saw them and walked over to them. Her eyes were shining. "He's here," she said, tugging at Garda. "My husband is here! He's down there. Oh, how long does it take to dock?" She dragged Max and Garda to the rail and then hung over it perilously, waving. The compact little man shading his eyes from the sun waved back and they could see a gold tooth gleaming in the front of his mouth. Stacey came by looking for them and Mildred clutched at him. "It's my husband," she said, pointing. "Look, he's waving. He's waving at me." She waved back frantically.

On the dock, while Mildred was opening her luggage, Max and Corrigan talked. Corrigan kept watching Mildred curiously. Mildred had never had friends like these before. Max said, "She sort of expected you'd radio her on the ship."

"She was on, wasn't she?" Corrigan said, grinning. "She couldn't get could she?"

"Sometimes women like to know what's going on in a man's mind," Max said.

"WOMEN are funny," Corrigan said. "Mildred's a good sort until she gets mad." He chuckled. "You should see Mildred mad."

"I did," Max said. "I thought she was fine."

"It's better to have her on your side than the other," Corrigan said.

Max smiled at Garda, who was snapping the lock on one of her bags. When a man felt that way everything was right. They could stop worrying about Mildred. At the taxi, Mildred put her arms around Garda's neck and kissed her loudly on both cheeks. "I thought you were awful stuck-up," she said, "and here you're my best friend. It goes show, doesn't it?" Corrigan looked very proud because Garda was Mildred's best friend. "Come and see us," he said expansively. "Any time at all. Mildred's friends are my friends." He patted Mildred's shoulder. "Wait for me, sugar," he said. "There's a guy on board got a package for me. I'll be right back and we'll have a drink to celebrate."

Max let him go. He got into the taxi after Garda and Stacey and they waved goodbye to Mildred.

In the lounge of the Washington Hotel they ordered beer. Max said, "I can be back from Colombia in two weeks. Then we can go to Guatemala."

"I don't think I'd like this place two weeks," Garda said. But she looked very peaceful and settled.

"I can't take you to Colombia."

"Who asked you to?"

"You're not really so smart," Max said. "When you start waiting around for people you're not smart at all. You know that, don't you?"

"You don't have to tell me what's smart and what isn't," Garda said. "I can take care of myself right well, Mr. Sanders."

Stacey, who had been listening suspiciously, leaned forward. "Did you or did you not, just propose to Garda?" he said. "In a way it sounded as though you had. On the other hand it sounded as though you were starting another fight. And if you did propose, what would she say? Or is it asking too much?"

Max said, "You go write a play about love. And be sure there's a lot in it about mutual understanding and patience and long suffering. Otherwise you won't sell it."

"How do you do, Mr. McCarthy... Good morning, Mr. Lord... Hello, Miss Oakley... How are you, Mr. Preissler..."

DANIEL ALAIN

"DEAR—AREN'T YOU GAINING INSTEAD OF LOSING?"

JO: "Three—four—touch the floor!"

CHARLIE: I'm not gaining! It's these confounded shorts. They've shrunk at least two sizes. And it's all your fault, too!

MARY: My fault? I got "pre-shrunk" shorts, just like you told

CHARLIE: Ow, I knew it! "Pre-shrunk!" Just what I didn't say!

MARY: "Five—six—kick!"—Well, what do I ask for, then?

CHARLIE: Sanforized-Shrunk! The kind you can depend on. Sanforizing takes all the shrinking out of a fabric down to a measly 1%, by standard tests.

MARY: Don't talk per cents to me. What I'm interested in is fit! "—seven—eight—bend!"

CHARLIE: Ouch! What I'm interested in is comfort! And Sanforized-Shrunk shorts won't ever shrink out of fit—no matter how often they're washed. Same thing is true of Sanforized pajamas.

MARY: How much extra do they cost? That's where I'll feel the pinch.

CHARLIE: Not a cent more than these terrible things you buy. "—nine—ten—" whew!

MARY: What is it I ask for, dear?

CHARLIE: Turn that thing off and get a pencil! I'm going to write down a complete list of what I need, with these words underlined—buy 'em SANFORIZED-SHRUNK!

"WELL, WHAT'S WRONG NOW..?"

SHE: There they are—Sanforized-Shrunk shorts and pajamas. Just what you asked for.

HE: But you didn't get me any Sanforized-Shrunk shirts!

SHE: What am I supposed to be—a mind reader?

HE: But you knew I needed some. And you can get Sanforized shirts all over town, in practically every style and make. At regular prices, too.

NEXT DAY—

SHE: There, smarty! The clerk said if all your Sanforized-Shrunk things didn't fit you perfectly every time they were washed—it's a sure sign you ought to do the shrinking!

SHE: And I can buy all kinds of things Sanforized now—wash dresses, children's clothes, uniforms, slacks and work clothes, slip-cover and drapery materials—anything made of cotton, linen, or spun rayon. If I look for the label, I'm safe!

FOR PERMANENT FIT... LOOK FOR THE WORDS... SANFORIZED-SHRUNK

"How I Give My Family a Great Modern Extra Advantage"

I'm Serving Them the New
"Vitamin Rain"
Breakfast Food

... IT'S THE DELICIOUS NEW QUAKER PUFFED WHEAT AND RICE

NOW ALL THESE VITAMINS
A-B-C-D-G***
 IN ONE BREAKFAST COMBINATION

Mighty Grand, I'll say, since they've found a way to shower the new Quaker Puffed Wheat and Rice with important vitamins B<sub>1</sub>, D and G. Why, that "Vitamin Rain" idea doesn't cost me a cent more—yet it helps make key vitamin protection for my family so easy. It's this way . . .

Just Think! I simply serve either the new Quaker Puffed Wheat or the Rice with a favorite fruit and our usual milk. This means we get nearly half of our minimum daily needs of those key vitamins, every morning—in a meal that's deliciously satisfying for everybody . . .

It's an Extra Advantage for the Children. For, like all modern mothers, I know key vitamins are important to youngsters for sturdy growth, good development, healthy nerves and alert minds.

Lots of Energy and Sound Nerves rate high with us, too. I'm a stickler for looking my best—and Dad's old gray matter just must keep working right these days. Yes, vitamins do count big. Seems this new "Vitamin Rain" breakfast food is just what my whole family needs. It makes possible such a real Modern Extra Advantage!

ONLY THE NEW QUAKER PUFFED WHEAT AND RICE BRING YOU "VITAMIN RAIN"!

*Imagine! Thanks to Quaker's "Vitamin Rain" process, all you do is serve the New Quaker Puffed Wheat or Rice with milk and your usual fruit (orange juice, peaches, tomato juice, etc.).

This marvelously tempting breakfast combination provides at least 40% of the minimum daily requirements of these five key vitamins—A-B<sub>1</sub>-C-D and G! It's a morning's vitamin-plenty, possible because "Vitamin Rain" supplies measured portions of vitamins B<sub>1</sub>, D and G to the breakfast food, supplemented by the vitamin content of the fruit and milk.

Why not make sure your family is getting this modern extra advantage? For "Vitamin Rain" unlocks the way to a daily vitamin protection everybody needs.

Remember to ask your grocer for the New Quaker Puffed Wheat and Rice today. Serve alternately, for this daily extra protection and delightful variety. In a new, larger package—yet costs no more. Visit or phone your grocer's now!

WITH MILK AND FRUIT YOUR Vitamin BREAKFAST

Famous for flavor, the New Quaker Puffed Wheat and Rice now bring "Vitamin Rain" besides! Always in the light-proof red and blue box to protect vitamin value and crispness.

Copyright 1940, by The Quaker Oats Company

The New QUAKER PUFFED WHEAT AND RICE

One-Two Punch

Continued from page 12

But his goal was third base, and during the next five years he often looked like a great hot-corner guardian. The Braves brought him up for trials in 1931 and 1932, but shipped him back to the minors. By 1933 he was with the San Francisco Missions, hitting .378 in late June. The Red Sox brought him east for another shot at the big show.

Just when he appeared all set, Tom Yawkey bought the Sox and began flooding the team with ready-made stars. One of the first he bought was Bill Werber, who now plays third base for the Reds. Werber ran Walters out of the Sox infield, for Bucky's hitting had slumped almost from the day he came to the Sox. It was a blow to him when he was waived out of the American League in mid-1934 and claimed by his home-town Phillies for the basic price of $7,500.

No Joke to Bucky

But even there he flopped. He became the epitome of failure, a Phillies substitute. It was a relief to him when, near the end of the 1934 season, Jimmy Wilson sent him in to pitch. The assignment was a comical one, but Walters took it seriously. He pitched seven innings that fall, finishing one game and starting another. He struck out seven men and allowed eight hits.

At training camp in 1934 he went back to third base. But during the off-season the Phils had taken Johnny Vergez in a trade. Vergez wasn't much of a third baseman, but he was better than Walters.

In an exhibition game against the Senators in Orlando, Bucky turned in his worst performance of the 1935 training season. Not only was he terrible at bat, but his fielding had gone to pot. After the game Jimmy Wilson went up to him in the locker room, where he sat in lonely despair in a corner, and told him he wanted him to ride back to Winter Haven with him.

En route to the Phils' home base, Wilson stopped the car at a roadside lunch stand. He and Walters and Hans Lobert, the Phils coach, got out. Lobert took Walters aside and began to talk to the moody infielder about the happy lot of a big-league pitcher. At the peak of Lobert's monologue Wilson, by prearrangement, sat down beside him and said, "Bucky, I think you ought to try pitching. You've got a great arm, and . . . well . . ." Wilson liked Walters too much to finish the sentence with a cursory summation of Walters' chances as a third baseman.

He's a sympathetic sort, this Wilson. He knew that Walters' grip on a big-league job was precarious enough, without further imperiling it by asking him to try the game's most difficult task. He knew Walters was married, and burdened with responsibility. "I'll tell you what I'll do, Bucky," Wilson promised. "I won't expect a thing out of you as a pitcher until June. And, listen, the club will give you a $25 bonus for every game you win. And if you flop . . . well, okay. I'll find some way to keep you around."

Wilson had no idea how he would keep his word. He knew too that the owners of the Phils would not agree to pay Walters or anybody else a $25-a-game bonus. He knew that that would have to come from his own not-too-fertile pocket.

The next day Bucky went into the bull pen. He had neither curve nor change of pace nor knowledge of how to hold a man on base nor any profound knowledge of the weaknesses of opposing batters. Wilson used him in twenty-four games that 1935 season. He lost nine games and in 151 innings of work he struck out only forty batters. He allowed an average of 4.17 runs a game. But to the surprise of all he won nine games, and nine times Wilson presented him with $25 and told him that the grateful owners were giving it to him.

By 1936 he had improved, but he seemed to be getting worse. "Looking back on it, I think I had more stuff that season than I'll ever have," the quiet man told us not long ago. "I never worked as hard in my life and I guess I never will again." What he didn't say was that he was bedeviled all season by one of the worst ball clubs in the history of the majors. Walters lost twenty-one games that year and won only eleven. At the end of the year his right arm was shaped like a scimitar. It wouldn't straighten out until he took it to the famed trainer of the Detroit Tigers, Denny Carroll.

Learning the Hard Way

Walters staggered through another backbreaking season in 1937, learning something every time he pitched and somehow managing to keep sane while the Phils threw away his ball games. He won fourteen and lost fifteen, for a better average than the Phils were able to show as a team. His bases on balls significantly dropped from 115 to 86; his strike-outs rose from 66 to 87.

Walters escaped from the Phils on June 13, 1938. He was traded to the Reds for Virgil Davis, Al Hollingsworth and a sum of money which the teams placed at $55,000. Warren Giles, general manager of the Reds, said, "Now maybe we can go places," a whistling-in-the-dark boast, inasmuch as Walters' record at the time was an abysmal four victories against eight defeats. Walters won eleven games for the Reds the remainder of that season, and the Reds climbed into fourth place for the first time in years.

Then, as 1939 came along, and Walters reached his hard-earned crest as a pitcher, he suddenly and without warning recaptured his third-basing skill. The more he frustrated rival batters, the more knowledge he himself picked up about hitting big-league pitching. At bat he flirted with the .400 mark through half of the season and finished well over the .300 mark for the year. He held his opponents to a bleak .219 stick average, as time after time he broke up his own pitching battles with crackling hits in the pinch.

As for his fielding, he became a kind of fifth infielder for the Reds, making stops and throws that shamed the accredited guardians of the several sacks. Walters began to eye third base again. But he knew that the spark had come too late. He was a pitcher now. And, we hurriedly add, what a pitcher! During 1939 he won twenty-seven games and lost eleven. He pitched more innings than any National League thrower, 319, won more games, struck out more men, 137, and had the best earned-run average, 2.29. He was named Most Valuable Player in his league virtually by acclamation.

After Derringer became a pitcher he was turned down by the Cards, under Bob O'Farrell and by the Red Sox, under Lee Fohl. Fohl crushed the tall six-foot-three rookie by calling his curve a "wrinkle" and advising him to try some other trade. Twice he bounced up to the Cards for trials, then back to the sticks, and the only encouragement he

"We got enough stuff that everybody doesn't like to have a special 40-cent luncheon!"

BOB DUNN

The most popular autoloaders made are the 3-shot Remington Sportsman and the 5-shot Model 11. Over half a million of these guns have been sold! The basic design came from John Browning, and as made by Remington it has never been surpassed by any other autoloading shotgun.

There is absolutely no loss of power in Remington autoloaders, because the breechblock is locked until after the shot has left the muzzle. The lightning-fast action and reduced recoil give you more time to swing—more time to get the right lead. Proof of the easy-swinging and easy-pointing qualities of Remington autoloaders is the fact that they are used by more skeet shooters than any other gun!

The right gun adds a lot to your shooting pleasure. See these tried-and-true, dependable Remington autoloaders on display at your dealer's.

There's POWER to spare in Nitro Express extra long range shells!

► Make sure the shells you shoot hit hard enough to get what you go after! Shoot Remington Nitro Express—the shells with the extra wallop! They've got Kleanbore priming to protect your gun barrel and save you the bother of barrel cleaning, progressive burning powder and gas-tight wadding to keep every ounce of power behind the shot. They're Wet-Proof, too . . . won't swell or misfire when wet. Ask for the green, corrugated Nitro Express shells. Write Dept. CS for literature about Remington guns and ammunition. Remington Arms Co., Inc., Bridgeport, Conn.

Sportsman, Nitro Express, Kleanbore and Wet-Proof are Reg. U. S. Pat. Off. by Remington Arms Co., Inc.

Remington
DU PONT

... call an UPHOLSTERER

The help you need is right at your fingertips in the classified (yellow) pages of your telephone book. Let them tell you where to find those shops and services you want . . . the Upholsterers, Employment Agencies, Uniforms, Window Cleaners . . . or who sells that advertised brand.

Look it up
in the Classified

got along the route came from Bill McKechnie, whom he encountered first as a Card coach and later as manager of Rochester, and from old Grover Cleveland Alexander.

"Alex taught me the most important thing I ever learned about pitching," the Duke told us not long ago. "He showed me that the only way to get control is to finish your pitch with both feet solidly on the ground. He made me appreciate, too, that you don't throw a ball with your arm as much as you throw it with your shoulder, your back, your hips and legs."

With old Alex's advice, Derringer won twenty-three games for Rochester in 1930, and he impressed the Cards so much in the spring of 1931 that Branch Rickey ordered him kept and another rookie, named Dizzy Dean, sent back to Houston—a decision which prompted Dean to squawk, "All I can say, Mr. Rickey, is that you just traded away thirty games." Rickey knew what he was doing. Derringer won eighteen games and pitched the Cards into the World Series.

But the next year he failed to pitch .500 ball, warred with his bosses, and in 1933 he was exiled to Cincinnati, strictly a cellar club, where his twenty-seven losses came within two defeats of the record for futility set in 1905 by Vic Willis of the Braves. In the minors he had battled with Billy Southworth; with the Cards he had clashed with Gabby Street, and now at Cincinnati in 1933 he ran afoul the mercurial Larry MacPhail.

MacPhail, whose flare-ups made Derringer's Kentucky temper pale in comparison, fined the Duke $250 and suspended him for three days for failing to slide into a base, although Derringer was "out" by several yards. When the three-day suspension was up, Mac-Phail called Derringer into his office and was excoriating him when Derringer idly picked up an inkwell and flung it at MacPhail's head. It missed by an inch and MacPhail sat down in his chair, white-faced, black-blotched and shaken.

"You might have killed me, Derringer," MacPhail gasped.

"That's what I was meaning to do," Derringer said coldly.

MacPhail suddenly reached into his desk for what Derringer thought would be a gun. But he came out with a checkbook, wrote out a check for $750 and handed it to Derringer. "Here, I'm paying you back the money I fined you."

"But what's this extra dough for?" Derringer demanded.

"That's a bonus for missing me, you blankety so-and-so," MacPhail roared, thereby ending the squabble.

Special Delivery Reproof

National League batters will tell you that Derringer hasn't missed anything he's thrown at since then. Gabby Hartnett got on him one day and called him a nasty phrase reflecting on Paul's ancestry.

"Don't say that," Paul said, quietly. Hartnett roared it again, as he stood at bat. Paul cranked up and hit Gabby in the neck, from a distance of sixty feet, six inches. "No sense hitting him on the head," he explained as they carried Gab away.

He probably is the most accurate thrower in baseball history. Over a span of 1,390 innings, covering five years, he walked only 230 men, many of them purposely passed. That's one walk for every 6.04 innings. During the 1939 season he walked only 35, one for every 8.6 innings. On one incredible streak he faced 208 straight batters without walking one, then broke his string by passing Morrie Arnovich purposely. It was Derringer who clinched the '39 pennant, after the Cards had turned back his buddy, Walters, in a crucial game near the end of the season. And he finished them off by striking out Medwick and Mize in the ninth.

Neither pitcher could win a game against the Yanks in the 1939 World Series, though Derringer lost a heart-breaker to Ruffing, the man who tried to get him a job with the Red Sox back in 1926. Walters had the misfortune to be opposed in the second game of the series by Monte Pearson, who almost pitched a no-hitter. And Bucky was in the box, sailing along on a lead in the fourth game when his team fell to pieces around him.

The 31-year-old Walters and the 34-year-old Derringer want another crack, another One-Two Punch series competition. And they started out this season to get that chance. By August these two square pegs who had finally found the proper holes had won thirty games between them, while losing only thirteen. Walters was turning in such feats as beating the challenging Cards 6-1, and driving in three of the runs himself. Derringer was providing such performances as a one-hitter against the same Cards and a two-hitter against the Giants. In the All-Star game at St. Louis the American League sluggers found them untouchable, while they pitched their league's team on to victory.

Their strange careers and their personalities bear a remarkable likeness. But on one radical point they disagree severely. Derringer is convinced that the greatest pitcher in the league is Walters. And Walters, a peace-loving soul, can work himself into an ire when he hears someone doubt that Derringer is the best.

FUNNY-BUSINESS MEN

Self-Portraits of Collier's Cartoonists
No. 5

Richard Taylor once taught art but was fired for introducing radical ideas. This accounts for his weird pictures (see sample at right)—which aren't half so weird as he'd like to make them. Born thirty-seven years ago in Fort William, Canada, he studied art in Toronto, Los Angeles and New York, and ran the gantlet of commercial work before romping into the cartoon field. Now lives in Connecticut and is fond of beer, faded wallpaper and rain.

"Lugging this thing around isn't enough!
They want also I should fizz and gargle!"

RICHARD TAYLOR

Ready when and where you need 'em, Uncle Sam

Here are some pretty solid Defense assets you have right now—and can count on—contributed by the TRUCKING INDUSTRY

TAKE a look below, Uncle Sam... and you, too, Mr. and Mrs. Citizen.

Some things there you probably didn't know...some amazing facts to give everybody just a hint of the vast value to the nation of the nation's trucking industry.

The tax money to maintain—and build more—of the world's best roads every year... the trucks to move all kinds of goods—long distances as well as short... the Army of trained men, the methods and equipment to do it with top efficiency...and above all, with the greatest overall economy.

More and more—American industry, agriculture and trade are letting trucks carry the load. For trucks deliver door-to-door—over the shortest routes—with the least handling—in the shortest time. They feed our assembly lines with clock-like precision...make modern production possible by dovetailing the output of one plant into another...preventing production jams...speeding production schedules.

And upon trucks also rests the burden of carrying food from farms to market—and finished products from industry to you. Today, practically everything you eat, wear and buy is transported all or part of the way by truck.

So, it behooves us to keep America's roads open to the unhampered flow of goods by truck. Our country must have the full benefit of this vital transportation system.

$430,826,000 IN SPECIAL HIGHWAY TAXES were collected in 1939 from trucks alone.

4½ MILLION TRUCKS—world's most modern, most efficient highway transportation system.

3½ MILLION TRAINED TRUCKING MEN—top flight drivers, mechanics and dispatchers.

137,000 MILES OF THE WORLD'S FINEST HIGHWAYS! Truck taxes, paid in the last ten years, equalled the cost of building this huge highway mileage!

ON LONG HAULS—FASTER THAN YOUR OWN SWIFT MAIL—because they travel direct routes—are subject to fewer delays

AMERICAN TRUCKING ASSOCIATIONS
WASHINGTON, D. C.

DOWN WENT MCGINTY

—but he's out of the dog house now!

"NO MORE CLOTHESPINS will I be wearin' on my nose," snapped Mrs. McGinty. "Sure and it's good riddance to an ugly-smellin' pipe!" And plop the pipe went in the water!

QUICK AS AN IRISH temper, McGinty plunged to save it. SPLASH! Has he a chance? Is the pipe worth saving? Maybe some of the caked-in bite and smell will get soaked out.

"NICE WORK, MISTER!" said a young lad on the dock as McGinty climbed back up. "But you better smoke a mildertobacco from now on. Ever tried this Sir Walter Raleigh?"

SORT OF A MIRACLE the way that switch to Sir Walter got McGinty out of the dog house. It's another win for the world's best-smelling blend of fine mild burley tobaccos!

New! Cellophane tape around lid seals flavor in, brings you tobacco 100% factory-fresh!

UNION MADE

Tune in... UNCLE WALTER'S DOG HOUSE
EVERY TUESDAY NIGHT ★ NBC ★ PRIZES FOR YOUR "DOG HOUSE" EXPERIENCE

The first flight dived. The

Five Minutes at Daw

By Paul Deresco Augsburg

LITHOGRAPHED ON STONE BY JAMES E. ALLEN

Captain Waldon, of the British navy, wins two battles as a gentleman should

ALL stood respectfully till Captain Waldon had seated himself at the head of the mess. Captain Geoffrey Waldon, R. N. He had blood and money, a high-caste Briton with lands which came down from Elizabeth's day—lands bought with plunder taken from Spain by another captain of another ship that flew the royal English ensign.

The sea was calm. The cruiser Bideford, pushing her gray prow through the swells, barely teetered the fumed oak table covered with flawless Irish linen. Captain Waldon ate in silence. Except for Surleigh, his junior aide, there was not a man on board the Bideford whose family name could approach his own. They were good men and capable sailors, but between him and them stood a subtle barrier of social station as well as rank.

He felt it too. It was bred in him through generations of caste-proud Waldons. It had made him a humorless martinet, smug and offensively of bearing—he who now wanted, who actually yearned to be regarded as "good Waldon." And yet each time he made a gesture in that direction, it never came off.

Tonight, for instance. As a rule the captain dined in his cabin alone, or with Surleigh. But tonight he had come to the officers' mess—and here he sat a stick, aloof, while the conversation lagged around him! They regretted his presence. He dampened their spirits. How could they know that their skipper felt shy, self-conscious, baffled, and because he wanted so much to be on their level?

Captain Waldon was tall and thin and partially bald, with florid cheeks that were deepened by tan. His eyes were gray-blue under sandy brows, stared most vacantly straight before him.

altitude and their eggs fell wide voice at his ear recalled him about of a wretchedness bleak as a: "A wireless message for the heard his throat, as if that were to read what was typed on the form. All eyes, he sensed, were on his face in the silence that he gripped the table. Small women in England fighting for life, their soundings and cruising a sea in enemy raider might challenge

ons. read the message again. The tre, Glover, was that of a man entered Dartmouth the year he was stuck at the admiralty in as Waldon had been when Jutre smile softened the captain's while his eyes ranged down the length till they paused on a full, handsome face. Something triumph lighted them then in that of meeting Lieutenant Clerker's. elemen, this is a personal matter. e has presented me with a son." ed not to watch the lieutenant's at he saw the quick change on the less. Clerker was scarcely tive, little more than half his age—too young, impetuous, to feelings. He was in love with e's wife.

alon knew this, for she had told he had been utterly honest with e. Clerker loved Claire, and eved Clerker, and before she ac- his offer of marriage Claire had Waldon in so many words just how stood between Clerker and her.

But that had made no difference to him. He too loved Claire, and in time, he had felt, her infatuation with Clerker would pass. In England blood and money meant power. Waldon had both, while her family's fortunes had been caught in a swiftly ebbing tide. He had bought Claire, yes, in the cynical view; and yet no man could have cherished his wife with greater pride and adoration.

Impulsively Clerker rose from the table. His cheeks were flushed as he caught up his glass.

"To His Majesty's youngest sailor," he cried, "our skipper's new-born son and heir!"

The smile left Waldon's face.

"Mr. Clerker," he spoke up sharply, "you seem to be rather forgetting yourself. His Majesty's toast is in order first."

He was careful to look away from the youth, not to enjoy his hot confusion.

"Gentlemen," Waldon added, "the king!"

They drank, and that was the moment for word to come to him from those on watch. An officer entered the mess, saluted. Two enemy warships had been sighted.

Captain Waldon did not hurry. His pulse kicked faster, but his face was frozen in calm, controlled lines as he strolled from the mess. He heard the call to battle stations, the notes of the bugle tumbling pell-mell like the men who answered its quickened summons. It rang through the cruiser from stern to stern, one lad of a bugler trumpeting sounds which loud-speakers echoed below and aloft.

(Continued on page 73)

The new Filmo Auto Master—only 16 mm. magazine-loading camera with a turret head.

Hunting Trips are Twice the Fun When Filmo Goes with You

● When you go hunting—take a Filmo Auto Master with you. It will double your fun while on the trip—and bring back the high spots with you.

Precision-built by the makers of Hollywood's professional equipment, Filmo Auto Master is THE movie camera for the hunter. It is the only 16 mm. magazine-loading camera with a turret head. On this turret may be mounted three lenses which make you master of any picture opportunity. For example: A telephoto lens to get thrilling close-ups of distant game... a super-fast lens for shots in the deep shade... and still another lens for average conditions. For those "now or never" pictures of fleeing game, any lens and its matching viewfinder unit are positioned instantaneously by a quick turn of the turret.

You can change from black-and-white to color film even in mid-reel without fogging a single frame. Loading is a three-second operation. The pre-threaded film magazine slides into place. There are four speeds, including slow motion, and control for animation work. A new built-in exposure chart gives readings in a single setting for both black-and-white and color film. The new steady-strap handle swings the Auto Master instantly into action—and its tough, durable finish is ideally suited to the rigors of outdoor life. It is small... light... compact... and easy to carry even though it does provide features found in no other 16 mm. motion picture camera for your present and future needs. Priced from $195.

See Filmo Auto Master at your dealer's—or mail the coupon. Bell & Howell Company, Chicago; New York; Hollywood; London. Established 1907.

● Palm-size Filmo 8 makes 8 mm. movies at snapshot cost; small; compact; convenient to carry... press the button, and what you see, you get, in black-and-white or full color. Price, $49.50.

● Filmo 16 mm. Auto Load mounts one fast, color-corrected lens; effortless magazine loading; improved viewfinder; film speeds of 8, 16, 24, 32; priced from $115, depending on lens selection. Steady-strap handle included.

BELL & HOWELL COMPANY
1802 Larchmont Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Please send free descriptive literature on ☐ Filmo Auto Master; ☐ palm-size Filmo 8; ☐ Filmo Auto Load.

Name.....
Address.....
City..... State..... CS-40

PRECISION-MADE BY

Bell & Howell

"Might as well try to write on a blotter as on this stencil duplicator paper!"

A FUZZY COPY is a poor representative. Questionnaires, special blanks, many stencil copies call for handwritten entries. Put them on Hammermill Mimeo-Bond. This paper takes pen and pencil writing like a letterhead. And it gives clean, readable copies... as many as 5,000 from one stencil. Test Hammermill Mimeo-Bond free. Send for 100-sheet packet and "Good Stencil Duplicating"—how to get better results from your equipment.

HAMMERMILL
MIMEO-BOND

HAMMERMILL MIMEOGRAPH PAPER

MADE BY THE MAKERS OF HAMMERMILL BOND

FREE! Hammermill Paper Co., Dept. C, Erie, Pa.
100 SHEETS As operators of a model
Stencil Duplicator, we would like to test Hammermill Mimeo-Bond. Send 100-sheet packet and "Good Stencil Duplicating." (Students and outside U. S., 50¢)

Name _____

Position _____

(Please attach to, or write on, your company letterhead) C-9-28

Happier Hunting Grounds

Continued from page 19

conservation efforts are Massachusetts, Utah, Indiana, Washington, Nebraska, Minnesota, Alabama, the Virginias, the Dakotas and New Hampshire. As an example of what this sort of work can do, John Chalk estimates that in Carolina the supply of bobwhite quail right now is the largest it has been in a generation. Aided by the sportsman, the farmer has learned that the birds on his farm are often the most valuable crop he has, paying their rent not only in sportsmen's fees but also, a hundred times over, in the pests they destroy. A single pheasant is known to devour three hundred grasshoppers in one day; and on a Southern farm it was estimated recently that the birds consume a daily average of 46,000 weed seeds per acre.

Through the sportsman, the farmer has learned some simple and helpful bits of farm practice that mean many thousands of new birds each year—to throw in a handful of peas with the seed crop, for example, or to sow a fallow field with lespedeza, or to set out a few rows of chufas in the wood lot for turkeys, or to leave alternate ditch banks uncut, with their year-round food supply of elderberries, wild grapes, Virginia creeper, blackberries and sumac.

He has learned, through the sportsman, to equip his mowing machine with a flushing bar in order to scare up ground-nesting birds ahead of the knives. He has learned to fence the cattle out of his beech thickets. He has learned to avoid that indiscriminate burning-over of his fields and wood lots in the spring, which destroys not only food and cover but even the nesting birds themselves. He has learned to rig up winter food stations—wooden platforms with shelters of spruce boughs, or occasional shocks of corn straddling the fences—where the birds can come for grain when the snow is deep. He has learned to keep his house cat indoors, or not at all. Last but not least, he has learned a new respect for sportsmen.

Not bad for the guy with the gun, you must admit. And yet it is only the least of the work he is doing in bringing our wild life back again. Most important of all, from any practical standpoint, is the cold cash that he furnishes each year. Without his license fees, the state commissions would have no funds to carry on their necessary protection and restocking and management. Without his duck-stamp money, the hundreds of federal migratory breeding areas, such as Mattamuskeet in Carolina or Klamath in Oregon or Bear River Refuge in Utah, could not have been purchased and developed. Without his voluntary contributions through his local fish-and-game club or through national organizations like More Game Birds and Ducks Unlimited, the state and government projects would not be supplemented by private hatcheries and game preserves.

What Conservation Can Do

Ducks Unlimited, for example—a nonprofit organization of American sportsmen interested in the conservation of waterfowl—claims to have made half a million acres of land in Canada suitable for duck breeding; to have begun similar projects on another 150,000 acres; to have spent a quarter of a million dollars in the construction of dams and dikes and erecting of barbed-wire fences and plowing of fire lanes; in short, to have been directly accountable for an estimated increase of 6,000,000 ducks in two years. "Seventy per cent of each potential duck crop is lost before the hunter fires a shot," they explain, "through droughts which dry up lakes before the ducklings can fly, through crows and magpies which eat eggs, through fire and flood and disease. Proper management of a wild-life sanctuary can cut these losses in half."

But these refuges are for the migratory birds, the ducks and geese and other waterfowl which are, actually, a federal responsibility. What about the upland game, the year-round crop of partridge and quail and pheasant and rabbit in your own back yard? For all nonmigratory game is owned, not by the government, but by the state; and the average state fish-and-game commission, with its license funds all too often diverted, cannot afford to purchase big tracts of land for breeding grounds and sanctuaries. Who takes care of our upland game?

The answer—and once again it is our old friend the sportsman who saves the game—lies in a measure passed by Con-

BACHELORS SOMETIMES CUT THEMSELVES ON SHARP CANS. FOR ANY LITTLE CUT THAT NEEDS A QUICK BANDAGE..

USE A READY-MADE BAND-AID (AFTER TREATING CUT PROPERLY). NO FUSSING AROUND WITH AWKWARD, HOME-MADE BANDAGES.

BAND-AID IS NEAT AND PRACTICAL. JUST STICK ONE ON... IT STAYS ON... EVEN ON HARD-TO-BANDAGE PLACES. IDEAL FOR MINOR BURNS AND BLISTERS, TOO. BUY A BOX TODAY. ONLY 19¢ FOR 36 ASSORTED SIZES!

Johnson & Johnson
BAND-AID
Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.
ADHESIVE BANDAGES

"You're still shooting low"

CHARLES PEARSON

SPORTSMEN

PROFESSIONAL MEN

BUSINESS MEN

The Ten Million Dollar Hat

COLLEGE MEN

HOLLYWOOD STARS

CAFÉ SOCIETY

OVER 2,000,000 MEN have paid more than $10,000,000 for the Stetson Playboy! As you probably know, more men buy Stetsons than any other maker's single brand...and the Stetson Playboy is the most popular of over 200 smart Stetson styles. It's Extra-Light...can be creased and worn as you like it...over 30 attractive shades to add the finishing touch to your outfit...from slacks to dinner jacket!

COPYRIGHT 1940, JOHN B. STETSON COMPANY

The STETSON Playboy $5

John B. Stetson Company, Philadelphia, New York, London and Paris. Stetsons also made in Canada, from $6.

Make All Days GOOD Days..

By Shooting WINCHESTER

WHEN good hunting comes your way—be shooting Winchester. For big, fast and high-flying northern ducks—for wary geese, long-range pheasants, gun-wise turkeys—be shooting Winchester Super Speed Shells. Selected with big-enough shot for your game, with their high speed, Winchester-controlled short shot string and evenly balanced hard-hitting pattern, they step up your gun to peak performance—assure clean quick kills within any effective range.

Load with Super Speeds, too, for clean-cut success with a fast-handling small-gauge upland gun from which you want lots of reach.

For hunting deer with a shotgun, get Winchester Super Speed Rifled Slug, single ball or buckshot loads.

In your all-around field shooting, use economical Winchester Ranger Shells. Dependable for quick, clean effectiveness, with standard-speed, uniformly-balanced hard-hitting patterns.

Winchester Shells have the famous sure-fire, clean Winchester Staynless priming.

Phone, write, send for or tell your dealer you want Winchester Shells.

For any hunting, your choice of the above Winchester Repeaters will bring out the full effectiveness of your Winchester Shells—will do full justice to your shooting skill. Model 12, the famous pump gun with triple-safety action. Comes in a wide selection of styles and weights. 12, 16, 20 and 28 gauges. For the keenest of wildfowling there's the Model 12 in Heavy Duck gun style, built for 3-inch shells.

The streamlined, sensationally new-design Winchester Model 40 Automatic (self-loading) comes in 12 gauge only, in two styles—standard Field gun, popular choice for wild fowl shooting, and Skeet gun, giving equal satisfaction for fast upland shooting.

See them at your dealer's TODAY.

Send Coupon NOW

Winchester Repeating Arms Co., Dept. 35WW
Division of Western Cartridge Co.
New Haven, Conn.

Send me FREE your new 1940 shot shell folder giving load specifications, and Pocket Catalog of Winchester World Standard guns and ammunition.

Name _____

Address _____

gress in 1937 and known as the Pittman-Robertson Act. Realizing that (to quote Albert Day of the Biological Survey) "the existence of wild life has been increasingly menaced by droughts, floods, soil erosion, the appropriation of lands for farming and industrial purposes, the destruction of faunal habitat, and by the fact that the supply of natural food and cover is ever diminishing," it was found necessary to provide for the restoration of suitable environment in which wild birds and mammals might live.

The Pittman-Robertson Act works simply. It imposes an excise tax of ten per cent on all firearms, shells and cartridges—a tax, incidentally, which was enthusiastically urged by sporting-goods manufacturers and sportsmen alike—and it allocates these funds to the various states each year, according to their respective areas and to the number of hunting licenses sold. Under the terms of the act, the United States pays seventy-five per cent of the cost of the work, the state the remaining twenty-five per cent. The projects are limited to land purchase, to land development in order to make the purchased areas more suitable for wild mammals and birds, and to practical research in wild-life restoration.

No Chiseling!

There is one string to it—an immeasurably wise and shrewd precaution. A state may qualify to receive this Pittman-Robertson aid only if its legislature has passed laws for wild-life conservation "which includes a prohibition against the diversion of hunting-license fees for any other purpose than the administration of said state's fish-and-game department." If your own state is not benefiting today from the Pittman-Robertson funds, inquire whether it is because the selfish politicians in your legislature have refused to relax their grip on the fish-and-game funds.

Is the Pittman-Robertson Act doing the job? Ask Commissioner Chalk of North Carolina, whose eyes grow mellow at the very thought of its possibilities. Ask Commissioner Chalk to take you over to Pender County and show you the Holly Shelter Wild Life Refuge, for example, Carolina's largest development and perhaps the biggest of the Pittman-Robertson projects.

It is not a prepossessing sight, at first: a flat, impenetrable pocosin, covered with a dense undergrowth of myrtle and reed and bay, a few scattered pines, some larger stands of trees on the occasional ridges. Straight out across this wilderness extends a line of heaped black muck, eight feet wide, bordered by the deep ditch from which the muck was taken. Along this ditch, now filled with water, your skiff is poled at snail's pace past the trucks and tractors churning hub-deep in the mud, past groups shoveling sand to surface the road, past WPA workers and hard-working CCC boys.

"This main firebreak," explains Commissioner Chalk, "will run sixteen miles directly through the center of the refuge. In addition, the entire area will be bounded by a similar fire road, and there will be smaller cross lanes and a look-out tower. Fire's our biggest problem, you see. In bad years, this pocosin dries out until it becomes a virtual tinder-box. If these recurrent fires can be stopped, the drainage controlled . . ."

His eyes grow dreamy, his face breaks into a contemplative smile.

"There's 70,000 acres of good game cover here, cover that has never been adequately used before. Cover for deer, bear, turkey, raccoon, squirrel, muskrat, wood duck, quail. Once this refuge is protected from fire, as well as from violators and trespassers, the deer alone should multiply to six or eight times their present number. The annual overflow—the surplus crop that cannot be accommodated each year by the existing food supply—should provide good hunting for the surrounding countryside."

For you in the red hunting cap and khaki coat and brier-scratched boots, you're the one who is bringing the wild life back. Directly or indirectly, your shotgun saves ten birds a year for every one it kills. Restrictions, closed seasons, posted lands—which discourage the sportsman and remove his financial support—are the worst breaks our birds and small animals can have. They owe their very existence today to the continued interest of the guy with the gun.

Private Notes from Mrs. M--'s Diary

Suffered all day with a terrible headache. Felt dull, tired and out of sorts. Remembered that I needed a laxative and decided my headache was due to that.

Took an Ex-Lax tablet before going to bed. It tasted swell - just like a piece of fine chocolate.

Slept like a top all night. Ex-Lax worked fine this morning and didn't upset me a bit. Headache's all gone now and I feel bright as a lark.

The action of Ex-Lax is thorough, yet gentle! No shock. No strain. No weakening after-effects. Just an easy, comfortable bowel movement that brings blessed relief. Try Ex-Lax the next time you need a laxative. It's good for every member of the family.

10¢ and 25¢

MEN! Build a Fine Business and Make More Money Now!

Take orders for P. H. Davis Insured Custom-Tailored Clothes. Insured satisfaction makes permanent customers who lead to more customers. Write today—for 27 reasons for Davis success! P. H. Davis Tailors, Dept. 3, Cincinnati, Ohio

BECAUSE THEY'RE GENUINE HARD RUBBER

"I say, is there a circus or something around here anywhere?"

GARDNER REA

Five Minutes at Dawn

Continued from page 69

The captain climbed to his conning tower over and aft of the second turret. Helped by Surleigh, he donned his coat and caught up his glasses and went on the bridge. It was chill out there, for the Bideford's course lay barely under the Arctic Circle, two hundred miles off Norway's coast.

Summer. For five more hours, at least, there would be light on this northern sea. Even after that, before early dawn, there would be light; for the full moon was rising out of the North Atlantic; twilight's falling would lighten its face, and the battle could go through brief night hours.

The enemy's ships lay off to the east: a cruiser which might well be the Köln and another only slightly smaller. Two in number, if not in guns. After a first glance through the prisms, Waldon turned his eyes aloft to make sure the white ensign was raised to peak. A checkler, the captain, for small details. He wrote a message to the admiralty, reporting that he was about to engage the German ships. His hand was steady. It was steady despite his thumping heart. Then he rejoined his staff to plan the tactics of the battle. Still unhurried, all outwardly calm, he said, "We'll open at sixteen thousand yards. Concentrate on the big one first."

OR an instant his eyes met Lieutenant Clerker's. The eagerness lighting the young man's face enhanced its attraction. Waldon felt suddenly homely and old as the thought, "If Claire could see him now!" flashed unwanted across his mind. Homely and old, alone, unloved—just at a time when more than ever he would like to think that his wife could care.

But maybe she did! She had borne a son. Perhaps the warm tenderness felt for her child might even embrace its father as well!

He clung to this thought with the fervent hope of a shipwrecked sailor clutching a spar. It was there in the background of his mind while the words spoke were concerned with war:

"We'll bear southeastward through the action."

"Our seaplanes, sir?"

The captain's glance went suddenly shy. They lay on their catapult and ship, two navy planes for scouting the foe. But Waldon belonged to the tradition which still resented aviation. England's glory was founded on ships. On men-o'-war her fate depended. "Visibility is clear," he answered. "Once we're engaged, we'll have no time for nursing planes run out of petrol. They will stay on board until we've closed. Then, and not before, toss 'em out."

Waldon returned to the steel-rimmed catwalk. In the guts of the Bideford the blowers whined as they lashed the masts to seething fury. His ship, he knew, was five knots faster than either. He could set the action. In the conning tower above and abaft him range finders tracked the narrowing gap between the Bideford and the Nazis. Now, in the citadel of his ship, officers sat at the plotting table, taking the range that was phoned to them, translating it into elevation. The turrets were swung for a broadside to port, six eight-inch guns with their muzzles lifted to pour out fifteen hundred pounds of pent-up death in one big salvo.

The captain turned as a lanky sergeant of Royal Marines gave his aide a message. Waldon's eyes inspected the fellow—blouse, cap, sidearms all in order—and then took the paper from Surleigh's hand. Again signed "Glover." Two words: "Good luck."

His jaw set grimly, he stood his bridge while the Bideford rushed like a killer whale to get at her foe. The enemy's ships had accepted battle, the swastika ensign raised to their peaks. But they did not come to engage the British. On a course only slightly east of south the Nazis steamed till the range could be closed. The dampers were drawn on the smaller German; dense black smoke rolled out from her stack; she was ready to lay a heavy curtain across her bigger-gunned companion.

"It seems that Jerry has taken to heart our tactics against the Graf Spee. H'mph!" Honest contempt was in Waldon's voice. Upstart landsmen trying to challenge a people whose blood for centuries past ran thick with salt from Britannia's seas!

"There go his planes," young Surleigh reported.

"H'mph!" grunted Waldon.

The Bideford's nose swung farther to starboard. She had almost closed to her opening range. In ten minutes more, she would be in position to fire a broadside.

The Nazi planes climbed high in the sky to outreach bursts of antiaircraft. His judgment told Waldon that he ought also to send up the Bideford's scouting planes. But stubbornness stayed him. He had said, "When we've closed," and he would hold to that decision.

He studied the Germans through the glasses. The smaller warship, rolling black smoke, was moving up swiftly to pass the other. Suddenly bright flames spurted to life, followed at once by a second burst as the lighter cruiser added her voice. Thunder rolled across the waters and there was a spreading fog of white smoke, but this was preceded by roaring geysers which leaped from the sea off the Bideford's beam.

Waldon quit the open bridge with studied care not to move in haste. Instinct told him to run to cover. His disciplined heart and his brain said, "No." Casually he remarked to Surleigh, "Dashed good aim for an opening shot."

Inside, still unhurried, he spoke through a phone, "You may send up your planes as soon as ready."

THROUGH a slit in the side of the armored tower he stared across at the enemy's ships. The smaller had passed her heavier sister, laying a screen of oily smoke. Faintly from farther aft on his vessel Waldon could hear the roar of a motor, and then the thud of the catapult's ram.

Almost at once a buzzer called and a voice, too eager to please him, reported, "No. 1 plane has cleared us, sir."

No. 2's motor was snarling now, a throaty growl and then full voiced as the throttle went wider, tuning for flight. While he watched the foe through powerful prisms the captain awaited the second thud. But a deeper, mightier sound intervened with the flashing of fire across the water; it came to him as a sullen echo of bursting shells in the Bideford's gear; fragments spat on the conning tower, and he heard the rending of quick destruction.

"Well placed," grunted Waldon. "It's our turn now."

Then the deck at his feet seemed to be convulsed, the whole ship shuddering under the shock of her six great guns. He felt the Bideford steady herself. The smoke rolled alee and gradually cleared, and he knew from what he saw in his glass that the broadside had missed.

But not by much. Soon word was re-

"There Is Nothing Too Good for a Good Dog!"

• Your dog is a good dog. He is faithful. He serves you devotedly . . . without question . . . without complaint. He trusts you implicitly.

So isn't it only fair that you fulfill that trust? Above all, be particular about the food he eats. Feed him Red Heart 3-flavor Dog Food—America's No. 1 Favorite*. Dogs enjoy the stimulating appetite appeal of Red Heart's 3 delicious flavors . . . Diet A—beef flavor, Diet B—fish flavor, and Diet C—cheese flavor, fed in rotation.

Red Heart is a well-balanced, top-quality dog food made in federally inspected plants from clean, wholesome meat and meat by-products, vegetable and bone meals, cereals, cod-liver oil, and Fleischmann's High-Vitamin Irradiated Yeast.

* According to independent, nationwide surveys

Red Heart provides an abundance of Anti-infective Vitamin A, Anti-neuritic Vitamin B<sub>1</sub>, Sunshine Vitamin D, Growth Vitamin G, and other necessary vitamins . . . in proper amounts to supply your dog's requirements. Red Heart is laboratory-tested and kennel-proved. John Morrell & Co., General Offices, Ottumwa, Iowa.

TUNE IN BOB BECKER'S "CHATS ABOUT DOGS"

Back on the air Sundays, 3:45 P.M., E.S.T., starting September 29! NBC Red Network, coast to coast. Thrilling dramatizations of the heroism and intelligence of dogs. Practical advice on the care and training of dogs.

FREE! "LOST AND FOUND" DOG LOCKET

Don't lose your dog! Send for free NEW, IMPROVED Red Heart "Lost and Found" Dog Locket. Has space for your name, address, phone, dog's name, etc. And with locket get copy of Michael von Motzeck's Official Obedience Rules, actually taught to dogs at famous Chicago kennels. Just send 3 Red Heart labels—Diets A, B, and C—to John Morrell & Co., Dept. 39, Ottumwa, Iowa.

RED HEART

DIET A—Beef Flavor
DIET B—
Fish Flavor
DIET C—
Cheese Flavor

THE
3-FLAVOR
DOG FOOD
FEED IN ROTATION

Treat your dog to the best during

NATIONAL DOG WEEK, September 22-28

FINEST QUALITY, RIGIDLY MAINTAINED—AMAZING LOW PRICE! TRY THEM AT OUR RISK!

GUARANTEED BY
THE MARLIN FIREARMS CO.
NEW HAVEN, CONN.

FREE: Week's supply, double or single edge blades. Write MARLIN, 168 Willow St., New Haven, Conn.

Think of your FEET!

Wigwam 100% wool socks keep your feet happy even after long hours of hunting. Will outlast many pairs of most socks. Uniform quality of yarn properly spun for warmth and comfort. Soft, fleecy lining forms cushion for foot, absorbs perspiration. Stitch courses and seams will not irritate the foot. There is a minimum of rubbing and less chance to blister tender feet. Styles for every sport. Hunt in Wigwams—you'll tire less, enjoy it more. Sold by your dealers.

HAND KNIT HOSIERY CO.
Sheboygan, Wisconsin

Wigwam SOCKS

FREE! Write us for valuable free folder titled "HOW TO WASH 'EM."

Original CHIPPEWA
BOOTS FOR EVERY PURPOSE

QUALITY SKI BOOTS

Famous among sportsmen for 40 years, Original Chippewas are perfectly made of finest leathers for fit and comfort. This ski boot, for example, has everything that adds to the fullest enjoyment of winter sports. Get Original Chippewas from your local dealer, or write for illustrated catalog.

Look for the Original CHIPPEWA Label on Every Pair

SNAGGED IN 6 PLACES

LEAKS NO WATER

SPORTSMEN! 1001 Repairs for Only

New plastoid "putty"—SO-LO—fills cracks, holes in tires, shoes, boots—anything of rubber, leather or cloth. Spreads on like butter. Dries tough. Waterproof, flexible, non-skid. Won't come off—guaranteed! 25¢ package (25 repairs) shows many uses. Get SO-LO at 10¢ hardware stores or sports goods stores.

So-Lo

"Woolworth, Kresge, Newberry, Murphy, McCrory, Nelson, McLellan, Sears, Ward, Scott, now featuring SO-LO."

"FIRST CHOICE"

—In KNIVES

Byrd, Peary, Lindbergh and other famous names top the list of explorers and sportsmen who know that—

MARBLE'S Knives give the utmost in service and satisfaction. No. 49—4 1/2 in. blade, $2.00; No. 60—4 in. blade, $1.50. Prices include sheath. At Dealers or direct. Write for catalog.

Marble Arms & Mfg. Co. 511 Delta Avenue Gladstone, Mich., U.S.A.

played to him from the plane, high over the sea, where the shells had carried. A slight reduction in elevation would make all the difference, shooting again.

Waldon regarded the plane up there. It would have to carry on now alone. For its sister plane lay a mass of wreckage still on the catapult amidship. His order—too late: a bursting shell had smashed it seconds before it could clear.

The captain grunted, his cheeks flaming hot at realization of how he had erred. But his jaw went hard and he braced himself for the fight before him.

The ships raced southeast in a running fight, locked to the death despite the fact that seven sea miles lay between them. They dodged in and out while their turrets thundered. More than eight tons of deadly projectiles, reaching to find some vital spot, had been poured from the Bideford's six big guns, and still neither side had scored a hit that really hurt its armored rival.

THE sun dropped low in the sky. High overhead two German planes, leaving a third to spot the range, attacked the Bideford's single flier. They wheeled and dipped like darting swallows, and then Captain Waldon gaped with dismay as the British seaplane suddenly dived to streak in panicky flight toward his ship.

His lips curled scornfully. Turning tail! But now he heard the bark of his archies, and realization burst on him that his youthful pilot was springing a trap. Right! A pattern of bursting shells formed in the sky—and—yes, by Jove, one of those Germans came fluttering down like a wounded fowl and splashed in the sea!

"Potted the beggar," he chuckled. "Good shooting."

Potted him just in the nick of time. For almost at once the action quickened. The Bideford's guns and the larger enemy's fired simultaneously at their marks, and the latter's broadside burst aboard with a detonation that rocked the cruiser. Too high to damage the thick steel hull, but the after turret had been knocked out—that and the anti-aircraft batteries between the stacks and the tapering stern.

A fire was starting to gather fury. The boatswain's pipe shrilled out its summons to man the hoses. In his conning tower, Waldon's heart gave a jubilant jump as the smoke dissolved to reveal his foe. There were fires on the larger Nazi, too! In the lenses Waldon could see a hole that gaped at him where British shells had blasted the main director tower.

Here was his chance. The principal foe had been badly crippled, control lines shattered, observers cut off. Jerry would have to worry along with his eyes half blind, his voice half mute. He was groggy. Now, hit hard and fast. The time had come for a knockout punch.

The sun lay red on northern waters and the larger enemy stood out clear, illuminated by raging fires. Again the Bideford's great guns boomed. It was the end for the heavier foe. A monster explosion burst her asunder, the shells in her magazine turned against her, and swiftly she sank, while a pillar of smoke still hovered over her watery grave.

Captain Waldon rushed out to the bridge. He saw men sprawled on the deck below him, but he did not give them a second thought. The lust of battle was on him now. He had savored blood, and its taste was good.

All that concerned him was his ship. Wreckage was strewn on the battered deck. A fire was licking abaft the beam. The Bideford looked a war-scarred ruin; and yet two turrets, the citadel of her, were still intact, still eager to fight; and again her blowers began to whine as the draft was forced to crowd on speed and catch the remaining, now fleeing Nazi.

The latter's course was southeast-by-east, running desperately for haven in one of Norway's fortified fjords. They raced through a night of eerie beauty. The moon's face brightened while northern lights shimmered and faded above the Circle. Astern of the Bideford, riding the swells like a resting gull, the little seaplane sat drinking fuel from five-gallon cans dropped over the side.

Presently Waldon's servant appeared with a tray of sandwiches and coffee. He had ministered to him for twenty years, a small gray man whose patient eyes seemed cast forever apologetic. The captain, in rare good humor, smiled.

"Rather a good fight, Tuttle—what?"
"Oh, indeed, sir! The little master will be very proud when he knows what happened the day he was born."

"By jove, that's right. You've hit it, Tuttle. A bit of a natal gift for my son."

Waldon beamed at his man. Good old Tut! The moon and the lights and the swelling sea stirred him to sentiment, buoyed his hopes. Two enemy cruisers engaged and sunk would make him a hero home in London.

There was no getting away from the fact that the British public would lionize him. Better, far better, these men he commanded would boast of him proudly as "good old Waldon." Something suspiciously like moisture came to his eyes as he thought of that.

Through the brief summer's night the Bideford strained to draw within reach of the fleeing Nazi. As the moon climbed higher, its light revealed a faint streak of smoke in the far southwest. From man-o'-war or cargo steamer, friend or foe? Captain Waldon frowned.

BUT the smoke drew nearer with so much haste that he knew it could only mean a destroyer. No matter, then. Whether friend or foe, he still would dominate the battle.

His ship was closing upon her prey. The Bideford's guns were swung for action. He could see the muzzles lifting a mite to correct the range as the Nazi dodged—like a fist being cocked in preparation to smash a finishing blow to the chin.

Dawn was about to break on their beam. Soon, Waldon knew, the sun would make his vessel a hazy target while that of his foe would be sharply limned.

It was young Surleigh who called his attention to the specks that were moving across the sky. Small black specks winging over the sea, seen in the first fresh pink of dawn. The specks grew larger—no longer specks. Almost Captain Waldon fancied that he could hear the drone of their flight.

"H'mph," he snorted. "Jerry's crows!"—and his rooted contempt was like a potion that gave him courage and spurred him on.

THE range had been closed. His foe lay abeam, and the Bideford's two live turrets thundered. Four guns only but they would suffice. Their mighty roar was like noble music to him. They were England's voice, the lion's roar and nothing that came on wings could mute them.

The little seaplane, miles overhead reported down an exact correction. Again the turrets spoke their piece. Again . . . and again, till they had it right. Syntax, accent, inflection were perfect, as witness the shambles over the water. This was the kill, and the Bideford's gun crews moved precisely to finish their prey.

The bombers from Norway were coming fast. The sound of their motor filled the heavens. The little seaplane was climbing now, and Waldon stared with open mouth as his eaglet braced itself to attack. Like David about to battle the giant—not one Goliath, but actually nine!

Grudging admiration claimed him. He saw the seaplane suddenly dive and dart like a hawk at the squadron leader. Its spitting machine gun struck a flame. The great bird crumpled and dropped from the sky.

"By Jove—I!" gasped Waldon. It was all he could say, for again his vessel was staggering under the kick of her guns. He stood on the forebridge waiting tensely until the smoke would disperse into air. What the captain

Reach out for Finer Flavor!

Enjoy Life with

Miller

HIGH LIFE

The Champagne of Bottle Beer

WHY WAIT TO TAKE A LAXATIVE?

PLUTO WILL MAKE YOU FEEL WORLDS BETTER IN ONE HOUR!

SWIFT...GENTLE...THOROUGH RELIEF!

● Thousands of busy people everywhere depend on Pluto—the laxative you can time! A Pluto highball thoroughly cleanses the intestinal tract *usually within one hour and no unpleasant after effects! Get Pluto at any drug store. Three sizes: 10c, 25c, 50c or Pluto highball 10c at fountains and bars.

PLUTO Water From Famous French Lick Springs, Ind.

WHEN NATURE WON'T—PLUTO WILL!
WINDPROOF

MATCHLESS QUALITY ZIPPO always lights every time—anywhere

The only lighter
with a LIFETIME GUARANTEE.
Ask your dealer.

Use one hand—even lights pipes in a gale. Can't light accidentally. Gadget-less design. Permanent wick. Big fuel supply. $2. plain. $3. with 3 engraved initials. Send for New Catalog. ZIPPO MFG. CO., Dept. C, BRADFORD, PA.

ZIPPO Windproof LIGHTER

Why
Hunters
Feed Miller's KIBBLES

Ever since 50% more meat was added to Miller's Kibbles, hunters everywhere are praising this healthful low-cost feeding plan. It's easy, safe, and so good for your dog. Simply use delicious Miller's Kibbles, dietetically-complete for the basic diet, with table leftovers for variety. Keeps your dog "healthier at half the cost." Try it! For FREE "Package of Joy" write Miller's Dog Foods, 926 State Street, Battle Creek, Michigan.

SOLD BY GOOD STORES EVERYWHERE

saw when the atmosphere cleared was like scenes that only harebrained artists had thought to paint a few decades ago. For two more planes were falling in flames, and one was his gallant little eaglet—falling in flames toward a placid sea where a cruiser lay stricken, mortally hurt by bursting shells from the Bideford's guns.

"One more broadside, just for luck."

"Aye, aye, sir," a brisk voice answered. "Hadh't you better take to cover?"

"Eh? I guess you're right there, Surleigh. One never knows, their aim's so erratic, where those eggs are likely to break."

In the tower, beneath its mushroom of steel, Waldon stood with his junior aide and the lad of a bugler. The guns spoke again. As though in an echo, less loud but more sharp, the voice of the turrets was now repeated: the antiaircraft batteries forward banging away at the Nazi planes.

He heard the scream of them diving toward him, through the sighting slits saw geysers of water leaping in air as though to strike back—seven loads of explosives dumped at the cruiser, and one consignment now found its mark.

There followed a lull in which little was heard but the drone of motors receding eastward: that and the maddened cry of a man in his final agony down on the deck.

Surleigh, peering out toward Norway, reported abruptly, "Here come more!"

One, two, three flights winging from land with eggs of death hung poised for release. Waldon said nothing. He had done all he could. The Bideford zig-zagged upon her course, eighty thousand horsepower driving her screws as she steamed to meet the rushing destroyer. The latter's archies, joined with his own, would hold Jerry's crows too high to make good.

Then a buzzer sounded. A voice on the wire. The forward antiaircraft guns were out of commission, forever stilled.

"Luck!" grunted Waldon. "But we'll come through."

Eight miles of water now separated the Bideford's prow and the lean destroyer. The latter's speed with the cruiser's added would total almost seventy knots. A mile a minute, closing the gap—yet this was a tortoise's pace compared with that of the bombers. The first flight dived. They kept a respectable altitude and their eggs fell wide of the moving target.

But the Bideford's silence had been observed. No archie bursts had flared in the sky. Only machine guns, futilely firing, had spoken up to greet their attack.

The next flight's pilots would be less cautious. And then the third's! They would dive so close that nothing could keep them from hitting the mark. It would be like shooting a crippled duck.

THEY had finished. Their wings were spread for Norway when Captain Waldon emerged at last to blink at what had once been a ship. Her screws were no longer churning the sea. Drifting, his vessel, her turbines blasted, her stern settling fast with a portside list. Through jagged holes in the armored deck he could see the sullen glow of flames. Smoke swirled about him and hid the destroyer, which must, Waldon knew, be about to stand by.

The Bideford's death was a matter of minutes—five at the most, before she would plunge. Now one thing only remained to be done: order his men over-side and then, when none was left on board, dive in.

To the bugler Waldon ordered, "Abandon ship," and the call was sounded from quivering lips.

Then he stood alone, gazing with love at his gallant cruiser. Below him upon the shattered catwalk he recognized a lanky figure draped grotesquely about a stanchion. The sergeant of Royal Marines was grinning, as though in death he had found a jest richer, broader than ever heard in the music halls of his native England.

"Poor devil," breathed Waldon, strangely moved, and he quit the twisted wreck of his bridge to reach the inside stairs leading down. But someone was coming. He heard quick steps ascending the stairs.

Then Clerker appeared. His hair was singed, and his uniform hung from him in shreds. He had been wounded; one arm showed raw; but apparently it was not too serious.

What was serious, in Waldon's eyes, was the beauty of him, his romantic youth—ardor and spirit and physical charm blended together in near perfection. Claire could never forget this man. He was a hero as much as Waldon, and again the latter felt old and homely, a husband only by grace of law.

"Mr. Clerker," he snapped, "you heard the order—abandon ship?"

"Yes, sir. But at least a score of men are trapped below."

"Alive?" gasped Waldon.

"Alive. I talked to them through the wreckage blocking escape from the engine room, aft. I saw them, sir. We'll have to get torches, cut a passage."

Captain Waldon stared at Clerker, at eyes still ablaze with the fire of battle. He swallowed. Here was a fighting sailor—not just a boy, but a man who would some day merit a ship of his own.

"IT'S no use," Waldon shook his head. "The ship won't last that long. She's going."

He resumed his weary way to the deck, with Clerker behind him. He walked as one doomed. At the starboard rail, now wrenched and broken, he turned to thrust his hand at Clerker.

"I seem to recall that you swim rather well. Get overside fast."

"But, Captain Waldon—!"

He noticed the horror on Clerker's face, saw that the latter had suddenly guessed what he had in mind.

"My orders," he snapped.

"Oh, but you can't, sir! You've done all you could. Won a glorious victory—"

"Never mind that."

"But if I had known—" Tears started up in Clerker's eyes and he tried again "I'd never have told you, if I had thought—! Don't do it, sir. You must think of Claire."

"If you mean Mrs. Waldon," the captain began. Then the formal hardness went out of his voice. "You will tell her for me—" But again he stopped. Why spoil their future by speaking words that could only cause them needless pain? "Damn it all," he blustered, "I still your captain. Over the side, now—look alive!"

WALDON had given his last command. For a moment he stood there after the splash, glancing about him. The light breeze freshened. It rifted the smoke to show him his enemy sliding under, her stern going last, the brightening sunlight dancing briefly on glistering plates before she was gone.

The victor would not be slow to follow. She seemed to be tensing herself for the plunge. Waldon turned briskly and hurried aft. At least he could call to his men in their trap, could give them the comfort, such as it was, of knowing their skipper shared the same fate.

He felt no fear. He was taking his place with Drake and Hawkins, Sir Richard Grenville, immortal Nelson—captains, all. Aye, and a place in Claire's heart too. A place that, living, could never be his. She would always think of him tenderly now, even perhaps with the warmth of love. She would teach their boy to be proud of him.

All in all, he thought, it was better this way. He smiled. In a minute life would be over for him and his men, trapped under the deck. He called to them. He heard their replies, heard lusty cheers for "good old Waldon." The ship shifted sharply. She was going now. Her captain still smiled as he clung to bulkhead, awaiting the clasp of Britannia's sea.

"There probably won't be any more French perfumes for a while. Brings the war uncomfortably close, doesn't it?"

CARL ROSE

Let me tell you something about Preparedness

RAILROADS may look about the same to you as they did at the time of the last World War, but any railroad man can tell you a lot of things have happened, a lot of improvements have been made to give America far better railroads today than it had then.

Here are two quick facts that size up the situation:

Freight train speed today averages nearly two-thirds faster.

And freight trains perform more than twice as much transportation service per hour as freight trains did then.

Behind these records are years of planning and hard work on the part of the railroads.

They've increased sidetrack mileage. They've enlarged terminal facilities. They've speeded up the handling of freight through yards. They've developed a vastly improved method of having cars on hand wherever and whenever they are needed. Their freight cars and locomotives are bigger and better than they were 20 years ago.

And they've met test after test without car shortage or delay.

From August to October, 1939, for example, the largest increase in business ever recorded in so short a period was handled so smoothly that most people never heard about it.

And they've got 50,000 more serviceable freight cars now than they had then.

All of which adds up to this simple fact—

In speed and operating efficiency the American railroads are at the highest peak in their history.

That's mighty good news for every American who wants to see this country of ours prepared to meet any emergency—because no other form of transportation can do the job that the railroads do.

They've certainly proved their ability to handle their job. To keep up the good work, and to do an even better job, all they need is a fair and equal treatment with other forms of transportation.

"See America"
FOR $90

Start from your home town now on a Grand Circle Tour of the United States—east coast, west coast, border to border—go by one route, return by another—liberal stopovers—for $90 railroad fare in coaches—$135 in Pullmans (plus $45 for one or two passengers in a lower berth).

NOW — TRAVEL ON CREDIT
See your local ticket agent

ASSOCIATION OF
AMERICAN RAILROADS
WASHINGTON, D. C.

The Patriotic Murders

Continued from page 23

The Trail to Happy Hunting

IS BLAZED WITH

RED HEAD HITS!

Stronger than army duck. Squaltex weighs 1/3 less. Tightly woven from finest Pima yarns. Sanforized. Vat-dyed to hold color. Zelan Waterproofed.

Loose, slightly longer than regular trousers. Blouses over tops of boots (all heights). Front reinforcement extends to elastic knit wool bottom.

Now—swing up to those high flyers as free and easy as if you were coatless. That's bi-swing action for happy hunting.

Pure wool yarns that assure warmth in the face of chilling blasts. Combines flexibility and durability. Eye-catching red and black checks. Coat, cap, and breeches available.

Last word in comfort. Storm blows up—just lift collar—pull out "hidden hood"—zip it up and the protection of an Eskimo parka is yours.

Finest pure virgin wool flannel, 10 oz. weight, de-cated to minimize shrinkage. Collars lined; fine fitting. Fullness that doesn't bind. Distinctive patterns.

A sandwich of rubber between two layers of fabric—placed ONLY where RUBBER is needed—that's the famous Red Head "bone-dry" happy hunting feature. In breeches and coats.

Made by the world's largest makers of gun cases. Natural wool of selected sheepskins forms a thick luxurious lining... gives your gun the protection it deserves. Made to fit any gun.

WATERPROOFING COMPOUND

For Leather and Canvas

At last... a waterproofing compound that really does the job. Made by Red Head... nuff said! Easy to apply... not greasy or messy... dependable because of thorough penetration. 6-oz. can only 25c.

FREE! Red Head Drinking Cup
Order a trial can of Seal-Tex and we'll send you this folding drinking cup free. Made of same fabric that goes into the famous Red Head "bone-dry" Hunting Clothes. Try Seal-Tex—if not satisfied, simply return and your 25c will be refunded. Keep the cup with our compliments.

FREE BOOK

Tells what to wear on the trail to "Happy Hunting"... an illustrated booklet of Red Head "hits," sent without obligation.

RED HEAD BRAND CO.
4311 W. Belmont Avenue, Chicago

"Yes. Yes, I have found her." He sat down. And he sighed. Alistair Blunt said, "Is she dead?" "That depends," said Hercule Poirot slowly, "on how you like to look at it." Blunt frowned. He said, "My dear man, a person must be dead or alive. Miss Sainsbury Seale must be one or the other."

"Ah, but who is Miss Sainsbury Seale?"

Alistair Blunt said, "You don't mean that—that there isn't any such person?"

"Oh, no, no. There was such a person. She lived in Calcutta. She taught elocution. She busied herself with good works. She came to England on the Maharamah—the same boat on which M. Amberiotis traveled. Although they were not in the same class, he helped her over something—some fuss about her luggage. He was, it would seem, a kindly man in little ways. And sometimes, M. Blunt, kindness is repaid in an unexpected fashion."

"It was so, you know, with M. Amberiotis. He chanced to meet the lady again in the streets of London. He was feeling expansive, he good-naturedly invited her to lunch with him at the Savoy. An unexpected treat for her. And an unexpected windfall for M. Amberiotis! For his kindness was not premeditated—he had no idea that this faded, middle-aged lady was going to present him with the equivalent of a gold mine. But, nevertheless, that is what she did, though she never suspected the fact herself."

"She was never, you see, of the first order of intelligence. A good, well-meaning soul, but the brain, I should say, of a hen."

Blunt said, "Then it wasn't she who killed the Chapman woman?"

Poirot said slowly, "It is difficult to know just how to present the matter. I shall begin, I think, where the matter began for me. With a shoe!"

Blunt said blankly, "With a shoe?" Hercule Poirot nodded.

"Yes, a buckled shoe. I came out from my ordeal at the dentist's and as I stood on the steps of 58 Queen Charlotte Street, a taxi stopped outside, the door opened and a woman's foot prepared to descend. I am a man who notices a woman's foot and ankle. It was a well-shaped foot, with a good ankle and an expensive stocking, but I did not like the shoe. It was a new, shining patent-leather shoe with a large, ornate buckle. Not chic—not at all chic!"

"AND whilst I was observing this, the rest of the lady came into sight—and frankly it was a disappointment—a middle-aged lady without charm and badly dressed."

"Miss Sainsbury Seale?"

"Precisely. As she descended, a contretemps occurred—she caught the buckle of her shoe in the door and it was wrenched off. I picked it up and returned it to her. That was all. The incident was closed."

"Later, on that same day, I went with Chief Inspector Japp to interview the lady. (She had not as yet sewn on the buckle, by the way.)"

"On that same evening, Miss Sainsbury Seale walked out of her hotel and vanished. That, shall we say, is Part One."

"Part Two began when Chief Inspector Japp summoned me to King Leopold Mansions. There was a fur chest in a flat there, and in that fur chest there had been found a body. I went into the room, I walked up to the chest—and the first thing I saw was a shabby, buckled shoe!"

"Well?"

"You have not appreciated the point. It was a shabby shoe—a well-worn shoe. But you see, Miss Sainsbury Seale had come to King Leopold Mansions on the evening of that same day—the day of Mr. Morley's murder. In the morning the shoes were new shoes—in the evening they were old shoes. One does not wear out a pair of shoes in a day, you comprehend."

Alistair Blunt said without much interest, "She could have two pairs of shoes, I suppose?"

"Ah, but that was not so. For Japp and I had gone up to her room at the Glengowrie Court and had looked at all her possessions—and there was no pair of buckled shoes there. She might have had an old pair of shoes, yes. She might have changed into them after a tiring day to go out in the evening, yes. But if so, the other pair would have been at the hotel. It was curious, you will admit?"

Blunt smiled a little. He said, "I can't see that it is important."

"No, not important. Not at all important. But one does not like things that one cannot explain. I stood by the fur chest and I looked at the shoe—the buckle had recently been sewn on by hand. I will confess that I then had a moment of doubt—of myself. Yes, I said to myself, Hercule Poirot, you were a little lightheaded perhaps this morning. You saw the world through rosy spectacles. Even the old shoes looked like new ones to you!"

"Perhaps that was the explanation."

"But, no, it was not. My eyes do not deceive me! To continue, I studied the dead body of this woman and I did not like what I saw. Why had the face been wantonly, deliberately smashed and rendered unrecognizable?"

Alistair Blunt moved restlessly. He said, "Must we go over that again? We know—"

Hercule Poirot said firmly, "It is necessary. I have to take you over the steps that led me at last to the truth said to myself: 'Something is wrong here. Here is a dead woman in the clothes of Miss Sainsbury Seale (except, perhaps, the shoes?) and with the handbag of Miss Sainsbury Seale—but why is the face unrecognizable? Is it perhaps, because the face is not the face of Miss Sainsbury Seale?' And immediately I begin to put together what I have heard of the appearance of the other woman—the woman to whom the flat belongs, and I ask myself—might it not, perhaps, be this other woman who lies dead here?"

"I GO then and look at the other woman's bedroom. I try to picture to myself what sort of woman she is. In superficial appearance, very different to the other. Smart, showily dressed, very much made up. But in essentials, no unlike. Hair, build, age... But there is one difference: Mrs. Albert Chapman took a five in shoes. Miss Sainsbury Seale, I knew, took a ten-inch stocking—that is to say she would take at least a six in shoes. Mrs. Chapman, then, had smaller feet than Miss Sainsbury Seale. "I went back to the body. If my half-formed idea were right, and the body was that of Mrs. Chapman wearing Miss Sainsbury Seale's clothes, then the shoes should be too big. I took hold of one. But it was not loose. It fitted

"I understand she's had quite an adventurous life"

BARBARA SHERMUND

tly. That looked as though it were body of Miss Sainsbury Seale after But in that case, why was the face figured? Her identity was already ved by the handbag, which could ly have been removed, but which not been removed.

It was a puzzle—a tangle. In desation I seized on Mrs. Chapman's res book—a dentist was the only son who could prove definitely who dead woman was—or was not. By coincidence, Mrs. Chapman's dentist M. Morley. Morley was dead, but ntification was still possible. You w the result. The body was identi- in the Coroner's Court by M. Mor- s successor as that of Mrs. Albert pman."

UNT was fidgeting with some imatience, but Poirot took no notice. was left now with a psychological blem. What sort of a woman was belle Sainsbury Seale? There were answers to that question. The first the obvious one borne out by her le life in India and by the testimony er personal friends. That depicted as an earnest, conscientious, slightly id woman. Was there another Miss sbury Seale? Apparently there

There was a woman who had lunched a well-known foreign agent, who accosted you in the street and ned to be a close friend of your s (a statement that was almost cerly untrue) a woman who had left a s house very shortly before a mur- had been committed, a woman who visited another woman on the eve- when in all probability that other an had been murdered, and who since disappeared although she t be aware that the police force of and was looking for her. Were all e actions compatible with the char- er her friends gave her? It would t that they were not.

Therefore, if Miss Sainsbury Seale e not the good, amiable creature she ned, then it would appear that she quite possibly a cold-blooded mur- ss or almost certainly an accom- after the fact. had one more criterion—my own onal impression. I had talked to elle Sainsbury Seale myself. How she struck me? And that, M. Blunt, the most difficult question to an- of all. Everything that she said, way of talking, her manner, her ges- s, all were perfectly in accord with given character. But they were ally in accord with a clever actress ing a part. And, after all, Mabelle sbury Seale had started life as an ss.

had been much impressed by a ersation I had had with M. Barnes aling who had also been a patient B Queen Charlotte Street on that ular day. His theory, expressed r forcibly, was that the deaths of ey and of Amberiotis were only ental, so to speak—that the in- ed victim was you."

Alistair Blunt said, "Oh, come now— as a bit farfetched." it, M. Blunt? Is it not true that is moment there are various groups ople to whom it is vital that you ld be—removed, shall we say? Shall o longer capable of exerting your fence?"

Blunt said, "Oh, yes, that's true gh. But why mix up this business Morley's death with that?"

Poirot said, "Because there is a cer- in—how shall I put it?—lavishness et the case. Expense is no object— an life is no object. Yes, there is a elessness, a lavishness—that points big crime!"

"You don't think Morley shot himself euse of a mistake?"

"I never thought so—not for a minute. No, Morley was murdered, Amberiotis was murdered, an unrecognizable woman was murdered— Why? For some big stake. Barnes' theory was that somebody had tried to bribe Morley or his partner to put you out of the way."

Alistair Blunt said sharply, "Nonsense!"

"Ah, but is it nonsense? Say one wishes to put someone out of the way. Yes, but that someone is forewarned, forearmed, difficult of access. To kill that person it is necessary to be able to approach him without awakening his suspicions—and where would a man be less suspicious than in a dentist's chair?"

"Well, that's true, I suppose. I never thought of it like that."

"It is true. And once I realized it I had my first vague glimmering of the truth."

"So you accepted Barnes' theory? Who is Barnes, by the way?"

"Barnes was Reilly's twelve-o'clock patient. He is retired from the home office and lives at Ealing. An insignificant little man. But you are wrong when you say I accepted his theory. I did not. I only accepted the principle of it."

"What do you mean?"

Hercule Poirot said, "All along, all the way through, I have been led astray—sometimes unwittingly, sometimes deliberately and for a purpose. All along it was presented to me, forced upon me, that this was what you might call a public crime. That is to say, that you, M. Blunt, were the focus of it all, in your public character. You, the banker, you the man behind the chancellor of the exchequer, you, the supporter of the present national government."

"But every public character has a private life also. That was my mistake, I forgot the private life. There existed private reasons for killing Morley—Frank Carter's, for instance."

"There could also exist private reasons for killing you. . . . You had relations who would inherit money when you died. You had people who loved and hated you—as a man—not as a public figure."

"AND so I came to the supreme instance of what I call 'the forced card.' The purported attack upon you by Frank Carter. If that attack was genuine—then it was a political crime. But was there any other explanation? There could be. There was a second man in the shrubbery. The man who rushed up and seized Carter. A man who could easily have fired that shot and then tossed the pistol to Carter's feet so that the latter would almost inevitably pick it up and be found with it in his hand. . . ."

"I considered the problem of Howard Raikes. Raikes had been at Queen Charlotte Street that morning of Morley's death. Raikes was a bitter enemy of all that you stood for and were. Yes, but Raikes was something more. Raikes was the man who might marry your niece, and with you dead, your niece would inherit a very handsome income, even though you had prudently arranged that she could not touch the principal."

"Was the whole thing, after all, a private crime—a crime for private gain, for private satisfaction? Why had I thought it a public crime? Because, not once, but many times, that idea had been suggested to me, had been forced upon me like a forced card."

"It was then, when that idea occurred to me, that I had my first glimmering of the truth. I was in church at the time and singing a verse of a psalm. It spoke of a snare laid with cords."

"A snare? Laid for me? Yes, it could be. . . . But in that case who had laid it? There was only one person who could have laid it. . . . And that did not make sense—or did it? Had I been looking at the case upside down? Money

READ THIS

ANNOUNCEMENT

by Du Pont

BEFORE YOU BUY ANTI-FREEZE

The Du Pont Company presents its newest chemical achievement—"Zerex"—a non-evaporating ethylene glycol anti-freeze at $2.65 a gallon. "Zerex" is a companion product to "Zerone," largest-selling $1.00 anti-freeze. We believe that "Zerone" and "Zerex," products of Du Pont chemical skill, have no superiors in their respective fields.

DU PONT INTRODUCES "ZEREX" NON-EVAPORATING ANTI-FREEZE

Out of the same laboratories that developed that sensational new material, nylon, comes another chemical triumph—"Zerex," made to a new and exclusive Du Pont formula.

Special ingredients make "Zerex" different from all other premium anti-freeze brands. It protects metals in the cooling system against rust and corrosion. It is an anti-acid that prevents formation of chemicals that attack aluminum cylinder heads, rubber hose and pump packings. Gives improved cooling and engine efficiency—more heat from the car heater. It won't boil out. One filling does the job all winter long. Not just an anti-freeze, "Zerex" is a winter radiator conditioner. $2.65 a gallon, 70¢ a quart.

MORE "ZERONE" IS SOLD THAN ANY OTHER ANTI-FREEZE

Introduced only seven years ago, more "Zerone" anti-freeze is purchased today than any other brand! "Zerone" is so effective it could protect even at 215° below zero! Surprisingly little is needed. A car with a 15-quart radiator capacity (the average size) can often get all-winter protection for as little as $1.50 to $2.00.

"Zerone" is stable. Replacements are small. All you need is an occasional check-up. A solution of "Zerone" and water passes off engine heat better than water alone. That means improved engine performance. "Zerone" contains a rust inhibitor that keeps clean cooling systems free of rust and corrosion. For an efficient low-price anti-freeze, buy "Zerone." Only $1.00 a gallon, 25¢ a quart.

So Young WITH A TROUBLE SO OLD!

Upset stomach is an ancient trouble . . . often the penalty of the age-old habit of over-eating. When your stomach is sour, sickish, or upset, don't aggravate the condition with overdoses of drastic physics or purges. Take soothing Pepto-Bismol instead.

Pepto-Bismol is of great help when the stomach is upset by over-indulgence, change of diet, or improperly prepared or selected food . . . when relief is desired from the distress of gas pains, nervous indigestion or simple diarrhea.

Pepto-Bismol has no laxative action and is not ant-acid. It helps soothe the irritated intestinal walls as well as the stomach, and is decidedly pleasant to the taste.

50¢ at all druggists.

Norwich

Makers of "Unguentine"

PEPTO-BISMOL

FOR UPSET STOMACH

*REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

no object? Exactly! Reckless disregard of human life? Yes, again. For the stakes for which the guilty person was playing were enormous.

"But if this new, strange idea of mine was right, it must explain everything. It must explain, for instance, the mystery of the dual nature of Miss Sainsbury Seale. It must solve the riddle of the buckled shoe. And it must answer the question: Where is Miss Sainsbury Seale now?"

"Eh bien—it did all that and more. It showed me that Miss Sainsbury Seale was the beginning and middle and end of the case. No wonder it had seemed to me that there were two Mabelle Sainsbury Seales. There were two Mabelle Sainsbury Seales. There was the good, stupid, amiable woman who was vouched for so confidently by her friends. And there was the other—the woman who was mixed up with two murders and who told lies and who vanished mysteriously.

"Remember, the porter at King Leopold Mansions said that Miss Sainsbury Seale had been there once before. . . .

"IN MY reconstruction of the case, that first time was the only time. She never left King Leopold Mansions. The other Miss Sainsbury Seale took her place. That other Mabelle Sainsbury Seale, dressed in clothes of the same type and wearing a new pair of shoes with buckles because the others were too large for her, went to the Russell Square Hotel at a busy time of day, packed up the dead woman's clothes, paid the bill and left. She went to the Glengowrie Court Hotel. None of the real Miss Sainsbury Seale's friends saw her after that time, remember. She played the part of Mabelle Sainsbury Seale there for over a week. She wore Mabelle Sainsbury Seale's clothes, she talked in Mabelle Sainsbury Seale's voice. And then—she vanished, her last appearance being when she was seen re-entering King Leopold Mansions on the evening of the day Morley was killed."

"Are you trying to say," demanded Alistair Blunt, "that it was Mabelle Sainsbury Seale's dead body in that flat, after all?"

"Of course it was! It was a very clever double bluff—the smashed face was meant to raise a question of the woman's identity!"

"But the dental evidence?"

"Ah! Now we come to it. It was not the dentist himself who gave evidence. Morley was dead. He couldn't give evidence as to his own work. He would have known who the dead woman was. It was the charts that were put in as evidence—and the charts were faked. Both women were his patients, remember. All that had to be done was to re-label the charts, exchanging the names."

Hercule Poirot added: "And now you see what I mean when you asked me if the woman was dead and I replied 'That depends.' For when you say 'Miss Sainsbury Seale'—which woman do you mean?—the woman who disappeared from the Glengowrie Court Hotel or the real Mabelle Sainsbury Seale?"

Alistair Blunt said, "I know, M. Poirot, that you have a great reputation. Therefore I accept that you must have some grounds for this extraordinary assumption—for it is an assumption, nothing more. But all I can see is the fantastic improbability of the whole thing. You are saying, are you not, that Mabelle Sainsbury Seale was deliberately murdered and that Morley was also murdered to prevent his identifying her dead body. But why?"

"Why? Yes, that is the question. Why? Well, I will tell you what I think."

"Yes?"

Hercule Poirot leaned forward. He said, "It is my belief that Mabelle Sainsbury Seale was murdered because she happened to have too good a memory for faces."

"What do you mean?"

Hercule Poirot said, "We have separated the dual personality. There is the harmless lady from India, and there is the clever actress playing the part of the harmless lady from India. But there is one incident that falls between the two roles. Which Miss Sainsbury Seale was it who spoke to you on the doorstep of Mr. Morley's house? She claimed, you will remember, to be 'a great friend of your wife's.' Now that claim was adjudged by her friends and by the light of ordinary probability to be untrue. So we can say: 'That was a lie. The real Miss Sainsbury Seale does not tell lies.' So it was a lie uttered by the impostor for a purpose of her own."

Alistair Blunt nodded.

"Yes, that reasoning is quite clear. Though I still don't know what the purpose was."

Poirot said, "Ah, pardon—but let us first look at it the other way round. It was the real Miss Sainsbury Seale. She does not tell lies. So the story must be true."

"I suppose you can look at it that way—but it seems very unlikely—"

"Of course it is unlikely! But taking that second hypothesis as fact—the story is true. Therefore, Miss Sainsbury Seale did know your wife. She knew her well. Therefore—your wife must have been the type of person Miss Sainsbury Seale would have known well. Someone in her own station of life. An Anglo-Indian—a missionary—or, to go back farther still—an actress—Therefore—not Rebecca Arnholt!"

"Now, M. Blunt, do you see what I meant when I talked of a private and a public life? You are the great banker. But you are also a man who married a rich wife. And before you married her you were only a junior partner in the firm—not very long down from Oxford."

"You comprehend—I began to look at the case the right way up. Expense no object? Naturally not—to you. Reckless of human life—that, too, since for a long time you have been virtually a dictator, and to a dictator his own life becomes unduly important and those of others unimportant."

Alistair Blunt said, "What are you suggesting, M. Poirot?"

Poirot said quietly, "I am suggesting M. Blunt, that when you married Rebecca Arnholt, you were married already. That, dazzled by the vista, not so much of wealth as of power, you suppressed that fact and deliberately committed bigamy. That your real wife acquiesced in the situation."

"AND who was this real wife?"

"Mrs. Albert Chapman was the name she went under at King Leopold Mansions—a handy spot, not five minutes' walk from your house on the Chelsea Embankment. You borrowed the name of a real secret agent, realizing that it would give support to her hint of a husband engaged in intelligent work. Your scheme succeeded perfectly. No suspicion was ever aroused."

"Nevertheless, the fact remained, you have never been legally married to Rebecca Arnholt and you were guilty of bigamy."

"You never dreamed of danger after so many years. It came out of the blue—in the form of a tiresome woman who remembered you after nearly twenty years, as her friend's husband. Chance brought her back to this country, chance let her meet you in Queen Charlotte Street—it was chance that your niece was with you and heard what she said to you. Otherwise I might never have guessed."

"I told you about that myself, m' dear Poirot."

"No, it was your niece who insisted on telling me and you could not very well protest too violently in case it might arouse suspicions. And after the meeting, one more evil chance (from your point of view) occurred. Mabelle Sainsbury Seale met Amberiotis, went to lunch with him and babbled to him of this meeting with a friend's husband—'after all these years!—looked older, of course, but had hardly changed!'"

"That, I admit, is pure guesswork on my part but I believe it is what happened. I do not think that Mabelle Sainsbury Seale realized for a moment that the M. Blunt her friend had married was the shadowy figure behind the

"Remember, just once more! We got to get out of here!"

LAURENCE REYNOLDS

"These days more people than ever before choose Wine"

report hosts and hostesses all over America

Men and women are finding they prefer to be moderate when they relax and enjoy themselves

AUTHORITIES on entertaining, famous career women, popular hostesses throughout America agree on it.

This from a young matron at Richmond, Virginia: "I've discovered more and more people like a chance to choose a moderate beverage like wine."

This from an Arizona mother, a leader in local welfare circles: "Every time I entertain it seems that more of my guests choose wine." This from a Chicago expert on homemaking: "It particularly compliments my guests nowadays when I serve wine at dinner."

Mind you, many folks believe wine has won its new popularity because it is a moderate drink. You discover you don't want to bolt down a glass of wine. You find yourself lingering over it like a connoisseur, sensing its satisfying bouquet and flavor.

Isn't it a good idea to follow the lead of so many successful hosts and hostesses? When you do, you'll find wine offers a simpler, more gracious way to be hospitable. You'll be surprised, too, how inexpensive wine is.

Among the many well-known people who report that increasing numbers of their guests prefer wine are:

Mr. Boake Carter
Mrs. Howard Chandler Christy
Mrs. Basil Rathbone
Mr. Grantland Rice
Mrs. Lawrence Tibbett
Margaret Bourke-White
Mrs. Ogden Nash

Mrs. W. S. Carr of Montpelier, Vermont likes to have friends in for dinner. "I usually serve a simple meal," says Mrs. Carr, "and then with my main course I bring to table a good wine — ruby Burgundy with steak or roast beef, or mild Chablis with chicken. I notice that most of our friends nowadays prefer to have the drink served with the meal."

THE WINES OF CALIFORNIA:

In the most discriminating households the good wines of our own country are usually served today. Actually more than 9 in every 10 Americans who serve wine choose wines grown here. The wines of California, for example, are grown to strict standards of quality. You will find them true to type. Well developed. Inexpensive.

THE A-B-C OF SERVING WINE

A With meals, serve a "table" wine, red or white as you prefer. Table wines are made "dry" (not sweet) especially to complement main-course dishes. With your dinner, in portions about half the size of a water glass, try:
Burgundy, which is red, full flavored, grand with roast beef, steak, or turkey

B Or with refreshments or desserts, serve a "sweet" wine . . . rich with the natural sweetness of the grape. For instance, try setting out, in cocktail-size portions:
Port, which is red, full bodied, superbly rich — delicious with nuts or with crackers and cheese

C At the appetizer hour, bring on Sherry wine . . . mellow amber, nutlike in flavor, the perfect invitation to a good dinner. Sherry is usually served in cocktail-size portions

Be Considerate — Serve Wine

This advertisement is printed by the wine growers of California, acting through the Wine Advisory Board, 85 Second Street, San Francisco ity on entertaining and et-well known author and lec-Mrs. Helen Sprackling of New writes: "In more and more I notice that wine is a favor-average nowadays. So many es bring on a good red Claret dinner, for instance, or serve t Muscatel or Port at after-or evening affairs. I find this adds immeasurably to the of entertaining."

"I Live in a Great Big Way!"

Says
KATE SMITH

"... and so I gotta have room to—well—sort of relax in. The reason I like Pullman is that it's so spacious. So really comfortable. It makes it possible to take it easy in the day and sleep at night. And the service you get on Pullman is so friendly. It's fun to go places by Pullman. But I guess pretty near everybody knows that."

A Lower on the Average Overnight Trip Costs a Mere $2.65!

TO TRAVEL COMFORTABLY, go by Pullman. It gets you there quickly, comfortably, safely. And all those things are important when you go traveling.

You see, Pullman gives you plenty of room by day. It gives you a real bed to sleep in at night. And the service you get on a Pullman train makes your trip pleasurable.

You have ample room for your personal luggage, aside from the 150 pounds you can check free in the baggage car. Your shoes are shined while you sleep at night. There are clothes hangers in berth or room. And don't forget you can go to bed when you want to and turn out your light when you like; you'll be called in the morning.

You have access to the lounge or observation car carried by principal Pullman trains!

*Yet... a lower berth on Pullman costs only $2.65 for an average overnight trip (plus your first class rail fare). For a trifle more you can have exclusive use of the whole Section, with full use of both seats by day and the extra space normally made into an upper berth by night!

So why travel uncomfortably when you can go practically anywhere this way that gives you so much for so little?

Pullman's service is available over certain lines in Canada and Mexico, too! Why not see these friendly and colorful "foreign lands"?

Low Bargain Rate to See America

You can now see America at a bargain rate! Ask your railroad ticket agent, or any travel bureau, about Pullman (1st class) Grand Circle Plan. Permits a coast-to-coast round trip by many combinations of routes at an amazing low price! Tickets sold up to Oct. 31 (good for two months). Take advantage of this travel bargain!

ON PULLMAN YOU GET plenty of hot water, clean towels, pleasant surroundings. Ample mirror space and light add to your satisfaction. Pullman's comfort is a big attraction to women travelers.

A COMFORTABLE TRIP—with a relaxing night of sleep in a thoroughly air-conditioned car—gets you there looking, feeling your gay best! Pullman travel does not "frazzle" your nerves and appearance.

"HELLO, EVERYBODY!" This cheerful radio greeting is listened for eagerly by millions every week! Kate Smith's name is undeniably one of the best loved on the radio. In addition to her famous evening program, she conducts a series of daytime commentaries.

Copyright 1940, The Pullman Company

Go Pullman

finance of this country. The name, after all, is not an uncommon one. But Amberiotis, remember, in addition to his espionage activities, was a blackmailer. Blackmailers have an uncanny nose for a secret. Amberiotis wondered. Easy to find out just who the M. Blunt was. And then, I have no doubt, he wrote to you or telephoned. . . . Oh! yes—a gold mine for Amberiotis."

Poirot paused. He went on: "There is only one effectual method of dealing with a really efficient and experienced blackmailer. Silence him."

"It was not a case, as I had had erroneously suggested to me, of 'Blunt must go.' It was, on the contrary, 'Amberiotis must go.' But the answer was the same! The easiest way to get at a man is when he is off his guard, and when is a man more off his guard than in the dentist's chair?"

POIROT paused again. A faint smile came to his lips. He said, "The truth about the case was mentioned very early. The page boy, Alfred, was reading a crime story called Death at Eleven-Forty-Five. We should have taken that as an omen. For, of course, that is just about the time when Morley was killed. You shot him just as you were leaving. Then you pressed his buzzer, turned on the taps of the washbasin and left the room. You timed it so that you came down the stairs just as Alfred was taking the false Mabelle Sainsbury Seale to the lift. You actually opened the front door, perhaps you passed out, but as the lift doors shut and the lift went up you slipped inside again and went up the stairs."

"I know, from my own visits, just what Alfred did when he took up a patient. He knocked on the door, opened it and stood back to let the patient pass in. Inside the water was running—inference, Morley was washing his hands as usual. But Alfred couldn't actually see him."

"As soon as Alfred had gone down again in the lift, you slipped along into the surgery. Together you and your accomplice lifted the body and carried it into the adjoining office. Then a quick hunt through the files and the charts of Mrs. Chapman and Miss Sainsbury Seale were cleverly falsified. You put on a white linen coat, perhaps your wife applied a trace of make-up. But nothing much was needed. It was Amberiotis' first visit to Morley. He had never met you. And your photograph seldom appears in the papers. Besides, why should he have suspicions? A blackmailer does not fear his dentist."

"'Miss Sainsbury Seale' goes down and Alfred shows her out. The buzzer goes and Amberiotis is taken up. He finds the dentist washing his hands behind the door in approved fashion. He is conducted to the chair. He indicates the painful tooth. You talk the accustomed patter. You explain it will be best to freeze the gum. The procaine and adrenalin are there. You inject a big enough dose to kill. And incidentally, he will not feel any lack of skill in your dentistry!"

"Completely unsuspecting, Amberiotis leaves. You bring out Morley's body and arrange it on the floor, dragging it slightly on the carpet now that you have to manage it singlehanded."

You wipe the pistol and put it in his hand—wipe the door handle so that your prints shall not be the last. The instruments you used have all been passed into the sterilizer. You leave the room, go down the stairs and slip out of the front door at a suitable moment. That is your only moment of danger."

"It should all have passed off so well! Two people who threatened your safety—both dead. A third person also dead—but that, from your point of view, was unavoidable. And all so easily explained. Morley's suicide explained by the mistake he had made over Amberiotis."

"The two deaths cancel out. One of these regrettable accidents."

"But alas for you, I am on the scene. I have doubts. I make objections. All is not going as easily as you hoped. So there must be a second line of defenses. There must be, if necessary, a scapegoat. You have already informed yourself minutely of Morley's household. There is this man, Frank Carter—he will do. So your accomplice arranges that he shall be engaged in a mysterious fashion as gardener. If, later, he tells such a ridiculous story no one will believe it. In due course, the body in the fur chest will come to light. At first it will be thought to be that of Miss Sainsbury Seale, then the dental evidence will be taken. Big sensation!"

"It may seem a needless complication, but it was necessary. You do not want the police force of England to be looking for a missing Mrs. Albert Chapman. No, let Mrs. Chapman be dead—and let it be Mabelle Sainsbury Seale for whom the police look. Since they can never find her. Besides, through your influence, you can arrange to have the case dropped."

"You did do that, but since it was necessary that you should know just what I was doing, you sent for me and urged me to find the missing woman for you. And you continued, steadily, to 'force a card' upon me. Your accomplice rang me up with a melodramatic warning—the same idea—espionage—the public aspect. She is a clever actress, this wife of yours, but to disguise one's voice the natural tendency is to imitate another voice. Your wife imitated the intonation of Mrs. Olivera. That puzzled me, I may say, a good deal."

"THEN I was taken down to Exsham—the final performance was staged. How easy to arrange a loaded pistol among laurels so that a man, clipping them, shall unwittingly cause it to go off. The pistol falls at his feet. Startled, he picks it up. What more do you want? He is caught red-handed—with a ridiculous story and with a pistol that is a twin to the one with which Morley was shot."

"And all a snare for the feet of Hercule Poirot."

Alistair Blunt stirred a little in his chair. His face was grave and a little sad. He said:

"Don't misunderstand me, M. Poirot. How much do you guess? And how much do you actually know?"

Poirot said, "I have a certificate of the marriage—at a registry office near Oxford—of Martin Alistair Blunt and Gerda Grant. Frank Carter saw two men leave Morley's surgery just after twenty-five past twelve. The first was a fat man—Amberiotis. The second was, of course, you. Frank Carter did not recognize you. He only saw you from above."

"How fair of you to mention that!"

"He went into the surgery and found Morley's body. The hands were cold and there was dried blood around the wound. That meant that Morley had been dead some time. Therefore, the dentist who attended to Amberiotis

PITHOLE... DIZZY CITY in Early Oil Days

Stately sentinel in the hills . . . a picturesque derrick marking one of the thousands of small wells in the Pennsylvania oil region which chug steadily along, producing the crude to make Pennsylvania Motor Oils . . . so you can get better service from your car.

Says Davy Kerr, veteran production superintendent: "Boy, take a look at that!" He peers and sniffs appreciatively, as he watches a steady stream of precious Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil pumped from a newly-drilled well near Oil City, Pennsylvania.

At left is the official emblem of the Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil Association. It is registered in the U. S. Patent Office and protected under federal copyright laws. This emblem is not the mark of a brand. It is a guarantee to you that a motor oil is made entirely from Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil and that the oil is up to this association's rigid standard in every respect.

This advertisement is published in the interests of producers, refiners, wholesalers, retailers, exporters and users of 100% Pure Pennsylvania Motor Oil protected by our emblem. Watch for new announcements in this series.

Grant Well, at Pithole, a short-lived center of pandemonium in the Pennsylvania oil region. Fortunes flared up like rockets, and dropped like rockets' sticks. Named for General Grant, this well brought 200 barrels its first day. Next day it spouted 1,200 barrels. Like Pithole itself, the Grant Well quickly faded out, but good old Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil has never faded since the day of its "discovery" in 1859. Sheerly on quality, it has held first place in the favor of motorists everywhere.

From coast to coast, motorists were asked "What's the best oil for your car?" 82% said "Pennsylvania!" It's the nation's favorite . . . and rightly so.

PENNSYLVANIA GRADE CRUDE OIL ASSOCIATION
OIL CITY, PENNSYLVANIA
Copyright 1940, Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil Association

UP in my plane, or
DOWN in my car...

MY VOTE GOES TO PENNSYLVANIA MOTOR OIL!

"First peep out of him was,
'I want an Arrow Tie, too!'"

• The mechanics of looking your best are simple—just pick some Arrow Ties and see what they do for you! Arrow Ties are in rich fabrics designed to go specially well with your suits and shirts. They're perfect-knotting, wrinkle-resistant. See them at your Arrow dealer's. $1.00, and $1.50.

ARROW TIES

As Outstanding as Arrow Shirts

Made by Cluett, Peabody & Co., Inc.

"You'll have to wait, old boy... I can't let ANYTHING interrupt the enjoyment of my MENNEN SHAVE!"

Find out for yourself the downright enjoyment of using Mennen Lather Shave! Man, this different, penetrating lather is the champion whisker-wilder! Want real shaving comfort... without yank... without pull? Then say to your druggist, "Mennen Lather Shave for mine!"

Mennen makes a swell Brushless, too.

THE 3-STEP SHAVE OF GENTLE-MENNEN:—① SHAVE CREAM, ② SKIN BRACER, ③ TALCUM FOR MEN could not have been Morley and must have been Morley's murderer."

"Anything else?"

"Yes. Helen Montessor was arrested this afternoon."

Alistair Blunt gave one sharp movement. Then he sat very still. He said, "That—rather complicates matters."

Hercule Poirot said, "Yes. The real Helen Montessor, your distant cousin, died in Canada seven years ago. You suppressed that fact, and took advantage of it."

A smile came to Alistair Blunt's lips. He spoke naturally and with a kind of boyish enjoyment:

"Gerda got a kick out of it all, you know. I'd like to make you understand. You're such a clever fellow. I married her without letting my people know. She was acting in repertory at the time. My people were the strait-laced kind, and I was going into the firm. We agreed to keep it dark. She went on acting. Mabelle Sainsbury Seale was in the company too. She knew about us. Then she went abroad with a touring company. Gerda heard from her once or twice from India. Then she stopped writing. Mabelle got mixed up with some Hindu. She was always a stupid, credulous girl."

"I wish I could make you understand about my meeting with Rebecca and my marriage. Gerda understood. The only way I can put it is that it was like royalty. I had the chance of marrying a queen and playing the part of prince consort or even king. I looked on my marriage to Gerda as morganatic. I loved her. I didn't want to get rid of her. And the whole thing worked splendidly. I liked Rebecca immensely. She was a woman with a first-class financial brain and mine was just as good. We were good at teamwork. It was supremely exciting. She was an excellent companion and I think I made her happy. I was genuinely sorry when she died."

"The queer thing was that Gerda and I grew to enjoy the secret thrill of our meetings. We had all sorts of ingenious devices. She was an actress by nature. She had a repertoire of seven or eight characters—Mrs. Albert Chapman was only one of them. She was an American widow in Paris. I met her there when I went over on business. And she used to go to Norway with painting things as an artist. I went there for the fishing. And then, later, I passed her off as my cousin, Helen Montessor."

"IT WAS great fun for us both, and it kept romance alive, I suppose. We could have married officially after Rebecca died—but we didn't want to. Gerda would have found it hard to live my official life and, of course, something from the past might have been raked up, but I think the real reason we went on more or less the same was that we enjoyed the secrecy of it. We should have found open domesticity dull."

Blunt paused. He said, and his voice changed and hardened:

"And then that damned fool of a woman messed up everything. Recognizing me—after all those years! And she told Amberiotis. You see—you must see—that something had to be done! It wasn't only myself—not only the selfish point of view. If I was ruined and disgraced—the country, my country was hit as well. For I've done something for England, M. Poirot. I've held it firm and kept it solvent. It's free from dictators—from Fascism and from Communism. I don't really care for money as money. I do like power—I like to rule—but I don't want to tyrannize. We are democratic in England—truly democratic. We can grumble and say what we think and laugh at our politicians. We're free."

"I care for all that—it's been my lifework. And now there's the war, we must guard against inflation. If I went—well, you know what would probably happen. I'm needed, M. Poirot. And a damned double-crossing, blackmailing rogue of a Greek was going to destroy my lifework. Something had to be done. Gerda saw it, too. We were sorry about the Sainsbury Seale woman—but it was no good. We had to silence her. She couldn't be trusted to hold her tongue."

"Gerda went to see her, asked her to tea, told her to ask for Mrs. Chapman, said she was staying in Mr. Chapman's flat. Mabelle Sainsbury Seale came, quite unsuspecting. She never knew anything—the medinal was in the tea—it's quite painless. You just sleep and don't wake up. The face business was done afterward—rather sickening, but we felt it was necessary. Mrs. Chapman was to exit for good. I had given my 'cousin' Helen a cottage to live in. We decided that after a while we would get married. But first we had to get Amberiotis out of the way."

"It worked beautifully. He hadn't a suspicion that I wasn't a real dentist. I did my stuff with the hand-picks rather well. I didn't risk the drill. Of course, after the injection he couldn't feel what I was doing. Probably just as well!"

POIROT asked, "The pistols?"

"Actually they belonged to a secretary I once had in America. He bought them abroad somewhere. When he left he forgot to take them."

There was a pause. Then Alistair Blunt said, "I've killed three people. So presumably I ought to be hanged. But you've heard my defense."

"Which is—exactly?"

"That I believe with all my heart and soul that I am necessary to the ultimate success and prosperity of this country. We are at war. War depends largely on money and the management of money. You need, above all else, sound financial foundations. That's my job—and no one else can do it. It's in your hands, Poirot. It's up to you. You can, if you like, retire from the case. I can deal with Gerda's arrest—mistaken identity—I've got a lot of pull, you know."

"Yes, I know."

"Well, what about it?"

Poirot said slowly, "You are the right man in the right place at a moment that is full of peril. That is one side of the picture. But there is the other side. Three human beings who are dead..."

"Yes, but think of them! Mabelle Sainsbury Seale—you said yourself—a woman with the brains of a hen! Amberiotis—a crook and a blackmailer!"

"And Morley?"

"I've told you before. I'm sorry about Morley. But after all—he was a decent fellow and a good dentist—but there are other dentists."

"Yes," said Poirot, "there are other dentists. And Frank Carter? You would have let him die, too, without regret?"

Blunt said, "I don't waste any pity on him. He's no good. An utter rotter."

Poirot said: "But a human being..."

"Oh, well, we're all human beings..."

"Yes, we are all human beings. That is what you have not remembered. You have said that Mabelle Sainsbury Seale was a foolish human being and Amberiotis an evil one, and Frank Carter a wastrel—and Morley—Morley was only a dentist and there are other dentists. That is where you and I, M. Blunt, do not see alike. For to me the lives of those four people are just as important as your life."

"You're wrong."

"No, I am not wrong. You are a man of great natural honesty and rectitude. Years ago you took one step aside—and outwardly it has not affected you. Publicly you have continued the same—upright, trustworthy, honest. But within the love of power grew to overwhelming heights. So you sacrificed our human lives and thought them of no account."

"Don't you realize, Poirot, that the safety and happiness of the whole nation depends on me—perhaps the whole future of democracy?"

Hercule Poirot said, "What is it England is fighting for? You are fighting against that spirit that says it is justifiable to murder, to torture, to persecute—if thereby the nation is benefited. And that is your argument too. That individuals do not matter! But we say, who believe in democracy and freedom, that individuals do matter, that their lives should not be taken from them, that the life of every man, woman and child is as important as the life of the whole nation."

He got up.

"You may be a great financier, Mon-sur, and an honest patriot but you are a murderer. And I mean to see you hang for it!"

He went to the door and opened it. There were men waiting outside. . . .

Hercule Poirot went down to where a man was waiting.

Jane Olivera, her face white and drained, stood against the mantelpiece. Beside her was Howard Raikes.

She said, "Well?"

POIROT said gently, "It is all over. M. Alistair Blunt has been arrested for murder."

Raikes said, "I thought he'd buy you . . ."

Jane said, "No. I never thought that. I thought he might persuade you—"

Poirot said, "I am not easily persuaded. I am a Belgian and a bourgeois—" (He looked at Raikes.) "I live my principles."

He laid his hand on Howard Raikes' shoulder.

"You have joined this International Brigade that goes to the north to fight?"

"I have."

Poirot glanced at Jane.

And before you go—"

Jane said, "Before he goes we are going to be married."

Poirot said gently, "God bless you, my children. You are young. The world is yours. The New Heaven and the New Earth. In your brave new world, my children, let there be freedom and let there be pity. . . . That is all I ask. . . ."

HERCULE POIROT walked home along the deserted streets.

An unobtrusive figure joined him.

"Well?" said Mr. Barnes.

Hercule Poirot shrugged his shoulders and spread out his hands.

Barnes said, "What line did he take?"

"He admitted everything and pleaded justification. He said that his country needed him."

"So it does," said Mr. Barnes.

He added after a minute or two: "Don't you think so?"

"Yes, I do."

"Well, then—"

"We may be wrong," said Hercule Poirot.

"I never thought of that," said Mr. Barnes. "So we may."

They walked on for a little way, then Barnes asked curiously:

"What are you thinking about?"

Hercule Poirot quoted:

"Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, He hath also rejected thee from being King."

"Hm—I see—" said Mr. Barnes.

"Saul—after the Amalekites. Yes, you could think of it that way."

They walked on a little farther, then Barnes said:

"I take the tube here. Good night, Poirot." He paused, then said awkwardly: "You know—there's something I'd like to tell you."

"Yes, mon ami?"

"Feel I owe it to you. Led you astray unintentionally. Fact of the matter is, Albert Chapman, Q.X.912."

"Yes?"

"I'm Albert Chapman. That's partly why I was so interested. I knew, you see, that I'd never had a wife."

He hurried away, chuckling.

Poirot stood stock-still. Then his eyes opened, his eyebrows rose.

He said to himself:

"He did that to me—Hercule Poirot!"

And went home.

THE END

Is He "Too Tired" to Remember?

1. How long since your Bob has taken you out to dinner and the movies? How long since he's been fresh enough to want to go out or have fun with his family? Yet plenty of husbands who used to be too tired, aren't too tired any more!

2. They drink Knox Gelatine regularly. What got them started on such an idea? It was reports of hundreds of men and women in jobs* that take stamina. All took the Knox 28-day test. 2 out of 3 who started, and 9 out of 10 who completed the test reported that Knox definitely reduced tiredness.

*23 occupational groups were tested, including business people, housewives, physicians, nurses, electricians, policemen, postmen, truck drivers.

3. Why don't you and your husband try the Knox 28-Day Build-Up Plan?

If you're both tired because you are not getting enough of the right kinds of protein, start drinking Knox—it's all protein!

Drink 4 envelopes a day for the first 2 weeks; then 2 envelopes a day for the following 2 weeks. Thereafter as required. Stir contents of 1 envelope into ¾ glass of water or fruit juice. Drink immediately. (Directions in every package.) Knox is tasteless. For details on the Knox Build-Up Plan, write for free Knox Bulletin, Knox Gelatine Co., Dept. 70, Johnstown, N. Y.

Buy Knox Gelatine . . . the only gelatine used to fight fatigue in these hundreds of tests. Buy the familiar 4-envelope kitchen package or the money-saving 32-envelope package.

Knox Gelatine

A FOOD THAT FIGHTS FATIGUE

Fastest Sighting Combination Known

MARBLE'S Flexible Rear Sight and Sheard Gold Bead Front Sight

Look through peep to gold bead and center instantly on target. Coil spring keeps rear sight in true shooting position. Can be locked down. Interchangeable discs.

Price, $4. Gold front sight that never blurs. Price, $1.50. Give make, model and rifle cal.

Ask for Catalog

Marble Arms & Mfg. Co. 511 Delta Ave., Gladstone, Mich., U.S.A.

SAFE!

NEW DISCOVERY

For WORMING Your Puppy or Dog Without Danger of TOXIC POISONING!

Thanks to the NEW Glover's Imperial Capsules, the danger of toxic poisoning and violent after-effects from worming your pet is at last removed. This was never before possible in a worm medicine! They not only safely expel Round Worms (Ascarids) and Hook Worms, but also Whip Worms—all THREE! Think of the ECONOMY—only 25¢!

FREE DOG BOOK—Write Glover's, Dept. 16, 460-4th Ave., New York.

ONLY 25¢ GLOVER'S Imperial CAPSULES

NEXT STOP ST. LOUIS!

AND MY STOP IS HOTEL Mayfair!

TOPS IN FOOD & SERVICE—AND RIGHT DOWNTOWN

ALL ROOMS WITH BATH . . . RADIO RECEPTION

Safety in every step!

BILTRITE

WILL NOT SLIP

HEELS

and Cord-on-End SOLES

for MEN, WOMEN, CHILDREN

Longer Wear More Economical

Get the BEST—insist on BILTRITE

"Sahib Mahatma Finnegan reporting . . . we got 'im!"

JAY IRVING

Keeping Our Southern Customers

HOW to hang onto most or all of the increased South American trade that the European war threw to the United States? That is one of the big problems facing United States business—which we hope is doing some thinking about said problem, even in these tumultuous days of world-shaking events abroad.

From private advices that we consider reliable, we hear that the problem of getting and keeping South American business good will is still pretty much what it has always been. Though there are Nazi agitators all over South America, the danger that they will bulldoze any appreciable business away from United States firms seems to have been far overestimated.

The real threat to our postwar South American business appears to be a three-plied threat, of which two of the plies are old-timers, while the third is comparatively new:

The old-timers are these:

1. European business houses, especially German ones, have long been anxious to please South American customers in such matters as attractive prices, stretching a point or two or three when it comes to arranging credits, and packaging and delivering goods as the customer wants them packaged and delivered.

2. United States business houses generally, with some smart exceptions, have been just the opposite. U. S. business practice as a rule has been to put the price up and keep it there, to demand big down payments and cut the credit terms short, and to act in various ways as if South American customers ought to be humbly grateful to do business with United States firms at all.

If our boys doing business in South America can bring themselves to drop these trade practices overboard, the word is that postwar United States business in South America will have a fighting chance of holding the ground gained during the war. If not, not.

It looks like a call for some old-time American go-getterism, chiefly. The go-getters on this business battlefield, however, should be gentlemen who can speak Spanish and/or Portuguese and adjust themselves to the suave and easy way in which many South Americans like to perform a business deal.

Also, some judicious investment of United States money in productive South American enterprises would seem to be in order—in railroads, for example, and in steel mills and certain kinds of factories. General aim of this type of investment would be to help the forward-looking South American minority to raise the living standards and increase the wants of the South American masses.

It's hard to see how the United States Government can do any of this kind of work, except perhaps advance some money in proper cases. That nobody has much confidence in the government's ability to help directly is indicated by the dull thud with which the Western Hemisphere cartel proposal flopped in both North and South American business circles.

It looks like a job for private enterprise—and, inasmuch as South America is the largest, richest area now lying comparatively uncultivated in the world, a highly stimulating and potentially profitable job.

The government could help, though, by dropping its namby-pamby, one-way good neighborliness toward such things as the Mexican oil grab of a couple of years ago. By standing for this piece of Bolshevik banditry, our State Department (1) set other possible bandit politicians all over Latin America dreaming of some day grabbing United States holdings in their countries, and (2) made a lot of United States money extremely wary of going into Latin America because it couldn't be reasonably sure of ever coming out again.

This is the third and new element in the problem of getting, keeping and increasing South American business good will. We'd suggest that the government do its part toward meeting this problem. If it will, we have a hunch that most private business concerns will be willing to play ball.

FROM GENEVA TO PRINCETON

REMOVAL of most of what is left of the League of Nations from Geneva, Switzerland, to Princeton, N. J., is as fitting as anything we know of.

Woodrow Wilson was president of Princeton before he was President of the United States. Wilson dreamed the League of Nations. For all the disasters that befell it, and all the wreckage that the latest European war has made of it, it was a noble dream.

It still is a noble dream. Maybe some day men and women will grow up to the nobility of this dream. Certainly the League should go along in some form, however attenuated, so that the idea may not perish.

Perhaps after this war, when a new generation of Europeans (and maybe Americans) shall have learned the folly and accursedness of war, the League will regain its old appeal to the hearts and imaginations of people. Or it may merge into some improvement on the "Union Now" idea.

Anyway, it's a pleasure to welcome the vestiges of the organization—eight officials and their families—to sanctuary in the United States. Where the League was born once, it may be born again.

CANCER AND COMMON SENSE

WE SUPPOSE Americans do more worrying per capita about cancer than about any other disease.

The thing is so insidious—frequently takes a long time making its presence known; develops from mysterious causes having nothing to do with contagion or violation of any ordinary health rules, so far as is now known; is thought by many to be inescapably hereditary, and by others to be absolutely incurable.

Like the old-time worries, superstitions and misapprehensions about tuberculosis, syphilis and gonorrhea, the worries and superstitions and popular misconceptions about cancer are gradually being dispelled.

The work is being done mainly by the American Society for the Control of Cancer, Inc., 350 Madison Ave., N. Y. C. The society is non-profitmaking, is run on voluntary contributions and devotes itself to furnishing authentic cancer information, not individual advice or treatments, free to inquirers. If you have any cause to worry about cancer, we suggest that this is the organization to query. Its service can be relied on up to the hilt.

